At the time appointed the states met: Patû (or Batû), eldest son of Chuchi (or Juji), presided in the assembly; where they began to deliberate about proclaiming an emperor. Pala, a Mungl lord or prince, spoke first in the name of the empress regent; and declared, that, according to the orders of the emperor Ogotay, She-lye-men ought to be elected Khân. Moko, one of the sons of Toley (or Tuli), said, that there was none who durst oppose the positive command of a dying emperor. Patû said nothing at first, and seemed inclined to execute the will of Ogotay. The brothers and uncles of She-lye-men, with the sons of Quey-yew, and their friends, followed the advice of Pala. The general Mangusar was the first who proposed Meng-ko for emperor: he was seconded by Hu-lyang-butay, great general of the troops, who made a speech in favour of that prince; and said, that the circumstances of the times required that he should be elected. The advice of the great general was of mighty weight in the affair. In fine, Patû, who spoke last, declared that Meng-ko ought to be chosen (M). This opinion being carried by a majority of voices, Meng-ko was accordingly proclaimed and acknowledged emperor at Karakorom. The partisans of She-lye-men, spirited doubtless underhand by the empress regent, appeared resolved to proclaim that prince. On this occasion a second assembly was held in June, at the source of the river Wa-nan, or Onon: but, maugre all the cabals of She-lye-men, and the princes and generals of his party, the election of Meng-ko was confirmed; and the year 1251, which is the year of the bog (N), is marked in history for the first year of his reign^a.

by the influence.

THIS is the Chinese account of Meng-ko, or Mang-ku Khân's election. Let us now see what the more western historians say on that occasion. According to Abû'lghazi Khân, after the death of Kayuk Khân, the Mungls were long in doubt on whom to confer the government, considering the great number of Jenghîz Khân's descendants: but as Siurkboktney (O) Begbi Jebân, the favourite widow of Taulay (Toley, or Tuli) Khân, had by her charities gained the hearts of all, every one wished that the empire might devolve to one of her sons. It is true, Batu, son of Chuchi, or Juji Khân, who resided in Dasht Kipjak (P), seemed to be the person to whom the succession naturally had an eye: but as he had no desire to take the trouble on him, he invited all the princes of the house of Jenghîz Khân to repair to him, in order to choose a Khân. Some resolved to go; others refused; alleging, that the election ought to be made in the place where the Khâns usually resided. However, the widow of Taulay persuaded her five sons to attend Batu's summons; and the rather, as, being much distempered in his feet, it was fit they should pay him a visit. Batu received them with all imaginable honours; and, the day of meeting being come, recommended Mangu, the eldest of Taulay's sons, as a proper person to fill the vacant throne. This proposal having met with a general approbation of the princes and lords, they agreed to put off his inauguration till the end of the current year: and, at the beginning of the next, viz. 648, in another assembly, he was proclaimed Khân. When the ceremony was over, Mangu treated all those who met on that occasion for seven days; in which time were consumed, every day, eight waggon loads of wine, two of brandy, and twenty of kumis, in liquors. There were likewise killed for dressing, 300 horses, as many cows, and 1000 sheep^b.

of prince Batû.

A. D. 1250.

^a GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 105, & seqq.

^b ABU'LGH. hist. Turks, &c. p. 158, & seq.

Where that country is, does not appear. Abû'lghazi Khân says, he outdid all his predecessors in the magnificent presents, which, at the beginning of his reign, he distributed among the grandees of the empire. But that was to secure his interest against She-lye-men.

(L) By the Wbey-lû are to be understood properly the Mohammedans. Gaubil.

(M) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, in gratitude to Batu, for the service done him on this occasion, he yielded to him in every thing, and relied on him in all affairs of consequence; he likewise changed his name from Batu into that of Saghin Khân.

(N) In the duodenary cycle of the Mungls and Tatars.

(O) Called in the Chinese history Sarkutna.

(P) That is, the plain of Kipjak; intimating its being a champaign country, for it consists of wide extended plains.

C H A P. III.

The reign of Meng-ko, or Mangû Khân.

THE emperor Meng-ko had much vivacity and courage, having gained great experience ^{Fourth Khân,} in the campaigns which he made in Sken-si and Ho-nan, with his father Toley; as well ^{Meng-ko.} as in the war which engaged him so long in the west. He was personally acquainted with the vast dominions of the Mungls, and most of the generals, whether Chinese, Tatars, or foreigners. He appointed his brother Hû-pi-lay (or Kublay), lieutenant-general in all the countries south of the Great Kobi, or desert; that is, of Tartary bordering on the great wall of China, Lyau-tong, and the conquered provinces of China. He nominated generals to command in the countries of Almalig and Kashgar, on the river Amû, and in the parts adjoining to the rivers Irtish, Selinga, Onon, Tula, and Kerlon. He likewise ordered a great army to encamp near Karakorum. He recalled the seals from the Mandarins and officers, and published rules for government.

MEAN while general Mangûsar having discovered a conspiracy, formed by several princes ^{Plot in favour} and lords, in favour of She-lye-men, he was ordered to seize them: which he did, and cut off their heads. Abû'lghazi Khân relates the circumstances of this plot in the following manner. Shortly after Mangû Khân's advancement, Shiramûn (in Chinese, She-lye-men), one of Ugaday Khân's grandsons, persuaded the other princes of that Khân's race to make away with Mangû, as having usurped the throne in prejudice to them. This, he said, might be done with very little risque, because he suspected nothing. The proposal being approved of, Shiramûn marched before, with a detachment of 500 men, and some waggons, loaded with arms. But a domestic of the Khân, who was in search of some strayed dromedaries, happening to pass by a place where they stopped in the evening, suspected they had some ill design in hand, and hastened back to inform the Khân of it. Mangû, on this advice, sent 1000 of his principal officers, with 2000 soldiers, to know the occasion of their meeting; and being answered ^{of Shiramun;} by Shiramûn, that he was going to pay his compliments to the Khân, they conducted him and his followers to court. Mangû treated them very handsomely for three days: but, on the fourth, having strictly examined some of them, concerning the intention of their assembling, and they confessing that it was to revolt, he put to death fourscore, and pardoned the rest, together with Shiramûn, and the children of Kayûk Khân ^b. The monk Rubruquis, who makes Shiramûn Kayûk's brother, reports, that the plot having been discovered, much in the manner as above related, Mangû Khân put him to death, with his eldest son, and 300 Tartar lords; not sparing even the ladies, who were first whipped, to make them confess. However, he pardoned Shiramûn's youngest son, and let him possess his father's effects ^c.

AFTER this, Meng-ko took all places of trust and consequence from those whom he knew ^{who is} to be inclined to She-lye-men; and caused that prince, as well as others, of the family of ^{watched.} Ogotay and Quey-yew, to be narrowly watched. About the same time he ordered Holitay, one of his generals, to enter Tibet, and put to the sword all those who refused to submit to the Mungls. He also appointed Bonzas of the sect of Tau and Fo, to govern the other Bonzas of their respective sects. He conferred on the princess his mother the title of empress, and caused a palace to be built, to honour the memory of prince Toley (or Tuli), his father. He bestowed on him the title of Whang-ti (A), or emperor, and the name of Jû-i-tsông (B).

PRINCE Hû-pi-lay (or Kublay) always preserved much esteem and gratitude for a Chinese ^{Kublay} lord, called Tau-shû, from whom he had learned the Chinese language and literature. Tau ^{was} was one of the most learned men of his time, and of known integrity; with a genius and prudence more than common. When Hû-pi-lay went to take possession of his government, he carried that lord with him, to profit by his knowledge and advice. Tau-shû began by presenting the prince with a book upon good government; wherein he fully set forth the manner in which Hû-pi-lay ought to comport himself towards the *Chinese*s, Tatars, the troops, the lords, and the princes of his house. This work giving Hû-pi-lay a higher idea ^f of his master than before, he put himself wholly under his direction: and to this sage conduct it was that he owed the empire which he afterwards obtained. By Tau-shû's advice he applied himself wholly to war, and the care of the troops; leaving other affairs to the Mandarins appointed by the emperor.

^a GAZER, ubi sup. p. 109.^b ABU'LG. p. 159, & seq.^c PURCH. pilgr. vol. iii. p. 23.(A) Whang, august; Ti, lord, sovereign.(B) Jû-i, full of spirit; tsong, respectable.

the Chinese sciences.

As in Ho-nan, and the conquered parts of Hû-quang and Kyang-nan, there were many towns, and even cities, without inhabitants, as well as great and beautiful plains quite desart; Tau-shû erected at Kay-fong Fû a tribunal, whose business was to assemble as many husbandmen and peasants as they could; among whom, after furnishing them with proper necessaries, they distributed lands to cultivate; and settled what they were yearly to give the emperor, towards supplying the public magazines and granaries. This regulation extremely pleased the Chinese, who were, besides, charmed to see Hû-pi-lay skilled in their sciences. On the other hand, he gave the Tatars no less pleasure, by paying the troops; by well distinguishing the officers of merit; by consulting the old and experienced, shooting with the bow, going a hunting, and doing many other things agreeable to their taste.

Meng-ko's severity,
A. D. 1252.

In January 1252, the princess, mother of the emperor Meng-ko, died, generally lamented. She was daughter of the prince of the Kara-it, brother of Wang-Khân; for whose relations, as well as tribe, the Mungls had always a very great respect. About the same time the Khân being informed that several princes were still inclined to set She-lye-men on the throne, the desire of keeping possession caused him to do things which made a great noise. He ordered prince Hoangur, son of Hasar, Jenghîz Khân's brother, who commanded the troops encamped near Karakorum, to make a review of them there; and repaired himself in summer to that city, where he ordered all the grandees, generals, and princes of the blood, to attend him. He banished the princess, who was the third wife of the late emperor Ogotay, and confiscated her effects. He, in like manner, took from the other wives of that monarch all their gold, silver, and precious stones; which he distributed among the princes, lords, and officers. Prince Hatan was exiled to Bishbâleg; Myeli (C) to a country near the river Irtish; Perko to Kurchi (D); Toto to Imili (E). Mongoto (F) was banished also; as well as the brothers of She-lye-men and prince Haytu, who was the son of Hashe (G), son of Ogotay. As for She-lye-men, he was fettered, and confined in a fortress^d.

and cruelty.

BUT what made the greatest noise of all, was the sentence of death pronounced against the empress Wauli-hamish (H), formerly regent of the empire, and dowager of Queyew; and against the princess, mother of She-lye-men. Sentence was executed upon both these great ladies; and, to palliate the action, it was given out, that they were magicians (I), and made use of divers forceries to set the crown on She-lye-men's head. But the history disculpates these princesses, and treats Meng-ko very ill. It says plainly, that they ought to have adhered to Ogotay's will; adding, that posterity would accuse Meng-ko both of tyranny and usurpation. After this, the new Khân bestowed great largesses on the troops, diminished the taxes, and ordered all the officers to hold their troops in readiness, on the first warning. This same year Meng-ko made a solemn sacrifice to heaven, on a mountain; and informed himself, from the Chinese literati, of the ceremonies observed in the sacrifice. The Lama Na-mo was declared head of his religion in the empire, with the title of the emperor's doctor and preceptor. His brother Wato-chi, another Lama, had great employs at court.

War in Yun-nan.

In December the Khân erected the lands of China into fiefs, for the princes of his house. Hû-pi-lay had for his share Ho-nan, and part of Shen-si. This prince having received orders the same month to attack the city of Ta-li-fû, in Yun-nan, he took with him the general Hû-lyang-butay, and Tau-shû his counsellor, before-mentioned. About the same time envoys arrived from the country of Intû, or Hintûs (K), to render homage to the emperor.

Armies sent forth.
A. D. 1253.

In February 1253 Meng-ko assembled the princes and grandees at the river Onon, from whence he resolved to send armies on foreign conquests; one to India and Kashmir, another against Korea, and a third against the Khalifah, or Soltân of Bâghdâd (L). This last, the ^d GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 109, & seqq.

(C) Hatan and Myeli were two of Ogotay's sons.

(D) Gaubil knows not where Kurchi is situate. Kurchi, or Kurji, has a great similitude with Kurje, or Kurj, a country mentioned by La Croix, on the north of China; but that country, which he mistakes for Korea, appears, from circumstances, to be Lyau-tong, which we cannot well suppose is meant here.

(E) Gaubil is likewise at a loss for Imili; which seems to be Imil, a city mentioned by Abûlfaraj and Abûlghazi Khân; but where situated, neither of them specifies. There is a river of this name, to the south of the Irtish.

(F) Perko, Toto, and Mongoto, were grandsons of Ugaday.

(G) This must have been Kasbi, mentioned by Abûl.

ghazi among the sons of Ogotay, as hath been observed in a former note.

(H) By the oriental writers called Ogûi Gammish. In the life of St. Lewis, Sharmis.

(I) Meng-ko told the ambassadors of St. Lewis, that Sharmis was a forceress; but, it is likely, ordered that none should speak of her death. Gaub.

(K) It is also called Shin-tâ, that is, the country of India, or the Hindooes; called Hindolân by the orientals; who also distinguish it into Hind and Sind, like the Chinese.

(L) Abûlghazi Khân says, these expeditions were occasioned by the Khân's neighbours, both on the east and west, forming designs against his empire.

a most considerable of the three, was put under the command of Hyu-le-hô, or Hu-li-kâ, the emperor's brother. Among the generals who served under him was Kokan (M), a native of the city Ching, dependant on W'ha-chew, in the district of Si gan fû, capital of Shen si: he was versed in the mathematics, military affairs, and geography; he was likewise in great reputation among the troops.

b PRINCE Hu-pi-lay, who had assembled his army the year before at Lin-tau-fû, in Shen si, Kublay's son, entered Se-chwen; and by difficult roads, through mountains and precipices, arrived on the river Kiu-shu, or the Kyang. Great part of Tan-nan province was then possessed by princes independent of China. Tali, in particular, had a king of its own, who was taken with that city in December. Hu-pi-lay would have put all the inhabitants to death, but Tau-shi diverted him from that cruel design. The prince caused a map of the country to be given him, subdued the neighbouring princes, and penetrated into Tibet, where several others submitted to him. After this he returned to his government, leaving Hu-lyang-kotay to command the troops.

c IN 1254, Meng-ko again assembled the Tatar princes and lords, at the source of the Onon, Regulation where he made them great presents in gold, silver, and silks: he likewise fixed what the emperor was thenceforward to bestow on them every year: and performed another sacrifice to heaven. He ordered the troops in China to make great magazines of provisions in such cities of Ho-nan as they had inclosed with walls. Hitherto they had only made incursions into Se-chwen, to pillage the country, from whence they were obliged to retreat, and often with loss, for want of subsistence. For this reason Meng-ko ordered general Wang-te-ching, by Meng-ko, son of Wang-shi-hyen, to inclose several towns with strong walls, and lay in store of provisions. The Khân likewise gained the love of the people, by the care he took to hinder his troops from ravaging the plains and lands of the peasants. He caused diligent enquiries to be made secretly upon that head; made those amends who had been sufferers, and punished with death, even considerable officers, who had been aggressors. Nay, he severely punished his own son, for having, one time, in hunting, spoiled the plowed lands of certain countrymen.

d IN February 1255, Hu-pi-lay sent for a famous Chinese literato, called Hyu-heng, born at Mungls im-Ho-ney (N), in Ho-nan, who was much endeared to the Mungls. He took infinite pains to induce them to study the sciences; which they at length did, under his tuition, with such success, that they fell short in nothing of the Chineses themselves. A. D. 1255.

e IN June 1256, Meng-ko made great feasts for the princes and grandees. At the same time he received homage from several princes of Yun-nan, and the neighbouring princes, as well as from the Soltâns of the west. As Karakorum seemed to him very incommodious for holding general assemblies, and keeping his court; he ordered a Chinese Bonza, called Lyew-ping-chong, to choose a place in Tartary, which might thenceforth be the capital of his dominions. Ping-chong, who was a man of great genius, skilled in mathematics, history, and almost all parts of literature, made choice of a place called Long-kang, to the east of the city W'ha-chew; where they built a great city, with a palace for the emperor and grandees, temples, and tribunals; the whole surrounded with high and thick walls. In the neighbouring country they pitched on places for hunting, fishing, and whatever else might serve for the conveniencies of the new city; which was called Kay-ping-fû (O), and in a short time filled with an infinite number of Chineses and Mungls. Yet Karakorum still continued to be considerable, and enjoy a jurisdiction of greater extent.

f IN 1257, Meng-ko sent orders to his generals in Se-chwen, Hu-quang, and Kyang-nan, to prepare for attacking the Song on all sides; resolving himself to make the campaign in the first of those provinces. Before he left Tartary, he went to honour the memory of his grandfather Jenghiz Khân, in the palace destined for that use: and in July made a solemn sacrifice to heaven. After this he appointed his brother Alipûko (P) to command in Karakorum, and left the general Alantar to assist him with his advice. Then setting out the same month, he came to the mountain Lew-pan, in Shen-si, where Jenghiz Khân died. He was scarce arrived, when he understood that his brother Hu-pi-lay was come, with his family, and without any attendance, in the form of a criminal, to submit himself implicitly to the orders of his majesty: which news affected Meng-ko, and began to remove the suspicions which he had conceived against his brother.

HU-PI-LAY was greatly loved and esteemed by the Chineses, whom he governed with gentleness. He was accused of making himself independent; and his having gained the affecc CAUVIL, p. 112, & seq.

(M) His father Ko chay, and grandfather Ko-pau-yu, were generals of Jenghiz Khân.

(N) In the district of W'hai-hin fû.

(O) And afterwards Shang-tû. Lat. 42° 25' long. 111° 50'' west of Pi-king.

(P) Called Arigbaqa, Arigbuka, and Arigbaga, by the oriental authors.

prevents his disgrace.

Hu-lyang's conquests.

Mengko's forces.

Vigorous opposition

A. D. 1258.

made by the Song.

Lan-chew
surrenders.

tions of the soldiers and the Chinces was interpreted to his disadvantage. Meng-ko began by depriving him of his government, and turning out some generals, who seemed too much attached to him. Officers were appointed to command in China, and Mandarins to try those who were found to be criminals. While these judges repaired to Si-gan Fû, capital of Shen-si, and prepared to execute the emperor's orders; Hû pi-lay, stunned with this sudden disgrace, seemed inclined at first view to have recourse to arms, and revenge himself on those who were the authors of it: but as he did nothing without the advice of Tau-shû, this lord counselled him instantly to depart, without any troops, and, throwing himself at the emperor's feet, offer to give up to him his wives, concubines, and children, with all the riches that he had in gold, silver, and precious stones. Hû-pi-lay took his advice; which had so happy an effect, that Meng-ko, when he beheld his brother's humiliation, found himself touched; and his ancient tenderness for him returning, he embraced him several times with tears, revoked all his orders, gave him full power, and ordered him to prepare for the siege of Vû-chang Fû, capital of Hû-quang; then to march to Hang-chew, the metropolis of Che-kyang, and empire of the Song. At the same time he nominated general Chang-jau to command under him^f.

WHILE these things were transacting on this side, Hu-lyang-kotay, after the conquest of Tibet in 1255, subdued most of the countries bordering on Yun-nan: after which he undertook to penetrate as far as Tong-king and Kochin-china, which, at that time, were comprehended under the name of Gan-nan. Pursuant to this design, he sent officers to the king of that great country, to summon him to pay tribute to the Mungls: but, on advice that those envoys were imprisoned, he marched to the capital of the kingdom, ruined it, and plundered the country; and was on the point of returning towards Tali, when he received orders from Meng-ko to make all possible haste to join Hû-pi-lay, at the siege of Vû-chang Fû.

THE army of Meng-ko was divided into three bodies, in order to enter Se-chwen by three different parts, when the Arab, Persian, and other foreign merchants, offered the emperor precious stones, valued at 500,000 lyangs (Q). The Khân refused them at first, saying, that, in his present circumstances, silver and copper money was of use to him: however, in regard to the general Tsay-tyen-che (R), and other western lords, he took some of their jewels, and gave them silver; but forbade them to offer him any for the future. As soon as the army decamped from the mountain Lû-pan, Po-li-cha, a great Tatar lord, was nominated to command the first body: Mu-ko, the emperor's brother, led the second: and the Khân himself would conduct the third; which took the route of Han-chong Fû, in Shen-si.

THE Song always took care to furnish Se-chwen with good troops, well officered; so that, in spite of the formidable armies of the Mungls, they stood their ground: and although beaten, being but few, they commonly retook the cities which the enemy had reduced; because the Mungls, for want of provisions and forage, were obliged to withdraw. Nyew-lyen, of the Chan-chû tribe, whose father and grandfather were renowned in the army, having been sent before by Meng-ko, learned, towards the beginning of the year 1258, that Atabû, general of the Mungls in Ching-tû Fû, was reduced to great extremities, besieged on all sides by the Song. Hereupon, being, after infinite fatigues, arrived in sight of Ho-chew, he resolved to succour Atabû. For this purpose he made extreme haste towards him; and meeting by the way with a detachment of the enemy's army, fought them for a whole day, and gained a complete victory. For all this the Song took Ching-tû, and Atabû died. Nyew-lyen, driven almost to despair for not having prevented that loss, marched directly to Ching-tû; and, posting himself between the city and army of the Song, intrenched his forces. In short, the city, for want of victuals, surrendered, and the enemies troops thereupon dispersed.

NYEW-LYEN, being informed that Meng-ko was arrived at Han-chong Fû, left the government of the city to Lyew-hema, and went to Mabû; from whence he sent troops to facilitate his passage of the river Kyan-lin, over a bridge of boats.

THE princes Moko and Tachar (S) having joined the Khân, he took Long-gan Fû; and, at the head of his choicest troops, attacked Lan-chew (T). Yang-ta-ywen, who had at first killed the officer sent to summon him to surrender, being seized with fear on sight of the Mungl army, went out, with design to submit: but, changing his mind, returned to the city. Meng-ko, enraged at the murder, protested that he would ruin the city: but Li-hû-lan-ki, who was a good officer, and native of Shen-si, having represented, that, without the assistance of

^f GAUBIL, p. 114, & seqq.

(Q) Or tacis; amounting to 2,500,000 livres. Reckoning at 6s. 8d. English, 500,000 come to 166,666 l. 13s. 4d.

(R) An Arab, of the family of Mohammed, who surrendered to the Mungls, on their irruption into Arabia. Gaub.

(S) This was a prince of the blood, not the general of that name. Gaub.

(T) Now Pau-ning Fû, in Se-chwen.

a Tang-te-yeen, they could scarcely succeed in the war of Se-chwen, he sent an officer to assure the governor of his favour, who thereupon surrendered.

GENERAL Hû-lyang-bo-tay, in his return from Gan-nan, entered China by way of Tong-king; Quey lin Fû and, proceeding forward to Quang-fû, seized Quey-lin Fû, capital of that province, notwithstanding the difficulties of the roads; and troops of the Song, who endeavoured to dispute his passage. But that commander, and his son Abû, either defeated them where-ever they met, or duped them by false marches: so that the Chinese were surprised to see him penetrate as far as Chang-sha, a city of Hu-quang, which he invested in the beginning of the year 1259^e.

b THE first day of the same year, Mengko, with the army, arrived at the mountain Chou-tay, Ho-chew be- where, in a great council of the antient generals, To-whan, of the Chalar (or Jalayr) tribe, sieged, affirmed, that the war in Se-chwen would prove unfortunate, as the heats and moisture would A. D. 1259. destroy the soldiers; for which reasons he advised his majesty to return to the north. But Pa-li-che, of the tribe of Orla, insinuating that To-whan spoke through fear, was of opinion that the emperor should stay where he was. Meng-ko praised that general for his advice; and resolved to besiege Ho-chew (U), which he invested in February. The place was strong, and defended by Vang-kyen, a very intelligent officer, who had a good garrison, and plenty of provisions. Lu-ven-te, governor-general of the province, who so bravely defended Gan-fong, in Kyang-nan^b, watched all advantages, and lost no occasion to harass the Mungls, who were always obliged to march in strong bodies, to prevent being surprised by the troops which he c had posted in all the difficult passages.

MENG-KO having sent a Chinese officer to summon Vang-kyen to surrender, that commander, out of season, knowing that he had been in the service of the Song, after reproaching him with treason, ordered him to be carried to the place of arms, and put to death. Mean time Nyew-lyen, advancing to join the Khân, caused a bridge of rafts to be made near Fû-chew. Fû, another general, went and encamped near Quey-chew, on the borders of Hû-quang. It was not long before Meng-ko perceived that the siege of Ho-chew would cost him much trouble. In the same month the Mungls were repulsed before the western gate: nor were the attacks more successful in March. In April the thunder and rain, which continued for twenty days, did them much damage. For all this they one day scaled the walls, and made great slaughter among the d defendants. However, Vang-kyen, after opposing them for several days and nights, at length repulsed them.

MEAN while Lu-ven-te attacked with much resolution the raft bridge at Fû-chew Fû, and The Mungls got into the city of Kon-chin Fû, eight leagues south-south-west (X) of Ho-chew. There he distressed gathered more than 1000 barks to ascend the Kya-ling; but being attacked on that river by the general She-tyen-che, this latter took 100 barks, and pursued him to Chong-king. For all this defeat, Lu-ven-te distressed the Mungls greatly, by cutting off their provisions, which was one of his principal cares. They suffered much likewise by diseases; and Vang-kyen had always the advantage over them, both in the attacks and sallies. The Mungls, weary of the siege, which, notwithstanding the diligence and bravery of Vang-te-ching, who had the conduct e of it, was very little advanced in July, resolved to employ their best troops, and carry the place, cost what it would. On the other side, Vang-kyen and his garrison swore to perish, sooner than surrender.

THE tenth of August Meng-ko visited the works; and sending for Vang-te-ching, ordered him A general to get things ready for scaling the walls the night following. These orders were executed assault. with much secrecy and conduct. The Mungls were already mounted in great numbers on the walls, when the governor, on notice given him, hastened to their defence. The assailants cried out, Vang-kyen, surrender, and you shall have your life. But he, without minding them, assembled his people, and attacked them with so much fury, that Vang-te-ching, who mounted the walls first, and most of those who followed him, were slain upon the place: the rest were f pursued by the victor, who put several quarters of the Mungls into disorder. Meng-ko, upon this, ordered a general assault, and went himself to the scalade. But Vang-kyen was not to be forced. At the same time a storm fell, and blew down the ladders. Hereupon a dreadful slaughter ensued, in which an infinite number of Mungls perished; and, among the rest, the Meng-ko emperor, whose body was found pierced with several wounds. Thus died Meng-ko (Y), at the slain. age of fifty-two, after a reign of nine years.

UPON

^a GAUBIL, p. 117, & seq.

^b See before, p. 348, where it is called Gan-tong.

(U) Lat. 30° 8' long. 10° 8' west of Pe-king. In the Jesuits map it is written Ko-chew. There is another Ho-chew, in the west border of Shen-fû, to the south-east of Si-ning.

(X) It should be south-south-east, according to the Jesuits map of Se-chwen.

(Y) According to Abûlghazi Khân. Mangu, having sent Koplay eastward, and Hulaku westward, marched himself to Chinu Machin, or Jinu Mejin (rather Chin-u a Machin, that is, Chin and Machin), and in winter laid siege to Chinu, or Jinu, the capital. That in spring, a mortality UPON this disaster, the prince Moko, and the rest of the generals, agreed to raise the siege, and retire towards Shen-si. He likewise sent a lord to invite his brother Hü-pi-lay to return into Tartary, and he proclaimed emperor. The army after this decamped; and the hearle which carried the Khan's corpse was placed in the midst of a great body of troops.

Person and
character.

THIS Khan, as to his person, was of a middle stature, and flat-nosed (Z). Several of his wives had the title of empresses, after the example of Jenghiz Khan and Ogotay. The first of them was of the Hongkila (or Kongorat) tribe, and family of Te in. By them all he had five sons, and several daughters.

THE history reproaches Meng-ko, for his attachment to the Lamas.

ⁱ GAUBIL, p. 119, & seqq.

^k Ibid. p. 121.

mortality arising among his soldiers, his generals would have had him raise the siege: but, obstinately refusing, he at length fell ill himself, and was carried off in eight days, in the year 655 of the Hejrah, that is, of Christ, 1257.

(Z) It may not be amiss to give the whole passage wherein this is found, from William de Rubruquis, who was sent into Tartary in 1253: in January following he arrived at the court of Mangu Khan, and was admitted to audience, sitting on a bench before the ladies. The house was hung with cloth of gold. In the midst was a fire, made of thorns, wormwood-roots of a very large size, and ox dung. The Khan sat on a bed, and was clad with a robe of spotted fur, which shined like a seal-skin. He was of a middle stature, flat nosed, and about forty-five years old (1). His wife, who was a little pretty woman, sat by him: and, in another bed near it, sat Sirina (or Kbirina), one of his daughters, who was grown up, but very ill favoured; and several little children. Purches pilgrim. vol. iii. p. 25.

(1) He was then forty-eight years of age.

CHAP. IV.

The reign of Hü-pi lay, or Kublay Khan.

SECT. I.

Progress of the war in China, till Peyen, or Bayan, was made generalissimo.

Kublay
marches.

A. D. 1259.

DURING the winter of this year, Hü-pi-lay (A) parted from Long-kang, afterwards a called Shang-tü; and, in July 1259, encamped to the south of the river Jü, in Ho-nan. There he forbade committing massacres: and having given one part of the army to Chang-jau, the two bodies reduced the fortresses which are near the city Ma-ching, in the district of Whang-chew, in Hü-quang. In September he received an express from his brother Moko, to hasten his return with his best troops: but Hü-pi-lay, not thinking it for his honour to quit the country without doing some remarkable action, ascended the mountain Hyang-li (B), near Han-yang Fú, a city of Hü-quang; and took much pleasure to behold the course of the great Kyang, which he intended to pass. Although the Song had a numerous fleet, and many troops, on this river, yet Tong-wen-ping undertook to make the attempt. Having embarked with some companies of soldiers, he caused the drum to beat, and rowed briskly, to attack the van-guard of the Song. These, astonished at the resolution of the Mungls, made great cries, and fear threw them into disorder.

Besieges Vü-
chang.

HEREUPON Tong-wen-ping making a signal to the troops of Hü-pi-lay, this prince embarked; and next day his army appeared before Vü-chang Fú. The news of these motions caused a general fear, and greatly alarmed the court at Hang-chew. The emperor of the Song, on this occasion, opened his treasures, and distributed immense sums (C), with pieces of silk, to his troops: great levies were made throughout the empire; and a numerous army was ordered to Han-yang Fú, to succour Vü-chang Fú. The general of this army was Kya-tse-tau, a man

(A) D'Herbelot writes Kolla, or Killy: M. P., Ka-bly; some Koily, Koily. Several blangs at Peking pronounced Hü pi ly. The Chinese know him under the name of Tam-shi yü. Gaubil.—La Croix writes Kublay; in Atalghazi Khan we read Keply; with the addition of Khan, or Khan, in all.

(B) From thence one has a prospect of the cities Fü- chang Fú, Han-yang Fú, and Han-keu; with the course of the rivers Hü and Kyang. Gaubil.

(C) They reckon 105 wan of tach in silver, or 5,500,000 livres; 7700 wan of tyou, of hahet, or copper deniers. The tyan, at present, is 1000 deniers. A wan is 10,000 livres.

raised

a raised to the highest dignities of state, without talents equal to the charge. He was neither loved nor esteemed by the troops. The officers could not endure to be commanded by a person who had no experience; and often openly made a jest of the courage of their general. Kya-tse-tau was, besides, very vindictive, as well as vain: often without cause used the best officers ill; and in the disposing of posts never considered the merit of persons; which made several of them resolve to go over to the Mungls, from whom they were sure to receive better treatment.

THE governor of Vú-chang Fú amused Hú-pi-lay at first with false hopes, and slew the officer Makes peace sent to treat with him: but was himself slain some time after in a fall which he made. Kya-tse-tau led the greater part of the army to Whang-chew Fú; and in this march shewed that b courage did not belong to him. In November, Líu-ven-te, governor of Se-chwen, received orders to repair to Vú-chang Fú, to command in that important place. The siege went on apace; and the garrison had already lost many officers, as well as soldiers. Kya-tse-tau, apprehending the consequences of the loss of that city, sent to propose conditions of peace; one of which was, that the empire of the Song should become tributary to the Mungls. But Hú-pi-lay would not hearken to them. At this time Kya-tse-tau learned, by an express from Wang-kyen, what had happened at Ho-chew, and took occasion from thence to renew his propositions. At the same juncture Hú-pi-lay received positive advice that the general Alantar was doing his endeavours to set his brother Alipuka on the throne; and that several princes and lords were of his party. Upon this a great council was held, in which Hau-king, a learned and sage coun-c sellor, advised Hú-pi-lay to make peace with the Song; to fix his court at Yen-king, and cause himself to be proclaimed emperor. This advice being followed, Kya-tse-tau promised to pay annually twenty van of silver (D), and as much in silk, by way of tribute, and acknowledgement of the sovereignty of the Mungls over the Song. In consequence of this treaty, after the limits of both empires had been settled, Hú-pi-lay decamped, and repassed the Kyang. Hú-lyang-bo likewise raised the siege of Chang-shu, and crossed the same river, in his way to the north: but some troops of his army having stayed behind, on the other side, till February 1260, Kya-tse-tau ordered them to be put to the sword (E).

THE history, in this place, represents Kya-tse-tau as one of the most wicked ministers who ever existed. He made a shameful treaty for the Song, and concealed it from the emperor d Li-tsung (F), who believed the retreat of Hú-pi-lay was owing to that officer's valour and conduct: the 170 soldiers, massacred by his order, gave occasion also to give out, that the Mungl army had been defeated. So that the court at Hang-chew lavished their praises and rewards on Kya-tse-tau, not dreaming that what this wicked man had done would shortly ruin the empire ^a.

HU-PI-LAY, after the treaty concluded with the Song minister, left Hú-quang with his best troops; and, in December following, encamped in sight of Yen-king. His return produced e a general joy in the people of the north, who wished to see him immediately settled on the imperial throne. Most of the princes of his house, as well as of the Chinese and Mungls, but above all the princess of Hongkila (or Kongorat), his first wife, pressed him to declare himself emperor. While Hú-pi-lay seemed unresolved what to do on this occasion, there arrived a Mungl lord, deputed by Hulagú, and, in the name of that prince, made strong instances for having Hú-pi-lay proclaimed. At length, in April 1260, Moko, Hú-pi-lay's brother, Hatan, son of Ogotay, whom Meng-ko had banished to Bishbâleg; Tachar, grandson of Tyemuko, fourth brother of Jenghiz Khân; the deputy of Holagú, with those of many other princes, and a grand number of Tatar lords, assembled at the new city of Kay-ping Fú, afterwards Sbang-tú, in Tartary, and declared Hú-pi-lay emperor of the Mungls. Afterwards they saluted him as such; and the troops did the same. The Chinese every-where made great rejoicings: and the new monarch thought of nothing but to chuse good generals, able ministers, and above all wise men, who should promote the silk manufactures, commerce, f and agriculture.

MEAN time it was confirmed, from all sides, that prince Ali-pú-ko (or Aribuga), intended to Arikbuga make himself emperor: that he had a great army at Karakorum, commanded by general Alan- asires tar: that he was supported by the princes Asútay, Yu-long-ta-she, and Siliki, three of Meng-ko's sons, besides some others; and that many officers, who served in the province of Se-chwen and Shen-si, were in his interest. Hereupon Hú-pi-lay ordered his generals in Tartary to send him an exact account of what they knew in relation to the intrigues of his competitor. In ^a GAUBIL, hist. Gentch. p. 123, & seqq.

(D) That is, a million of livres, or about 50,000 l. sterling.

(E) A little lower, the number of those cut to pieces is said to have been 170.

(F) He was fourteenth emperor of the Song dynasty, which ruled over the southern China, and consisted of eighteen princes.

China, among other trusty lords, he made use of Lyen-hi-hyen, born in the country of Igir; a Chang-ting, a Chinese; and Chau-lyang-po, a native of Nyu-che (G). He appointed Hi-hyen the first governor-general of Shen-si and Se-chwen, with a good army under his command. This Hi-hyen was an able minister, as well as general, very learned, and had a prodigious memory. As an instance of his merit, prince Hatan desired to serve under him.

to the empire.

NOR was Ali-pu-ko idle on his part: he sent general Alantar into the northern provinces of Tartary, with large sums of money, and quantities of silks, to gain the heads of tribes. When-tû-bay, governor of Lû-pan, where Jenghîz Khân died; who had 60,000 men at his devotion, joined the governor of Ching-tû Fû, capital of Se-chwen; while other officers of Ali-pu-ko's party seized Fong-tsyang Fû, in Shen-si, and carried on a correspondence in Si-gan Fû, the metropolis of that province. After these precautions taken, Ali-pu-ko caused himself to be acknowledged emperor at Karakorum, as soon as he came to understand what had passed at Kay-ping Fû. Lyew-tay-ping, and A-lû-whay (H) (who, in the time of Meng-ko, commanded in Si-gan Fû, where they were hated by the people, to whom they were a charge), being now at Fong-tsyang Fû, in behalf of Ali-pu-ko, as soon as they heard that Hi-hyen was on his march for Shen-si, set out post for Si-gan Fû, where they arrived the first of May, and began to persuade the inhabitants to declare for his party. But two days after, Hi-hyen arrived, and gave heart to the people, who mightily dreaded the return of those two officers ^b.

Attempts on Shen-si.

THE general immediately caused the order for acknowledging Hû-pi-lay to be published through the city; likewise the patent whereby he was declared commander and governor of the provinces of Se-chwen and Shen-si. This done, he charged the officers to keep strict guard at the gates and walls, and to examine closely all those who went either in or out. He particularly gave a secret direction not to suffer either Lyew-tay-ping, or Ho-lû-bay to get away. Soon after, the guards gave notice, that they had stopped a stranger at the gate, who said he came from Lû-pan. This was a trusty officer, who had watched all the motions of When-tû-bay; and from him Hi-hyen learned the names and number of those who were of that governor's party. Hereupon the general assembled the officers and Mandarins; and, after consulting with them, caused Lyew-tay-ping and Ho-lû-bay to be put under an arrest. Then he sent Lyew-be-ma into Se-chwen, to put to death Mi-lyo-che, governor of Ching-tu Fû, and Kitay-pu-wha, who commanded on the frontiers. He gave an army to general Vang-lyang-ching, to go join prince Hatan; and appointed Pachun, a Mungl officer, to sustain Lyang-ching with 5000 choice men, drawn from Se-chwen. This done, he put to death Lyew-tay-ping and Ho-lû-bay, as rebels; and received orders soon after to save their lives.

His army defeated,

and generals killed.

WHEN-TU-HAY, who heard all this news with surprise, plainly perceived that Hi-hyen was thoroughly instructed in matters; and, losing hopes of taking Si-gan Fû, resolved to repass the Whang-ho; and, after reducing Kan-chew (I), went and joined Alantar. Prince Hatan, not being able to prevent either, marched northward with his horse; and, having encamped between the rebels and Karakorum, sent Hi-hyen an account how things stood. As he was quickly joined by Wang-lyang-ping and Pachun, he resolved to march in three bodies, and seek the enemy, whom he attacked to the east of Kan-chew. When-tu-bay and Alantar had the advantage at first, by means of a great wind, which incommoded with the sand and dust the cavalry of Wang-lyang-ping. Hereupon this general ordered his men to alight; and, falling on the enemy's left wing, put them into disorder, and then posted himself to the north of them. The right wing likewise began to stagger, and Pachun wheeled to the south. Mean time Hatan cut off their retreat towards Karakorum, and made so long an attack, that the troops of Alantar and When-tu-bay gave way on all sides. These two generals were both killed in the battle (K); and a great slaughter was made among their troops, who were not able to retire either towards the north or the great wall. In short, Hatan and his lieutenants gained a complete victory; and, by this means, Shen-si and Se-chwen became intirely settled.

c

Good regulations.

THIS year Hû-pi-lay sent for to court a Chinese doctor of great reputation, called Tew-me, an intimate friend of Tau-shu and Hyu-beng. He was one of those whom the emperor consulted most about the manner of governing the people: for he made it his business to have a personal knowledge of those who were best able to make his reign illustrious, either by means of arms, the sciences, public works, wealth, or commerce; and laid it down as a rule, to employ persons of merit, let their country or religion be what it would. Ever since the empire was founded, very few (literary) Mandarins were appointed to govern the people, and regulate the affairs of private men; no account having been made of any but officers. The person who at this time kept the seal was called Talia (L), or Targuji. This was then the most con-

f

^b GAUBIL, p. 132, & seq.

(G) Or Ny-che, the country of the Kin and Manchews, who are descended from the Kin. See before, p. 135, & alibi.

(H) Called, lower down, Ho-lû-bay.

(I) A city of Shen-si, near the great wall of China, towards So-chew.

(K) Which was fought in May, according to some; to others, in September. Gaub.

(L) Talia is a corrupt Chinese pronunciation of Targchi, or rather Targuji, as it is pronounced both by the Mungl and Si-gan.

- a considerable employment, and he took place of the ministers of state, who had not the authority which they possessed since. The Khân ordered Lyew-ping chong and Hyu-beng to settle the number, order, and authority of the Mandarins; with the salaries of each. In consequence of which he appointed the several tribunals of ministers of state, censors of the empire, ceremonies, Mandarins, crimes, public works, war, and other affairs. He regulated also the officers of the army, and those of the imperial palace: settled the tribunal of mathematics; and published all those different regulations. He caused the miseries of the people to be enquired into; and ordered the state of each country to be laid before him; setting forth what was either good or bad in it, what it produced, and what might be done to make it rich and commodious. This attention of Hû-pi-lay to such momentous matters, acquired him much honour in the opinion of the Chinese; who likewise saw, with extreme pleasure, people of their nation possess very important posts in the court, the army, and the provinces^c.

HU-PI-LAY loved men of learning, and such were seen at his court, who were of all sorts of nations. The history bestows great commendations on a Persian lord, named Cha-ma-lu-ting, who was an able mathematician. He composed a piece of astronomy for the use of the court; and presented the emperor with large and beautiful instruments, belonging both to that science and geometry. Gayfue (M) had the inspection of what concerned medicine, and was one of the principal Mandarins for mathematics. A great number of men from Igûr, Persia, Great Bukhâria, and other countries, were employed to translate books. In imitation of the Chinese emperors, Hû-pi-lay made choice of the most able doctors to compose an academy: they are called Han-lin; and this tribunal is at present in great consideration. As the Khân assembled a great number of doctors on this occasion, he set apart a distinct body of Han-lin, both to write and compose the history of the empire. At the head of these he placed Wan-gu, a person of probity, prudence, and capacity; who furnished good memoirs for the history of the Lyau and Kin. He wrote a great deal upon the Chinese classical books, and made a large collection of imperial edicts. When Ju-ning Fû was taken (N) he was put in the list of those who were sentenced to die; but was saved by Chang-jau.

MEAN time Hû-pi-lay sent Hau-king to the court of the Song emperor; both to notify his advancement to the throne, and execute the treaty concluded with Kya-tse-tau, during the siege of Vu-chang Fu. But as the Chinese monarch knew nothing of that treaty, his minister, fearing the envoy would discover his knavery, imprisoned him near Nan-king; and took all possible care that neither Hû-pi-lay nor his master should hear any thing from this lord. The Song emperor indeed was informed that a Tatar envoy was arrived on the frontiers; but Kya-tse-tau had the art to turn his thoughts to other matters.

THE Mungl emperor, being young himself, took a great liking to Pasepa, a young lord of Tibet, full of wit, and very polite. Pasepa was of an ancient family, eminent for virtue, whose ancestors, for ten centuries, had been the principal ministers of the kings of Tibet, and other western princes. This lord became a Lama, and made himself considerable among those of his sect. In 1260 Hû-pi-lay sent for him; and, in December, declared him chief of all the Lamas, with the title of doctor and master both of the empire and the emperor. China and Lyau-tong were divided into ten departments, with each its officers and Mandarins; and ten lords were appointed to be at the head of affairs relating to them: an order was likewise published, that the presidents in all the tribunals should be Mungls.

HU-PI-LAY was likewise pleased to ordain, that the fifty-seventh year of the Chinese sexagenary cycle, and year of the fox (O), in the Mungl duodenary cycle, that is, the year of Christ 1260 should be the first of his empire. He also, after the manner of the Chinese, gave to the years of his reign a title, viz. that of Chong-tong (P), of which the year above-mentioned was the first^d.

THE beginning of the next year the emperor set at liberty all the literati, who had been made slaves during the late wars. Mean time Kya-tse-tau, the Song minister, having maltreated Lyew-cheng, who commanded in the quarter of Lû-chew, in Se-chwen, this officer put himself and that city, with its dependencies, in subjection to the Mungls. Hereupon Lyew-ywen-ching, commander of the Mungls at Ching-tû Fû, went to pay him a visit. This coming to the knowledge of Yu-ling, governor of Se-chwen for the Song, who was Lyew-cheng's enemy,

^c GAUBIL, p. 132, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 136, & seq.

(M) The history praises his charity to the poor; and the exactness with which he performed his devotions to his Fo. He came from the kingdom of Fû-lin, a great country west of the western sea. Hence it appears, that he was a Christian, and perhaps a Frank, or European. Gaubil.

(N) Which put an end to the Kin empire.

(O) There is no such year as that of the fox in the Mungl or Kitayan cycle, in the epocha ascribed to Uigh Beigh; by which the year 1260 should be that of the Dakûk, or ben, the tenth of the cycle.

(P) The emperor who reigns at present (1726) bears the title of Yong-ching, as his father did that of Kang-hi. These titles they change whenever they think fit. Gaub.

and had been his accuser to Kya-tse-tau, he marched with forces to invest Lu-chew. At his approach, several Mungls were for abandoning Lyew-cheng to the fury of Heng; but Twen-ching told them he was resolved to die with Lyew-cheng in defence of so important a place. As succours happened to arrive opportunely, Lyew-cheng made a sally, and obliged his enemy to raise the siege, who thereupon was broken.

Ali-pu-ko defeated.

IN October the emperor Hû-pi-lay set out for Tartary, followed by the princes Hatan and Tachar, with a great body of Chinese troops, in order to attack those of his brother Ali-pû-ko. The two armies met at Simutû Nor (Q); where, after a bloody fight, that of Ali-pû-ko was intirely defeated: but this prince broke through the Khân's troops, and retired to the north (R). Hû-pi-lay took possession of Karakorum, where he found a great deal of riches; then returned to Kay-ping Fû, and from thence to Yen-king. Towards the end of the year, Lyew-cheng repaired to the court: and Lu-ven-te, the new governor of Se chwen, having taken Lu-chew, the beginning of 1262, Hû-pi-lay made Lyew-cheng governor of Quey-chew, in the same province, on the borders of Hû-quang; and this lord did the Mungls great services.

Li-tan revolts.

LI-TAN, the son of a great Mandarin, who had surrendered to Jenghiz Khân, commanded the Mungls in the districts of Tsi-nan Fû, I-tû (at present Tsing-chew Fû), and other places in Shan-tong. His power likewise extended over the parts of Kyang-nan subject to the emperor Hû-pi-lay; ever since whose accession to the throne, Li-tan had resolved to go over to the Song. This lord, having in January sent for his son from Kay-ping Fû, caused the two cities before-mentioned to be fortified, and then threw off the mask; declaring openly for the Song, to whom he delivered up several places of importance. On this occasion Wang-ven-tong, one of Hû-pi-lay's ministers, was detected in corresponding with Li-tan, and put to death. This Li-tan, who was a good commander, took the field, and made some conquests. Hereupon the emperor ordered prince Apiche, and general She-tyen-che, to haste and besiege Tsi-nan Fû in May. Chang-hong-fan, son of Chau-jau, who was posted on the west of the city, raised a wall of earth; and, having laid an ambuscade of cuirassiers, left the east gate open, and dug a deep foss.

Besieged and slain.

LI-TAN sallied presently, to attack this intrenchment; and while one part of them passed the ditch and entered the gate, the other scaled the wall: but the troops in ambush issuing forth, cut this whole detachment in pieces, and Li-tan had much ado to escape. The Song had indeed sent succours to Li-tan; but the general who commanded this army being seized with fear, on his entering Shan-tong, retired, after having conveyed 30,000 lyangs (S) to I-tu. The Mungl generals, after this, inclosed the city with a strong wall of earth, so that Li-tan could make no sallies: yet he still held out; and after having consumed all provisions, salted human flesh, and had no other food. At length, seeing no hopes of relief, he first slew his wife and concubines, and then threw himself headlong into a lake. However, She-tyen-che still found life in him, and slew him with his own hand; then ordered him to be cut in pieces (T). After this, the army marched to I-tu, which surrendered of its own accord.

The Song insincerity.

THE Chinese great men who were at court, particularly general Kokan, provoked at the conduct of the Song towards the Mungls, pressed Hû-pi-lay incessantly to declare war against them. The emperor hereupon complained, in a manifesto, of their unfair dealing; and either being ignorant of, or dissembling, the detention of Hau-king, said, that, before he resolved on war, he would wait the success of that envoy's negotiations. Mean time he appointed Achu, son of Hu-lyang-bo-tay, who was reckoned a great captain (having followed his father in all his wars in Tibet, the Indies, Gan-nan, and China), to command the army destined for the south.

Ahama's artifices.

ONE of Hû-pi-lay's faults was the love of money. It was difficult to persuade him that the Mandarins were dishonest, who furnished him with it: or, to speak more properly, he was not pleased to hear them ill spoken of. Ahama, a Mohammedan lord, and Arab by nation, was one of those bad subjects, who study only to procure money for their prince, by enriching themselves; without regard to the unlawful means which they make use of, the evils which they cause to the state, and the injury which they do to the reputation of their master. Ahama,

* GAUBIL, p. 128, & seq.

(Q) Simutû Nauei signifies the great lake. Naor, or Nor, is the Mungl word. Our author knows not where this lake is.

(R) According to Abûlghâzi Khân, Artokbuga, having been left regent by Mangu Khân, on his death got himself proclaimed Khân, and slew Koplay Khân's envoy, sent to dispose him to quit his pretensions. Mean time Burga being elected Khân of Kipjak, after the death of his brother Batû Saghin Khân, Artokbuga made war on him: but, having been defeated, fled towards Karakum, or Karakorum. On this news Koplay marched against him; but he fled: and some time after finding means to be reconciled to his brother, obtained his favour. Abûlgh. hist. Turks, &c. p. 162.—According to La Croix, after the last battle, Artokbuga, being vanquished, came and threw himself at his brother's feet, who only made him some reproaches at first; but afterwards shut him up between four walls, covered with thorns of the tree Adragant, and strictly guarded till his death, which happened a year after. Hist. Jenghiz, p. 399.

(S) Or taels; that is 250,000 livres. Gaub.

(T) This is one of the most ignominious treatments that can be given to a Chinese.

who

- a who was superintendant of the customs through the empire, had recourse to many contrivances to deceive the emperor, and the Mungl grandees. He would submit his accounts to none but ^{plunders the} the emperor, pretending to be independent of the ministers. Tew-me, Tau-shu, Hyu-beng, ^{people.} Lyew-ping-chong, and other Chineses, knew, from the first, the character of Abama, and did not fail to acquaint the Khân with it. Chang-when-kyen, in particular, made it appear, that it was contrary both to reason and practice to withdraw the customs from the jurisdiction of the ministers. As Hu-pi-lay, in this point, followed the advice of the Chineses, Abama had recourse to a thousand artifices to be revenged on them: he caused vast sums of money to be brought in to the emperor, giving him to understand, that it was the fruit of his good management; when, at the same time, the money was forced from the people by his commissaries, who were
- b men of no credit; and, indeed, no better than public robbers. He never ceased urging the Mungl lords to complain that the Chineses had too much power. But Tau-shu and Hyu-beng, being masters of more genius and address than Abama, they discovered all his fourberies, and took care to make the prince Cheng-king (U) acquainted with them.

Abama was greatly mortified to see the illustrious Tau-shu declared prime minister in Janu- ^{Mungls their} ary 1263. This lord, who was one of the most learned men among the Chineses, counselled ^{ignorance.} Hu-pi-lay to found, in all the countries within his vast dominions, colleges and academies, to educate youth in the sciences, arts, and good behaviour. The Khân himself was sensible of A. D. 1263. the ignorance which reigned, for the general, among the Mungl lords; and was ashamed to see the difference which there was between them and the Chineses, as well as the strangers from c the west, who were in great numbers at his court. The Mungls knew only how to handle the sword and bow; and their whole science was limited to some knowledge they had of horses. Hu-pi-lay began this reformation, by causing the princes his sons to be well educated. Chau-pi, a native of Tay-tong-fú, had already translated, into the Mungl language, part of the classical books; and Hyu-beng made an abridgement of the Chinese history and chronology (X). The emperor gave these works to the Mungls, to learn; and did not disdain to examine them himself upon the book of Hyu-beng.

THE observation of the rites due to the memory of their ancestors is, in China, an affair of ^{Palace of an-} state; and one of the principal duties from which the emperors themselves are not exempt. ^{cestors.} Hu-pi-lay built a magnificent palace (Y), in honour of his ancestors; and, in March, the same d year, went to pay his respects to them (Z). He was the first Mungl prince who performed this ceremony after the Chinese manner. He ordered the Bonzas and Lamas to recite, for seven days and nights, the prayers of their Fo (A): and since then this practice had been observed every year (B).

MEAN time Lyew-ching, governor of Quey-chew, in Se-chwen, was contriving how to get ^{Lyew-ching's} possession of Syang-yang and Fan-ching. Lü-ven-te came to be made governor of Hu-quang, and ^{address.} his brother Lü-when-whang was governor of Syang-yang: they were both good officers, and very watchful. But Lü-ven-te being covetous, Lyew-ching, by means of that fault, laid a snare for him, which he did not expect. As the subjects of the Song and the Mungls carried on a trade together at Syang-yang and Fan-ching, Lyew-ching proposed settling custom-houses near e those two cities. Lü-ven-te agreed to the proposal; and, finding the expedient to be very profitable, built large storehouses for the merchandizes. The Mungls inclosed their magazines with walls; and, under pretence of defending them against robbers, by degrees, introduced soldiers to guard them: and Lü-ven-te perceived, when it was too late, that he had been a dupe to his love of money. The Mungls, too well fortified to fear any danger, made incursions on all sides, and were very attentive to observe who went in and out of Syang-yang.

IN 1264, Lyew-ping-chong and Abama were declared ministers. This last had the manage- ^{Arikbuga sub-} ment of the revenue and customs, without being accountable to any but the emperor. In ^{mits.} March, prince Ali-pu-ko (C), brother of Hu-pi-lay, with the princes and lords of his party, came and submitted themselves to his clemency. The princes he pardoned; but put to death such

(U) Elsewhere Cheng-kin. He was the son whom Hu-pi-lay designed for the empire; but was not appointed heir apparent till the year 1273. Gaubil.

(X) He agrees exactly with Couplet, as to the number of years between Tau and Hu-pi-lay. Gaubil.

(Y) The public palace, where the Chinese emperors honour their ancestors, is called Taymyau.

(Z) The names of them were, 1. Lye-tsü, or Yesukay. 2. Tey-tsü, or Jenghiz Khân. 3. Tay-tsong, or Ogotay. 4. Chu-chi, or Juji. 5. Chabatay, or Jagatay. 6. Jui-tsong, or Toley. 7. Ting-tsong, or Quey-yew; that is, Keyuk Khân. 8. Hyen-tsong, or Mengko Khân. Gaubil.

(A) I know not whence the name of Fo is derived, which is given to their object of worship by the Chinese Bonzas, called Ho-shang: for La is the name which the Bonzas of Tibet, called Lamas, give to Fo.

(B) I cannot tell the reason, 1. Why Hu-pi-lay does not speak of any of Yesukay's ancestors. 2. Why he speaks not of the brothers of Jenghiz Khân. 3. Why having spoken of Chuchi and Chabatay, he does not speak of the fifth and sixth sons of Jenghiz Khân. Before this, among other ceremonies, they poured out and offered mares milk to their ancestors, while their Sam-man, or priests, recited prayers. It does not appear, that any of the emperors, before Hu-pi-lay, built Tay-myau, or temples: nor do I know, that, before Quey-yew, the Mungls had in their country any monasteries of Lamas. Gaubil.

(C) The same whom D'Herbelot, p. 267, calls Arikbuga.

of the lords as had seduced them to take up arms. The emperor gave to Kay-ping-fû the title of Sbang-tu (D), or high court; whither he went in March, and did not return to Yen-king till August. Every year he made this journey; and his Mungl successors followed his example. In January, the king of Korea sent an envoy, with compliments to Hû-pi-lay; and this custom has continued ever since. This year Kya-tse-tau, the Song minister, abolished the paper money, which was then in use in Southern China, and substituted another sort of paper money; which raised the deniers to an exorbitant value, and thereby rendered him very odious.

Gan-tong
prime minister: IN 1265, Gan-tong, descended from Mûbuli in the fourth generation, being then no more than twenty-one years of age, was the admiration both of the Mungls and Chineses, for his prudence and capacity. The most experienced generals proposed him to be generalissimo of the troops: the Chinese grandees counselled the emperor to set him at the head of state affairs; and the most able doctors reaped some instruction from his conversation. His high birth and good mien, his probity and reserve, rendered him beloved and respected by all the lords at court. He was, this year, chosen to be minister. The first thing he did was to fetch Hyu-beng back to court, and learn from him the science of government. Hyu-beng had never ceased to acquaint the emperor that Abama was a bad man; and the vexation it gave him to see him at the head of the finances, with the quality of minister, made him retire from court, to apply himself to study. Gan-tong had for an associate in the ministry a lord of the country of Parin (E), named Pe-yen, who was of his own character. He had passed his youth in Persia and Syria, and was newly arrived in the retinue of some lords sent by Holagû to the emperor: who, charmed with the polite behaviour and good aspect of Pe-yen, sent to speak with him in private; and from the first interview perceived that he was a great master, both in state and war affairs. Hû-pi-lay, on this occasion, appointed him also to be a minister; and said, that it was not fit such a man as Pe-yen should be in the service of any other but of him who was chief of the Mungl princes^f.

Hall of ancestors. IN 1266, the Tay-myau was finished; in which there were as many halls as princes honoured there. In each hall was placed a tablet, inscribed with the name and title of the prince; and on the side of such tablet there was another, with the name and title of the princess who was his first wife. Among those princesses was the empress Wauli-bamish, wife of Quey-yew, who was put to death by Meng-ko, or Mangu Khân. This year, Hû-pi-lay asked Te-wbey, whom he knew to be well versed in the history of the Lyau and Kin, if it was true, that the Lyau owed their ruin to the Bonzas, and the Kin to the Literati? Te-wbey answered, that it was not fact as to the first; but that the Kin had not employed the Chinese Literati enough.

Ta-tû city. IN April 1267, was finished, by the emperor Hû-pi-lay's order, the city called Ta-tû, or Tay-tû; that is, the great court; to the north-east of Yen-king, named also Chong-tu, or the court of the middle. These two cities, being very near each other, must have made a very spacious one. Ta-tû (F) in the bulk of the Tatar city, at present called Pe-king, the capital of China.

Syang-yang besieged. LYEW-CHING, having persuaded Hû-pi-lay to besiege Syang-yang and Fan-ching, before he made war on the Grand Kyang, that general and Achû were appointed to undertake it. Achû immediately set about fortifying a post at the mouth of the river Pe, which was finished in December. Lu-ven Whang sent his brother advice of this; and observed, that it was to be feared the Mungls intended to reduce the city by famine. He added, that it was necessary, without delay, to secure the posts which were in the neighbourhood, and drive the Mungls out of them. Lû-ven-te seemed to make a jest of his brother's fears; saying, that the place was furnished with provisions for several years, as well as numerous warlike troops. At the same time he gave out, that next spring he would repair thither in person. In 1268, Lyew-ching and Achû assembled the Chinese sailors, to build fifty large barks of war, and exercise the Mungls in combats on the river. This the two generals ordered to be done both night and day; and Achû soon became very expert himself. In September they formed the siege of Syang-yang, with an army of seventy thousand men.

Haytû defeated. THIS same year, Hay-tû (H), who, among others, as before-mentioned, had been banished by Meng-ko, because he favoured She-lye-men, appeared in Tartary, with a great army. This prince resolved to be revenged on Meng-ko, when he could find an opportunity: and, after his

^f GAUBIL, p. 142, & seq.

(D) The Ciandu of Marco Polo; spelled, in English, Cbandu.

(E) A country of Tartary, to the north of Pe-che-li: but Gaubil is not sure that the present Parix is the Parin of Hû-pi-lay's time.

(F) This is evidently the Kambala (or Kambâlu) of M. Polo. The vestigia of the ancient Yen-king are still to be seen, a few furlongs to the south-west of Pe-king. Gaubil.—Kan-balu, or Khan-palu, signifies the palace of the Khân. Khan balig, as the oriental writers name it, signifies the city of the Khân.

(H) Perhaps the Alga of Abû'lghâzi Khân, p. 163, & 167. or Naligu of others, grandson of Jagatay Khân.

a death, founded a considerable dominion in the country of Almâlig (I). He gained the affections of the people there, and drew to his interest the chiefs of tribes who encamped to the north-north-east of Turfân, as well as to the west and north of mount Altay. He likewise stirred up several princes of his family; and resolved at length to declare against Hû pi-lay: but his first attempt proved unsuccessful; for he was beaten, and forced to retreat to Almâlig.

b SHE-TYEN-CHE, having been made generalissimo of the army to be sent against the Song, Vast army, amounting to 300,000 men, of the best soldiers; several foreign lords, Igûrs, Persians, and Arabs, as well as princes, and chiefs of tribes, desired to serve under that Chinese lord; who was loved and esteemed by all. This general examined the avenues of Syang-yang; and, judging that the siege would be long, in January 1269, ordered strong walls to be built, to cut off the communication with other places; and caused great retrenchments to be made at a post called Lû-men, to shut up Fan-chin. Mean time Say-tyen-che, an Arab lord, with a great body of troops, most of them foreigners, from the west, had orders to encamp at Ching-tû-fû, capital of Se-chwen, and make incursions on every side.

c TATA-TONG-KO having introduced the Igûr characters, the Mungls began to have some Mungl character notion of history; and the natives of Igûr, as well as other countries, composed some books characters invented in the Mungl language. After that, Yelu-chu-tsai sent for Chinese literati, to teach the Chinese characters. The Persians, Arabs, and the Lamas of Tibet, had likewise their characters, as well as the Nyu-che or Kin, and Kitan or Lyau. The Mungl emperors had, since the time of Fengbiz Khân, employed in the public acts the Igûr and Chinese characters; but Hû-pi-lay imagined, that it was requisite, for the grandeur and glory of his nation, that it should have characters of its own. He gave this commission to Pa-se-pa, chief of the Lamas, who was thoroughly acquainted not only with the Chinese and Lama characters, but also with those of Tibet, called the characters of Tangut, of Igûr, the Indies, and several countries of the west of Asia. Pa-se-pa, having examined the nature of these several characters, with their conveniencies and inconveniencies, rejected the Chinese (which represent the ideas of things), and thought only of those which were proper to express the different sounds. Of these he formed one thousand; with rules for pronouncing, shaping, and writing with them. Hû-pi-lay was so well satisfied with this work of Pa-se-pa, that, in 1269, he declared this Lama a Regulo; and, in the patent A. D. 1269, which he gave him, was lavish in his praise. In February, he, by edict, ordered his characters, d which were called the new Mungl characters, to be used in all the tribunals; although, at first, the Mungls, who were accustomed to the Igûr letters, as well as the Chineses, who liked their own best, found some difficulty to learn the new ones.

e In March, Hya-quey, general of the Song, entered the Han, with a great fleet, manned with Syang-yang an infinite number of soldiers: but, not liking their looks, thought proper to retire again, relieved, though not without loss. However, that river overflowing in autumn, Hya-quey took advantage of the inundation, and entered Syang-yang, with all sorts of necessaries, in spite of Achû; who yet defeated him in his return. Since the time Lû-ven-te had been duped by Lyew-chong, he became inconsolable for his error; and the siege of the above-mentioned city gave him so much vexation, that he died in December this year. The death of this general gave a mortal wound to the Song affairs; and the Mungls, contrary to their custom, proceeded with so much precaution before Syang-yang, only because they feared the ability, attention, and bravery, of Lû-ven-te, from whom they had suffered so many evils in Se-chwen.

f In 1270, Abama began to dread the probity and genius of several great lords who were at Ahama's court. He had found means to render the fidelity of Lyen-hyen suspected, and remove him power; from court: but this minister, having cleared himself, resumed his employment, and joined more than ever with the Chinese grandees, to destroy Abama. This minister accused Hi-hyen of negligence, in suffering an officer within his jurisdiction to remain in prison, after the emperor had ordered his discharge. On Abama's complaint, Hi-hyen was removed, and sent home; where he lived like a philosopher. Hû-pi-lay one day asked the lords about him, what Hi-hyen did in his house? Abama made answer, and said, he spent his time in plays and feasting. The emperor, offended at this discourse, replied, that Hi-hyen was too poor to think of feasts and comedies.

HI-HYEN, although a stranger, was in great esteem among the Chinese Literati, because disgraces Hi-hyen: he professed to follow the doctrine of Konfusius. He was an enemy to the Mohammedans, Tau-tse, and Bonzas; especially the Lamas, or those of Tibet. A Tau-tse, who had access to court, would fain persuade the emperor to drink a liquor; which, according to the principles of his sect, would prolong his life, and make him happy after death. Hi-hyen, being consulted hereupon by the emperor, made a fine satire on the sect of Tau-tse; concluding with an harangue on the long life and virtues of the antient emperors Tau and Shun. Hû-pi-lay after this dismissed missed the Tau-tse; but would persuade Hi-byen to follow the maxims and rules of conduct laid down by Pa-se-pa. Hi-byen answered, that he followed the rules of Konfusius: and, without being afraid, repeated the precepts of that philosopher's disciples, on the sincerity of great men when they speak to the emperor; and the care with which a son ought to keep the precepts of his forefathers. Nothing could be more à-propos than this answer. Abama passed for a knave, and yet had the confidence of Hû-pi-lay^b. Jenghîz Khân had given orders, not to make use of Bonzasⁱ, and yet the court was full of Lamas. Hû-pi-lay was one of those great princes who did not take it ill to be told their faults; and always set a high value on those courtiers who were of Hi-byen's character, praising the delicacy and integrity of his answers.

§ GAUBIL, p. 146, & seq.

(1) Between Turfân and Kâshgar in Little Bukhâria, often mentioned before.

bated by all.

A. D. 1270.

Abama was hated by every body: but, because he imposed on the emperor by projects which gave him hopes of money, he was in favour; and, in 1270, his majesty gave his son the department of war. Among the princes, none but Ching-kin, the emperor's eldest son, dared to speak against Abama; yet Hyu-beng said openly, that it was dangerous to give such great posts to the father and the son. Abama hereupon laboured to get Hyu-beng appointed minister, with intention to ruin him: but this latter, suspecting his design, never would accept of that post. The year following, Hyu-beng conveyed to the emperor a writing, wherein he accused that minister of deceiving his sovereign, destroying the government, and ruining the people. As Hû-pi-lay made no answer to this accusation, Hyu-beng fell sick with vexation. Hereupon the emperor comforted him, by promising him the foundation of colleges or academies, to teach the sciences and morality.

A. D. 1271.

Title of Ywen.

In December this year, Lyew-ping-ching persuaded the emperor to give to his dynasty the name of Ywen (K). This Bonza said a world of obscure and enigmatical things on the occasion, with relation to the two figures of Fû-hi (or Fo-hi), first emperor of the Chineses. The first is expressed by the character Kyen, heaven; the second, by the character Quen, earth. The Bonza in his long discourse insisted, that, according to the sense of those two Qua (L), the Mungls ought to assume the title of Ywen. No body could find any thing solid in what he advanced; much less in the arguments which he drew from the sense of the words Kyen and Quen. However, the great reputation he had acquired, for a thorough knowledge of antiquity, supplied all defects. He was commended by every body; the emperor was felicitated on the occasion; and, by a public declaration, notified to his subjects, that they were thenceforth to give the Mungl dominion the title of Ywen.

Syang-yang
strengthened.

In May, Hû-pi-lay freed the people of Se-chwen for a season from tribute; and, at the same time, ordered general Say-tyen-che to plunder that part of the province which was still subject to the Song. Say-tyen executed his commission with rigour, and almost ruined the district of Kya-ting-fû. The troops who were before Syang-yang and Fan-ching, resolving to take those two cities by famine, general Chang-hong-fang made new intrenchments on the mountain Van. In June, a fleet of the Song, with 100,000 men aboard, and provisions for the besieged, appeared before Lû-men; but Achû, who commanded there, dispersed them, and took a great many barks, with all sorts of arms and other valuable booty.

The governor
distressed:

A. D. 1272.

LU-VEN WHANG, governor of Syang-yang, being greatly incommoded by the blockade, and finding no possibility of making sallies with success; in the beginning of the year 1272, ordered several bundles of herbs to be made, in one of which he inclosed a man, who could dive, and remain a long time in water, without either eating or drinking. In his hair was put a letter, written on wax, to acquaint the governor of Gan-lo, a city of Hû-quang, with his distress. The bundles were cast into the water; but both they and the bearer of the letter were taken. The governor of Gan-lo was Li-ting-chi, a man of consummate experience, as well as heroic zeal for his prince. He had orders to guard all the mouths of the brooks and rivers which fell into the Han. On one of those brooks, called Tsing-ni, he caused 100 flat and light barks to be built. He joined three of them together to make a large one, and had all the rest covered with decks. Three thousand soldiers, natives of Syang-yang, Gan-lo, and Shan-si, offered to man those barks, and succour Syang-yang at all hazards. Chang-quey and Chang-shun, who passed for intrepids, asked to command those three thousand men, Li-ting-chi bestowed grand titles on those two officers, distributed rewards among the soldiers, and furnished the threefold bark with all sorts of arms and provisions.

sends for relief,

It being now in March, and the river high, about ten or eleven at night, the two intrepids entered the Han, at Kotew-byang; where they drew up their little fleet. Chang-quey led the way, and Chang-shun made the rear-guard. In spite of wind and stream, which were against them, they passed before the retrenchments of the Ywen, and fell to the east of Mo-bong-tan. The Ywen, who had laid chains across in every part, on sight of the Song bark, ranged their own in order, and secured the river, so that it seemed impossible to advance. For all this, ⁱ See before, p. 330.

^b GAUBIL, p. 143, & seq.

(K) Ywen signifies beginning.

(L) Qua is the name of the figures ascribed to Fo-hi; of which number are Kyen and Quen. Gaubil.

a Chang-shun cut his way through, and fought for seven or eight leagues so vigorously, that the Twen were forced to give back, and stretch more chains. Chang-quey was already arrived, early in the morning, at Syang-yang, to the great joy of that city: but, after all his efforts, Chang-shun was not able to reach thither; being killed, fighting like a hero. His body, which was found pierced with ten wounds, four made by pikes, and six by arrows, was buried with great pomp^k.

LU-VEN-WHANG would fain have kept Chang-quey with him: but that officer depending on ^{of two intre-} his own valour, would needs return to Gan-lo. He found out two men, resolved to die; and ^{pids:} such skilful divers, that they could remain for several days in water. These two men went to, and returned from, Gan-lo under water, and brought advice, that Li-ting-chi had assembled, b at Long-vey-chew, 5000 choice men to succour Lu-ven-whang. At this agreeable news Chang-quey went aboard his bark, and resolved, at any risk, to join the succours designed for Gan-lo. That officer had beaten one of his soldiers; and, finding him missing, on the review which he made of his little troop before he set sail, concluded he had fled to the Twen. This accident made him hasten his departure; and, by favour of the stream, he, with his hatchets, cut the chains which obstructed his passage. He likewise attacked the retrenchments of the Twen; and, having ruined them by means of lances, fiery arrows, and other arms, arrived by night at Sin-ching, after having put the enemy's barks in disorder.

Achu and Lyew-ching then went aboard their barks; and, encouraging all by their presence, a bloody battle ensued. Both sides of the river were lined with lodgements of soldiers, and the river covered with vessels. Each lodgement, as well as bark, had its lanthorns lighted; and, on any other occasion, it had been an agreeable spectacle. In spite of the valour and number of the Twen troops, Chang-quey was already gotten near to Kew-lin-tan and Long-vey-chew; when, seeing standards displayed, he made great rejoicing, believing them to be the 5000 men sent by Li-ting-chi: but his joy was of no long continuance; for he found himself surrounded by the Twen. The troops of Gan-lo had indeed left that place; but the winds and stream made them retire, and the Twen posted themselves at Long-vey-chew. Chang-quey, after he had fought like a lion, and received several wounds, was taken, and brought before Achû; whom he would not kneel to: and he likewise swore never to have any other master than the emperor of the Song. Hereupon that general ordered him to be killed, and four prisoners d were charged to carry his body to Syang-yang. This fight threw the inhabitants into a consternation; and Lu-ven-whang ordered him to be buried near Chang-shun; building a house, as well as tomb, to honour their memory.

Among the general officers who commanded at the siege of Syang-yang was an Igûr lord, Fan-ching named Ali Yaya (M): he had a great knowledge of the western countries, and their manner of making war. In 1271, he advised the emperor to send for several of those engineers out of the west, who knew how to cast stones 150 pounds weight, which made holes seven or eight feet wide in the thickest walls: and with these, he said, Syang-yang and Fan-ching would soon be taken. Hû-pi-lay, liking the proposal, ordered two of these engineers to be sent for; who, after giving a specimen of their art before the emperor, at Ta-tû, were sent to the army, e towards the end of the year 1272.

THE river Han runs between Syang-yang and Fan-ching, in which last place Fan-shun and Nyew-fû commanded at the beginning of the year 1273. The two engineers, Alawating and Isamayn, planted their machines, which immediately made a breach in the walls. Hereupon the Twen, commanded by Ali Yaya, made an assault; and, after a bloody conflict, the suburbs of Fan-ching were taken. Flushed with this success, Sbe-tyen-che ordered Achû to attack the bridge, which joined that city to Syang-yang, and offered mutual succours. Achû conducted the troops with hatchets and scythes, to cut the wood and posts; while Ali Yaya caused stones to be shot against those who opposed that general. Other officers were commanded to cut the fastenings and stakes, and take away the crosses which held up the chains. After these f things were done, they burnt the bridge of barks. A great detachment was then posted along the Han, to hinder any succours from getting to Syang-yang by water. These precautions having been taken, the greater part of the army attacked Fan-ching on all sides, and made themselves masters of the walls and gates. Fan-tyen-shun, seeing the city taken, slew himself: saying, that he had lived a subject to the Song, and would die their subject. Nyew-fû, at the head of one hundred soldiers, resolved to fight from street to street, and slew a great number of the Twen. Both parties were so overcome with thirst, that they drank human blood to quench it. Nyew-fû, full of rage and despair, set fire to the houses, that the great beams falling might kill his pursuers, and embarrass the way. At length, pierced with several wounds,

^k GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 151, & seq.

(M) He was an Igûr, or Oygûr. His father was called Poly Haya. Many Igûr names ended in Haya.

he ran his head against a pillar, and threw himself into the flames, where he expired. The officers and soldiers, who were at his sides, followed his example. Thus the Mungls became masters of Fan-ching in January: where most of the general officers distinguished themselves; but their loss of subalterns and soldiers was considerable¹. -

Syang-yang
distressed:

KYA-TSE-TAU, the Song minister, would have commanded the army destined for the relief of Syang-yang; but it was refused him. General Kau-to was also proposed; but not employed. It was only resolved to send an army; which posted itself between Hsi-quang and Kyang-nan. However, the report spreading as if Kau-to was to march with succours to relieve that city, Lu-ven whang, fearing the arrival of a person who was his mortal enemy, dispatched several couriers to signify that he had no occasion for succours: for although he was reduced to an extremity, yet hatred and enmity made him tell this lye.

is battered,
and surren-
ders.

AFTER the taking of Fan-ching, all the materials which served at the siege were brought before Syang-yang. The two engineers posted themselves to the south-east of the city, against a wooden retrenchment, which was raised upon the ramparts. This was quickly demolished by the great stones which they launched against it: while the noise and havoc which they made struck terror into the hearts of the besieged; who had never seen or heard the like before (N). The garrison had, from the walls, observed part of what passed at Fan-ching, which much damped their courage. Lyew-ching having, in an assault, received a wound with an arrow, shot by Lu-ven-whang; to be revenged, asked leave of Ali Yaya to go and attack him: but Ali Yaya, instead of permitting him, went himself to the foot of the wall, and offered Ven-whang honourable conditions; which were accepted of, and his request granted, that he might be of the van-guard when they went to attack Gan-lo. Possession was given to Achû in February; upon which She-tyen-che sent Ali Yaya to court, where he was received with distinction, and had his praise publicly set forth, with that of the other generals, by Hû-pi-lay; who ratified all which he had promised to Ven-whang. This general, who followed Ali Yaya to Ta-tû, had also the honour to salute the emperor, and both were sent back (O) to the army, with new instructions.

Song minister's vanity.

As the family of the Lu was one of the most considerable in the empire of the Song, the defection of Lu-ven-whang made a great noise. His brother, his nephews, and other relations, who possessed his posts, sent petitions to the emperor, to declare themselves culpable; and worthy to be turned out of their employments, for being so unfortunate as to be allied to a bad subject, who had gone over to the enemies of the state. But Kya-tse-tau made no mention of their request; and, with his usual vanity, gave out, that this evil was owing to his being hindered from putting himself at the head of the army, and marching to fight the enemy.

Pe-yen made
general;

THE emperor Hû-pi-lay being informed, that several princes of his family were forming plots in Tatary, seemed inclined to make peace with the Song: but Ali Yaya, Lyew-ching, and others, having shewn how easy it would be to carry on the war with success, now Syang-yang and Fan-ching were taken, that prince resolved to continue it. She-tyen-che, on account of his infirmities, obtained leave to lay down his post of generalissimo, and proposed Gan-tong to succeed him. Yau-shu did the same: but the emperor appointed Pe-yen (P); whom he ordered to go, without delay, and put himself at the head of the army: complaining, that the Song had imprisoned his envoy, and not observed the treaty concluded with Kya-tse-tau. At the same time, the generals Polo-whan and Lyew-ching were commanded to march to Yang-chew, in Kyang-nan.

A. D. 1274.

¹ GAUBIL, p. 154, & seq.

(N) It is strange, that after what has been said of the pau, or engines, for casting or shooting stones at the siege of Kay-fong-fû, p. 340, and elsewhere, that both the Ywen and Song should consider those of the two strangers as new inventions, and till then unknown in China. These pau were named pau of the Mohammedans. Marco Polo, cap. 48, speaking of the siege of this place, which he calls Sian-fû, says, that he, with his father and uncle, offered their service for making engines, after the European manner, for casting stones of three hundred pounds weight. In which they employed Nestorians, who made three Mangani, as he calls them; and that the first stone, falling on a house, so demolished it, that the inhabitants immediately capitulated. This agrees with the Chinese history: but this latter declares positively, that the engineers were Whey-hû, or Mohammedans: but our author Gaubil thinks he might easily have mistaken them for Christians.

(O) This was in 1273: in which year Ching-kin, Hû-pi-lay's eldest son, was declared his heir. Gaubil.

(P) Called, by Marco Polo, Bayan.

S E C T. II.

Pe-yen's victories, and the ruin of the Song dynasty by that great captain.

Camps near Ganlo;

PE-YEN was saluted great general, near Syang-yang, by the officers; who were charmed with the manner in which he took possession of his new dignity. After which, Lu-ven-whang being appointed to command the embarked troops, the army marched toward Gan-lo; and,

- a and, in October, encamped to the west of this place; which is separated from Sin-in by the Han. They had stretched iron chains across the river, and barred it up with great barks, fastened together. They had likewise driven thick posts into the bottom of the chanel. The walls of Gan-lo were of good stone; and the city was furnished with all sorts of necessaries. Besides all this, it had a strong garrison; and Chang-chi-kyay was intrenched in the neighbourhood with a good army. Notwithstanding the apparent strength of the place, most of the generals were for attacking both it and the Song forces. But Pe-yen, after holding a great council, and examining the prisoners whom Achû had made, resolved to go another way to work. He caused a vast quantity of wood and bambû canes to be felled; and then ordered the general Li-ting to attack the post of Whan-kyawan. This post being carried, Pe-yen made use of his wood and bambûs to transport the barks into the lake Teng; from whence they entered the Han, before Gan-lo^m.

- b ONE of the principal officers of the garrison, having, at the head of 2000 men, retired to Tsven-tse-bû, was beaten, after a brave defence, and killed by Pe-yen himself. Afterwards, the general marched to Sba-yang; and, taking advantage of a high wind, which arose in the evening, by means of his Kin-shi pau (Q), burnt the houses, and took the city. They next ^{takes Sin-ching,} besieged Sin-ching, opposite to Gan-lo. From whence Pyen-ku, rallying on horseback, ran full-speed, shooting arrows on every side, with which he wounded Lu-ven-whang; and, having unhorsed, obliged him to retire. Ven Whang renewed the attack with fresh men; but Pyen-ku, with his fire-arms (R), made him give way a second time. However, that commander, having ordered all his soldiers to the assault, they, by getting on one another's shoulders, mounted the walls, and took the city, on the second of December. Pyen-ku, after a brave resistance, ran himself through; and, being half-dead, threw himself into the fire. Three thousand men, whom he commanded, fought desperately, and died all with their arms in their hands. Pe-yen had the curiosity to see the dead bodies, which were pierced with many wounds; and, with the other general officers, admired so great courage.

THIS year great troubles arose in the cities of Wa-to-van (S), Irgben, and Kâshgar: but Hû pi-lay restored things to order again.

- c PE-YEN, in 1274, assembled the generals at Tsay-tyen, some leagues to the west of Han-kew, ^{and Sha-vû-kew;} where the Han enters the Great Kyang, to consult on the manner and time of passing that river. Hya-quey, general of the Song, had fortified the posts along it, and put 8000 men into Yang-lo-pu. He likewise seized on Sba-vû-kew, and covered the Kyang with armed barks. Pe-yen, under pretence of fortifying himself, put troops into several posts; and, being acquainted with the country, gave his orders in such a manner, that the troops might come together again in a short time, to attack Sba-vû-kew (T): the conduct of which he committed to general Hargan, of the Chalayr tribe. To conceal his design, he besieged Han-yang, which made Hya-quey believe, that his view was to take Han-kew. In this persuasion he came to relieve Han-yang: of which Pe-yen being informed, he gave his orders to Hargan, who forthwith attacked Sba-vû-kew, and made himself master of that important place. This done, Pe-yen caused his barks, which were in the Han, to sail into the river Lun, where he had an hundred barks of war, besides many others at Sba-vû-kew; and Hya-quey had the vexation to see that general's horse encamp to the north of the Kyang.

- d PE-YEN after this directed Achû to pass the Kyang, with stout troops, and send him notice ^{passes the} when he was over. Achû that evening descended the river, two or three leagues to Chin-shan-ki; ^{Kyang-} and next morning, at day-break, came in sight of Sba-chew, an isle of the Kyang, to the west of Vû-chang-fû. There he ordered Shi-ke, son of the general Sbe-tyen che, to advance before: who being met by Cheng-pen-fey, an officer of that city, he was beaten, and repulsed. But Achû coming up obliged Pen-fey to retire with loss, and then made towards the bank, where a fierce fight ensued; in which Pen-fey, being entirely defeated, was forced to return to Vû-chang-fû. Achû after this landed; and, having fortified himself, sent advice to Pe-yen, who received the express on the day of the Red Dragon, in the twelfth month (U). Hereupon the general ^{A. D. 1275.} ordered the greater part of his army to join Ali Yaya, and follow his directions for attacking Yang-lo-pû; where Wang-ta, after defending himself valiantly at the head of 8000 men, was

^m GAUBIL, p. 156, & seq.

(Q) Kin, metal, Shi, juice; that is, melted metal pau. I know not what this is. Gaubil.

(R) It is not said what these fire-arms were. Gaubil.

(S) Gaubil cannot say what city this is; but explains Va-eul-kan, or Go-el-kan, and Ha-she-ha-eul, to be Irgben, or Irgben, and Kâshgar, in Little Bukhâria.

(T) The Chinese geography puts Yang-lo-po, above-mentioned, twelve leagues to the west of Whang-chew-fû, and Sba-fû-kew, or Sba-vû-kew, twelve leagues to the north-west; but I know not if that be exact. Gaubil.

(U) That is the 26th of January, 1275. In the seventh moon [which we reckon July], 1274, Tû-tsung, emperor of the Song, died, and was succeeded by his son (Kong-tsung), but four years old; the empress his grandmother taking on her the regency. Gaubil.

flain. As soon as this place was taken, Pe-yen, without delay, crossed the Kyang with all his army, instead of following Hya-quey (as several officers propose¹); who, informed of the bold action of Achû, went off with 300 barks; and, after having set fire to the barks, fled sneak-ingly down the river. Mean time the city of Han-yang surrendered to the Ywen.

Vû chang-fû
surrenders,

PE-YEN having joined Achû, the siege of Vû-chang-fû was resolved on; in order to have a retreat on the Kyang, in case of any misfortune. A Song general set out from Kyang-lin-fû (now King-chew), in Hû-quang, to succour Vû-chang: but when he heard, that Yang-lo-pu and Han-yang were taken, he went back again. All these misfortunes had so discouraged the gar-rison of Vû-chang, that Lû-ven-whang soon prevailed on the principal among them to deliver up the city, notwithstanding the strong remonstrances of two officers. The Mungls would have killed these officers; but Pe-yen praised their fidelity, and forbade them to put any body to death. This general, by his address, managed the people to his interest; and knew how to profit by the discontent which reigned among the Song officers. Lû-ven-whang gained over many lords of his family, who commanded along the Kyang: so that the cities of Ki-chew, Whang-chew-fû, and others, were taken, without striking a stroke^a.

with other cities.

MEAN time Kya-tse-tau, the Song minister, under pretence of rewarding the services of Lu-shi-quey, governor of Kyang-chew (now Kew-kyang), a city of Kyang-si, upon the Kyang, got him made head of a tribunal at Hang-chew-fû, capital of the Song empire, and sent an officer to command at Kyang-chew. Shi-quey, imagining that they distrusted him, and to be revenged on Kya-tse-tau, surrendered the city to Pe-yen. At a great entertainment which he gave that general, he presented him with two young ladies, of the imperial blood of the Song. Pe-yen refused to accept of the present, and shewed himself displeased with Shi-quey on the occasion: for that great man never addicted himself to a vice so common among the grandees of his nation. Gan-king, in Kyang-nan, on the Kyang; and Nan-kang, in Kyang-si, eight leagues to the south of Kyew-kyang, with other cities, surrendered also. In short, every place submitted, on the approach of the Ywen general.

Peace proposed.

LYEW CHING, having miscarried in his attempt to pass the Kyang on the side of Yang-chew, was baffled before a place of no consequence. When he heard of the reduction of Vû-chang-fû, and the success of Lû-ven-whang, his enemy, it gave him deadly anguish, and he died, regretted by the Ywen. Kya-tse-tau feared his daring spirit; and, knowing him to be so near, durst not venture out of Hang-chew-fû. But, as soon as he heard of his death, he caused a great fleet to be fitted out: and, putting himself at the head of 130,000 men, entered the Kyang by Si-gan-chi-kew, and went to post himself at U-hû. In February, he was joined by the fleet of Hya-quey. After this he sent to Pe-yen a Mungl prisoner, with a grand regale of fruits; and was not ashamed to propose peace to him, upon the terms concluded with Hû-pi-lay. Achû, at the time of that treaty, was with his father Hu-lyang-botay, at the siege of Chang-sha; and, having been witness of Kya-tse-tau's fourberies, acquainted Pe-yen therewith: who, thereupon sent Nan-kyatay, a Naymân lord, of great descent, to that minister, with orders to reproach him for his unfair dealing: and to tell him, "that for the honour of his master, he ought to have spoken of peace sooner; but that now the time was past."

Pe-yen's
answer:

takes Chi-
chew;

MEAN time Pe-yen laid siege to Chi-chew, in Kyang-nan, a few leagues east-by-north of Gan-king: when Chau-ma-fa, governor of the city, finding it impossible to defend it, said to his wife, that he could neither resolve to be unfaithful to his master, nor bear to see the city possessed by strangers. After speaking these words, he killed himself; and his wife did the same. Pe-yen then entered the city, and made the people fall on their knees, according to the Chinese ceremony. They obeyed; and, weeping, loaded with praises both Chau-ma-fa and Pe-yen: who forthwith ordered the army and fleet of the Song to be attacked. Kya-tse-tau was at Lû-hyang; Sû-hû-ching with 70,000 choice men, at Ting-kya-chew, below Chi-chew; and Hya-quey, with 2,500 barks, in the middle of the Kyang. Hya-quey was persuaded he should never be pardoned the fault he had committed, in flying when Pe-yen was about to cross that river; and could not bear to see Sun-hû-ching preferred to him. This made him take the resolution not to fight.

defeats the Chinese;

THE Ywen general, having caused great heaps of grass and straw to be put upon rafts, spread a report, that he intended to burn the enemy's barks. He then ordered his own to get ready for battle; while the horse and foot marched along both sides of the Kyang. The Song commanders were day and night on their guard, although their soldiers had no inclination to fight. At length Pe-yen ordered a great stone to be shot from his pau, against the body commanded by Hû-cheng; which put the troops in motion: and Achû, who encamped opposite to Hû-cheng, following the stream, advanced to attack his van-guard. On this Kyang-tsay, Hû-cheng's lieutenant, made a shew as if he intended to stand the shock: but the troops, seeing their general on a board his concubine's bark, cried out, that he had taken to flight. These cries begat confusion; and Hya-quey, calling out to Kya-tse-tau, that there was no withstanding the enemy, fear-fizzed him also. Achû took advantage of this disorder, and fell upon the Song troops; who were put to a general rout: while Achû, supported by Pe-yen, with all his forces, made a great slaughter. Many of the enemy's soldiers were drowned; and the Twen got an inestimable booty.

^a GAUBIL, p. 159, & seq.

AFTER this defeat, Kya-tse-tau retired in haste; and soon after, Hya-quey joined him. Hichin, depe- coming up to them, fell a crying; and said, there was not a single man, who was willing to rate. expose himself to death. Hereupon Hya-quey, mocking him, replied, that he and Kya-tse-tau had fought even to death. When they had breathed a little, the minister asked him, what was to be done, as things stood? Hya-quey told him, that the best way would be to go to Tang-chew; and there, gathering as many men and barks as he could, put to sea: after this he went his way, with a design to join the Twen on the first opportunity. Many of those who fled from the battle repaired to Tang-chew, and spoke openly against Kya-tse-tau; and indeed Pe-yen owed his great success as much to the bad conduct of the Song generals, as to his own valour and prudence. The consternation became almost universal through Che-kyang, and Kyang-nan: so that the governors of Ching-kyang, Ning-que, and Ho-chew, in the last of those provinces, and even of Nan-chang-fû, capital of Kyang-si, abandoned these cities; and the Twen took Tau-chew in the same province, several of whose Mandarins slew themselves, rather than surrender °.

c THE principal officer of Kyen-kang (now Nan-king), in Kyang-nan, took what gold and silks The minister he could get, with abundance of silver, and abandoned that city: for a great number of Man- removed. darins were weary of Kya-tse-tau's government, and chose rather to see the state perish, than obey that minister: in Hang-chew itself there was a minister who deserted it. A lord, named Wang-si-lin, coming to hear of Kya-tse-tau's shameful flight, gave a great entertainment to the lords who were his friends and relations; and, not being able to support his grief, slew himself three days after. Mean time the empress, who had the title of the Song monarch's grandmother, and regent of the empire, took the management of affairs from that minister; and published an edict to exhort the Mandarins to do their duty. She likewise caused writings to be posted up throughout the empire; wherein she invited the grandees, officers, and persons of fortune, to succour the state in such deplorable circumstances. Chang-shi-kyay, always faithful to his prince, retook Tau-chew, in Kyang-si; Ven-tyen-syang sold his effects to levy troops, and raised 10,000 men. Others made great efforts likewise: but Pe-yen, by his activity and policy (X), disconcerted the most prudent measures of the loyal Song.

d IN March, this general took Nan-king (Y): he bestowed bounty on the poor, and sent Pe-yen's physicians into the towns and villages afflicted with contagious diseases; he forbade the least pil- humanity. lage, on pain of death, and did friendly offices to every body; especially the officers, whom he always distinguished above others. In short, he made himself admired, as well for his sincerity, as for his disregard of pleasures and money.

e HU-PI-LAY having renewed his complaints against the Song ministers, for the detention of Complaints of Hau-king; the court caused that lord to be enlarged. On his way back to Ta-tû he fell sick; the Twen. and although the emperor sent physicians to cure him, yet he died as soon as he arrived at that city. On which occasion Hû-pi-lay made a great eulogy on the qualities of Hau-king, who had composed large comments on the I-king and Chun-tsyen. Another ground of complaint quickly followed: Lyen-bi-kyen, brother of Lyen-bi-byen, who was president of the tribunal of ceremonies at Ta-tû, being transferred to Nan-king, Pe-yen sent him a guard of 500 soldiers. As he went to a fort (Z) near Hang-chew-fû, capital of Che-kyang and the Song empire, the garrison seized, wounded, and sent him to that city, where he died of his hurts. An officer likewise of the tribunal of public works, who was in his retinue, was slain. This affair made a great noise; and the Song ministers immediately dispatched a messenger, to assure Pe-yen that neither the empress regent, nor the emperor, knew any thing of the matter; and that they would, without delay, make the necessary enquiries to discover and punish the authors of that crime: they intreated Pe-yen, at the same time, to make peace on the conditions which they proposed.

° GAUBIL, p. 162, & seq.

(X) Pe-yen is the general whom M. Polo, and others, name Bayan. The word Chinsan (Kinsan), which he joins with it, is a corruption of Tsay-syang, which signifies minister of state. Gaubil. Polo says, Chinsan signifies 100 eyes; nor has it in sound the least similitude with Tsay-syang.

(Y) In the same month, Chang-chew-fû and Sû-chew-fû, in Kyang-nan, were taken; and Po-lo-han reduced Tsing- ho, Hay-chew, and other important places in the same province. Gaubil, p. 166.—In the same month Man-ghola, son of Hû-pi-lay, followed prince Gau-lûche into Tibet, to punish those who had revolted in that country. Ibid. p. 171. note (1).

(Z) It appears afterwards that the name of this fort was Tû-fong-quan; and that Lyen-bi-kyen went to treat about affairs with the Song.

Ali Yaya's
exploits.

AFTER Vai-chang-fû was taken, Pe-yen left the government thereof, and its district, to Ali Haya (A), with 40,000 men, and the two officers of the west, who were skilled in shooting great stones. This general made himself no less famous than Pe-yen: he knew how to gain the hearts of the Chinese (whose characters and sciences he understood very well), as well as of the troops, who had a great esteem for him. Ali Haya took the field, and attacked the naval force of Kau-shi kyay in Tong-ting Hû, a famous lake of Hû-quang; which he defeated after a bloody fight, and slew the admiral with his own hand. After this victory, he presented himself before Yo-chew, near the said lake, and reduced it: he likewise obliged King-chew, Gan-lo, and other places, to surrender. Then drawing into the field, he, in several rencounters, beat general Kau-ta, an officer of reputation, who afterwards went over to the Ywen. As the news of these conquests gave a sensible pleasure to Hû-pi-lay, who loved Ali Haya, he wrote the eulogy of that general with his own hand: wherein, among many other soothing expressions, he said, "That when he knew him (Ali Haya) to be at such a distance from Pe-yen, and furnished with so few troops, he feared he should want opportunities of making conquests worthy of his courage."

Affairs of Tartary.

SHE-TYEN-CHE died at Ching-ting-fû, in Pe-che-li, on his return from Hû-quang, in the beginning of the year. This general had always commanded great armies with applause since the time of Jenghîz Khân. Before he died, he intreated Hû-pi-lay to forbid slaughter after he had passed the Ky-ang: the Chinese have made great encomiums upon him. This same year (1275) the emperor bestowed the government of Al-malig on his son Nanmûh-in, under whom Gan-tong had command of the troops. Hû-pi-lay thought it convenient to oppose a prince of the blood, and a good general, to prince Hay-tû, who made incursions over all Tartary ^P.

Yang-chew
besieged.

MEAN time Achû and Chang-hong-fan, who were in the neighbourhood of Yang-chew-fû, in Kyang-nan, after several small battles, in which they had always been victors, came to attack the southern gate of that city. Li-ting-tchi commanded there; and, notwithstanding the great conquests of the Ywen, sustained himself a long time. In May, a detachment of the Song retook the city of Chang-chew-fû, in the same province. Chang-shi-kyay, having gathered a great number of barks, posted himself near the mountain Tsyau. He ranged ten great barks in a line, which he made almost immovable by means of anchors: and forbade touching them under pain of death. Achû, who saw them at a distance, resolved to burn them. With this view he embarked 1000 cross-bow men; and, putting himself in the middle of them, shot burning arrows, which set fire to the masts and sails of the enemy's fleet. At the same time he so briskly attacked Shi-kyay's troops, that, for all their general's bravery, they could not withstand the shock, many of them jumping into the river. Chang-hong-fan, and Tong-wen-ping, watching their time, with their chosen troops, fell on the body commanded by Shi-kyay in person; who, having had none with him but new levies, was obliged to retire towards the mountain Chen. Achû took more than 700 barks; and many of the Song officers dispersed. As for Shi-kyay himself, who was always firm, and never disheartened at any misfortune, he demanded new succours from the court: but receiving no answer, he was obliged to run from place to place to raise new recruits; and, although neglected, still encouraged the people, and exhorted them to be faithful to their prince.

Great naval victory.

Hay-tû in arms.

IN the interim, Hû-pi-lay saw himself threatened with a bloody war in Tartary. The officers of Hay-tû went over all the tribes to make friends, and the prince himself stirred up all those of his family against the emperor: however, it does not appear from the history, what were either his complaints or pretensions. Whatever they were, he this year appeared with prince Tua, at the head of 100,000 men, in the country of Igûr, and besieged Idikut (or Idikut) in his capital (B); whom they would oblige to become their ally, and renounce the party of Hû-pi-lay. But Idikut answered, "that he knew but one master to whom he was tributary, and would rather be cut in pieces than depart from his duty." Accordingly he defended himself valiantly till succours arrived; and then forced the princes to raise the siege. After this he went to court, where the emperor did him all sorts of honours, and loaded him with riches. Idikut was grandson and heir of Idikut, who submitted to Jenghîz Khân, and had married a daughter of the emperor Quey-yew (or Kayuk). ^e

Pe-yen
marches

THIS war, which threatened Tartary, made Hû-pi-lay recall Pe-yen, to command in the north: but, at that general's intreaty to continue the war in the south, the emperor complied, and ordered him to march immediately towards Ling-gan (C) (or Hang-chew-fû). In October, a Chinese officer, named Li-fû, threw himself into Chang-sha-fû, a city of Hû-quang, resolved to ^P GAUBIL, p. 165, & seq.

(A) Before called Ali Yaya.

(B) This, we presume, was Ho-chew, a few leagues to the east of Tarfân, as hath been already remarked, p. 290, note (Y).

(C) So the capital of the Song empire was then called.

perish

a perish in defence of the place: he had 3000 men in garrison, with much provision, and other necessities. They were besieged by Ali Haya; and although the streets were full of dead bodies, and the inhabitants in great distress, yet they held out with so brave a governor. Achâ had been a long time before Yang-chew-fû, but the brave Li-ting-cki and the citizens still defended themselves with a valour admired by the Mungls.

PE-YEN being come to Man-tew with his army, passed the Kyang; and sent Algan, accompanied by Gau-lû-che, to attack the fort of Tû-song-quan, near Hang-chew-fû. Tong-wen-ping ^{towards the capital.} and Syang-wey went toward Wba-ting, along the sea-coast; in which detachment was Fan-wen-bû. Pe-yen and Atabay, preceded by Lu-ven-wbang, went to lay siege to Chang-chew-fû, into which Ven-tyen-sang attempted in vain to throw succours, for he was always beaten. Algan, after taking Quang-te, appeared in sight of Lin-gan; which alarmed the court, who made all above fifteen years of age take up arms.

MEAN time, Song-tu-hay, son of general Tachar, Li-beng, of the family of the kings of Mi-yew's Hya, and Lu-shi-quey, who surrendered Kyew-kyang, being detached by Pe-yen, made great ^{bravery.} conquests in Kyang-fû. When they were near Vû-chang-fû, an officer named Mi-yew, born at Mi-chew, advanced to meet them with some troops; and cried out, that he came to fight. At these words he fell upon the body commanded by Song-tû-hay, who caused him to be surrounded: but although Mi-yew received four shots from arrows, and three wounds with pikes, yet, taking a sword in each hand, he cut down all before him, till, coming to a little bridge, one of the planks broke under him, and he was taken. Song-tû-hay, who admired his courage, offered him great presents, and, by means of his son, invited him to take part with the Mungls: but it was all in vain; he caused himself to be stripped, and desired he might be slain. His son fell on his knees, and, with tears, cried, My father, what shall I do after your death? Mi-yew embraced him, and, with an undaunted tone, said: My son, you need only appear in the streets; and there is no person will refuse to assist you, when they know that you are the son of Mi-yew. Hereupon Song-tû-hay ordered him to be killed^a.

PE-YEN, who found much resistance at Chang-chew-fû, shewed on that occasion how far his ^{Chang-chew-fû taken.} courage and activity extended. He beat down the houses which were about the city, and raised an inclosure of earth, in order to get upon the walls. Night and day he appeared armed, to support the labourers against the sallies of the besieged. He caused great heaps of dead bodies to be placed upon his rampart: then ordering the whole army to be in readiness, the officers and soldiers, getting one upon another, mounted from the rampart to the top of the walls; and Pe-yen himself was one of the first who entered the city. Tau-in, one of those who commanded in the city, was killed at the beginning: Cheng-chau and Wang-gan-tsye (D) still defended themselves in the great square. It was proposed to Cheng-chau, the fourth commanding officer, to escape through the north-east gate, which was still open: but he answered, Any other place, tho' but an inch from hence, will not be fit for me to die in. He was killed about noon; and Pe-yen caused the inhabitants to be put to the sword (E). He ordered Wang-gan-tsye to be bound, and then to kneel; but he chose rather to die. Lyeu-shi-yong, with some horse, forced an intrenchment, and escaped toward Sû-chew-fû. The son of Lyen-bi-kyen had strong suspicions that Chan-jû, one of the commanders of Tû-song-quan, when Hi-kyen went thither to treat about affairs, was the author of his uncle's murder, as before related: so that, after that fort was taken, he watched Chan-jû, who had made his escape, followed, and killed him.

CHI-NI-CHONG (F), principal minister of the Song, in December, sent Lyew-yo to Vû-si-hyen, a ^{Peace sued for.} city of Kyang-nan, near Chang-chew-fû, to assure Pe-yen, that the assassination of Lyen-bi-kyen was committed unknown to his court; and, at the same time, desired peace. Lyew-ho affirmed that all the mischief was owing to Kya-tse-tau, who had violated the public faith, and betrayed the empire (G): he added, weeping, that the emperor his master was still in mourning, and in an age not fit to govern. Pe-yen reproached Lyew-yo with the many treacheries employed by his ministers; the murders in the persons of the envoys, even of Hû-pi-lay; and the unfair dealing with regard to the conditions which had been agreed to: "As to the minority of your prince, ^{Pe-yen's answer.}

^a GAUBIL, p. 167, & seq.

(D) He was son of the illustrious Wang-kyen, who commanded in Ho-chew, in Se-chwen, when Meng-ko was killed before it. Gaubil.

(E) The inhabitants of Chang-chew must have committed some very heinous action, to provoke Pe-yen to this; for he was far from being cruel. Gaubil.—M. Polo observes, that the Alans having taken the outer wall of Tinguigui, and made themselves drunk with the wine which they found there; the citizens came and slew them all in their sleep; for which reason Bayan (or Peyen), afterwards when he took the city, put them all to the sword. Tinguigui, by its situation, seems to be Chang-chew-fû.

See new Collect. Trav. in 4to. vol. iv. p. 599—It must be observed also, that Chang-chew had been taken once before by the Mungls; and perhaps its being retaken by the Song, was owing to the disaffection of the inhabitants.

(F) Written in this place Thini-thong: in another, Tchini-chong. We follow this last reading.

(G) On the displacing of this minister, his effects were confiscated, and he retired to Chang-chew-fû (a city of Fo-kyen): where, on his arrival, he was slain by a Mandarin, who could not bear to see the man enjoy life who had ruined the empire by his wickedness. Gaubil.

" you

"you ought to consider," said Pe-yen to Lyew-yo, "that formerly your dynasty wrested the empire from a prince who was nearly of the same age as yours : at present, heaven takes the empire from an infant to give it my master. There is nothing in this which is contrary to reason." After these words, he sent back Lyew-yo, and ordered Nan-kyatay to follow him.

SHORTLY after, Pe-yen, preceded by Lu-ven-whang, made his public entry into Sû-chew (then called Ping-kyang) ; there he received an express from Chi-ni-chong, wherein the Song emperor offered to be called nephew, or grand nephew, of Hû-pi-lay, and pay him tribute. But every thing was rejected by Pe-yen ; who, being joined by Argan, and some other generals, prepared to make himself master of Lin-gan without delay.

Grat magnanimity
A. D. 1276.

of the Chinese.

MEAN while Ali Haya pushed the siege of Chang-sha vigorously. He caused the ditches to be drained ; and, after making several breaches in the walls, ordered an assault to be given in January 1276. As the garrison had suffered extremely, and were not able to sustain this last attack, the officers spoke of surrendering : but Li-fû opposed that motion ; and declared he would kill those who any more talked in such a strain. A Mandarin of Heng-chew, who was then in the city, ordered the cap of ceremony to be put on the heads of his two young sons, and made them perform the ceremony of beating the head (H) to those who were present : after which, he and his two sons, with his domestics, threw themselves into the fire, and there perished. Li-fû performed the ceremony for them of pouring wine on the earth ; and then made all the Mandarins write the Chinese character which expresses the fidelity due to the sovereign ; they all swore likewise not to surrender. One of the most considerable began, by going into an inclosed place, and drowning himself in a pond. Li-fû then sent for Shen-chong, one of his officers, and said to him : "I have no strength ; I must die ; I would not have the people of my family dishonour me by slavery. After you have slain them all, kill me." Shen-chong fell on his knees, and protested he could not undertake such a task. But Li-fû importuned him so much, that at length he consented. He slew all Li-fû's domestics, after he had made them drunk ; then slew Li-fû himself, and, having set fire to the house, returned to his own : there he first slew his wife and children, then himself. All the Mandarins of the city, excepting two, killed themselves : most of the inhabitants did the same ; and the very wells were filled with the bodies of those who threw themselves in, not one being found empty : so that Ali Haya, entering the city, was much surprised to find it without any people. Most of the other cities of that part of Hû-quang, called Hû-nan (I), submitted to the Twen.

The empress submits to Pe-yen.

IN the first month the empress regent of the Song, finding that Pe-yen would not grant peace, on condition that the emperor should be called grand nephew of Hû-pi-lay, offered that he should be styled subject, with a yearly tribute of twenty-five Van in silver, and as much in silk. This step was taken without the knowledge, and against the advice, of the minister Che-ni-chong, who was for having the court remove elsewhere. But the empress would never consent to it ; and, in anger, cast the ornaments of her head on the ground, reproached the great men for having deceived her ; shut the palace gates, and forbade any such proposals to be made to her. Che-ni-chong (†) had promised Pe-yen to come to confer with him ; but he did not keep his word. That general, resolving not to be duped, went and encamped on the mountain Kau-ting ; from whence he ordered some troops of horse to advance as far as the north suburbs of Lin-gan (or Hang-chew-fû). Ven-tyang-syang and Chang-shi-kyay proposed setting the empresses, emperor, princes, and the ministers, on ship-board, that they might put to sea ; while they two, and the officers who were willing to follow them, attacked the Mungls : but the prime minister rejected that measure. After this the empress-grand-mother sent the great seal of the empire to Pe-yen, in token of surrender ; and that general dispatched Nan-kyatay with it to Hû-pi-lay. As Che-ni-chong did not approve of this step, he immediately left the court, and retired to Wen-chew-fû (K).

Shi-kyay proposes peace.

CHANG-SHI-KYAY, not able to bear this shameful act of submission without fighting, retired with a body of troops, and encamped at Ting-hay. Hereupon Pe-yen sent Pyen-pyau, an officer of note, to exhort him to surrender. Shi-kyay imagined at first that Pyen-pyau's design was to pursue him : but when he understood the true motive of his arrival, he ordered his tongue to be cut out, and himself hacked to pieces. The general Lyew-shi-yong, who had so well defended Chang-chew-fû, went out to sea, and drank himself to death. Mean time Ven-tyen-syang and the minister U-kyen went to wait on Pe-yen ; and, with a view to repair the honour of the empire, which had been impaired by former negotiations, spoke thus : "If the empire of the

* GAUBIL, p. 170, & seq.

(H) That is, to fall on their knees, and strike their heads thrice against the ground.

(I) Hû-quang province is divided into two parts, of which Hû-nan is the southern.

(†) We are not sure whether it should be written Chi, or Bhe, Chin-i, or Chi-ni-chong.

(K) A city on the sea-coast, above 150 miles to the south-east of Lin-gan, or Hang-chew-fû.

- a " north would withdraw its army, and make peace with ours as a neighbour ; then we might " talk of money and silks to give your troops : but in case you intend to destroy the dynasty
 " of the Song, consider, Sir, that we have still large and good countries, strong cities, ships,
 " money, and troops ; and you know there is no promising for the events of war."

PE-YEN, charmed with the grand qualities of Ven-tyen-syang, whose character he was acquainted with before by report, sent back U-kyen, and detained him, under pretence of conferring with him about important affairs ; and ordered the generals Mang-tas and Sai-ti to do him all sorts of civilities. Ven-tyen-syang boldly reproached the deserting lords of the Song with their perfidy and cowardice : he even told Pe-yen to his face, that it was unjust to detain thus the envoy of a crowned head. When Lu-ven-wang would have exhorted him to talk in a

- b more moderate strain ; that illustrious Mandarin shewed him clearly his ingratitude for the imperial family of the Song, from whom he had received so many benefits and honours. After this, Pe-yen sent an officer to Hu-pi-lay, and put Ven-tyen-syang in his train.

In February, Pe-yen appointed Tatar and Chinese lords to govern the city of Lin-gan. By his orders they took and sealed up the books, the registers, the geographical maps, the historical records, the paintings, the edicts, and other things belonging to the great tribunals. They likewise carried away the seals of all the tribunals. He sent two great lords to guard the palace

- c of the empress's grandmother, and have an eye on all that passed there. They behaved to her with the greatest respect ; and seemed rather to make their court, than to watch her. All this was done without the least disorder : so that the Chinese themselves, in all their affliction, could not but admire at the police and good regulations which Pe-yen caused to be observed. The Song emperor had two brothers, whom his father had by his other wives : these young princes were carried away ; and, after they had been concealed for seven days upon a mountain, were conveyed by a Mandarin to Wen-chew-fu before-mentioned. This same month, Hya-quey, who for a long time was inclined to submit to the Twen, went over to them ; and delivered into their hands the strong city of Lü-chw (L) in Kyang-nan.

In March, Pe-yen on horseback, followed by all the general officers, and with the standard of the great general carried before him, left Hü-chew-fü (M), and came to Lin-gan (N) ; where he visited all parts of the city, and had the curiosity to see the flux and reflux of the river Che. The emperor and empress desired to see him : but he excused himself, by giving them to understand

- d that he was not thoroughly acquainted with the ceremonial proper to be observed on such occasion. Next day he left Lin-gan. In May, the generals Atabay and Li-ting entered the imperial palace, and caused the ceremonies to cease, which were used in appearing before the emperor. They then, saluting the emperor, and the empress's mother, acquainted them, that they were to set out for the court of the emperor Hü-pi-lay. The princess at this message could not refrain from tears ; and embracing the emperor her son, said, " My son, the son of heaven " (O) grants you life, you must beat the head to him." The young prince, at these words, turned his face towards the north ; and, falling on his knees, along with his mother (P), they both saluted the emperor Hü-pi-lay, by striking the ground nine times with their heads. This ceremony being over, they were both put in a chariot, and sent to Ta-tü.

- e THIS was a sad spectacle for all the faithful subjects of the Song race. Su-ing-pyan, one of the greatest lords of the court, not being able to survive the misfortune of his prince, threw himself, with his two sons and one daughter, into a well. The empress's grandmother was suffered to remain in her palace till she recovered from her illness. Pe-yen gave orders to take the gold, silver, precious stones, jewels, and other costly things of the imperial palace, and send them by sea to Tyen-tsin-wey (Q) ; from whence those immense treasures were conveyed to Ta-tü. Pe-yen, having had an express order to repair to court, left the generals Argan and Tong-wen-ping to command the army which was in the neighbourhood of Lin-gan (R).

- f LI-TING-CHI, Kyang-tsai, and other Song officers, shed torrents of tears when they heard that the emperor was carried prisoner to Ta-tü : they assembled in great numbers at Tang-chew.

* GAUBIL, p. 173, & seqq.

(L) Or Lya-chew-fü.

(M) Near the sea, about 40 miles north of Lin-gan, or Hang-chew-fü.

(N) On the news of Pe-yen's approach, many ladies of the palace, fearing violence from the soldiers, drowned themselves ; but their fears were groundless, for Pe-yen did not suffer the least disorder to be committed.

(O) The empress gives to Hü-pi-lay the title of Tyen-tse, or son of heaven ; which the emperor of China bore.

(P) The captive emperor, named Kang-ti, or Kong-tsong, was then near seven years of age : the empress, intitled grandmother, was the wife of Li-tsong, his grandfather ; the grandmother of Kong-tsong and of Ta-tü.

MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

tsong was also conveyed to Ta-tü, or Pe-king, along with other princes of the imperial family.

(Q) Since the year 1710, advanced to the dignity of Chew, or a city of the second rank ; so that it bears the name at present of Tyen-tsin-wey. It stands on the river Pay-ho, about 10 leagues from its mouth and 20 from Pe-king, of which it is the port.

(R) Lin-gan is the same city which M. Polo calls Quinsay ; which is a corruption of King-tse, or King-shi, the name which the Chinese often give the place where the emperor keeps his court. In 1237, above 530,000 houses were burnt by a fire : the vast number of barks, filled with people, which are continually in its port, shew how populous it is.

fu, and swore to do their utmost to rescue their prince out of the hands of the Moos. Pursuant a to this resolution they wrote circular letters; and, having distributed their money to the most hardy soldiers, got together an army of 40,000. This army, under the command of Kyangtsay, attacked the city of Qua-chew (S), where the emperor was arrived. The Twen troops, conducted by Atabay, Li-ting, and other generals, fought the Song for three hours together, and repulsed them. Kyang-tsay, who fought continually as he retreated, was surrounded by Achü, come from the taking of Whey-gang-fü (T), who summoned him in vain to submit.
at Shang-tü. The inhabitants of Cheng-chew-fü attempted also, without success, to deliver the emperor Kong-tsong; who at length, in May, arrived at Shang-tü (U). Hü-pi-lay sent the prime minister to meet him; and the princess of Horgkila, empress and first wife of the Mungl monarch, ordered a lord to furnish the mother of Kong-tsong with every thing suitable to her rank: the b Chineses highly commend the virtue and moderation of this empress. When the treasures from Liz-gan arrived at court, the princes and princesses beheld them with raptures of joy; but the empress did nothing but weep: "My lord," said she to Hü-pi-lay, "the dynasties are not eternal: by what you see has happened to that of the Song, judge what will happen to ours."

Twon-tsong
enthroned.

THE retreat of the princes to Wen-chew-fü drew thither a great number of Mandarins, officers of the army, and soldiers. Chang-shi-kyay repaired thither with the body of troops which he commanded: the minister Chi-ni-chong came also; by whom I-wang, brother of Kong-tsong, was declared great general of the empire, associating with him his brother Quang-wang. Among the ruins of an old temple in that city, is seen the place where formerly Kau tsong set himself in c his throne, when he quitted the north to pass into the south. On this throne I-wang being placed, the grandees knelt, and took an oath of fidelity, not without shedding tears. After this they removed into I'o-kyen; and in May, I-wang was acknowledged emperor of the Song at Fü-chew-fü, capital of that province. He was then nine years of age, and assumed the title of Twon-tsong. He appointed his generals as well as ministers: and had it not been for traitors and cowardly subjects, the Mungls must of necessity have been obliged to repass the Great Kyang. Ven-tyen-syang escaped on the road; and after many dangers, had the good fortune to reach Fo-kyen: he was received with great demonstrations of joy, and unanimously declared generalissimo of the troops.

Pe-yen
recalled.

PE-YEN was not without his enemies at court, who accused him of having carried himself d too effeminately: but he had also his friends, who defended his conduct, among whom was Gay-swe, the foreigner from the west, before spoken of. Hü-pi-lay sent all the great Mandarins to meet him; whom they received with great magnificence in the suburbs of Shang-tü, or Kay-ping-fü, and conducted to the audience of the emperor. This prince made his encomium, and appointed him his lieutenant-general in Tartary. He likewise did great honours to the generals Atabay (X) and Li-ting; which latter was allowed to follow Pe-yen ¹.

*Yang-chew-
fu and*

THE general Song-tu-hay, who commanded in Kyang-fü, detached Tachay, of the Pü-bü-la tribe, and Li-heng, to join Argan and Tong-wen-ping; being resolved to enter I'o-kyen, in order to destroy entirely the party of the new emperor of the Song. Mean time Li-ting-chi and Kyang-tsay still continued to defend Yang-chew-fü, with a resolution worthy the greatest heroes. e Achü, to no purpose, employed all which experience, stratagem, and force, suggested to him to become master of the city. The two commanders governed there as a father does his children; and the inhabitants were so many soldiers; who were ready to die in the train of the governor. When Li-ting-chi was informed of Twon-tsong's instalment at Fü-chew-fü, he left the command of the city to the inferior officers; and, followed by Kyang-tsay, with 7000 chosen men, set out to join the new emperor: but was intercepted by Achü, who besieged him in Tay-chew-fü. Soon after Li-ting-chi had left Yang-chew-fü, the city was taken by treason, and Tay-chew-fü fared the same fate. Hereupon that commander and his colleague went to drown themselves in a lake; but they were taken and carried to Achü. This general treated them with honour: however, finding he could prevail on them neither to join his troops f nor kneel, he consented that they should be slain; and soon after went to court, where he was sent for to be one of the ministry.

Tay-chewfü taken.

The emperor's flee

THE army of general Argan, after reducing the places to the south of Che-kyang, entered Fo-kyen; which, being filled with traitors, great part of the cities surrendered without resistance. This obliged the emperor to put to sea; who narrowly escaped being taken at Tsuenchew-fü, by the treachery of the governor. Chang-shi-kyay having pressed for the emperor's

¹ GAUBIL, p. 176, & seqq.

(S) A considerable post to the north of the Great Kyang, over against Chang-kyang-fü, and nine miles and a half to the south of Yang-chew-fü. Gaubil.

(T) About seven miles south of the W'hang-ho, and within 55 of its mouth.

(U) The new capital of Tartary, often mentioned before, whither the court was removed from Karakorum.

(X) A Mungl of the tribe of Tsun-tu-tse (or Tjuntus), whose father had drank of the water of Panchuni with Jenghiz Khan. Gaubil.

a service several barks and ships, which that covetous Mandarin employed in trade; he, to be revenged, surrendered the city to the Mungls. The emperor Twon-tsong arrived in November at Whey-chew with his fleet, on which, it is said, were embarked 180,000 men. Mean time Lu shi-quey crossed the famous mountain of Mey-lin, and entered the province of Quang-tong, where he made great conquests. The general Ali Haya put to the sword all the inhabitants of Quay-lin-fu (Y); which he took after a long siege, wherein he lost a great number of men.

In 1277 Chang-shi-kyay levied forces in Fo-kyen, and supported the best he could, the party of the emperor Twon-tsong. He laid siege to Tsven-chew-fu in that province, but it was raised by Sai-tu; who, pretending that the Chinese were not to be trusted, made a great slaughter where-ever he came: he in particular put to the sword the inhabitants of the cities Hing-wa-fu and Chang-chew-fu.

b Ven-tyen-syang had a considerable number of troops in Kyang-fi, but could never join a powerful army which Tsew-fong, a great Mandarin, had raised; and the forces of both were new levies, and undisciplined. In August, general Li-heng sent troops to Kan-chew, (a considerable city in Kyang-fi, of which Ven-tyen-syang had a mind to make himself master); hindered his junction with Tsew-fong, and beat their armies in several engagements; so that Ven-tyen-syang was obliged to retire, after his wife and two sons had been taken prisoners, who were sent to Ta-tu. Chau-shi-shang, one of the imperial family of the Song, with others, were carried to Nan-chang-fu, capital of Kyang-fi: where, encouraged by Shi-shang, they chose rather to be slain than kneel to the Mungls.

c In November, Ta-cku took the city of Quang-chew fu (Z), in Quang-tong; and, in December, the ship which the emperor Twon-tsong was aboard, was in danger, near the isles of Ma-kau, of being cast away with a squall of wind. The prince fell into the water, and was taken out again half-dead with the fright. A great part of his troops perished. He had retired from Fo-kyen in 1276; first to Whey-chew-fu in Quang-tong: from whence he sent an officer to acquaint Sai-tu, that he was willing to submit to Hu-pi-lay. That general sent the same officer to Ta-tu; but no mention is made with what success the negotiation was attended. From Whey-chew-fu Twon-tsong retired to Chau-chew-fu, a city and port in the eastern part of the province; and there took shipping; in order to get to the kingdom of Chen-chen (A). The minister Che-ni-chong went before; but he never returned, nor was ever heard of after.

d HU-PI-LAY this year appointed Bonzas of the sect of Tau and Fo, to govern the Bonzas of their respective sects, who were in Kyang-nan, and other southern provinces. He likewise ordered general Say-ten, an Arab, to follow the army, which was ordered to march from Yun-nan into the kingdom of Myen (B), or Pegu.

WE have already taken notice that the prince Siliki, son of the late emperor Meng-ko (or Mangu), first joined the party of Alipuko (or Aribuga), and afterwards submitted. Since then, he was corrupted by prince Hay-tu; and, with the princes his allies, this year (1277) defeated the troops of Hu-pi-lay, in the country of Olimali (or Almalig), took the prince Nanmu-ban, son of the emperor, and general Gan-tong. After these great advantages, Siliki marched towards the east with a powerful army; and was already arrived to the north of the city Ho-lin (or Karakorum), when Pe-yen, who had been for some time in Tartary, set forward to meet the enemy, giving great bodies of troops to the generals Li-ting and Tu-tu-ha (C). Siliki, on the news of Pe-yen's march, decamped from the neighbourhood of Karakorum, and crossed the Orgun, near which he entrenched himself. Pe-yen followed; and, having encamped near the same river, seized all the avenues, by which provisions could be brought to Siliki's camp.

THIS prince, seeing himself in danger of perishing with his whole army, was obliged to come to a battle; in which he was taken and killed by Li-ting, in the month of July. The prince Totomur fled towards the Tula, and entrenched himself between the sources of that river and the Onon: but Tu-tu-ha, being detached by Pe-yen, overtook and entirely defeated him. At the same time Li-ting marched westward, and having passed the river Tamir (which falls into the Orgun), defeated the remains of Siliki's army, and several bodies commanded by the

" GAUBIL, p. 179, & seq.

(Y) Capital of Shen-fi [a mistake for Quang-fi]. Its situation among waters rendering it very strong, Ali Haya turned the course of the rivers, and made breaches in the walls. Gaubil.

(Z) The capital of Quang-tong, called by Europeans Kanton.

(A) The part of Tong-king, opposite the isle of Hay-nan, on the south of China, is, in the Chinese books, often called Chen-chen. The sea between Hay-nan and Tong-king was formerly called by the Arabs the sea of Sinji. Chen-chen is also one of the names of the royal city of Cochin-china, called Thean-hoa, or Sinea. Gaubil, p. 190.

(B) This is the name which the Chinese give to the kingdom of Pegu: and Say-ten was sent thither in consequence of the account which his son Nasu-lating (probably Nesroddin) had given to Hu-pi-lay of Myen; which, according to the Chinese, borders on the province of Yun-nan. Gaubil.

(C) He was descended from the prince of part of Kincha (or Kipjak). He commanded a body of troops of his own nation; and was with Chepe and Sai-pu-toy in the expedition on that side in 1223. He always made war with success; and was advanced by Hu-pi-lay to the first posts in the army. — Gaubil.

officers

officers of the princes Hay-tu and Tia. The emperor, to whom the revolt of those princes had given some uneasiness, was much rejoiced at the news of this great victory; which, for a time, disconcerted the measures which several Mungl princes had taken with Hay-tu, who thought of nothing less than rendering Tartary intirely independent of Hû-pi-lay.

ABOUT the beginning of this year, or end of the preceding, the Literati, who had submitted to Hû-pi-lay, deputed Pû-hû-chû with a memorial (D), to intreat that prince to order public colleges to be built throughout the empire; in order to educate, in the sciences and morality, youths of genius, under the direction of the most judicious and learned men, who could be found.

Song emperor
dies.
A. D. 1278.

In January 1278, the Twen completed the conquest of Se-chwen. Ven-tyen-syang, notwithstanding the losses he had received, took the field again, and in March reduced the city of Quang-chew Fû, or Kanton. Mean time the emperor Twon-tsong retired into a little desert isle, called Kang-chwen (E); where he died the month following, aged eleven years. Several great men, after this, quite desponded, and quitted the army of the Song. Most of those who were about Twon-tsong, weary of such a long and unfortunate war, seemed inclined to acknowledge Hû-pi-lay, Lû-syew-fû said to them: "Sirs, what shall we do with the third son of the emperor Tû-tsong, aged eight years, who is here with us? Anciently one Ching and one Lu (F) sufficed for one sovereign: there are still remaining in our possession vast countries, and millions of people: what is there wanting to us that may be necessary for the proclamation of a new emperor?" Hereupon all agreeing to proclaim Quang-rang, they caused this young prince to get upon a rising ground; then fell on their knees, and acknowledged him emperor. Lû-syew-fû and Chang-shi-kyay were declared his two ministers in April. This latter was obliged to raise the siege of Ley-chew Fû (G), a strong city, not far from Tong-king, which general Ali-baya caused in time to be well furnished with troops and provisions.

Ti-ping proclaimed.

Retires to an isle.

In May the new emperor of the Song, known under the title of Ti ping, retired to the mountain Tay-shan, near the city of Sin-wbey-hyen (H), in Quang-tong. Tay-shan stands in the sea, opposite to the mountain Ki-shi-shan. The flux and reflux of the current, between these two mountains, makes the Chinese compare them to a gate with folding doors, which open and shut every moment. Chang-shi-kyay, having chosen this mountain for the emperor's retreat, caused houses to be built for the officers and soldiers; likewise a palace for Ti-ping, and the prince's mother. Plenty of provision was brought from Quang-chew Fû, or Kanton: abundance of oars, arms, and arrows, were made: ships and barks were fitted out: in short, the zeal and fidelity of that minister cannot be sufficiently extolled. Reckoning the people, Mandarin, and soldiers, the emperor had with him more than 200,000 men. Great numbers of soldiers and sailors, from Hu quang, set forward to join Chang-shi-kyay: but Ali-baya having sent out large detachments to examine all passengers, the minister was, by that means, deprived of a considerable succour *.

The Song
generals.

In August the Mandarin performed the ceremonies for interring the late emperor Twon-tsong, on the mountain Tay-shan. The air of sadness spread over the new emperor's face during this ceremony, and the reflections which arose in their minds on the present state of affairs, drew tears of real sorrow from the eyes of Chang-shi-kyay, Lû-syew-fû, and all the officers, as well as soldiers. Chang-hong-fan (I) having been informed of what the Song minister (K) was doing, represented to the emperor Hû-pi-lay, that it was necessary, as soon as possible, to make himself master of the province of Quang-tong. The Mungl monarch charged him with that important commission; and, making him a present of a sword, adorned with precious stones, appointed him general of the army, designed against the emperor Ti-ping. Hong-fan upon this repaired to Yang-chew Fû; and there taking with him 20,000 choice men, in November

* GAUBIL, p. 182, & seqq.

(D) In this memorial, the substance of which is given by our author Gaubil, they endeavour to induce the emperor, by instancing the most remarkable examples of the Chinese emperors, in founding colleges, from the times of Yau, Shun, and Yu, the first of whom reigned, if we may believe the Chinese history, above 2357 years before the Christian æra.—Pû-hû-chû was a lord of the Kangli tribe, who became one of the most learned men in the empire, and was very dear to Hû-pi-lay.

(E) On the south coast of Quang-tong, to the north-east of the city Lwi-chew Fû.

(F) Ching is the space of a league square: Lu the habitations of 500 men. Gaubil.

(G) The same with Lwi-chew Fû (as it is written in the Jesuits map of Quang-tong), mentioned in the note but one before. According to Gaubil, it is seventeen leagues to the north of Kun-chew-fû (or Kyeng-chew Fû, as in the said map), capital of the isle of Hay-nan. It stands on the east coast of a peninsula, which, like a bear's foot, shoots out from the southern coast of Quang-tong.

(H) On the west side of the bay of Quang-chew Fû (or Kanton), about midway between that city and Ma-kau.

(I) He was the son of general Chan-jau, often mentioned before.

(K) Chang-shi-kyay was of the same family with Chang-hong-fan, born at Cho-chew, in Pe-che li. He followed his relation into Ho-nan, when young; and, to avoid being punished for a fault which he had committed, took refuge with the Song, whom he served with an heroic constancy. Gaubil.

arrived

a arrived by sea in the province of Quang-tong, where he surprised Ven-tyen-syang, in conjunction with two other generals, Tsew-fong and Lyew-tse-tsun.

THE troops of these commanders, not being used to fight, gave way at the first onset, and the rout became general. Tsew-fong slew himself. Lyew-tse-tsun and Ven-tyen-syang were intimate friends, and each of them fought death, in order to save the other's life. Lyew-tse-tsun, being taken first, said he was Tyen-syang; in a belief, that, on uttering those words, he should be killed: but instead thereof, they put him into the hands of a guard. Tyen-syang was taken afterwards, and bound, to hinder him from poisoning himself. Hong-fan having ordered Lyew-tse-tsun to be put to death, Tyen-syang said he was the man. But the prisoners discovered the truth; and Lyew-tse-tsun was burnt alive by a slow fire. Tyen-syang, being brought before the Mungl general, would not perform the reverence, in token of submission, although he was unbound for that purpose, but demanded to be slain: Hong-fan, however, would not grant his request: but sent him prisoner to Tatû, and set at liberty his relations and friends, who had been taken.

AFTER this victory, Hong-fan set sail with his naval force; and, on the 31st of January (L) 1279, came in sight of the mountain Tay-shan. The first caused this mountain to be examined; and then having informed himself concerning the tides, winds, and windings of the coasts, took measures with Li-beng for attacking Chang-shi-kyay to advantage. But this latter was before-hand with him; and, in the night, the 29th of March (M), came to attack the Twen. However, he was repulsed. Hong-fan, to avoid confusion, divided his fleet into four squadrons, one distant from the other 3 or 400 paces. Li-beng posted himself to the north of the Song fleet, which lay to the west of the mountain. On the third of April (N) a thick fog covered that side of the mountain. Li-beng had orders to attack the enemy at the coming-in of the tide. The tide came-in at the hour of the horse (O), at what time the instruments sounding, which was the signal, Li-beng bore down upon them on one side, while Chang-hong-fan advanced on the other. Chang-shi-kyay, though attacked on both sides at once, defended himself valiantly: but his troops, being fatigued, gave way; and the Mungls having taken one great ship, several others struck.

In short, confusion seized the whole fleet of the Song; while Hong-fan and Li-beng, taking advantage of this disorder, routed them on all hands. At sun-set, the wind and fogs beginning to arise, Shi-kyay cut his cables, and escaped with sixteen great ships. Lû-syew-fû ran swiftly to the emperor's vessel, but it was sluggish; and several others were fastened one to the other. These were almost in a helpless condition; nor were there so much as officers or sailors to manage them. Lû-syew-fû, perceiving all was lost, first threw his wife and children into the sea; then, with a resolute tone, said to the young emperor, "Do not dishonour, sir, your illustrious family, in following the example of your brother Kong-tsung. Die a sovereign prince, rather than live a slave to a foreign nation." After he had spoken these words, he, weeping, embraced Ti-ping; and, taking him on his shoulders, jumped with him into the sea. Most of the Mandarins followed this example.

HONG-FAN took 800 barks. The Chinese historians say that 100,000 men were drowned. For several days the sea was seen covered with dead bodies. Chang-shi-kyay discovered that of the emperor, and interred it with respect. He also recovered the imperial seal; and then joined the vessel which had on board the princess, mother to Ti-ping. He found this lady in the greatest inquietudes, as well as danger; her ship being separated from the rest of the fleet. He first communicated to her the death of her dear son; and then exhorted her to think of installing a new emperor of the family. But she was so deeply affected with the doleful news, that, without either speaking one word, or shedding a single tear, she threw herself into the sea. The ladies and maids of honour who were with her did the same. Shi-kyay interred their bodies, with all the decency things would permit; and, with the remains of the fleet, sailed to the coasts of Tong-king, where he met with considerable succours. With these he put to sea again for Quang-chew Fû, or Kanton: but a violent storm arising soon after, the officers would have had him return into port. This he peremptorily refused to do; saying, that a risque must be run, in order, as soon as possible, to set up an emperor of the Song family. However, the wind increasing, and the tempest becoming more furious, Shi-kyay went upon deck; where, having invoked heaven, and burnt perfumes in honour of the Deity (P), he flung Y GAUBIL, p. 186, & seqq.

(L) The day Ji-nû, of the first month. Gaubil.

(M) In the night of the day Ki-man, of the second month. Gaub.

(N) The day Quey-wi.

(O) The space of time between eleven o'clock in the morning, and one in the afternoon. Gaubil.

(P) Gaubil says, in honour thereof, that is, of heaven: doubtless that the Dominicans, and other adversaries of the Jesuits, in the famous controversy which helped to ruin their mission in China, might not lay any-thing like unfair dealing to his charge. But we make no scruple to insert the word Deity; being convinced from reason, as well as facts, that the followers of Konfûsus often use the word tyen, or heaven, as we do, to signify God. Nothing seems to us to discover the hardy temper of some men more than their affirming the contrary opinion.

MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

5 E

himself

himself headlong into the ocean, near the mountain Hay-lin. After this, all the officers and a Mandarins submitted to the Ywens or Mungls: and the same year the emperor Hû-pi-lay found himself peaceable master of the whole empire of China, which had been, for several ages before, divided among several potentates.

Song dynasty
extinct,

Thus ended the dynasty of the Song, whose family-name was Chau. The first emperor of this imperial house was Chau-quang-yu, descended from one of the prime families of the empire, who made himself famous in the wars against the Kitân. He established his court at Kayfong-fû, capital of Ho-nan, nine of whose successors reigned there 168 years. The wars which they had with the Kin emperors, obliged them to remove their court to Hang-chew Fû, capital of Che-kyang; where it remained 148 years, under seven princes. The two last reigned, in all, near four years. So that, in the whole, the dynasty of the Song continued 319 or b 320 years.

in the year 1279.

S E C T. III.

Commencement of the Ywen dynasty; and its affairs, to the death of Hû-pi-lay.

Pa-se-pa dies.

BEFORE we proceed to the next year, we shall mention the death of the famous Lama c Pa-se-pa, which happened in this. After his departure, the most extraordinary titles were conferred on him. They said, he was above men; and that nothing but heaven was above him. He was called the great saint; the man of the highest virtue; the son of Fo of Si-tyen (A).
The Chinese Literati loudly exclaimed against these titles, and vilified the Bonzas. Nay, several of them, over-zealous for their doctrine, treated Hû-pi-lay as a Barbarian, and superstitious prince; who suffered himself to be governed by women and the Lamas, without courage, and without genius for government. There is still at Pe-king a Myau (or temple), built in honour of Pa-se-pa, in the time of the Mungl emperors.

The Whang-
ho.
A. D. 1280.

THE general Ali-baya having made a great number of slaves in the southern provinces, the d emperor Hû-pi-lay set them all at liberty in the year 1280. In March he appointed mathematicians to search for the source of the Whang-ho, or yellow river; who, in four months time, arrived in the country where it rises, and drew a map of it (B), which they presented to his majesty.
Although much mention is made of this great river in the books of the Chinese, and its course is particularly described in the chapter of the Shû-king, intitled Yu-kong, written at least above 3920 years ago (C); yet, till the time of Hû-pi-lay, the country from whence that river comes seems to have been unknown to the Chinese, who represent it very erroneously in their books ^a.

Japan summoned.

THE emperor, having long resolved to subdue the kingdom of Je-pen (D) (or Japan), or at least render it tributary, sent to summon the king to acknowledge him for his sovereign: e but the king paid no regard to Hû-pi-lay's letter, which was written in form of an order from a prince to his subject. The Mungl monarch, several years after, sent a deputy thither, who was killed. Hereupon Hû-pi-lay, being enraged, equipped a great fleet, and this year ordered general Argan to attack Japan, with an army of 100,000 men. The king of Korea had orders to favour this enterprise; which was disapproved of generally by the Tatar and Chinese grandees. In November was published the astronomy composed by four Chinese Literati, who had been long about it: in which great work Ko-shew-king had the chief concern. The mathematicians of the west, who were in great number and credit at court, had already written much upon that science, and made very beautiful instruments, Ko-shew-king, a man of genius, and extraordinary application, assisted by his three colleagues, and perfectly acquainted with the methods which those of the west had pursued, put the finishing hand to the Chinese astro- f nomy (E).

Mungl kalendar.

JENGHIZ KHAN gave the care of that science to Yelu-chu-tsay. This astronomer had rectified many of his notions, when he followed that conqueror into the west; and, at his return, pub-

^a GAUBIL, p. 188, & seqq.

(A) This is the name which they give at Pe-king to that part of Hindûstân where they say Fo was born. Gaubil.—Si-tyen signifies the western heaven, or heaven of the west.

(B) Gaubil tells us this map is lost; but that the greater part of the description which explains that map is still in being. He, from thence, gives an account of the springs of the Whang ho.

(C) Reckoning back from about the year 1726

(D) Some call it Japon. Wô is one of the names

given this island by the Chinese, whose books afford less information concerning it, than the relations of the Europeans: but then they relate many things with regard to the history of Japan, which the Europeans know nothing of. Gaub.

(E) Our author has spoken at large of the astronomy published in 1280, by order of Hû-pi-lay, in a treatise which he sent into Europe concerning the Chinese astronomy, and which has been printed by Souciot.

a lished an astronomy. At the beginning of Hû-pi-lay's reign, the astronomers from the west published two astronomies: one according to the method of the west; the other according to the Chinese method, but corrected. Ko-shew-king took a middle course; and following, in the mean, the method of the west, preserved as many terms as he could of the Chinese astronomy: but intirely reformed it according to the astronomical epochas, and the method of reducing the tables to one certain meridian; as well as of applying afterwards the calculations and observations to other meridians. Besides this, he caused large brass instruments to be made, such as spheres, astrolabes, mariners compasses, levels, and gnomons, of which last sort one was forty feet high.

b THE Mungl emperors, who had at their court western, as well as Chinese, physicians, and mathematicians, made separate bodies of each, who yet lived in good correspondence. The books, which give the history of those times, praise much, in general, the ability of those strangers; and, in particular, acknowledge, that what is best in Ko-shew-king's work was taken from them.

Tsu-i-yu (F) was one of the great Mandarins who governed the province of Kyang-nan; Abama's ma- and highly esteemed, as well by the Chineses as Tatars, both for his integrity and vigilance. Ali-baya had chosen him for one of his lieutenants; and considered him as one of the best officers in his army. This worthy person undertook to make known to Hû-pi-lay the malversations of Abama: who, full of revenge, accused him, and two other Mungl lords who seconded him, with having purloined more than two millions; likewise with turning out and changing c Mandarins without orders. Hû-pi-lay sent commissioners to the several places, to examine into the affair, and they declared Tsû-i-yu innocent. Abama, resolving if possible to gain his ends, got others to be sent, who declared Tsû-i-yu guilty; and, as such, caused him to be beheaded (G), with the two lords above-mentioned, in December. The prince, who was appointed heir to the crown, sent officers of his court to quash the proceedings, as soon as he was apprised of Abama's intrigues; but they arrived too late. The death of Tsû-i-yu (H) made a great noise in the provinces, at court, and in the army: They murmured greatly against his accuser; and the prince only sought for an occasion to get rid of that evil minister. and villainy.

In March 1281, Hû-pi-lay having gone to Sbang-tu, and left Abama (I) to govern at Ta-tu, He is slain.
d a Mandarin, named Whang-chu, went one day to the palace, and slew him at the great gate. As the guards and officers did not mind to seize Whang-chu, he easily made his escape, and was satisfied that the prince would save his life. In this confidence, he surrendered himself to the tribunal; and was condemned to death by the commissioners sent by Hû-pi-lay. This monarch at last opened his eyes, and saw the crimes of Abama. In April he ordered his palace to be plundered, his body to be taken out of the grave, cut in pieces, and then cast to the fowls of the air. There was no sort of extortion and oppression but what Abama was guilty of: so that the obstinacy of Hû-pi-lay in supporting him, notwithstanding the representations of the prince his heir, and the repeated accusations, effectually proved, of the most sage in his counsel, did his reputation no small prejudice^b.

e THE expedition to Gan-nan containing, as hath been said, the kingdoms of Kochin-china Losses in Gan- and Tong-king (K), had not the expected success. The king's son would never be prevailed on to submit; and, with a considerable body of troops, possessed a great part of the country. The general Su-tû entered Gan-nan in June; and meeting at first with no opposition, advanced imprudently, and took the city of Chen-chen, which is not far from the south-west point of the island Hay-nan, on the south of China. The prince amused the Mungls with false promises to submit; and, by degrees, seizing the posts between China and Gan-nan, cut off Su-tû's retreat. The excessive heat incommoded the Ywen, accustomed to the northern climates; and their general, who was not supported by a fleet (L), perceiving too late his fault, retired with much courage; but the greater part of his army perished. nan,

^b GAUBIL, p. 190, & seqq.

(F) This person was a native of Tse-cheu, in Shan-si; and his brother a censor of the empire. Gaubil. — His name in the original French is Tsouy-yu; which we choose to write Tsû-i-yu, rather than Tsui-yu, as it might also be written. Our author not having divided the names into monosyllables, or Chinese words, makes it often difficult to reduce them to the idiom of the English; without which an English reader would be scarce able to read or pronounce them.

(G) This is an ignominious kind of death in China.

(H) This year died prince Mangkola (by M. Polo called Margala), third son of Hû-pi-lay. Gaub. p. 239.

(I) He was a Mohammedan, and native of Khorassân, in Persia; of a family which had furnished generals and ministers to the kings of the country. He was of the city Parwal, that is, Baurd [or Barwerd], of which D'Herbelot speaks, p. 195. Gaub.

(K) We are told by several European travellers, that the language of these two kingdoms is the Anamitic, that is, the language of Anam, which is a corruption of the word Gan-nam. Gaubil.

(L) Or perhaps the prince had one in the bay. Gaubil.

and Japan.
A. D. 1281.

THE expedition against Japan, which was undertaken the next year, had still a worse event a than that to Gan-nan. General Argan being dead, Atabay commanded the fleet: but scarce was it arrived in sight of the island Ping-hu (M), when a violent storm arose, which dispersed the ships. Atabay hereupon was obliged to put into port; and the rest of the vessels fell into the hands of the Japanese, who made slaves of 70,000 *Chinese*s, and flew 30,000 Mungls. Hû-pi-lay was almost distracted to see his designs upon Gan-nan and Japan miscarry. In February also he received a great loss, by the death of his first wife, the princess of Hong-kila, and mother of the prince his heir. The Chinese authors represent her as an accomplished lady. She loved the people, and always disposed the emperor to clemency: she likewise took extraordinary care of the late empresses of the Song, who were prisoners at Ta-tû.

Books of Tau
burnt.

HU-PI-LAY was strongly attached to the sect of Fo, and openly protected the Lamas, who b were great enemies to the sect of Tau; insomuch that, in conjunction with the Chinese Bonzas, or priests of Fo, who hated them no less than the others, they asked leave to search for and burn all the books of the Tau-tse, or Bonzas of the Tau sect. The emperor, granting their request, ordered all their books to be burnt; nor was any saved, excepting that called Tau-te-king, on account of its antiquity, having been written by Lau-tse (N) himself.

Wang-sun
dies.

THE prince Cheng-kin's grief, for the loss of the empress his mother, was increased by that of Wang-sun. This lord, who was one of the four concerned in composing the book of astronomy, was very well educated by his father Wang-lyang. The famous Lyew-ping-chong having recommended him to the emperor Hû-pi-lay, this latter appointed him to be near the c person of the prince his heir. Cheng-kin quickly took an affection for Wang sun, and made him eat at his table. They studied together the book which Hyu-beng had written upon history, mathematics, and other sciences. They never ceased encouraging each other to virtue, and were patterns of moderation, and aversion to pleasures. Wang-sun's view was to inspire Cheng-kin with a great desire to become a perfect prince; to which end he made him take notice, in Hyu-beng's book, of the virtues and vices of princes, and the true cause of their happy or unhappy reigns. Wang-sun died at the age of forty-seven, regretted by all the court. This year also died Hyu-beng, so renowned for his virtue, experience, and works. Mean time the emperor sent an officer into Yun-nan, to bring away the duties upon gold (O), d which, at this time, was drawn in great quantities from that province.

Affairs of literature.

IN 1282 the emperor ordered the learned men, from all parts of the empire, to repair to court, to examine the state of literature, and take effectual measures for the advancement thereof. He likewise caused sixty great vessels to be built, to transport by sea, from the southern provinces, into Pe-che-li, provisions of rice, and other necessaries, which before had been conveyed by rivers, with much trouble, delay, and expence (P). Mean time several kings of the Indies sent deputies to pay Hû-pi-lay tribute. The most remarkable among them was he of Ku-long, a kingdom 100,000 li (Q) distant from China, who brought as tribute (R) black apes, and precious stones. Towards the end of this year a Bonza of Fo-kyen, having given out that Saturn had been very near a star named Ti-tso (S), or the seat of the emperor (T), the Mandarins presented a petition to Hû-pi-lay on that occasion. At the same juncture an e impostor, who pretended to be the emperor of the Song, gathered more than 100,000 men; and, in his name, caused billets to be published, importing, that the minister of state need not be astonished; and that, on a day appointed, the houses covered with bulrushes would be set on fire; and that this would be the signal of the sedition in Ta-tû.

A Chinese
pretender.

^c GAUBIL, p. 194, & seqq.

(M) Our author says, this island must be near Japan, but knows not where it is. There the remains of the shattered fleet being re-united, the Japanese took and destroyed them, as in the text. Marco Polo, and other authors, speak at large of this expedition; but his date is faulty. Gaubil.

(N) He lived several ages before Christ.

(O) There are still rivers in this province, out of which they gather very good gold. Gaub.

(P) They were also conveyed, partly by rivers, and partly by sea. Gaubil, in a note, gives an account of both these courses.

(Q) That is, 10,000 leagues; a most extravagant reckoning; since Ku-long is in the East-Indies. Gaub. Perhaps Koulon in Malabar.

(R) The *Chinese*s consider presents from foreign princes as tribute; and their emperor's presents to those princes as rewards. Likewise the answers they give pass for orders. Gaubil.

(S) Gaubil knows not what star this is.

(T) There is no country where astrology and fortune-telling is more in request than in China. The astronomers have all a treatise, containing the theory and practice of that art, in which are remarked all the appearances of the heavenly bodies, with their prognostics, as they relate to the court or the magistrates: for the stars have all names, which regard the imperial family, governors of provinces, generals of the army, princes, and princesses, over whom they are supposed to have particular influence. In the tribunal of mathematics there are astronomers appointed for this purpose, who yet vary their rules according to the notions or views of the reigning dynasty. Hence their astronomies of different times differ. Gaubil.

VEN-

a VEN-TYEN-SYANG having been prisoner in that capital for several years, the emperor sent Kublay's son for him into his presence, and offered to make him one of the ministers of state, if he would enter into his service. Tyen-syang thanked his majesty; but told him he should never acknowledge two emperors; and desired to die. Though Hü-pi-lay saw he was inflexible, yet he could not resolve to put him to death. But what good-nature would not suffer him to do, superstition, at length, effected. The great men of the court put him in mind of the petition made him, concerning the conjunction of Saturn and the star; and would persuade him, that the anonymous minister, mentioned in the billets, was no other than Ven-tyen-syang. This wrought so upon the mind of Hü-pi-lay, that he at last consented to the death of this great man: who having been conducted to a public place, turned himself towards the south, to honour and salute the court of the Song emperors; beat his head against the ground, and received the fatal blow with great courage, in the forty-seventh year of his age. He was born in Kyang-si, in the district of Ki-gan Fû. Both Chineses and Tatars lamented his destiny. He was reputed learned, honest, and well versed in affairs. After this they carried into Tartary all those of the Song race, who were at Ta-tü.

b As Hü-pi-lay believed it for the glory of his reign to make conquests in Japan, in 1283 he commanded general Atabay to prepare 500 ships, with victuals and munitions. At the same time an order was published in the provinces, to assemble as many sailors as possible. This order caused much confusion in Che-kyan, Fo-kyen, and Kyang-nan; for the enterprise against Japan was not relished by either the Chinese or Tatar ministers. The officers and soldiers murmured loudly. Besides, commerce was interrupted. The fear of going to Japan caused the best seamen to desert: several of them turned robbers: and great numbers of sea-officers, with their crews, became pirates, and infested the coasts. The great men endeavoured to divert the emperor from his design, by representing to him all these evil consequences: but he would not hearken to them. However, Atabay met with new difficulties: and the grandees took measures for keeping him a long time without the proper necessaries. In October a Mandarin of Kyen-ning Fû, in Fo-kyen, revolted, and took the title of emperor; but this sedition was immediately quashed.

c This year the prince Siantar, followed by the generals Ku-lye and Nasu-la-ting (U), and others from the western countries, besides Chinese and Tatar, marching out of Yun-nan, entered the country of Myen (X). In November that prince made himself master of the royal cities of Kyang-tew and Tay-kong.

d Some good regulations were made also in the state. First, the custom of picking out young maidens through the provinces, to supply the court, having, by means of Xelu Chu-tsay, been abolished in the parts of China subject to the emperor Ogotay, Hü-pi-lay ordained that the same regulation should take place in the provinces conquered from the Song. Secondly, as the salaries of the Mandarins were not sufficient to support their state, it obliged most of them to take fees from the people; the emperor, therefore, to relieve his subjects after so long a war, doubled the income of those magistrates, and forbade receiving the smallest gratuity, under severe penalties. Whoever robbed, as it is termed, the value of twenty-five pounds, was condemned to death: and those who stole half that sum, were turned out of place, after receiving a heavy bastinado.

e In 1284, Hü-pi-lay ordered the Mandarins of the several provinces to send up all who could be found of the Song race. This order was obeyed; and the number sent to court was very great: among whom were several considerable Mandarins. The emperor being informed that the sect of Fo was in high esteem in Japan, he sent Bonzas privately aboard the fleet destined for that country, to get information concerning it. But the sailors, coming to discover their design, threw them into the sea (*).

f LU-SHI-JONG, a native of Ta-ming Fû, in Pe-che-li, by money, had obtained a considerable employment in the time of Abama, whose creature he was. This the emperor well knew: but the love of riches engaged him, by degrees, to follow the selfish views of that projector; who gave out, that the people would be eased, at the same time the revenue became more considerable. Tong-ywen-yong spoke loudly against Shi-jong, and would have had him turned out, as a bad subject, who ruined the people: but Hü-pi-lay punished Ywen-yong, and supported Shi-jong. This countenance, given to such a man, made Ho-li-bo-tsun, one of the principal ministers, lay down his employment; foretelling, that he would prove another Abama, and ruin the (U) Ku-lye was much esteemed. Nasu-la-ting was an Arab, and a Mohammedan, as before-mentioned; by M. Polo called Nofarain. Gaubil.—Doubtless Nasreddin.

(X) The same with Paga. What M. Polo calls Ka- ráyam, is a good part of the province of Yun-nan. Gaub.

(*) This shews, that the idolatrous sect of Fo did not so generally prevail then as it has done since; doubtless, through the encouragement given by the Mughl emperors.

emperor : who, on his withdrawing, suspended the order which that minister had obtained, a to introduce examinations of the Literati throughout the provinces¹.

his scheme

In February Hü-pi-lay demanded of Shi-jong what methods he proposed to take, in case he was put into place? Shi-jong, in a long discourse, among other things, said, First, that a great quantity of kashes, or copper deniers, ought to be made, and tribunals established, at Hang-chew Fû, capital of Che-kyang, and Tsven-chew Fû, a port of Fo-kyen, in order to distribute those deniers among the people, and buy the commodities brought thither by the foreign merchants : that the profit arising from thence should be divided into ten parts, seven to go to the treasury, and three to the people : that, as several great lords were possessed of forges, where they made arms, which they sold very dear, he was for taking the iron from them, and employing the money which it yielded to buy grain, in order to fill the public magazines, which he affirmed were every-where empty : that the grain should be sold at a reasonable price ; and that the profit arising therefrom would be very considerable : that none should be allowed to sell wine without a licence : and that the duty upon it should be raised. He was not for laying any upon the provisions and carriage for the armies ; but proposed settling a considerable tax on horses and sheep. He likewise wished that silks, callicos, and stuffs, were bought up from the Chineses, to furnish the Tatars, who would give those animals in exchange : that Mungl families should be appointed to take care of the herds, droves, and flocks ; alleging, that, from the skins, hair, horns, milk, and wool, there would arise great profit, two tenths of which would be sufficient for those families.

approved of.

THE emperor approved of all which was proposed by Lu-shi-jong, who had full power c to employ all those whom he judged fit to execute his schemes ; but was so imprudent as to restore a great many commissioners, who had been cashiered, because they were creatures of Abama. Shi-jong was in every thing supported by Sang-ko, brother of the Lama who had succeeded Pa-se-pa, in the post of doctor and master of the emperor, as well as chief of the Lamas. Several Mandarins spoke against Shi-jong, one of whom was sentenced to be bastinado'd ; which punishment was executed so severely, that he died of the blows. As the prince, appointed successor, was naturally an enemy to all those kinds of projectors, whose schemes tended only to hinder the circulation of money, reflect on the emperor, and fill the provinces with robbers, he spoke also against Shi-jong, and maintained that he did no more than imitate Abama. At length a great Mandarin, named Ching, made complaint to the d emperor of the unjust death of a Mandarin, who had been killed for having done his duty.

Accused of extortion,

He accused Shi-jong afresh, and made it appear, that this Mandarin, during the time that he had the care of the custom-house for cha (or tea), in Kyang-si, had done nothing but rob with impunity : and that, to raise the emperor's revenue to fifteen millions, he had set on foot a thousand rapines, vexations, extortions, false accusations, unjust confiscations, sales of places, murders, and the like.

convicted, and executed.

THE accusation of Ching put all Ta-tü in motion. The emperor was much surprised to see it supported by the prince, and most of the great men : so that neither Sang-ko, nor his brother, notwithstanding their authority, durst speak in his favour. In short, both he and Ching were cited to Sbang-tü, where the chief articles of the accusation having been proved against e Shi-jong, sentence of death was pronounced upon him by the judges ; and the emperor having approved of their sentence, he was executed on the spot. All the friends and creatures of Sang-ko and the criminal were struck with consternation : and Hü pi-lay became ashamed of his obstinacy, in upholding a man who had misled him by dazzling appearances.

Loss in Gan-nan.

THE general Sütü having made great complaints of the conduct of Chen-ye-tsven, the king of Gan-nan's son, by whose artifices such numbers of Mungl's had perished ; Hü-pi-lay, to be revenged for this affront, ordered prince To-whan, his son, to enter that kingdom ; and appointed general Li-heng to command under him. To-whan marched from Yun-nan ; and, being come to the river Fü-lang (Y), he demanded passage of the king of Gan-nan to Chen-chen, which city and country was possessed by his son. To-whan crossed the river on rafts, f and intirely defeated the king's army. Hereupon Chen-i-tsi, his brother, came with his ships, and submitted to the prince. However, the troops of Gan-nan rallied, and became more animated than before. As it happened to be the middle of summer, the heats and continual rains brought sickness into the Mungl army, so that they were not able to march to Chen-chen : and, for fear they should all perish, it was resolved to retire to Yun nan. The troops of Gan-nan pursued the Twens ; and, in this retreat, Li-heng received a shot with a poisoned arrow, of which he died. The king, after this, got with his army between China and Sütü, a who knew nothing of the prince's retreat, although but fifteen or twenty leagues distant : but he opened a passage through his enemies ; in which action a great many men were slain on both sides, and, among the rest, Sâtû himself, who fell valiantly fighting. He and Li-keng were two of the best generals in the empire ; and Hû-pi-lay was greatly concerned for their death.

^d GAUBIL, p. 198, & seq.

(Y) This is the river Ha-ti lo, which is a branch of the Kin-sha. The Ching geography, intitled, I-tü-chi, calls this river Mo-sha-lo. P. Martini is mistaken about the source of this river. Gaub.

THIS affliction was followed by one more sensible, which was the loss of the prince his heir (Z), who died in December, at the age of forty-three. As prince Cheng-kin, from his very infancy, discovered an inclination for virtue and good behaviour, the great men admired at it. His father gave him the illustrious Taw-shû for a preceptor ; who chose young Chinese and Tatar lords, of parts and good education, to be about him. The prince became very b learned in military affairs, the science of government, history, mathematics, and the classical books of China. He was perfectly acquainted with the nature of the countries both of China and Tartary ; the number of their inhabitants, their rivers, and their commerce (†). His whole study was to make the people happy ; and he was feared by those bad ministers, who, to please their masters, made use of the most unjust methods. He was generally esteemed and beloved ; nor was accused of any fault. He married the princess Koko-chin, of the Hongkila (or Kongorat) family ; who was of the same character with the prince her spouse ; by whom she had three sons and some daughters. The eldest of his sons was Kanmala. The second Talamapala ; who died in the reign of Hû-pi-lay, and left some children ; the eldest of whom was Hayshan. The third son of Cheng-kin was Timûr, who succeeded his grandfather in the c empire.

IN 1286, the grandees, being under great apprehensions, from the resolution in which the emperor still continued, of attacking Japan, they represented to him the danger and inutilty of that enterprise. They likewise laid before him the lamentable condition to which the armament set on foot by Atabay had reduced the southern provinces. Hû-pi-lay indeed dropped his design ; and caused it to be published, that he ought in that, as well as every thing else, to follow the counsel of those he employed in affairs : but the true reason for that change was, the advice he received that all Tartary was on the point of revolting. After the defeat and death of Siliki, and losses which the other princes in alliance with Hay-tû had received, there seemed nothing farther to be apprehended ; and the complete victory which general Tûtûba d had obtained, in 1283, over the confederate princes to the north of the river Tula, had confirmed Hû-pi-lay in that opinion. But, this year, Pe-yen, Tûtûba, Li-ting, and other generals, in Tartary, sent advice to the emperor, that the party of Hay-tû was grown stronger than ever : that this prince sent out spies on all sides ; and that it was to be feared, he would gain over to his interest the Mungl princes who dwelt to the north-east of Shan-tong, bordering on Liau-tong.

HU-PI-LAY, profiting by this intelligence, made new regulations to draw over to him the Chinese, especially those of Kyang-nan, Fo-kyen, Che-kyang, and some other provinces. In March he sent deputies into all parts of the empire, to look out for men skilled in the Chinese sciences and arts ; to whom employment was given, and some were brought to court. Hû-pi-lay took great pleasure to talk to them himself ; and it was still more pleasing to them to see a Mungl emperor well versed in the Chinese sciences. In September, advice came from the Mandarins of Fo-kyen, that ships from more than ninety-nine foreign kingdoms (A) were arrived at Tsven-chew-fû, in that province. These kingdoms are all treated as tributary ; but only eight of them are mentioned in the history, and those by names unknown to Europeans (B). This news gave a sensible joy to Hû-pi-lay, both as they brought much wealth into his dominions, and made the Chinese honour him. All the empire of China being now under one sovereign, the Bonzas of the sect of Fo assembled this year, to the number of 40,000, and agreed upon a form of church-government. They likewise made several statutes, or decrees, and regulations, for their prayers, penances, and other rites.

c GAUBIL, p. 201, & seqq.

(Z) Marco Polo speaks of this prince, whom he calls Chinchi. Gaub.

(†) Hence other nations may learn, what is the proper education for a prince, governors, and legislators.

(A) The kingdoms of Korea, Tibet, Gan-nan, Lao, Siam, Pegu, Japan, and others, which have been, at one time or other, tributary to China, have maps of their countries, and a present state of their dominions : wherein an account is given of their revenues, number of inhabitants, and other particulars ; whence it is that the Chinese historians give a very good account of those countries. The Chinese likewise have come to the knowledge of foreign parts, by means partly of the officers of their armies, which have often been in all the countries as far as the Caspian sea ; partly of the Bonzas of Fo, who have visited the countries near the Ganges and Indus ; partly of the Arabs, Persians, and other foreigners, who have settled in China. Gaubil.

(B) Viz. Ma-pa-eul (or Mapar), Sû-mûn-tû-la (or Sumatra), Su-men-na, Seng-ki-li, Ma-lan-tan, Lay-lay, Na-wang, and Ting-ho-eul (or Tinghor). The countries spoken of here are those of Malakka, Sumatra, the gulf of Pen-ko-la (or Bengal), and from cape Komcri to the Persian gulf.

Nayen joins Hay-tû.
A. D. 1287.

JENGHIZ KHAN had divided Tartary into eastern and western; whose limits were nearly in the meridian of Pe-king. The exact extent of the western part was not known to our author; but the eastern was divided into twenty departments. That conqueror's youngest brother, Pye-li Kû-tay, had the country between the rivers Liau, Toro, and Quy-ky, with part of the country between the Liau-tong and the Liau. Nayen, the great grandson and heir of Pye-li Kû-tay, who had enlarged the possessions of his ancestor, and became very potent (C), was gained over to his party by Hay-tû, who persuaded him to take arms. General Pe-yen, who had been one of the first to give notice of the league between those two princes, was sent towards Liau-tong, to see how matters stood; and, having narrowly escaped being taken by Nayen's spies, informed Hû-pi-lay of the great preparations which were making by that prince. The emperor hereupon ordered Pe-yen to encamp between Karâkorom and Shang-tû, in order to hinder the troops of Hay-tû, and other princes his allies, from joining Nayen (D). Li-ting was commanded to assemble a great body of Chinese troops; and the Tatars were conducted by Yusi Temûr (E), grandson of the famous Porcbû, the principal of Jenghiz Khân's four intrepids. General Tûtûba was likewise called with his forces from Kin-cha ^f.

defeated, and slain.

HU-PI-LAY, having, in May, taken the field in person, with design to attack Nayen, was advanced with a few troops, when the general of that prince's army came to observe the emperor's camp. Hû-pi-lay, though in danger of being carried away, shewed no signs of fear; and, as it was night, his forces, on notice given, hastened to his relief, the horse taking the foot behind them. Mean time Nayen lay quiet in his camp, his general not daring to attack the emperor, for fear of an ambuscade. Hereupon Li-ting, with ten resolute men, approaching the enemy's camp, shot a cannon (F) into it. The noise so frightened the troops of Nayen, which were besides undisciplined, that the general, thinking the whole imperial army was at his heels, took to flight. The Chinese and Tatar troops being now all arrived, Nayen was attacked by the before-mentioned commanders, at the head of their respective bodies, and by Hû-pi-lay at the head of his guards. The emperor's presence rendered his troops invincible, and the army of Nayen was entirely defeated. That prince himself was taken, and afterwards put to death. The battle was fought near the river Liau: after which, Hû-pi-lay returned triumphant to Shang-tû.

Losses in Gan-
nan.

THE same year, in the first month, prince To-whan, the emperor's son, entered Gan-nan; and was victorious in seventeen engagements. He plundered the city of Chen-chen, and returned to Yun-nan with a rich booty. He had scarce reached the borders, when he received advice, that king Chin-ye-suen appeared again with mighty forces. This obliged him to make a new expedition to Gan-nan; which he entered in March 1288, with a considerable army. The king let him advance, and amused him with deceitful negotiations; till, finding the pestilence began to rage in his army, he came with 300,000 men to attack him. The Mungls, on his approach, retired towards Yun-nan, in good order; nor could the enemy ever make any impression on the van-guard, although general Sitûr (G), who commanded it, was both sick and wounded. But the other troops did not escape so well; so that the prince lost a great number before he reached the borders. The emperor on this news reproached him for his imprudence, and took from him the government of Yun-nan; giving him a smaller one instead of it, and forbidding him to come to court. The king of Gan-nan however sent Hû-pi-lay a statue of gold, by way of tribute; and even wrote a very modest letter, in which he owned he had committed a fault in opposing the imperial armies.

Success in
Tartary,

TIMUR (H), grandson of Hû-pi-lay, was more successful in the war on the river Liau. Prince Hatan (I), supported by the princes Tye-ko, Arlu, and Tûlûkhân, having entered into league with Hay-tû and Nayen, came with a great army to that river; and threatened Liau-tong, with the countries bordering on the great wall of China. Pe-yen had always made head against Hay-tû, and hindered his junction with Hatan. Hû-pi-lay sent his grand-

^f GAUBIL, p. 204, & seq.

(C) He possessed nine of those twenty departments; the eleven others belonged to the lords of five tribes, viz. those of Chalar (or Jaloyr), Hongkila (Kongorat), Alangû, Gû-lû, and I-kye lye-ise. Gaubil.

(D) M. Polo speaks largely of Nayen's revolt. The king whom he calls Laidu is Hay-tu. But the Chinese history says nothing either of crosses or Christians, Jews or Mohammedans, being in the armies. Gaubil.

(E) Polo-schan, famous in the war against the Song, was one of his principal generals. Gaubil.

(F) The Chinese says Ho-pau; that is, fre-pau. This circumstance of fire, joined to the great noise it made, makes me call it a fire-cannon. Possibly it was a petard. Gaubil.

(G) He was a native of Kin-cha [or Kipjak]; and was in great reputation. Gaubil.

(H) Or Temûr, third son of the late prince Cheng-kin, and the princess Koko-chen. Hû-pi-lay loved this young prince much; who, excepting the name and title, had all the privileges and honour of the imperial heir. This is the same Temûr, whom M. Polo speaks of. Gaubil.

(I) He was grandson of Ha-cho-sen, third son of Tû-lûkay, and brother to Jenghiz Khân. Gaubil.

- a son Timûr, a young prince of great hopes, with orders to follow the advice of J. Hienûr, Tâtûba, Li-ting, and Polo-whan. They engaged Kin-kya-nu, one of the late prince Nayen's generals: and, after fighting a whole day, with great slaughter on both sides, the two armies separated. Timûr being informed, that Hatan and his allies were encamped near the river Quey-ley, marched against them with his fire-cannon, which Li-ting had taken great care to get ready. The battle lasted two days, and was exceeding bloody; in which perished several princes, who were Hatan's allies, the generals of Nayen, and their best troops. This victory gave great reputation to prince Timûr, and filled with joy the emperor; who designed him for his successor: great elogies were likewise bestowed on the generals who served under him. The prince after this visited all the tribes, which had before been subject to Na-yen, Hatan, b and others; and had the pleasure to see their lords submit to him. His affability and clemency gained him the love of the Tatars, who in great numbers encamped near the river Lyau, Tiro, Quey-ley, and in other places.

In October, Kong-tsong, the late emperor of the Song, was sent to Pûtala, the residence of Emperor the Grand Lama, in Tibet, to learn the doctrine of Fo. The Chinese historians blame Hû-pi-lay for sending one of their emperors to live among Bonzas; and paint Kong-tsong as a poor-spirited prince, who ought rather to have died than dishonoured his name by going to be educated in the doctrines and customs of barbarians. Kong-tsong turns Bonzo.

- In January 1289, it was resolved to make the canal, called Whey-tong-ho; which was to go from Tsi-ning-chew, in Shan-tong, to Lin-fing-chew, in the same province: likewise to make
c a communication between the rivers Ven and Wey, in the same province. This canal was undertaken to convey provisions to the court (K). In 1287, Hû-pi-lay had built a magnificent college (L) at Ta-tû, for teaching the Chinese sciences, and furnished it with the most able doctors in the empire. There he caused many sons of princes, lords, and great Mandarins, to be brought up. This year, 1289, a second imperial college, of the same kind, was built at Ta-tû. Hû-pi-lay, who gave the direction of it to the Whey-hû (M), was earnest to promote this college; and, in person, exhorted the Tatar and Chinese grandees, as well as the princes of his own family, to send their sons thither.² Royal canal. A. D. 1289.

- PRINCE Hay-tû, this year, prevailed on several Tatar tribes to the north and north-west of Karakorum to revolt against Hû-pi-lay. Prince Hatan took the field again, and made incursions d into Lyau-toug, and other provinces. Kin kya-nu, before-mentioned, a great friend and confident of prince Na-yen, at length, joined Hay-tû, with his troops. Pe-yen, who commanded the imperial camp formed at Karakorum, detached a great body of Kirghis (N), to join the army commanded by Kanmala, eldest son of the late prince Cheng-kin: for all which Hay-tû surprised and surrounded him, near the river Selinga. But Tâtûba, being informed of this, immediately set forward with his troops of Kin-cha (or Kipjâk); and falling on Hay-tû, rescued Kanmala, who was on the point of being made prisoner. Tâtûba received orders after this to join Hû-pi-lay; who, notwithstanding his great age, in June, marched from Shang-tû against Hay-tû: But this prince retired, without venturing a battle. However, about the same time, prince Naymân-tay attacked, and defeated, Hatan, who was encamped near the river Toro, which e falls into the Non. Affairs of Tartary.

- In January 1290, Hû-pi-lay published several sage regulations, to advance arts and sciences in the imperial colleges built at Ta-tû: he likewise examined into the state of printing and books. In March, he enquired how the orders which he had given for the cultivation of lands, silk-worms, and other points relating to commerce, had been executed. In April, he sent experienced persons to the kingdom of Mapâr, in the Indies; with orders to spare no expence to engage men skilled in the sciences, mechanics, officers both for land and sea, and interpreters for divers languages. It cannot be denied, says Gaubil, that Hû-pi-lay has rendered his name immortal, by what he had done for the advantage of his empire. He caused canals to be dug in several parts of China, for the communication of rivers: he sent mathematicians as f far as fifty-five degrees north, and fifteen or sixteen south, towards Kochin China, to observe the latitude of the principal cities in China, the capitals of Gan-nan, and Korea, and of many places in Tartary. He was at immense expences to make mathematical instruments, search for old books, send able men into foreign countries, draw others from all parts of the world, Regulations made regarding literature.

² GAUBIL, p. 207, & seq.

(K) But it was not finished by the Taven, nor till the reign of Yong-lo, (third) emperor of the succeeding dynasty of the Ming, who joined it to the W'hang-ho. Gaubil.

(L) At present called Que-tse-kyen. A Que-tse-kyen was built at Yen-king, in the time of Ogotay (or Oktay); but it made but a poor figure, and was not much resorted to. Gaubil.

(M) By Whey-hû the Chinese understand a Mohammedan. But, under the reign of the Taven, by that term must be understood the people of the west; that is Great Bukhâria and Karazm, Persia, Syria, Arabia, and the countries to the west of the Caspian sea, and it may be even the Europeans. It is not mentioned what arts and sciences were taught in their colleges. Gaubil.

(N) In Chinese, Ki-eul-ki-se. Gaubil.

get good books translated into the Mungl language, form libraries, build public structures, procure rarities from distant regions, draw commerce from abroad, build ships, and do infinite other beneficial works. These actions are the more commendable, as during his whole reign he had great wars on foot against potent princes of his family, who were jealous of his power and glory.

In June were finished the books, containing the doctrines of the Lamas of Tibet, written in great letters of gold; and the historians, who had orders to collect the memoirs for the reign of Quey-yew (or Kayuk), put the finishing hand to their work: soon after which, the history of the reign of Ogotay was also completed.

A rapacious
minister

SANG-KO, who was no less covetous and evil-minded than Abama, had care of the finances; and his brother, who had succeeded to the titles and dignity of Pa-se-pa, disposed Hû-pi-lay so much in his favour, that none dared speak of his malversations: however, a lord of the imperial family of the Song, named Chau-meng-fû, resolved, at all risks, to accuse Sang-ko. He began by founding Che-li, a lord full of probity, and acceptable to Hû-pi-lay; telling him, that it was time to discover to the emperor the crimes of Sang-ko: "if we do not," says he, "posterity will accuse us, and we shall pass for men without honour: the good of the empire requires that we should make known the person who ruins it." Hereupon Che-li, one day when Hû-pi-lay was hunting, spoke freely against Sang-ko. The emperor, incensed hereat, ordered him to be bastinado'd, for having spoken very ill of a great man of the court. This lord was so beaten, that the blood came out both of his nose and mouth: he likewise, with faintness, fell to the ground. However, being questioned about the matter, by Hû-pi-lay's order, he had the courage and fidelity to repeat all which he had declared; adding "that the good of the state and honour of the prince alone had moved him to make the accusation; which he was ready to maintain, at the expence of his life." The emperor now repented his having caused Che-li to be so ill treated; and knew that other great men proposed to imitate that great lord's zeal.

detested and ruined.

PU-HU-CHU, lord of the country of Kang-li, before-mentioned, who was one of the most steady and sincere men of his time, had orders to examine into the affair. This minister was already acquainted with the rogueries and bad actions of Sang-ko: and, as he was a mortal enemy to those who did injustice, spoke of him as a wicked minister, who had deceived his prince, brought trouble and disorder every-where; procured many persons to be unjustly accused, and put to death; and was the true cause that robbers were so numerous. Pû-hû-chû intreated the emperor to get rid, as soon as possible, of so great an offender; and did not scruple to affirm, that, if it was delayed, a considerable change was to be feared. What this lord said was confirmed by many other grandees. Hereupon Hû-pi-lay complained, that he had not been informed thereof sooner: but these imprudent complaints only drew on him a slur from the censors of the empire; who declared, "that till then it had been dangerous for any one to acquaint him with the intrigues of bad ministers." Che-li, now become more in favour than ever, was appointed to take an inventory of Sang-ko's effects, gotten by unjust means; which were immense. They found an infinite number of jewels and precious stones in his palace. They searched likewise that of Orgun Sali, an Igûr, who was an old pupil of Pa-se-pa; and, being in the ministry, was linked with Sang-ko. This last was turned out of all his places; and the marble monument demolished, which his pride had prompted him to raise to his memory, with his elogy cut upon it^a.

In June, Hû-pi-lay forbade the Mungls to go trade in the countries of the west: and, in August, some foreigners presented him with books written in gold characters, and several lions.

A villainous
Lama

At this time there was a Lama of Tibet, in the southern provinces, in great reputation among the Mungls. For all this, he was a mere hypocrite, and corrupt mortal, who loved money to excess. He counterfeited the emperor's mandates, and gave false licences; intimidated several wealthy families, promised and procured places: in short, he made use of all sorts of unlawful means to become rich. His passion for money carried him so far as even to take up the bodies of the Song emperors, princes, and great men, whose tombs were near Shau-king-fû, in Che-kyang; where, it is said, he found abundance of gold, silver, and jewels. Of their bones, mixed with those of oxen and horses, he raised a pyramid; which sight filled the Chinese with indignation; nor needed there more to excite a general revolt. Hereupon the Mandarins of those places imprisoned the Lama, confiscated his goods, and condemned him to death; but, being supported at the court by several Mungl lords, and the ladies, at the instigation of the Lamas, who had great influence over them, so wrought on Hû-pi-lay, that the Lama was discharged, and great part of his treasures restored to him. This unjust change of the sentence did the emperor's character much prejudice. The Chinese cannot forgive him condemned, yet

pardoned.

^a GAUBIL, p. 211. & seq.

a this weakness: and their history, on this occasion, renews its complaints against him, for having had so great an affection for the Lamas: Men, says it, at least very useless to the empire.

HU-PI-LAY, being told of several isles, named Lyew-kyew (O), to the east of Fo-kyen, was Expedition: land side. immediately for sending an army to subdue them; but was diverted from that enterprise: however, he was at great expences to fit out ships to discover those isles. He would likewise have sent armies into the kingdom of Gan-nan: but the generals and ministers presented him a petition, exhorting him not to renew a war, which experience had shewn to be so hurtful to the state; and pointed out other ways of inducing the king of that country to become tributary to the empire. Hû-pi-lay followed their advice; and turned his thoughts wholly to secure Tartary against the designs of Hay-tû, and the other rebel princes.

b THE first day of the Chinese year (P) is a day of public rejoicing at the court, and through the Chinese super- provinces. The sight of the princes, great men, and Mandarins, who, on this occasion, sition appear at the palace, in their habits of ceremony, to strike their heads nine times before the emperor, gives a grand idea of the majesty of the empire. But if an eclipse of the sun, which about natural was always a bad omen with the Chinese, happens on that day; it is, according to the Chi- events. nese astrology, a certain token that heaven threatens an approaching danger. Towards the end of the year 1291, the tribunal of mathematics presented a petition to the emperor, to A. D. 1291. acquaint him; that, by the calculus, a solar eclipse would happen on the first day of the next year. After the examination usual on such occasions, the court thought proper to order, that on new-year's day there should be no compliments of felicitation, nor public rejoicing (Q); c The Chinese likewise, who piqued themselves on their wisdom, did not fail to lay hold of this opportunity to exhort Hû-pi-lay to correct any defects which he might, on examination, find in his conduct or government; and by that means render heaven propitious. The eclipse was observed with the usual ceremonies; and the day which should have been a day of public joy, was a day of sadness.

THIS year, 1292, was made the canal, called Tong-whay (R), which runs from Pe-king to Victory in Tong-chew: and several Mandarins belonging to the finances, who were friends of Sang-ko, Tartary. were put to death. Prince Mengli Timûr, leagued with Hay-tû, appeared also to the north of A. D. 1292. the great Kobi, or desert. Pe-yen retired towards Karakorum, as it to defend that city; but it was only to watch an opportunity for attacking that prince with advantage. At length, one d day in October, he drew out his army; and, without giving any orders or directions but to follow him, with his sword drawn, galloped full-speed towards the camp of Mengli Timûr: who, not able to resist the attacks of Pe-yen's troops, fled with a few horsemen, and left his army to the mercy of the enemy, by whom the greater part of them were slain.

HU-PI-LAY had an extraordinary fondness to be known and esteemed in foreign countries. Expedition to The great number of Indian ships which arrived in Fo-kyen, gave him frequent opportunities to Qua-wa, send Mandarins to treat with the princes of India; and induce them to communicate to him the curiosities of their respective dominions. The Indians were great gainers by their commerce with China; from whence they brought vast sums of money: and Hû-pi-lay's deputies had been often well received by the king of Mapâr. But not long before, having sent a Chinese grandee, named Mengki, to Qua-wa; the king, for what reason does not appear, caused him to be branded in the face with the marks which are often put on highwaymen, and then dismissed him. The Chinese lords, enraged to see a great Mandarin of their nation dishonoured by a prince whom they considered as a barbarian, petitioned the emperor to revenge the affront. Hû-pi-lay made a great stir about this insult upon one of his envoys; and ordered a considerable number of ships of war, and other vessels, to be gotten ready, at Tsuen-chew-fû, in Fo-kyen. This province, with those of Kyang-fû and Hû-quang, furnished 30,000 resolute soldiers, a part of In- and the Chinese grandees were very earnest to have the fleet well provided. It consisted of one dia.

(O) It is doubtful, whether the isles of Lyew-kyew, which Hû-pi-lay would have conquered, were the same with those at present called Lyew-kyew. The geography I-tong-chi gives that name to the isles of Pong-hû and Formosa: affirming, that Formosa is the Lyew-kyew which Hû-pi-lay wanted to subdue. Lyew-kyew is the name of several islands, whose prince often sent deputies to the emperor of China, to pay him homage and tribute. They lie between Formosa and Japan. One of them is near Sasuma, which the Portuguese, and, after them, some French, write Saxuma: but I do not know any thing exactly about the number or largeness of those islands. Gaubil.

(P) The first day of the year is the first of the first moon; and the first moon is that in the course of which the sun enters the sign of Pisces. Marco Polo says, the first day of the year at the court of Kublay answered to the first of February: but it appears from the annals of that emperor, both in the Chinese and Tatar language, that the civil year was then the same that it is at present. Gaubil.

(Q) These superstitious notions about the ill presage of an eclipse of the sun, have sometimes thrown the Chinese Kalendar into confusion. It has been often dangerous to declare that an eclipse would happen on the first day of the year: so that more than once, to avoid disturbing the emperor, and to deceive the people, they have intercalated a month. They have made the eclipse fall on the last day of the twelfth month of the former year, on the first of the twelfth intercalated month, or on the first of the second month of the same year. Gaubil.

(R) It is named at present Ta-tong-ho, the river or canal of Ta-tong. In digging the earth, they found remains of an antient canal, which joined the rivers Wben and Pe together. Gaubil.—P. 588 called Whay-tong ho.

thousand

thousand ships, including vessels of burden and others, with provisions for a year. She-pe, a native of Pau-ting Fu, in Pe-che-li, had the chief command. Kau-bing, of Ju-ning-fû, in Ho-nan was general of the 30,000 troops; and Ye-be-mi-she, an Igâr, commanded the sailors. Ye-be-mi-she and She-pe had been in the Indies before, and understood the language of Qua-wa.

THE fleet set sail in December, and steered directly for the south part of Tong-king, bordering on Kochin China; then, sailing along a mountainous coast, they entered the sea of Wen-tun (S). At length, they came in sight of certain mountains (T); where they cut wood to build little barks; and, in September 1293, by help of those barks, landed their troops¹.

The country described.

THE kingdom of Qua-wa is near that of Ko-lang. The Chinese books of geography say, Qua-wa is the name given in the time of the Twen to the country antiently called Tû-po; which is represented as a great island in the sea, lying to the south of China; and that the Bonzas of Fo call it the kingdom of the Quey, or spirits: but nothing is spoken of the situation of Quey; and others say, that Qua-wa is not far from the kingdom of Kamboja, in the farther peninsula of the Indies. In a very large general chart or map, made by order of the late emperor Kang-hi, and kept with great care in the palace, whereon that monarch ordered to be written the names which the Chinese give to foreign countries known to them, the characters of Qua-wa take up good part of the hither peninsula where Kochin stands. But our author thinks this cannot be the Qua-wa in question. He rather judges it to be the island of Borneo; especially, as a Chinese fleet, with 30,000 troops on board, could not, in his opinion, sail in sixty-eight days from Kochin to Tsven-chew-fû, in Fo-kyen: although he confesses most of the Chinese geographers have committed great errors, both in the distances and bearings of the islands (U) off the coasts of India, Persia, and Arabia.

The Mungl general

BUT to return to the history. Ta-nay-kya-lay, king of Qua-wa, going to war with Hachi-ka-fû, king of Ko-lang, was killed in battle. Hereupon Tû-han-pi-tû-ye, his son-in-law, undertook to continue the war: but, being baffled in all his attempts, as soon as he heard of She-pe's arrival, and the occasion of his coming, he submitted to him; and offered to give up all he was possessed of. This he did the better to deceive the Chinese, while he took measures underhand to destroy their army. He gave the general a map of the country of Ko-lang, and persuaded him to conquer it; promising to join him with his troops. She-pe, who believed all which Tû-han-pi-tû-ye told him, left officers to guard the fleet, and divided his forces into three bodies, in order to attack Ta-she, the capital of Ko-lang. The Chinese found an army of 100,000 men ready to oppose them: but, after a battle, which continued from sun-rise till noon, the Ko-lang troops were defeated, and retired into the city. However, the king, unwilling to undergo a siege, came out and surrendered, with his wife and children; who were all killed.

duped by the king.

A. D. 1293.

TU-HAN-PI-TU-YE after this asked leave to return to his dominions; which motion was opposed by Qua-heng: but She-pe and Ye-be-mi-she gave their consent; which they in a little time repented: for, next year (X), that king, renouncing all which he had promised, instead of obeying She-pe's orders, came with a considerable force to cut off his retreat towards the fleet; which was thirty leagues distant, She-pe, who too late saw he was betrayed, defended himself with much valour, and retired in good order to the sea-coast; where, having embarked with his troops, he, in sixty-eight days, arrived at Tsven-chew-fû. In this expedition he lost 3000 men; but brought off a great booty in gold and precious stones. The emperor punished both him and Ye-be-mi-she; and confiscated two thirds of their effects, for not obeying his commands, and for letting Tû-han-pi-tû-ye escape. However being good officers, they were soon after pardoned; and the Chinese grandees were satisfied to let the king of Qua-wa and others see, that, notwithstanding their great distance, they would not fail to revenge the affronts offered to them.

Pe-yen recalled

GENERAL Pe-yen had hitherto kept Tartary in subjection, in spite of the power and efforts of Hay-tû, and other princes of the imperial family: the emperor was fully convinced of his great services, and resolved to reward them in a signal manner. However, several grandees, jealous of that general's glory, told Hû-pi-lay, that it was dangerous to let him continue so long at the head of the troops of Tartary: and even insinuated that he was clandestinely in league with Hay-tû. The emperor well knew that jealousy was the ground of their informations, although he said nothing. In June he talked of declaring Timûr hereditary prince; and ordered him to prepare forthwith for going to command the army against Hay-tû. General Yusi-temûr was named to succeed Pe-yen; who received an order to repair to Tay-tong-fû, as

¹ GAUBIL, p. 214 & seq.

(S) That is, the immense chaos, which seems to be the ocean. Gaubil.

(T) Kan-lan, Yu-kya, Li-ma-ta, and Kew-lang. Gaubil. —It is not said in what country; but we presume they belong to Qua-wa.

(U) Yet, by attending to the account which is given of those different parts, it is easy to know many of them. Gaubil.

(X) In January this year, the buildings of She-tsi were finished. Gaubil.

a soon as Timûr arrived at Karakorum. This prince made no great haste to get to the imperial camp, as he loved Pe-yen, and was sensible he knew better than himself how to deal with Hay-tû: Yûsi-temûr was in the same sentiments with Timûr. Mean time Pe-yen, though informed of all, behaved as if he knew nothing of what passed: he decamped from Karakorum, and marched northward to meet the army of Hay-tû, who was again defeated and obliged to retire.

A FEW days after the battle, Timûr and the new general arrived at the camp: where, in out of the presence of the officers, the prince notified to Pe-yen the emperor's orders; and commanded him to repair to Tay-tong-fû in Shan-si, there to wait his imperial majesty's further pleasure. The generals who served under Pe-yen, and were strongly attached to him, could not forbear b expressing their surprise: but grew easy again, when they saw that the prince made him eat at his own table, and bestowed considerable presents on him. Before Pe-yen set out, Timûr sent is greatly for him, and with tears embraced him, intreating him to give him some instructions. Prince, poured. said the general, love neither women nor wine, and every thing will succeed with you. Pe-yen went to Tay-tong-fû, and there received an order to repair to court. Where being arrived, the emperor, to the confusion of the jealous grandees, received him with much honour; publicly extolled his fidelity and services; declared him his prime minister, and gave him in particular the general command, as well of the troops which composed his own guard, as those which encamped in great numbers about Ta-tû and Shang-tû^k.

c IN September, Hû-pi-lay returned from Shang-tû to Ta-tû; and next month was frightened at the sight of a comet. The Chinese history carefully takes notice of these phænomena which d have happened, as well as the panics which have seized the emperors on such occasions. The astrologers have likewise been assiduous to collect the events which came to pass after a comet had appeared; and pretend that it is designed as a favour from heaven to warn crowned heads to take care of themselves. Hû-pi-lay had given into these false ideas: the first day of the comet he sent for Pû-hû-chû, one of his ministers, to know what he had best to do to appease the anger of the deity. Pû-hû-chû passed the whole night in the emperor's chamber, and recited several passages of the I-king and Shi-king (Y); to shew with what respect he ought to receive the advice which heaven gives, and how much its anger ought to be dreaded. He produced instances from the ancient history, to shew that the principal business of a prince d should be the practice of virtue; and that on the appearance of eclipses, comets, and earthquakes, he ought seriously to examine his own heart, and, above all, in what manner he governs his people.

THE minister dwelt particularly on the history of Ven-ti, emperor of the western Han; and Kublay's set forth the use which that prince had made of the appearance of several phænomena. Hû-pi-lay was so well pleased with the instance of Ven-ti, that he thought he could never talk himself, or hear Pû-tû-chû talk, enough about it. Mean time he fell sick, and, in January 1294, died A. D. 1294: in his palace at Ta-tû, in the eightieth year (Z) of his age.

THE Chinese historians charge Hû-pi-lay with being superstitious to excess, and ridiculously and character: attached to the Lamas. They likewise accuse him with loving women and money; with e having sacrificed too many men in the wars of Japan and Gan-nan; and too much promoted foreigners of the west. On the other hand, the Tatars and foreigners have always considered the reign of Hû-pi-lay as one of the most glorious that ever was; and it is certain this prince had great qualities. He was learned, courageous, and magnificent, a friend to men of letters; and if he loved money, it was with a view to execute the great designs which he conceived in his mind; whose object was generally the glory of the empire, and the public good.

HU-PI-LAY was the fourth son of prince Toley and the princess Sarkutna; brother to the Wives and emperor Meng-ko and the king Hyu-la-gû; and grandson of Jenghîz Khân. He married a great f many wives, five of whom bore the title of empresses. By these he had ten sons: 1. Turchi, who died without issue. 2. Cheng-kin, who had been declared heir, but died in 1285. 3. Mang-kola, governor general of Shen-si, Se-chwen, and Tibet. 4. Gantan-pûwha. 5. Nan-mû-han. 6. Ukoche. 7. Gayyache. 8. Gaulûche. 9. Kokochû. 10. Choan. Besides these princes, he had several daughters¹.

^k GAUBIL, p. 218, & seq.

¹ Ibid. p. 221, & seq.

(Y) Two of the classical or canonical books of the Chinese; which Konfutsius, and his successors in doctrine, have commented on. These false notions are inculcated as supposed to be the only check on princes.

(Z) La Croix puts his death in the same year; and says, he reigned twenty-five (a mistake, perhaps, of the press for thirty-five) years. Abû'lghazi Khân says, he reigned thirty-five, and lived seventy-three years; but does not mention that of his death: of these thirty-five years he reigned fifteen over China.

his extensive
power.

THE Persian, and other western historians of Asia, have written entire books on the exploits a of this famous Khân; but scarce any thing of moment hath as yet been communicated from them. Besides what has been already inserted in our notes, relating to Arikbuga (or Alipuko); the sum of all is as follows: that Hulâkû, being wiser than his brother Arikbuga, sent to compliment Kublai, or Koplay Khân, upon his advancement to the empire; and had all the countries possessed by the Mungls to the south of the Amû, granted to him in return: that Kublai, hearing of Hulâkû's death in 1265, installed Abâka Khân in his room: that Burgha (or Berek) Khân remained in possession of Kipjâk: and Algû (A), Jagatay's grandson, had for his share all the countries lying between the Amû and mount Altay: lastly, that Koplay died full of glory, after he had taken the town of Zimû, or Jinû^m; a mistake, perhaps, for the country of Chin, or China. Hû-pi-lay was the sixth Khân of Great Tartary, and the first Mungl emperor who b reigned over that country and all China.

Remarks on him,

BEFORE we proceed to the next Khân, it will be proper to make a few remarks. Hû-pi-lay, that he might please his conquered subjects, and not disoblige his natural ones, divided his reign between them, residing part of the year in one country, and part in the other. For which purpose he fixed the capital of each near the frontiers of both, as well as one another; and his successors followed his example as long as they remained in possession of China, where he founded the empire of the Mungls: for, although his ancestors were possessed of the northern part of it, yet the Chineses would not acknowledge them as their sovereigns, so long as any of the Song emperors, their natural lords, reigned in the southern provinces. After the subjugation of the whole Chinese empire, and extinction of the Song race, they were obliged to acknowledge them c for their masters: but they, in effect, subdued the Mungls in their turn, by giving them their manners, customs, and even their forms of government and policy. In consequence of this, their historians have, in effect, turned the Mungl emperors, from Hû-pi-lay downwards, into Chineses: they have separated them from the line of Jenghîz Khân, made a distinct dynasty of them, and placed Hû-pi-lay as the head and founder of it; considering all his predecessors as Khâns of Tartary only. The more also to naturalize this race, and make them their own, they have changed the title of the dynasty from Mungls, or Moguls, into that of Ywen; as well as the name of Hû-pi-lay (or Kublai), and his successors, who reigned in China.

and the Chinese historians.

respecting his dynasty.

THE Mungl emperors, therefore, from Hû-pi-lay, are to be considered in two different respects: viz. either as they make part of the Mungl Khâns of the line of Jenghîz Khân, who d reigned over the Mungl empire in Tartary, China, and other countries; or only as a distinct race of emperors reigning in China, to which those other regions, and even Tartary itself, is supposed to be subject. It is in the first of these lights that we have treated of them here (although, for want of other sources, we are obliged to draw our materials from the Chinese authors): because the province which we have undertaken in this place, is the history of the Mungls and Tatars. They will likewise be considered briefly hereafter in the second light, when we come to speak of China.

^m LA CROIX, ubi supra, p. 400. ABU'LGHASI, ubi supra, p. 162.

(A) The same, probably, called Hay-tû, in the Chinese history: although the reign neither of Algû, nor his successor Baruk Khân, who, according to the oriental historians, made war on Kublai, will synchronize with the time of this latter, or of Hay-tû. See hereafter.

B O O K VI.

The history of Jenghîz Khân's successors in Tartary and China.

C H A P. I.

The reign of Timûr, called by the Chinese Ching-tsong.

AFTER the death of Hû-pi-lay (or Kublai), Pe-yen, as prime minister, and general of the army, gave the necessary commands, to prevent all disorder; and invited Timûr to come immediately, and be acknowledged emperor, pursuant to the last will of his grandfather. This appointment he also notified to the princes, and other generals of the troops; giving them to understand, at the same time, that he would not suffer the least opposition to it. The assembly met, by agreement, in April 1294; where, notwithstanding, several princes intended to declare somebody else emperor. Then Yusi Timûr spoke; and said, That it was proper, without delay, to instal Timûr, according to the intention of Hû-pi-lay. Pe-yen seconded Yusi Timûr; and, drawing his sword, declared he would never acknowledge any other emperor than Timûr. The general Ywe-chechar, great grandson of Porgû, one of Jenghîz Khân's four intrepids, was of the same opinion, as well as all the other generals: it was known also, that the Chinese great men would declare for Timûr. Hereupon Kanmala, eldest son of the late prince Cheng-kin, gave his vote for Timûr, his youngest brother: the other princes did the same; and, in short, all fell on their knees before that prince, to acknowledge him for emperor. Notice was immediately given of this to all the tribes, generals of troops, and mandarins of the provinces of China: a general amnesty was published likewise, according to custom.

Sixth Khân, Timûr.

A. D. 1294.

ONE of the first acts of Timûr, who is known to the Chinese by the name of Ching-tsong, was, to give the title of emperor to his father, and that of empress to his mother. He likewise erected monuments to the memory of his father Cheng-kin, grandfather Hû-pi-lay, and the princess his grandmother; punctually paid what was due to the princes and princesses of his house, to the generals and mandarins: shewed great marks of confidence to his brother Kanmala, and declared him his lieutenant-general in Tartary. He appointed generals to oppose Hay-tû, and other princes of his party. He provided for the security of the provinces by a choice of good officers, giving full powers to Pe-yen, Yusi Temûr, Ywe-chechar, Tûtûba, and others, in all matters whatsoever which concerned war. He caused the finishing stroke to be given to the history of Hû-pi-lay; made peace with the king of Gan-nan (*); and ordered commerce with India to be renewed, which had been interrupted by the war with Qua-wa (†).

His first act.

IN December this year died the famous Pe-yen, at the age of fifty-nine, with the reputation of being one of the greatest men whom either China or Tartary ever produced. The emperor, the princes, the generals, and universally all the officers, mourned his death a long time; and the Chinese historians have bestowed on this general a magnificent elogy.

Death of Pe-yen.

THE year 1295 is marked for the first of Timûr's reign by the Chinese, who usually reckon to the deceased emperor that in which he dies (A). At the beginning of it, lands were given in the southern provinces, to the soldiers, on condition, to keep in awe the Myau-tse: a kind of independent people, who inhabit certain mountainous parts of Se-chwen, Quey-chew, Hu quang, Quang-si, (*) Containing Tong-king and Kochin China.(†) Supposed to be near Kamboja.(A) Altho' this rule or custom is not always observed, many instances being found to the contrary. Gauth.

Quang-tong, and elsewhere; having languages and laws different not only from the Chinese, but from one another. In April there happened a grievous famine, on which occasion Timûr shewed his readiness to succour the people; he caused large alms to be distributed every-where to the poor, and the public granaries to be examined: henceforth also he forbade the felling of civil employments^a.

Good regulation.

In 1296 the daughters and sisters of the Mungl emperors, as well as the princes and grantees their husbands, were possessed of very great privileges. By little and little they had assumed to themselves the right of judging, and putting to death, their vassals and domestics. Several abuses on this occasion determined Timûr to make a law, that no person whosoever should condemn another, without having the emperor's consent; which regulation is highly praised by the *Chinese*s.

A. D. 1297. In 1297 the empress-mother had a mind to go to U-tay-shan, a mountain near the city of U-tay (B), to see the temple which she had built in honour of Fo. As this journey must have been very chargeable to the people, and besides, was not agreeable to the emperor her son, who, through respect, would not oppose it openly, the Chinese great men, deeply averse to the worship of Fo, presented that princess with a petition full of spirit and eloquence. After delicately setting forth her known tenderness and compassion for the people, they exaggerate the number of persons ruined, or dead, on occasion of that temple; and make a dismal representation of the evils which such a progress would bring on the inhabitants of Pe-che-li and Shan-si; nor did they spare to exclaim against the worship of Fo. Hereupon the empress desisted from her design; and, as she saw that the emperor did not approve of it, she was unwilling to give him the least uneasiness.

Hay-tû defeated.

A. D. 1297.

TIMUR, when he appointed his brother Karmala for his lieutenant-general in Tartary, and Ywe-checkar for general of the troops, ordered them to follow the counsels of Tûtûba, prince of Kin-cha (C), who had beaten prince Hay-tû in several engagements. Tûtûba died in 1295, at Swen-hû-fû in Pe-che-li, as he was setting out for Tartary, to command one of the armies designed against the same enemy. He was succeeded in his title and honours by his son Chobangûr, who was as great a captain as his father, under whom he always served with distinction. This general, being in 1297 appointed to oppose Hay-tû, who was advanced as far as the country of Parin, marched at the head of his troops of Kin-cha; and, finding him encamped along the river Arû, prepared to attack him: but in October he fled, and retired towards the north. Next year prince Tuwa, Hay-tû's brother, was defeated by Chobangûr, to the west of the mountain Altay, towards the source of the river Irtish. In August a detachment of Hay-tû's army, being met by prince Ko-li-ki-tse, who had married the emperor's daughter, he defeated them three times: but, falling from his horse, was taken, and carried to Hay-tû, whose great offers he refused, chusing to be slain, rather than prove unfaithful to Timûr.

Timûr's charity.

A. D. 1299.

In January 1299 this monarch sent mandarins into all the provinces, to examine into the losses which the people had suffered; the damages which the troops had caused; the families of mandarins, who had not wherewithal to live on, suitable to their condition; and the peasants, who could not cultivate the lands. These commissioners gave a real relief to the poor, the diseased, the old officers who were no longer able to serve, and to their families. This conduct loaded Timûr with the publick applause: he refused continually to declare war against Japan, altho' several Mungls, who delighted in blood and slaughter, urged him to it. The emperor declared, that he would live in peace, and banish the vices which reigned in the empire. He daily inquired into the miseries of the people, and seemed to be sensible only of the glory of making them happy.

The history, however, blames Timûr for having sent a bonzâ, in quality of envoy, to Japan, in February this year: it praises the emperors, who sent deputies to foreign courts; and adds, that, for such commissions, it is necessary to chuse out men of credit and titles, and such as do honour to the empire by their magnificence, gravity, and air of grandeur, worthy the dignity of their prince.

An eclipse mistaken.

The tribunal of mathematics having foretold an eclipse of the moon for August, which did not happen; the great lords, to save its credit, represented to the emperor, that heaven had for that time, in his majesty's favour, caused a change in the motion of the sun. Timûr did not believe what they said; yet, without punishing the tribunal, sent them notice, to set the stars in order again.

In the year 1300 Lyew-shen, a general of the troops, represented to the court, that the kingdom of Pa-pe-si-fû (D) would not receive the calendar of the empire; and prayed his majesty

^a GAUBIL, hist. Gentel. p. 223, & seq.

(B) In the district of Tay Tzen-fû, capital of Shan-si. Gaubil.

(C) The same with Kapchak or Kipjak.

(D) A pretty large country, between Ten-nou and Bengâl in India; but the air is very unwholesome, and the people poor; and were, at that time, cruel and barbarous. Gaubil.

a to permit him to compel the inhabitants to follow the form of the Chinese year, and reckon their months like the subjects of the emperor. One of his ministers, called Wan-tse, considering this as a serious affair, persuaded the emperor, in December, to attack the kingdom of Pa-pe-si-fû. Alaasun opposed that resolution; alleging, that the people, whom they would attack, were barbarians; that, indeed, they might be instructed, if his majesty thought fit; but that it would be of no use, as well as dangerous, to make war upon them. The emperor said nothing to the minister Alaasun; but, contrary to his custom, he fell in a passion at another mandarin, who went about to give his advice. In effect, Lyew-shen was ordered, with 20,000 men, to attack Pa-pe-si-fû^b.

Pa-pe si-fû invaded.

But it was not long before Timûr repented this unfortunate war: most of the troops perished by famine or sickness, and the province of Yun-nan suffered much. The bordering people, who, till then, had lain quiet, took arms, and plundered several countries subject to the emperor. This war at length became serious; many excellent officers died in it; so that the troops of Hû-quang, Se-chwen, Sben-si, and Yun-nan, were obliged to march; and Koko (E), son of Hû-pi-lay, had orders to support those troops, in case of need. Teshtar (F) and Lyew-kû-kyay (G), after many difficulties and losses, subdued Pa-pe-si-fû, and pacified the troubles which the Myau-tse, and the people of the frontiers, had excited: nor was it till the year 1303 that an end was put to the war. The emperor often let Alaasun know, that he repented having not followed his advice: which occasion a great mandarin laid hold of to represent to his majesty, that, for thirty years past, the empire had been at exorbitant expences to make war on Japan, Gan-nan, Qua-wa, and Lyew-Kyew, without the least profit. He compared those wars to that of Pa-pe-si-fû; and added, that the honour of the emperor required that he should put to death the general Lyew-shen, as having deceived his prince. Several of that general's friends represented, that he ought to enjoy the amnesty: but Alaasun made the same representation as the mandarin; and Lyew-shen had his head struck off.

and reduced.

A LORD of the kingdom of Myen (or Pegû), having revolted against his king (H), seized him, confined him in a stable, and, in May 1300, slew him. The king's second son escaped to Ta-tû, and, on his knees, asked assistance from the emperor. Timûr, by advice of his council, granted his request, as being a tributary prince; and Suechawr, great general in Yun-nan, was ordered to enter Myen, and attack the rebels. He did so; but was worsted, with his lieutenants, who returned to Yun-nan, after spreading a report, that they had made all things quiet. However, the court had intelligence, that several great officers had been corrupted by the rebel; who, being tryed for the same, were found guilty, and put to death: nor did Suechawr escape punishment; for he was degraded, and his goods were confiscated.

Rebellion in Pegû.

The same year died Pû-hû-chû, one of the ministers; a Kangli by nation, and one of the wisest men of his time. He held the chief employments in the empire, and yet died very poor. His children inherited his probity, and love for the sciences. His wife, who had as much virtue as her husband, was continually at work with her hands, nor was ashamed to make use of them to maintain her family.

Timûr had sent his nephew Hayshan into Tartary, to learn the art of war under the generals Iwe-chechar and Choangûr. This prince had defeated Hay-tû in several engagements; but the latter, tho' always beaten, was still in a condition to make himself feared; so that the emperor was obliged to have great armies continually in that country, commanded by princes of his family, and his best generals. Hayshan, having, in 1301, joined together the five great bodies of troops which had been employed in different parts of Tartary; in August had several bloody battles, between Karakorum and the river Tamir, with Hay-tû and his brother Towa, whose troops were, for the most part, cut in pieces. Hay-tû, who, for more than thirty years, had made war on the princes of his family, on pretence that they had usurped the empire of Ogotay, or Oktay, to his prejudice, died with vexation. His brother Towa was dangerously wounded, but escaped with a few followers. Such a continued run of losses, and bad success, at length induced most of the princes who were of Hay-tû's party to acknowledge Timûr for the true successor of Jenghiz Khân.

Death of Hay-tû.

In January 1302 died prince Kanmala, the emperor's eldest brother; whose excellent qualities, joined to his fidelity and courage, made him lamented. In March the court was under great uneasiness on account of the emperor's illness: but he recover'd his health, and learned, with a sensible joy, how much the people had been afflicted to hear he was sick. He, on his and prince Kanmala. A. D. 1303.

^b GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 225, & seq.

(E) He had the title of regulo of Yun-nan. This is the prince whom M. Polo calls Kograkam. Gaubil.

(F) He was the son of Nyew-lyen, general under Meng-ko and Hû-pi-lay. Gaubil.

(G) A Tatar of Nyu-che, and one of the best officers in the empire. Great praise is bestowed on the conduct of prince Koko, and those two generals. Gaubil.

(H) Called in the Chinese history Ti-li-pu-wa-na-na-ti-ti-ya.

Konfusius
honoured.

part, caused great largesses to be distributed, and a general pardon to be published. In April ^a he removed, as usual, to Shang-tû; and, in May, an eclipse of the sun happening, which the tribunal had neglected to calculate, the mandarins thereof were punished, by lowering the degrees of some, turning out others, and lessening the salaries of the rest. The establishing of an imperial college at Ta-tû gave great satisfaction to the Chinese Literati: but they could not forbear expressing their concern, to see that a palace had not been built to honour the memory of Konfusius. This being represented to Timûr by Alaasun, that prince, who had a high esteem for the philosopher, and understood his doctrine, caused a magnificent palace to be erected for him, which is still to be seen at Pe-king ^c.

Timûr's humanity.

JENGHIZ KHAN brought with him into Tartary, from Persia, Khorassan and Great Bukhâ-ria, a considerable number of Mohammedan families, among whom there were many excellent ^b officers; and, ever after, the Mohammedans were very powerful at the Mungl court. There were, of that religion, generals, and whole bodies of troops; chiefs of merchants, and mandarin in all the tribunals, especially that of the mathematics; doctors, and even ministers of state, of whom, in July, U-tû-pû-ting was nominated one.

In 1303 Timûr, ever attentive to the good of the empire, sent judicious persons into all the provinces, to inform themselves how things stood. One of his views was, to procure an exact account of the misery of the people; and to find out men of merit, who were not employed, either for want of money, or friends at court. The emperor, in regard to the evils which had been occasioned by the long wars with Hay-tû and Towa, appointed generals to command in the territory of Qua-chew and Sha-chew (I). There he ordered magazines to be erected for the ^c troops, and lodgments for them in several places between Kan-chew, in China, and Sha-chew. This monarch grew daily more beloved; and the Tatar princes were charmed with his integrity, clemency, and liberality.

All Tartary
submits.

PRINCE Towa, tired with so long a war, assembled all the lords, his vassals, and declared he was resolved to acknowledge Timûr, whom he highly praised. Chapar, eldest son of Hay-tû, did the same. The other princes followed their example; and, after having caused the emperor to be recognized in their respective territories, sent deputies in their names to implore his pardon, and reckon them in the number of his subjects. Timûr granted their request; and, by that act, saw all Tartary united to his empire; a design, which his grandfather Hû-pi-lay could never compass. Timûr, on this occasion, conferred great honours on the prince Choangûr, in July. ^d He gave him, with his own hand, a gold seal, jewels, and habits, in presence of the whole court: he praised his merit, and bestowed on him the principal posts in the army. But that which redounded most to this prince's honour, was what passed in the assembly; where the princes leagued with Hay-tû and Towa resolved to submit. One of them said, that, Choangûr being appointed to govern Tartary, they reckoned they should be more soundly beaten than they were in the time of Pe-yen and Tû-tû-ha; which reflection was one of the chief motives that induced them to a submission. In October this year the Han-lin, who were appointed to examine the Chinese history, and write annals, presented the emperor with the annals of Jenghîz Khân, Ogo-tay, Quey-yew, Toley, and Meng-ko (K).

Religious ceremonies fixed.

A. D. 1305.

THE Ywen, or Mungls, had, by tradition, their certain rules and rites for the worship of ^e Heaven: but they had neither fixed ceremonies, places, nor times, for sacrificing thereto. Therefore, in 1305, Timûr set able persons to examine what had been the practice on that head, from the foundation of the Chinese empire to his own time. Alaasun, with some others, who were *Chinese*s, reported to the emperor the result of their researches, and settled the ceremonies which were thenceforth to be observed in the worship of Heaven. The history speaks this year of precious stones called Ta u-ta, sold by the western merchants for sixty van (L).

Timûr dies.

TIMUR had one son called Te-shew, and one daughter by Pe-yew, the princess of Hongkila. Te-shew was appointed heir: but died without children during the life of his father; who died himself in January 1307, in his forty-second year, without either leaving issue, or naming a suc- ^fcessor.

His character.

THIS prince passed, in the judgment of the *Chinese*s, for a perfect emperor. The wise conduct which he observed in the war against Hay-tû and Nayen; the judicious choice which he made of generals and ministers; the constant aversion which he shewed for the vices which

^c GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 228, & seq.

(I) Cities to the north-west of China, between Kya-yu-guan, at the west end of the wall, and Khamû, or Hami, in Little Bukhâria. Sha-chew is the Sachium of Marco Polo, according to Gaubil, who observes, that this city and Qua-chew have always had Chinese garrisons to cover the western frontiers.

(K) These are the Chinese names for Jenghîz Khân, Oktay, Kayûk, Tûli, and Mungo. The work spoken of is, according to Gaubil, one of the best which the Chinese have on the subject of their history; and therefore in great esteem. He has spoken of it at large in a dissertation on the ancient history of the *Chinese*s.

(L) That is, three millions of livres, or about 1,500,000 sterling.

- a reign but too often in the courts of princes; and the extraordinary care which he took to comfort the people; give a high idea of this prince's abilities in government. He was sixth khân of Tartary, and second emperor of China^d.

^d GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 230.

C H A P. II.

The reign of Hayshan, called by the Chineses Vũ-tsông.

- b WHEN the emperor Timûr died, Hayshan, eldest son of Talamapala (A), the son of Cheng-kin, the son of Hû-pi-lay, was lieutenant-general in Tartary, and at the head of a great army to the north of Karakorum. This prince was esteemed by most of the princes of his family, whom he had seen in Tartary, and had gained reputation in the war with Hay-tû. He had likewise a considerable interest among the grandees, many of whom expressed a desire to see him emperor; while none seemed to think of setting any of the sons of Kanmala, eldest son of Cheng-kin, on the throne. Mean time the empress Pe-ya ü, widow of Timûr, having conceived a hatred against a princess of her own house, the wife of Talamapala, caused her to be banished to Whay-chew, at present Whay-kin Fû, in Honan, with her son Ayyulipalipata; and, fearing the resentment of Hayshan (who was also her son, and secretly enraged at her treatment), in case he became emperor, sent for the minister A-ü-tay, prince Mingli Temûr, with several other princes and grandees of her court. To them she proposed the prince Honanta, eldest son of Mangkola, third son of Hû-pi-lay, who then governed the provinces of Sben-si, Se-chwen, and Tibet, as his father had done before; and usually resided at Si-gan Fû, capital of the first of those provinces. Honanta, who readily embraced the offer of the empress, came by post to Ta-tû; while the parties above-mentioned took measures to hinder Hayshan's return.

- c THE first thing they did, was to go to the palace, and intreat the empress to pull down the curtain (B), in order to give audiences, and govern the state, till Honanta was installed. After this, A-ü-tay assembled the grandees at the palace of the ancestors; and, under pretence of consulting about the succession, they began by force to perform the ceremonies which are usually observed after the recognition of a new emperor. Two great mandarins opposed this attempt; and insisted, that they ought first to see the name of the new emperor. Ho-wbey, one of the prime mandarins, declared the same thing. Hereupon A-ü-tay fell in a passion, and threatened with death the opposing lords: but, as they stood firm to their principles, the assembly dissolved.

- d ON the other side, Alaafun, as prime minister, seizing the seals of the tribunals, caused the treasury to be shut up; likewise the chambers where were kept the robes, and jewels of the crown. Then, in concert with the officer of the inner guard of the palace, suffered no-body to enter. At the same time he feigned himself sick; and, in spite of the repeated orders and threats of the empress, remained firm; sending underhand some trusty lords to Hayshan and Ayyulipalipata, to hasten to the court. This latter, having received the express in February, was at a loss what course to take. Hereupon Li-meng his master quoted him the law of Shi-tsû (C), which excluded bastards from the succession; and represented to him, that, as his brother Hayshan was above a thousand leagues from the capital, he ought to set out with the princess his mother for Ta-tû. Li-meng, who was but little known at the court, went before; and, counterfeiting the physician, as such, was brought into the chamber of Alaafun. A lord, sent by the empress to know how the minister did, was with him when Li-meng entered; yet, no-body suspecting him to be

(A) These, and other names, tho' Tatarian, yet being transcribed from the Chinese characters, differ more or less from the true pronunciation: nor is it in our power to give them in their true orthography; since neither our author Gaubil has done it, nor have we any account of them, except a few, in our extracts from the oriental writers.

(B) This is in allusion to an ancient custom observed by the Chinese princesses, who governed during the minority of the princes their sons. Gaubil.

(C) The Chinese title for Hû-pi-lay. But it is difficult to know with certainty whether the law of Hû-pi-lay excluded the children of other ladies than the first empress, or those born of his other wives, excepting those five who had the title of empresses; but it is clear, that Honanta, who was the eldest son of Mangkola, Hû-pi-lay's third son, was looked on as illegitimate. Gaubil, p. 238.

other than a physician, he had opportunity enough to deliver what he had to say on the part of Ayyulipalipata. After this he took post-horses; and, while Alaasun prepared every thing necessary for the reception of that prince, Li-meng travelled day and night; so that the empress was much surprised, when soon after she was informed, that Ayyulipalipata and his mother were arrived in the city. They made their entrance into the palace early in the morning, followed on horseback by their retinue in deep mourning; and were introduced by the officers of the guards, into their old apartment^a.

Palipata arrives.

THE partisans of Honanta agreed to declare him emperor on the third of March; and chose that day, under pretence of celebrating the birth of Ayyulipalipata. Alaasun promised Honanta to assist at the ceremony; and, the same night, gave Ayyulipalipata notice; acquainting him, that it was necessary to prevent the authors of the plot, without waiting for the arrival of Hayshan. Prince Filla, who was great captain, undertook forthwith to conduct an army; and, two days before, entered Ta-tû at the head of a considerable body of troops, without declaring on what design: but the empress could easily perceive, that the prince would never suffer Honanta to be proclaimed emperor, and, from that time, was in very great fear. Ayyulipalipata, seeing himself strengthened by an army at his devotion, caused a report to be spread, that Hayshan had sent a commissioner to inquire into what had passed with respect to Honanta. Then prince Mengli Temür, being seized, was carried in chains to Shang-tû. A-tay, and the other mandarins his accomplices, were condemned to death; but execution was stayed till the arrival of Hayshan. Guards likewise were placed at the gates of both the palace and city; so that the empress, and prince Honanta, saw themselves quite disabled from proceeding in their design; and, as it were, prisoners in their own palace. c

The conspirators seized.

Li-meng's modesty.

MEAN time the princes of Ayyulipalipata's party proposed to him to assume the empire: but he refused; and declared plainly, that the crown belonged to his elder brother. He added, that the prosecutions he had set on foot were in favour of Hayshan, and to punish those who had the audacity to attempt to violate the rules of the succession. Li-meng was nominated for one of the chief employments, and to have had a general inspection over all; but he declined the same. He had never seen Hayshan; and, as soon as he heard that prince was on the road, he disappeared: nor was the place of his retreat known, the love of study and retirement having induced him to conceal it.

Hayshan's resolution.

As soon as Hayshan received advice of his uncle Timür's death, he repaired from the mountain Antay, or Altay, to Karakorum; where he assembled as many princes and great men as he possibly could, in order to deliberate what he had to do. The troops, who loved him, were desirous that he should be acknowledged emperor in that antient capital; but Hayshan would not agree to it. He received an express from the princess his mother, by which he found, that she was inclined to have Ayyulipalipata elected; induced thereto by the words of an astrologer, who had promised the empire to that prince, at his departure from Whay-chew. On this advice, Hayshan sent for Toto, who had brought him the news of Timür's death, and told him: "That, as he was older than Ayyulipalipata, the speech of an astrologer ought not to disturb the order of the succession: that he knew how to punish those who had infused such sentiments into his mother; and that he was resolved to set out for Shang-tû, there to take possession of the throne of Jenghîz Khân." Having spoken thus, he ordered Toto to go before, to acquaint his mother, brother, and Alaasun, with the other princes and faithful lords, with his resolution. e

Marches towards Ta-tû.

HAYSHAN chose 30,000 soldiers out of the army at Karakorum, appointing the prince Gan-why and Choangür to command them. Then, putting himself at their head, made them march in three bodies, and at an easy rate, to avoid fatiguing them. The princess, Hayshan's mother, charmed to hear from Toto the true intentions of her son, sent that lord back; requesting him to speak in her behalf to Hayshan, and especially to explain to him fully in what sense she seemed to wish to see Ayyulipalipata on the throne. Mean time this latter prince caused his brother's approach to be published in Ta-tû; and, after he had provided for the security of that city, set out with the guards, accompanied by several princes and grandees, for Shang-tû, to prepare every thing for the reception of Hayshan^b. f

Proclaim'd emperor.

THIS prince expected with impatience the return of Toto; and, seeing him at a distance, rose up in his chariot, and ordered him to come and sit by him. Toto was accompanied by his brother Ashapüwha, sent by the princess. Hayshan was never tired with hearing Toto relate what his mother and brother had said to him. He appointed Ashapüwha to be one of his ministers; and, being near Shang-tû, drew up his troops. He entered that city in May, attended by his generals, and was conducted to the palace by the imperial guard, through the acclamations of the people. As soon as he saw his brother, he advanced to embrace him, both shedding tears;

^a GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 233, & seq.

^b GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 235 & seq.

thanked

a thanked him for his zeal, and praised his management. After this, the two princes went to pay their duty to the princess their mother, who reckoned this the most glorious day of her life. Hayshan was then acknowledged emperor with much pomp. He declared his mother empress; and gave to his father the title of emperor: he likewise appointed his brother hereditary prince: which ceremonies being over, the court set out for Ta-tü.

WHEN they were arrived there, Hayshan, attended by the princes of his house, went to the palace of his ancestors, to honour the memory of Tay-tsu or Jenghiz Khin, Ogotay, Quey-yew, Meng-ko, Toley, Sbi-tü or Hü-pi-lay, Timür, Cheng-kin, and Talamapala, who, by the advice of He-whey and Alaafun, were ranged in the following order. The tablet of Jenghiz Khin being placed in the middle, on the east were, 1. Talamapala; 2. Timür: to the west, 1. Toley; b 2. Hü-pi-lay; 3. Cheng-kin. Toley and Cheng-kin had, besides, particular palaces, where they were honoured. The above arrangement was made apart from the tablets of the emperors Ogotay, Quey-yew, and Meng-ko. Hereupon the history blames those two mandarins for committing two essential faults, contrary to the Chinese ceremony, in which they were thoroughly versed: first, to build palaces, to honour those princes as emperors, who had not been emperors; secondly, to place princes, who had not been emperors, above those who had been. Those princes, though brothers or fathers of emperors, were no more than subjects, and therefore were intitled only to the honours due to subjects.

AFTER this ceremony of respect paid to his ancestors was over, Hayshan ordered the sentence of death obtained by Ayyulipalipata against the mandarins of Honanta's party, to be carried into c execution: he likewise put to death the empress Pe-ya-ü, and prince Honanta, as well as the minister A-ü tay. In July he caused to be distributed through the empire the Mungl translation of the book written by Konfusius, intituled, Hyau-king; with an exhortation to the Tatar princes and grandees to read that book, and conform to the doctrine contained in it. Afterwards, alluding to the pains that philosopher had taken to put the classical books in order, he says: "That, but for Konfusius, they would have known nothing of the antient sages; nor would " the sages of the times posterior to those of Konfusius have had examples of the antient and " true virtue to imitate."

THE year 1308 is reckoned the first of the emperor Hayshan, whom the Chinese intitle Vü-tsong. Hayshan's d He was warlike, equitable, generous, mild, and a patron of learned men: but he had three faults; was too much attached to the Lamas, loved wine, and was fond of women. In January Ashapüwha, a faithful minister, fell on his knees, and, with tears in his eyes, conjured him "to " take care of his health, which was so dear to the empire; assuring him, that wine and women " would soon put an end to his life." As the emperor loved Ashapüwha, he did not take that lecture ill, and would have him drink in his presence a glass of good wine. A few days after, the great mandarins came in a body, to felicitate his majesty on having a subject so sincere as Ashapüwha. To this latter, who was brother of Toto, and grandson of the king of Kangli, Hayshan gave the title of count of Kang.

LI-PI, one of the great mandarins of Shang-tü, intending to punish a Lama, who had abused some of the commonalty; that Lama, and several others, armed with sticks, entered his tribu- e nal, beat and confined him in a little room: yet, on complaining, he had no redress. At the same time another Lama had the impudence to stop the chariot of a princess on the road, and get before her; and, when her attendants attempted to seize him, he beat the princess, and then went on. Neither could this great personage obtain any satisfaction from the emperor: on the contrary, an imperial order was published, importing, that the hand should be cut off which struck a Lama; and the tongue of him who abused any of them: but the prince appointed heir revoked that order. The historians speak with great vehemence against these acts of injustice; and add, "that the Lamas ruined the empire of the Ywen: that the dynasty of the western Han " was destroyed by the relations of the queens; that of the eastern Han by the eunuchs; that " of the Tang by the great mandarins; and that of the Song by bad subjects."

f THE Mungl emperors laid out a great deal of money in rare birds, jewels, pearls, precious stones, and rarities of all kinds. As they had given commissions to the foreign merchants of the west to search for such things in the provinces, the sea-ports, and elsewhere; those strangers travelled over the country with a mark at their girdles (D), to shew that they belonged to the emperor; and, in that quality, took post-horses where-ever they came, under pretence of searching for curiosities for the court: but, in November, there appeared an edict, forbidding thenceforward to furnish the western merchants with post-horses. In the same month, Chapar, eldest son of Hay-tü, the eldest son of Ta-tü (E), and others, came in person to the court, to acknow-

* GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 238, & seq.

^d See before, the years 1257 and 1258.

(D) Perhaps they wore a yellow girdle, or sash, which is sometimes allowed to the emperor's envoys.

(E) Perhaps it should be Toua.

ledge Hayshan for their sovereign. At the end of the year Alaafun died at Karakorum in Tartary, where he had been removed on the following occasion.

*Alaafun
disgraced.*

A-U-TAY, the minister before-mentioned, who was for installing Honanta, being a person of so great strength, that no-body durst attempt to seize him, it was feared he would have escaped. Upon this, prince Tûla, descended from Ogotay, by Myeli, undertook the task; took him with a great deal of resolution, and bound him. In consideration of this piece of service, Hayshan conferred on him the title of regulo of the country of Tsee. Alaafun, on this occasion, represented, that it was against the rules of the imperial family to give that title to a prince of so remote a branch as Tûla was. Tûla, in revenge, accused Alaafun; and shewed his name among those who were to have installed Honanta. The emperor knew the charge to be false; yet, seeming to be angry with Alaafun, reduced his titles some degrees: but appointed him governor-general and prime minister at Karakorum, which was one of the first posts in the empire.

*Death and
character.*

ALAASUN repaired to that antient capital of Tartary; and it was there that he displayed his talents in their full light. He began by putting to death a Tartar lord, the head of a gang of robbers who destroyed the country: he bestowed large gifts on the poor officers and soldiers: took a great number of oxen, cows, sheep, and horses; giving, in exchange, silks, linen, rice, and tea: he sent for skilful fishermen, plowmen, labourers, and peasants, from China; taught the Tatars, who dwelt along the lakes and rivers, to fish; caused canals to be dug for watering the lands, and rendering them fit for culture; likewise corn and rice to be sown; and established public granaries, posts, and carriages. In the distance of twenty-five or thirty leagues there were ten post-houses, where one met with victuals and drink, voitures and guards. In a word, the emperor was agreeably surprised to understand, that the department of Karakorum was in a condition to furnish subsistence to the army, and fill magazines. Alaafun was of the hord of Walano (or Alano, Alans), who, Marco Polo says, were Christians. Likisili, his great grandfather, was an intimate friend Jenghiz Khân, and had saved his life upon a certain occasion: they two loved each other as if they had been brothers.

*New money.
A. D. 1309.*

IN January 1309 prince Tûla was guilty of want of respect to the emperor: he was brutish, as well as addicted to wine; and, as very bad consequences was to be feared from his outrageous temper, he was put to death. Hayshan, about this time, examined into the state of his finances; and ordered kashes, or copper deniers, to be cast. New tickets were likewise issued, each bearing the value of an ounce of silver. The kashes were of three sorts: each of the first sort was worth one li (F): one of the second kind contained, within a small matter, ten of the first; and each of the third sort was worth several kashes, current under the dynasties of the Tang and Song (G).

A plot discovered.

IN February a conspiracy was discovered, at the head of which was Koko, son of the emperor Hû-pi-lay, and the son of prince Tûla. Twenty-four Lamas, who were in the plot, were punished with death, and the two princes banished. In June the lands of the Bonzas of the sects of Fo and Tau, which had been exempt from paying tribute, were declared thenceforward liable to the tax, as well as those of other people. In November the dispute, which had arisen in the reign of Timûr, touching an article in the worship of Heaven on the days of the two solstices, was at length decided.

Unjust execution.

ONE of the great mandarins of Ta-tû was a foreigner, named Arslin, who was much loved by the people, and esteemed by the soldiers: but being accused, by some of his enemies, of a design to revolt, was beheaded, with his brother, and seventeen other persons. The people cried out aloud, That Arslân was innocent; and, in effect, his innocence appeared, when it was too late. On this occasion the history blames Hayshan much, for having, on such slender grounds, put to death a foreign nobleman, invested with a great employment, and in reputation for his virtue.

Hayshan dies.

IN January 1311, the emperor Hayshan died, at the age of thirty-one. He had no children by the empress Chenko, princess of Hong-kila; but he had two by two of his queens, who were both afterwards emperors: the eldest was named Hoshila, the other Tûtemûr^e. He was the seventh Khân of the Mungs, and third of the Chinese dynasty of the Twen.

^e GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 240, & seq.

(F) Ten li make a fen; ten fen one tsyen; and ten tsyen one ounce. Gaubil.

(G) There are still extant kashes of all these kinds, which are preserved by the curious. Gaubil.

C H A P III.

The reign of Ayyuli-palipata, styled by the Chinese Jin-tsong.

^a AS soon as Hayshan was dead, his brother Ayyuli-palipata, who had been early declared the Eighth Khán hereditary prince, was acknowledged emperor, and styled by the Chinese Jin-tsong. Several Ayyuli palipata ministers, during the reign of his predecessor, had abused their power, and taken advantage of that prince's inclination [to pleasure, in order to enrich themselves, and committed a thousand acts of injustice, which the emperor knew nothing of: the new monarch began his reign, by making examples of these bad ministers; he put some to death, and banished others, not sparing even the princes of the blood. Orders had been given to new-case the antient walls of Ten-king (A), and enlarge it; but, as this work had been very inconvenient to the inhabitants, Ayyuli-palipata caused what had been already built to be demolished, and satisfaction made to those who had been sufferers. After this, he chose mandarins, remarkable for their integrity, ^b to act at the head of affairs.

In January 1312, the emperor gave orders concerning the tribunal of historians of the empire: Several regulations and had always a great inclination for the study of history. In February the famous (B) stones on which Sven-vang (C), emperor of the Chú race, had caused many Chinese characters to be cut, were, by his command, deposited in the imperial college at Tatú. The department which depended on Si-gan Fú, called that of Gan-si, was thenceforth ordered to be named the department of Tong-ywen (D), and Ho-lin (or Karakorum), was called Ho ning. As the emperors have often caused the tablets of learned men to be placed in the temple of Konfusius, to honour their memories at stated times, Ayyuli-palipata commanded, that, for the future, those ceremonies should be performed to Tse-ma-quang, Chú-bi, Shau-kang-tsyé, Nan-hyen, Chew-tung, Ching-hau, Chang-tsay, Lu-tsú-kyen, and Hyu-beng (E).

^c THE emperor Hú-pi-lay had promised the Literati to institute the examination of men of their Public calamities class: but that design was never put in execution, till November this year, when Ayyuli-palipata ^{issued} a mandate for that purpose. About the same time, Alimating, a foreigner, presented the emperor with a new kalendar, which, he said, would serve for ten thousand years; but no mention is made either of the author, or the principles it was formed upon. As this emperor loved the people, he beheld, with grief, the ravages which epidemic diseases made in his capital: with no less grief he saw, that, since his accession to the throne, the sun had been eclipsed, a comet had appeared, and there had been two earthquakes; besides, the famine, drought, and inundations of rivers, had ruined several provinces. On occasion of these calamities, he assembled the grandees: some said his majesty ought to imitate the example of Ching-tang, founder ^{imputed to the} of the Shang dynasty; others, that the false worship of Fo had caused so many evils. The emperor readily drew up writings, wherein he deplored the misfortunes which befel his people; and even declared, they were sent by way of punishment, for the faults which he had committed in government, and promised to correct: but whether it was that he believed the worship of Fo to be good, or that, in policy, he ought to tolerate it, for fear of causing a revolt in the princes of his family, and his Mungl subjects, who were bigotted to the doctrine of the Bonzas, he would not hear of abolishing that superstition ^{Bonzas}.

^e In January 1314, the emperor ordered a search to be made after such men of learning and virtue, as were either unknown, or without employment; and in March, made new regulations for the imperial college at Tatú, and that of the Whey-há (F), both of which were much

^a GAUBIL, p. 243, & seqq.

(A) Now Pe-king, or very near it.

(B) They are called She-kú, that is, stone drums, on account of their figure. There are nine or ten of them still seen in the college at Pe-king. The diameter is one foot, and the height three. Gaubil.

(C) Or Sven-vang. He lived before the Christian æra.

(D) The changes often made in the names of cities and countries, by order of the Chinese emperors, is one of the greatest difficulties in the Chinese history and geography. There are indeed lists of those names; and if a man, who writes on those subjects, would be exact, he must have them continually before him. Gaubil.

(E) All these authors were of different provinces, and wrote under the Song dynasty, excepting Hsu kong, spoken of before, in the reign of Hú-pi-lay, at which time he flourished. Tse ma quang is one of the best historians of the empire; and most of his works are still extant. Chú-bi composed the great work on the history called Tong-kyu-kang-mu, besides others on the classical books. Gaubil.

(F) Whey-kú is one of the names given by the Chinese to Mohammedans, and denotes, in general, the people of the west of Asia. The sciences and characters taught among the Whey Lú are called Whey tsyey. Gaubil.

Learning encouraged. declined. In June, taking into consideration the evils, which had, by their authority, been brought on the preceding dynasties, he ordered, that they should not be made mandarins. Commissaries were likewise sent into the southern provinces, to examine into the saleable and cultivated lands: they found many reforms to make; and rectified the land-tax according to the price of goods.

Examinations established. IN March 1315, Ayyuli-palipata instituted examinations among the doctors, who were divided into two bodies, one of Mungls, the other of Chineses; and, having assembled them, made them compose, in his presence, upon a subject, which he gave them himself. Three of each body were to be chosen, that they might have titles and rewards conferred on them. The same custom is still in force; but no distinction is made between the Chineses and Tartars. The Chinese historians, on this occasion, are lavish of their eulogies on Ayyuli-palipata, and consider him as the most illustrious emperor of the Yuen: however, they censure him, for having, the next month, constituted an eunuch a great mandarin, after the prohibition which he had issued to the contrary.

Effects of oppression; TYE-MU-TYEL, one of the principal mandarins for the finances, finding fault with the taxes imposed in 1314, augmented them in the southern provinces. One of his chief commissioners, named Ni-cha-ma-ting, a Mohammedan, committed all sorts of vexations in Kyang-si; and his avarice carried him so far, as to rob the sepulchres, in hopes of enriching himself. The city of Kan-chew, in Shen-si, revolted; and one of the seditious assumed the title of emperor. The great mandarins of the province stifled this rebellion in the beginning: the Mohammedan was punished; and the people were eased, not only in Kyang-si, but also in Che-kyang, Kyang-nan, and other provinces; which happened on the following occasion.

and a comet. IN the beginning of this year, Ayyuli-palipata sent commissioners into all parts of the empire, to examine into the conduct of the mandarins: he knew that the people in the south had suffered several grievances from those magistrates; and that the revolt of Kan-chew was the effect of their ill conduct. The emperor, who feared nothing so much as an intestine war, became very uneasy; and his apprehensions increased, on the appearance of a comet, which happened in November. The people were struck with the sight of this phenomenon, which they considered as sent to inform them, that heaven designed to punish the emperor (G), by taking from him the dominion, to give it to a person more worthy of it. Ayyuli palipata, who was one of those princes best acquainted with the genius of the Chineses, as soon as he saw the comet, caused a general pardon to be published; and discharged the provinces of Kyang-si and Che-kyang, which had suffered most, from all kinds of taxes, for two years: declaring, that it was to indemnify them for the wrongs which they had suffered. The other provinces (H) were eased in proportion; and the Literati took care every-where to bestow great encomiums on the emperor (I), who had attached them to him by his love for the sciences, as well as the examinations instituted for their order in general, and the doctors in particular.

Meng-tse honoured. IN 1316, the prince Hoshila, eldest son of Hayshan the late emperor, was appointed to govern Yun-nan: at which, being discontented, he left China, and went to reside to the north-west of the mountain Kin (K). Several great men followed him; and he was received with open arms by the princes of the imperial house, particularly by prince Chakotay. Mean time, Ayyuli-palipata ordered a palace to be built at Wey-whey, in Honan, to honour the memory of the celebrated Pi-kan; and another at Chang-ping-chew, a city of Pe-che-li, to honour that of Ti-jin-kyay. He declared the famous Meng-tse, or Mençius, a count; and gave a title to his mother. At the end of the year, he appointed his son, a prince of high esteem, to be his heir.^b

IN February 1317, the emperor caused the public granaries, through all the provinces, to be visited, and put in good condition. This year that monarch discovered his love for wine; and several times drank to excess: but he was brought off that vice by Ma-tsi-chang, a foreigner, of the west (L); who was one of the censors of the empire, and esteemed for his knowledge in mathematics and other sciences.

Classic books of Fo. IN February 1318, the classical books of the sect of Fo were written out, in gold characters. A mandarin likewise crossed the sea to Korea, carrying back an exiled prince, with design to

^b GAUBIL, p. 245, & seqq.

(G) The remarks which the Literati have made on the original and sense of the title of Son of heaven, which is given to the emperor, have often afforded occasion to deceive the people, and induce them to revolt: and the great men have frequently abused this notion of the Son of heaven, as well as the celestial appearances, to seize the empire, take up arms, excite troubles, and the like. Gaubil.

(H) The imperial commissioners found a book in the district of Fau-chew, in Shen-si, which is a bibliotheque of authors, books, and sciences. It was written by Ma-ti-on-lin, of Lo-fing, in the same country, towards the end of the Song dynasty; and, being a very elaborate work, was ordered, by the emperor, to be printed, in 1314. Gaubil.

(I) It is well known that, in China, the Literati are in great credit with the people, and have no small ascendancy over their minds. Gaubil.

(K) A celebrated mountain in Tartary; but I know not its distance from mount Altay. Gaubil. See before, p. 130.

(L) Born in the country of Teng-kû: but Gaubil knows not where it is.

a stir up the people in his favour : but that officer was taken, and condemned to death, with seven of his accomplices.

In 1319, the emperor, who tenderly loved the prince his heir, had an inclination to cede the empire to him ; and most of the grandees approved of his design. But one of the great lords of the court having induced them to change their sentiments, his majesty desisted : however, he declared the prince lieutenant-general of the empire, and gave him the management of all affairs. Shotepala had a great soul, as well as a true filial affection for the emperor and the empress. A. D. 1319.

b In January 1320, Ayyuli-palipata fell sick ; and his disease being judged mortal, the young prince never left his father's chamber, day nor night, so overwhelmed with grief, that it had like to have killed him. Without acquainting any person, he one day retired to his own apartment, fell on his knees, and addressing himself to heaven, offered to die in the room of his father : but a few days after his father died (M), being in the thirty-sixth year of age. The history praises him for his aversion to hunting, and other pleasures ; his application to affairs ; his duty to the princess his mother ; and the protection which he gave to the sciences, and learned men. The emperor dies. A. D. 1320.

AYYULI-PALIPATA married Anoshosheli, princess of Hong-kila, by whom he had Shotepala, the appointed heir. He had also another son, called Utûfû-pûwba, and a daughter ; but it is not said he had them by the princess of Hong-kila : however that be, this emperor never was given to women.

c In the beginning of his reign he had war with a prince of his house, called Isyen-pûwba, supported by several other princes ; but their army was defeated in the country of Itebaymish, by Choanggûr, then one of the generals of the troops, which were very numerous about Karakorum. He afterwards beat their general Utû Temûr, in the country of Chemeykan, and pursued the enemy as far as the country of Chayr, near the defile called the iron gate (N). The account of this war, which the Chinese history makes no mention of, is taken from the elogiac history of Choanggûr. This last was prince of Kincha (or Kipjak), and had been loaded with honours by the emperors Hû-pi-lay, Timûr Hayshan, and Ayyuli-palipata. He died under Ing-tsong, president of the privy-council. Choangûr's exploits.

d AYYULI-PALIPATA was eighth Khân of the Mungl empire in Tartary ; and fourth emperor of the Chinese dynasty of the Ywen.

^c GAUBIL, p. 248, & seq.

(M) There happened a total eclipse on the first day of the first month : and we have already seen how much the superstitious Chinese have for a long series of ages, dreaded such phenomena. Gaubil.

(N) A famous gorge of the mountains to the west of Samarkand, in Great Bukharia, where the war here spoken of was carried on. Gaubil.

C H A P. IV.

The reign of Shotepala, called by the Chinese, Ing-tsong.

e A S soon as Ayyuli-palipata was dead, the appointed heir was saluted emperor ; and, to gratify the empress his mother, declared Tye-mû-tyel prime minister. This Mungl lord Shotepala had been often employed in affairs under the late monarch. He understood the finances ; and had frequently paid great sums of money. He had, besides, a great deal of wit and cunning. He was hated by the people, as well as the great men ; and although he was in disgrace at the death of the late emperor, yet he was supported under-hand by the empress. This evil minister, grown proud with his new elevation, committed all sorts of oppressions, and threw every thing into disorder. In February, under false pretences, he caused Syau-pay-chû and Yang-tûrchi (A), two of the most judicious lords of the court, to be put to death : they had belonged to the tribunal of ministers, and often made known the flagrant acts of injustice which he had done. He put to death several other persons ; and threatened to give the wife of Yang-tûrchi to a slave. As soon as this lady, who was no less remarkable for her wisdom, modesty, and honour, than her beauty and high birth, had notice of his menace, she caused her hair to be cut off, disfigured her face, and took an oath to remain a widow. Ninth. Khân.

(A) The first a Tartar, of Nyu-che, or Eastern Tartary ; the other of Ning-hya, in Sen-fi. Gaubil.

the minister's violences.

So many violent proceedings incensed the grandees ; but they dared not complain, either to the empress or Shotepala, who was acknowledged emperor in March. After the installation, Tye-mû-tyel became more powerful than before ; and to revenge himself on the sage Li-meng, his enemy, put him a degree lower in the class of mandarins ; and demolished a stone monument, which the emperors had raised in honour of him and his ancestors, in the place of their sepulchres. Li-meng seemed very little concerned at the disgrace which was put upon him ; and the emperor was surprised to see, that he did not so much as utter one murmuring expression against the author of it. Taking from thence an occasion to inform himself of Li-meng's actions, he repaired the monuments of stone and marble, restored him to his titles and employments, and warned Tye-mû-tyel to be very careful, for the future, not to accuse persons of so much virtue ^a.

Pay-chû
made minister.

WICKED men vested with power can never reform. This minister saw, with great uneasiness, that the emperor had much esteem for Pay-chû, general of the imperial guard. Pay-chû, descended from the famous Mû-hû-li ^b, by Gan-tong (B), was a young lord, learned, brave, handsome, modest, and irreproachable in his manners. Shotepala, who was of the same character himself, had always a great liking to Pay-chû, which increased, in proportion as he became acquainted with the excellent qualities of his favourite. The emperor resolved, at last, to do nothing without the advice of his dear Pay-chû ; and, after several refusals, obliged him to take on him the charge of prime minister. This lord began his ministry, by making known the injury which Tye-mû-tyel had done his majesty, and concealed nothing of what had passed. The emperor Shotepala was equitable, and very sensible on the point of honour. He caused an inquiry to be made after those who had been sufferers, and resolved to make them satisfaction, as far as he was able. He did not indeed think it yet convenient to remove Tye-mû-tyel ; but he put no manner of confidence in him, and took care that he should not treat any body ill. ^b

Shotepala
visits the MEAN time, sending for such lords and princes as he knew were men of most wisdom, he employed them about him. After this, he made himself thoroughly acquainted with the ceremonies which are observed in the temple of ancestors, without disclosing his design : but when they least thought of it, he sent for the princes of his house, and declared to them, that, in November, he would go to the hall or palace of ancestors, in habit of ceremony. The Chinese great men had orders to make every thing ready ; and habits were prepared for the guards, grandees, and all the officers. This news created a general joy in the city among the Chinese : the emperor and his retinue appeared in the streets on horseback, magnificently dressed. This sight charmed the people ; but, when they found that they were not hindered from seeing the emperor, they made the streets ring with acclamations, and wept for joy. Shotepala was the first of the Mungl monarchs who performed this ceremony ; and, as he had not appeared in public before, every body was delighted to see their prince discover such an air of grandeur, mixed with popularity : nor did ever any monarch receive from his subjects more encomiums, and sincere wishes, than Shotepala did on this occasion. It was known that Pay-chû had counselled the emperor to perform this ceremony : the palace of that lord was continually filled with the Chinese great men and Literati ; the people congratulated him loudly as he passed along ; while every honour done to Pay-chû, gave Tye-mû-tyel the greatest anguish. A general pardon had been already published throughout the empire ; and, from Ta-tû, the rejoicings spread over all the provinces. Both Chinese and Tatars promised themselves every thing from the reign of Shotepala, whose first year was 1321. ^d temple of ancestors.

Takes good advice.
A. D. 1321.

As this prince, called Ing-tsung by the Chinese, loved hunting, he proposed, at the beginning of that year, to aggrandize the places set apart for that exercise in the neighbourhood of Shang-tû, by building, at proper distances, palaces, stables, and lodges, for the men assisting in the chace. Pay-chû, though he loved hunting also, yet did not approve of this design. He represented to the emperor, that it could not be executed without great expences, and incommoding the people. Hereupon Shotepala dropped his project ; and protested, that he would think of nothing but easing the empire. In April a conspiracy was discovered, formed by Afan (C), and several other great lords ; who, by the advice of Pay-chû, and the empress grandmother, were condemned and executed. Tye-mû-tyel, who, by means of the empress, mother to Shotepala, still maintained his ground, caused the prince Tûtemûr, second son of the emperor Hayshan, to be banished to Kung-chew (D), capital of the island of Hay-nan. Towards ^e

^a GAUBIL, p. 250, & seqq.

^b See before, l. iii.

(B) The mother of Pay-chû was a princess of the Que-lye tribe, of the family of the princess Sarkutna, wife of Toley, and mother of the emperors Meng-ko and Hû-pi-lay. She was a widow at the age of twenty-two years, yet never would marry again, resolving to employ her time wholly in educating her son Pay-chû. Gaub.

(C) This Afan seems to be the same spoken of in a note, p. 249. by our author Gaubil ; who says, he was a foreigner of the west, very understanding in affairs, and one of the principal ministers of state.

(D) Latitude, by observation of Du Tartre, 20° 0' 35" ; Longitude, by the bearings, and measured distances, from Kanton, near three degrees more west. Gaubil.

a the end of the year, the emperor judged it would be for his honour to make magnificent presents to the Lama who had been his master, and had a mind to return to Tibet ^c.

SHOTEPALA, who was a zealous believer in the doctrine of Fo, in the beginning of the year built a magnificent temple to that false deity, in the mountains to the west of Pe-king. While the work was going forward, several censors of the empire made very smart representations upon the occasion. The emperor, contrary to his custom, falling into a passion, caused some of them to be put to death, and banished others. One of the most illustrious among the former, was To-yau-el Hatimisshi (E), a native of Hami, or Khamil, in Little Bukbária. The historical elogy of this lord ascribes his death to the calumnies of Tye-mû-tyel, and his son Sonan; who, bearing him, as well as the other censors, an ill-will, told his majesty, that, instead of giving him notice of what had passed, they did nothing among themselves but speak ill of him. The Chinese Literati, who were great enemies to Fo, but full of esteem for Shotepala, praise exceedingly the courage of these censors. Some time after, the memory of these mandarins was re-established; and the emperor was too wise not to repent having so imprudently followed the motions of his anger. In April he caused the temple which the Whey-hû, or western Mohammedans, had at Sbang-tû, to be demolished; and afterwards forbade those foreigners to buy young boys and girls of the Mungls, in order to give or sell them again for slaves to the Chinese. ^{Censors put to death.}

In 1322 Pay-chû had obtained leave to go into Lyau-tong to raise a monument of marble, with an inscription on it, in praise of Gantong his grandfather, who died in the reign of Hû-pi-lay. Tye-mû-tyel, who, through vexation, kept for some time in his palace, without stirring out, took the opportunity of Pay-chû's absence to go to court; but the guards stopped him at the gate, and told him, they had orders not to let him enter. The anguish which this disgrace gave him, threw him into a fit of sickness, of which he died in August, hated by every body. In June 1323 he was deprived of his titles; the monuments of stone and marble, inscribed with his elogy, were pulled down, and his goods confiscated. Mean time Pay-chû caused the taxes and annual tribute, paid by the provinces, to be remitted; and, withal, considerable sums of bounty-money to be distributed every-where. Debauchery, avarice, luxury, and other vices, were banished from court; so that the Chinese great men could not but admire such wise conduct in a Tatar prince only twenty-one years of age. ^{The court reformed.}

d WHILE things seemed thus to promise happy times, Tye-she, the adopted son of Tye-mû-tyel, and one of the principal lords of the court, bent his thoughts wholly on contriving how to be revenged for the affront done his father, and the confiscation of his effects. In order to this, he first fomented the inclinations of several discontented princes, with those of the relations and friends of the mandarins who had been put to death in April 1320: after which, he engaged several officers and soldiers in his interest. On the third of September, the emperor, being at Sbang-tû, and not able to compose himself to sleep, ordered prayers to be said to Fo. Tye-she, and his accomplices, were seized with fear. They had prevailed on the Lamas to require that sacrifices should be offered to Fo, as the only means to avoid the evils which threatened the empire. Pay-chû sent away the Lamas, treating them "as men who thought of nothing but how to get money, and, in reality, protected wicked people." These words being heard by the associates of Tye-she, who was one of the commanding officers in the guards; the lords Chinkin Temûr, Syen Temûr, formerly ministers, prince Ganti-puwba, and others, immediately met, and consulted how to prevent the measures of Pay-chû, whose probity, vigilance, and valour, they feared. The same night, therefore, Tye-she, followed by several soldiers, slew that lord; and then, entering the tent of the emperor, who was in bed, killed him with his own hand. The place where this assassination was committed, is called Nan-po, to the south of the city Sbang-tû. ^{Pay chû and the emperor assassinated.}

f THE emperor Shotepala married Sukopala, princess of the tribe of Ikilye, and daughter of Ilibaya, daughter of the emperor Timûr: but he had no children by her; nor does the history speak of his having any other wife ^d. He was ninth emperor of the Mungls, and fifth of the Chinese.

^c GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 151, & seqq.

^d Ibid. p. 252, & seq.

(E) His grandfather, in the fourth degree, was an officer under Jengbiz Khân, and followed him to the first siege of Pe-king; and afterwards in his other expeditions. His grandfathers in the third, second, and first degree, as well as his father, were all illustrious officers. Gaubil.

C H A P. V.

The reign of Yesun-temûr, styled by the Chinese Tay-ting.

Tenth. Yesun-temûr, or Tay-ting, promotes the conspirators ;

but, soon after,

puts them to death :

others banished.

*Lectures on government
A. D. 1324.*

AT the time when the above-mentioned conspiracy was carried on at Sbang-tû, Yesun-temûr, eldest son of prince Kanmula, brother of the emperor Timûr, commanded to the north of the Great Kobi, or Sandy Desert, in Tartary ; and encamped near the river Long-kû, or Panchuni (A), famous for the oath made there by Jenghîz Khân, and his adherents. This prince had in his court a lord named Taulasba, whose son Hafun was an officer in the imperial guards under the command of Pay-chû ; but as he knew of a long time, that Tye-she, intended to kill his general, he quitted his service. In March this year, 1323, a mandarin, called Tan-te, leaving the court, informed Taulasba, that the emperor did not care for Yesun-temûr ; and, it was to be feared, would, in a little time, put him to death. After this intelligence, the two became intimate friends. Tye-she, before he put his design in execution, sent a mandarin, named Walû-tse, to acquaint Taulasba, that he, Alasan, Yesyen-temûr, and others, as soon as they had brought their plot to bear, would proclaim the young prince Yesun-temûr emperor.

As soon as this affair was communicated to Yesun-temûr, he caused Walû-tse to be arrested, and instantly dispatched several couriers to inform the emperor of what was plotting against him : but the messengers arrived too late. The prince Ganti-purwba, and Yesyen-temûr, having seized the seal, and imperial robes, hastened over the desert ; and, on their arrival at the river Long-ku, Yesun-temûr caused himself to be proclaimed emperor in September. After this, he published a general pardon, and declared Taulasba his prime minister : he likewise appointed Tye-she, and his accomplices, to be his principal mandarins.

As Shotepala was the delight of the people, the news of his death spread a general sorrow among the princes, grandees, and chiefs of tribes, as well as the Chinese mandarins and Literati. On the other hand, the princes and lords of the family of Mubûli, which was one of the most powerful and considerable among the Mungls, were impatient to obtain justice for a murder committed on one of the principal persons of their house, who was general of the imperial guards, and prime minister. The new emperor might easily see, that he was in danger of suffering, for having had a hand in the assassination of the prince, and his minister. Prince Maynû, descended from the grandfather (B) of Jenghîz Khân, finding the emperor inclined to make use of Tye-she, and his accomplices, and even to advance them to be great mandarins, represented to him, that such a conduct would not only lose him the affections both of the Chinese and Tatars ; but that posterity would reproach his majesty with dipping his hands in the blood of his sovereign, and that of a minister sprung from the great Mubûli, to whom the Mung's owed the empire of the Tatars. Yesun-temûr, struck with this idea, ordered Yesyen-temûr, Wang-che, Tumen, and other lords, to be put to death that instant, in the camp of Long-kû. He likewise dispatched officers to Ta-tû, to seize Tye-she, and his associates ; who were all executed on the spot, their families extirpated, and their effects confiscated. Sonan, son of Tye-mû-tyel, had only been sentenced to be banished ; but, on representing that he was the first who struck Pay-chû on the shoulder with his sword, the emperor ordered him also to be put to death, and his goods to be forfeited ; although the latter part of the sentence was not put in execution.

THE lives of Ganti-purwba, and other princes who were in some sort parties in Tye-she's treason, were spared ; but they were all banished, and carried the brand of their infamy along with them. Yesun-temûr, arriving at Ta-tû in November, restored the memory of the two lords whom Tye-mû-tyel had caused to be put to death in January 1320. The emperor did the same justice to those impeached the year following by that minister, and his son Sonan ; some of whom were put to death, and others banished, on their accusations, which were declared to be malicious.

IN 1324, which is the first year of Yesun-temûr, styled by the Chinese Tay-ting, one of the ministers proposed to his majesty to appoint doctors, whose business should be to expound daily, in the palace, such books as were most proper to form the princes and grandees for government. The emperor approved of this design ; and ordered his son, as well as those of other princes, to go every day to hear the lectures. The first book pitched upon was the Chinese

(A) Our author, Gaubil, does not know the exact situation of this river.

(B) Maynû was the fifth descendant of Talickin, fourth son of Palitan, father of Yesu-kay, father of Jenghîz a history, written by Tsema-quang; and this custom is still observed. Chang-quey, the projector of this fine institution, was one of the most steady and discerning ministers the Twen ever had. He was the son of general Chang-bong-fan,^a and educated by a great Mandarin of the Song empire.² Chang-quey This Mandarin, being in the fleet of Chang-shi-kyay, near the mountain Ay-shan, when Hong-fan came to attack it^b, was going, with others, to throw himself into the sea: but the general hindered him; and, finding that he was a great lord, and a man of merit, kept him, and desired his friendship. The Mandarin, out of gratitude, would never quit the house of Chang-bong-fan, and undertook to educate his son.

Khân. Yesun-temûr augmented his revenues and titles ; which exceedingly pleased the family of Pay-chû, and all the grandees. Gaubil.

Soon after the above-mentioned lectures were established, the emperor declared his son Asikepa the prince inheritor. Mean time the Chinese grandees and Literati, who were watching for an occasion to make known to posterity their sentiments touching the treason of Tye-she, the worship of Lo, and several other abuses, met with one in April; for, during that month, wherein the emperor made a progress to Shang-ti, there happened a violent storm, an earthquake, and a total eclipse of the moon. These, they publicly declared, were sent in punishment of the murder of Shotepala and Pay-chü. The emperor, seized with fear, sent for the grandees, and ordered them to draw up a memorial, sincerely setting forth their sentiments. Chang-quey was pitched on by them to perform this task; which he did with much freedom, and addressed it to the emperor.

He demanded, in the name of the empire, “that, in time, justice should be done on all concerned in the horrible crime of Tye-she: that the sons of Sonan, who still appeared at court, and were even in the guards, should be banished; and the effects of their father, which had been restored them, confiscated: that Ganti-puwba, and the other princes who had been convicted of being accomplices in the treason, and were only banished, should be put to death, as unworthy subjects, who dishonoured the imperial family: that prince Toto (C), governor of Lyau-tong, having, in the time of the troubles, taken away the lives of several princes and princesses of the blood, and confiscated their goods, instead of being rewarded, as he was, ought to be punished, by confiscating his own effects, resuming his titles, and banishing himself; for that, if such crimes were left unpunished, there would be reason to fear the ruin of the empire was near at hand: that as, during the ministry of Tye-mi-tyel, and since Tye-she’s conspiracy, many innocent persons had been put to death, an inquiry ought to be made after such, and satisfaction made to their families; and that, considering how many villains those evil ministers employed, as well as acts of injustice they committed themselves, it was to be feared many innocent persons still groaned under oppression; the prisons therefore ought to be visited, and the state of the cities and villages inquired into: that commissioners ought to be sent to the frontiers, and regard had to what the troops had suffered: that care should be taken to send the bodies of the dead into the countries where their parents lived; and to give them wherewithal to inter the corpses: that remedies, and other assistance, ought also to be administered to the sick poor; and the fishing for pearls in the province of Kanton prohibited, as occasioning the death of too many people.”

BESIDES these demands, the memorial of Chang-quey pointed out several abuses which required a reform. He complained, “that two Mandarins, who had been convicted of counterfeiting the emperor’s orders, and carrying off an officer’s wife, had been pardoned: that, under pretence the court wanted precious stones, a sordid commerce was carried on by certain persons, who were not ashamed to make his majesty pay ten times more for them than they cost: that such persons cared not if whole families and provinces were ruined, so they could make their court by presenting precious stones, which, in reality, were of no use: that a prince ought not to think of governing the empire any other way but as a father of his subjects; and that it was not by the Bonzas, or priests of Fo, that he should seek to be happy: that since the Bonzas, the Lamas, and the Tau-tse, made so many prayers and sacrifices to Fo, heaven had shewed continual marks of its displeasure; and that, till such time as they saw the worship of Fo abolished, and all the Bonzas driven out, they might expect to be unhappy: that the palace of the emperor was filled with idle persons, eunuchs, astrologers, physicians, and others, whose maintenance amounted to exorbitant sums: that, as the empire was a family, of which the emperor was father, it was not fit that any of his children should die for want of care and assistance; much less was it fit that a prince should think it inconsistent with his dignity to listen to the cries of the miserable.”

The emperor read this discourse of Chang-quey with pleasure: but durst not abolish the worship of Fo, for fear the Mungls should revolt: nor would he put to death prince Ganti-puwba. With regard to the other articles, he appeared to be pretty indifferent: on which occasion the history, on one side, praises the lords, at the head of whom Chang-quey spoke a with so much zeal; and, on the other, deploras the unhappiness of the times.

^a GAUREL, ubi supra, p. 255, & seqq.

^b See before.

(C) He was descended in the fifth degree, from Tyemüke, brother of Jenghiz Khan. Gaubil.

The empire divided.

PRINCE Tûtemûr, youngest son of Hayshan, who had returned from his exile in Illy nan, was ordered to go to Kyen-kan, now Nan-king, there to reside. Yesun-temûr, this year, divided the empire into eighteen great governments, which was before parted into twelve. Those twelve governments depended on a council (D) called the lords of provinces. It is remarked also, that the rice sent by sea from the southern provinces, for provisions of the court, amounted to 170 van of tan; and, the following year, to 335 van, and 1000 tan.

Lamas influence curbed.

IN 1326 there was a great famine in Pe-che-li and Sban-tong; of which the emperor having received the particulars from Chang-quey, at his return from Pau-ting Fû, where he had been to see his relations, that prince followed his sage advice, in succouring the people of those two provinces. The Lamas were all-powerful at court, especially with the princesses. They had patents to take post-horses (E), and ran about with the equipage of princes. They were a great charge to the people, who were obliged to furnish them with horses and provisions. Their lives and manners were often very disorderly; and the Chineses on all sides made most bitter complaints of them. The emperor, being at length informed of these abuses, put a stop to them. It being found, that more money had been given to the occidental merchants, who traded in precious stones, than they ought to have had, the same was confiscated: but Upetula (F) and Taulasba (G), who, either through interest or inclination, were much attached to them, caused the money to be returned to them; and put many Mandarins, who had been turned out, into their places again.

Great calamities.

IN 1327 the grandees invited the emperor to go in person, and sacrifice to heaven: but his majesty refused; and cited a law of Hû-pi-lay, importing, that the emperor should perform that sacrifice by a deputy. On this occasion the history represents Yesun-temûr as a prince who was not exact in observing the duties of his station; and that he was punished for his faults by the shortness of his reign (H). It is added, that this year all sorts of evils afflicted the empire; drought, famine, inundations, the falling or sinking of mountains, an earthquake, and an eclipse of the sun. In June the emperor caused the great work of Tse-ma-quang, intituled, Tse-chi-tong-kyen, containing what passed under the emperors from before Christ to a long time after, with very elaborate notes, to be translated into the Mungl language. In December (I) died the illustrious Chang-quey, regretted by all the men of worth in the empire.

Care about silk.
A. D. 1328.

IN the beginning of the year 1328 the emperor caused prints to be distributed through the empire, whereon was delineated the art of rearing silk worms, and making silk, with the manner of cultivating lands. Besides these prints, he ordered a book to be printed, and distributed, consisting of fourteen chapters, wherein the antient method of doing those things was treated of. In February his imperial majesty went from Ta-tû to Sbang-tû, and left the guard of the former to Yen-temûr. His majesty at the same time ordered Tûtemûr, son of Hayshan, to go to Kin-chew, a city of Hû-quang: but, in July, Yesun-temûr died, at the age of thirty-six, leaving the court full of intrigues and factions.

Emperor's death,

marriages,

and sons,

THIS emperor married Papûban, princess of Hongkila, who had the honours and titles of empress. Besides this princess, he likewise married his own niece, by one of his elder sisters; and two other ladies, of the house of Hongkila, near relations of the empress. The history gives him four sons, of whom Asikipa, the prince inheritor, was the eldest. It likewise remarks, that the emperor Shotepala, through bad advice, removed from court Heshila and Tûtemûr, the two sons of Hayshan; so that, after his assassination, Yesun-temûr, taking advantage of their absence, had himself proclaimed emperor: farther, that Ayyuli-palipata and Hayshan made an agreement, whereby the two families were alternately to possess the empire; and that the former broke his word, in declaring his son Shotepala hereditary prince^d.

YESUN-TEMUR was tenth Khân of the Mungls, and sixth emperor of the Chinese Ywen.

^c GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 257, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 260, & seqq.

(D) Marco Polo, chap. 22, speaks of this council. Gaubil.

(E) They carried news every-where, and even as far as the frontiers. Gaubil.

(F) This seems to be Abd'ollah, or Obejde'llah, a Mohammedan name.

(G) Doubtless Yesun-temûr's prime minister, mentioned before.

(H) Yet the reign of amiable Shotepala was not only as short, but his death tragical; which shews the absurdity of such superstitious conclusions.

(I) It is related, that in this year, 1327, a stranger from the country of Pusayn presented the emperor with a lion and a leopard. The cities of Nichapûr, Terpen (or Derbend), Baghdâd, Ijefnan, Kû-fa, Sûntania, (or Soltania), and others, are put in the kingdom of Pûsfayn. Gaubil.

C H A P. VI.

The reign of Hoshila, known to the Chinese by the title of Ming-tsong.

a AFTER the death of the emperor Yesun-temür, the empress Papühan, in the name of ^{Eleven:th} the prince inheritor, her son, sent the minister Upetüla to Ta-tü, in order to secure the ^{Khân.} seals, as well as appease and gain the people. On the other hand, Yen-temür, as governor and ^{Hoshila.} commander-general in that capital, posted troops in all the quarters, reinforced the guards at the gates both of the city and palace, and resolved to raise to the throne Hoshila and Tütemür, the two sons of Hayshan. Yen-temür, one of the greatest captains of his time, was the third son of Chobangür, prince of Kin-cha, (or Kipchak). His fine personal qualities, joined to his ^{A. D. 1328} birth, and the services which his father and grandfather had done, made him esteemed at court. As he had been raised by Hayshan to the prime dignities, and was loved by that prince more than any other lord of his court, Yen-temür thought himself bound in gratitude to be b attached to his family.

In these sentiments Yen-temür, in concert with the Regulo of Gan-si, great grandson of Yen-temür's Ilü-pi-lay, by Mangkola, having picked out his officers, and most resolute soldiers, on the day ^{real} Kyaw of the eighth month, summoned the great Mandarins to one of the halls of the palace.

All the lords being assembled, Yen-temür, followed by seventeen men of his party, proposed the two sons of Hayshan to be emperors; and said, he would put to death on the spot any who should oppose that resolution. After these words, he ordered his men to seize Upetüla, and ^{for Hayshan's} several other of the great Mandarins, who did not concur with him, and conduct them to ^{family.} prison. He then appointed Mandarins of his own party; and gave full power to general

c Chau-shi-nen (A), (or Chau-shi-yen). The subaltern officers knew nothing of what was intended; and the generals who were in the secret, having assembled the troops, ordered them to kneel, with their faces to the south, and beat the ground with their heads; by which ceremony they perceived that Yen-temür designed to proclaim Tütemür emperor, at that time banished into Hü-quang. For a whole month this general appeared always on horseback, and but a few persons knew where he slept at night. He had taken right measures to hasten Tütemür to Ta-tü, and give Hoshila notice, who was in Tartary: at the same time he spread a report, that the first was advancing by great journeys; and that the latter would soon return from the north, with the princes of his family (B).

d WHEN Pe-yen, governor of Ho-nan, a Merkit by nation, and one of the best officers of the ^{His great} Twen, knew Yen-temür's design, he entered into his views; and, putting to death several ^{activity.} officers whom he distrusted, made the troops declare for Tütemür. Satün, brother of Yen-temür, seized the important post of Ku-yong-quang; and Tang-ki-shi, Yen-temür's son, took Kü-pe-kü (C). Mean time that general used the necessary precautions for executing his design at Ta-tü: on which principle he put to death prince Koko-chü, and some other great lords, who went about to supplant him: but he compassed all which he undertook, by his resolution, activity, genius, and the reputation he had gained in the opinion of the troops.

e WHILE Yen-temür was thus busy at Ta-tü, in favour of Tütemür, Taulasba caused Asüküpa, Asüküpa known to the Chinese by the name of Tyen-shun, to be proclaimed emperor. This party was ^{set up.} powerful: for, besides many princes of the blood, and governors of provinces, most of the western officers and soldiers were inclined to follow it; and, according to the Chinese law, Asüküpa was the lawful emperor; having been acknowledged for the prince inheritor in the life-time of the emperor his father. Prince Wang-chan (D) also had given an army to general Tashe Temür, son of the minister Toto, prince of Kangli, in order to oppose that of Yen-temür.

At length, in August, Tütemür arrived at Ta-tü, and, by his presence, exceedingly ^{Tütemür} strengthened his party. He made a promotion of Mandarins; and bestowed a great dignity ^{proclaimed.} on Timé-puwba, a prince descended from Itübü (or Idiküt), prince of Türfün, who put himself under the protection of Jenghiz Khân. In September Tütemür put Upetüla to death; and banished several other Mandarins, whom Yen-temür had imprisoned. This general pressed him to be proclaimed emperor. He put it off, saying, he would wait the return of his brother

(A) A descendant of general Ganchor, who served with much glory in the wars of Jenghiz Khân. Gaub.

(B) He had a brother called Machartay, the father of Tashe, both famous for the great posts they held. Gaub.

(C) A fortress and gate in the wall of China, to the north of Pe-king.

(D) Son of Song-shan, son of Kanmala, and cousin-german to Asüküpa. Gaubil.

Hoshila, and yield the empire to him. However, at last he suffered himself to be prevailed on, and was declared emperor. Yen-temûr was immediately declared generalissimo; and Pe-yen, governor of Ho-nan, was likewise much advanced. Manifestos were sent into all parts; and it was affirmed, that Tûtemûr was resolved to surrender the empire to his brother Hoshila.

Asûkipa proclaimed.

PRINCE Wang-chan, being advanced as far as Yulin (E), was there stopped by Satûn, brother of Yen-temûr, and received some losses: but taking advantage of Yen-temûr's absence, who had been sent to the frontiers, to oppose prince Yesfen-temûr, reduced Ku-yong-quan. On advice of this, that general returned; and, in two battles, defeated the prince, near the river Yu (F), and obliged him to retire into Tartary. Wang-chan, though full of courage, yet being young, and without experience, was no match for an old warlike commander, like Yen-temûr. Prince Koko, who declared for Asûkipa, with the troops of Shen-si, seized the important pass of Tong-quan. Prince Yesfen-temûr likewise entered Shen-si, and proclaimed him emperor. Tyemûko, the Tatar general, following the same party, advanced with a great army to the borders of Ho-nan and Hû-quang, where he made great conquests. Ho-nan was at this time full of formidable armies of both parties^a.

His troops defeated.

MEAN while Yesfen-temûr, who had marched from Shen-si into Pe-che-li, reduced Tong-chew (G); and, being reinforced by many succours, drew near Ta-tû, in order to besiege it. On this news, Yen-temûr took his best troops, and, attacking the prince vigorously, cut his army in pieces. The most valuable officers belonging to Asûkipa were slain in this battle; and the prince had much ado to escape with the ruins of his army. Prince Ulatay, who also declared for Asûkipa, made great marches with his troops, in order to join Yesfen-temûr. He had taken Tse-kin-quan, an important post in Pe-che-li, and alarmed the whole country; but when he came to the bridge of Lû-kew-kyau, he there heard of the prince's total defeat; and, fearing to be overwhelmed by Yen-temûr, retired.

Shang-tû taken.

WHEN Pû-wba-temûr, paternal uncle of Yen-temûr, who was great general of the Mungls in Tartary, to the west, north, and north-east, of Lyau-tong, knew that Tûtemûr had been installed at Ta-tû, he invited prince Ywelû-temûr (H) to join him with his troops; and both went, in October, to lay siege to Shang-tû. Taulasba defended the place at first with much courage; and, followed by the princes and great men of Asûkipa's party, several times attacked the besiegers, but was always repulsed; and, being at length reduced to extremity, surrendered at discretion. He delivered up to Ywelû-temûr all the jewels, precious stones, and whatever else belonged to the emperor Asûkipa. Prince Wang-chan fled; prince Toto, heretofore governor of Lyau-tong, was killed: but it was not known how Asûkipa died.

Asûkipa slain.

ON the news of Asûkipa's death, and taking of Shang-tû, the princes and great lords, who were leagued against Tûtemûr in Shen-si, Shan-si, Hû-quang, Che-kyang, Lyau-tong, and other countries, laid down their arms; and, in November, Tûtemûr, seeing himself without a rival, sent a lord to his brother Hoshila; banished to Tong-gan-chew (now called Tong-gan-hyen) (I) the empress Papûhan, wife of Yesun-temûr; and put to death the general Taulasba, with the princes Wang-chan, Yesfen-temûr, and others. He would have done the same by all the Tatar and Chinese grandees taken at Shang-tû, if a great Mandarin had not told him such a proceeding was unjust, and might cause a general disaffection. The history, on this occasion, speaks of Tûtemûr as an usurper, who, without reason, put to death the princes and great men, for having supported their lawful sovereign. He is blamed likewise for exiling the empress Papûhan. Mean time Nankyatay, one of the commanders in Yun-nan, got himself proclaimed emperor, and appointed ministers to act in affairs.

Princes put to death.

Hoshila installed.
A. D. 1329.

PRINCE Hoshila, having been informed of what had passed, in January 1329 decamped (K); and, marching southwards, encamped to the north of the city Ho-ning (L) (or Karakorum), and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor. This installation was performed with the concurrence of Tûtemûr; and the lords of both courts made great rejoicings on the occasion. In March Tûtemûr sent Yen-temûr to carry the seal of the empire, with the imperial habits and ornaments, to Hoshila, who declared him prime minister, and general of the troops; and Tûtemûr was appointed the prince inheritor. For all this, Tûtemûr, in reality, carried

^a GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 262, & seqq.

(E) A small city of Pe-che-li, about five miles east of W'hai-lay-hyen. Gaubil.

(F) A little river which passes to Ku-yong-quang, in Pe-che-li, and falls into the Pe-ho, or river Pe. Gaubil.

(G) A city on the west side of the river Pe, some leagues [about twelve miles] to the east of Pe-king.

(H) Ywelû-temûr was descended, in the fifth generation, from Sho-chi-han, second son of Tsjutay, and brother of Jenghîz Khân. Gaubil.

(I) A city in Pe-che-li, a little to the south-east of Pe-king.

(K) The history says Hoshila encamped in summer on mount Ha-lo-û-chay. I know not if this be the mount Altchay, which M. Polo speaks of, and where he says Jenghîz Khân is buried. This (Altchay) is mount Altay. Gaub.

(L) Otherwise called Ho-ling. Gaubil.

a himself as emperor, independent of his brother. He sent a lord into Se chwen; who publishing that the emperor Tütemür would pardon Nankyatay, who, towards the end of last year, was proclaimed emperor, that general submitted; but was immediately put to death. Mean time Hoshila prepared to go to Shang-tü; and being arrived, in August, within two days journey of that city, Tütemür went thither to salute him: but, soon after, Hoshila was found dead in his bed. The second of that month he gave a great entertainment to the lords of both courts; and, on the sixth, died suddenly. The historians accuse Tütemür with having, His sudden death. out of ambition, procured his brother's death.

HOSHILA is the emperor whom the Chinese call Ming-tsung: he gave the title of empress to the princess Papúsha, who was of the tribe of Naymanchin, by whom he had a prince named b Iinchipin, who was proclaimed emperor, as the reader will see hereafter. When he was in Tartary, he married also the princess Maylayti ^b, daughter of Nabanlülü, descended from ^{sons.} prince Arslün, who came from the west to submit to Jenghiz Khán, and had large territories given him to the north of the Great Kobi, or Desart. Hoshila had, by the princess Maylayti, Towhan-temür, who was the last emperor of the Mungls in China. He had likewise another son named Han-chi-pan, who reigned before his brother about two months ^c.

HOSHILA was the eleventh Khán of Tartary, and seventh emperor of the Ywen, who reigned over the Chinese.

^b GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 265, & seqq.

^c GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 267.

C H A P. VII.

The reign of Tütemür, styled by the Chinese Ven-tsung.

c AS soon as Hoshila was dead, Tütemür sent for the seal of the empire; and, after he had ^{Travelled.} performed the last duties to the deceased, he returned to Shang-tü, where, on the ^{Tütemür, or} fifteenth of the same month of August, he was acknowledged emperor; and appointed that ^{Ven-tsung.} the year 1329 should be reckoned the second of his reign. This same year Tütemür ordered the book, intitled, King-shi-ta-tyen, to be composed in Chinese by the most able doctors of the empire. It is often cited in the great history of the Mungls; by which quotations it appears (A) to contain many curious matters relating to the origin, government, conquests, and geography, of the Mungls. One of the doctors, appointed to be concerned in this grand work, was Shen-se, a native of Khorassán, and a Mohammedan: but, as he could never agree with the other doctors, about several articles treated of in that book, which yet are not mentioned, he obtained leave to write on other subjects: among the rest (B), he composed, in d Chinese, a geography of the western countries of Asia, to which he has subjoined remarks upon their doctrinal books, with a large catalogue of their eminent men.

In March 1330 prince Túkyen revolted in Yun-nan, and assumed the title of king. He ^{Rebellion in} committed a thousand disorders; took the cities, slew the Mandarins, and stirred up the ^{Yun-nan.} Nyau-tse, with other people who live independent in the neighbouring provinces, to rebel against the emperor. Hereupon the prince Alatenasheli, son of prince Tüla, was ordered to march with an army to oppose the designs of Túkyen. Mean time the empress Pútasili, or Pútasbeli, of the house of Hongkila, and wife of Tütemür, not able to endure the empress dowager Papúsha, employed an eunuch to make away with her. The historians take occasion from hence to represent the dangerous consequences of a bad example in princes. Tütemür, say they, caused his brother Hoshila to be sent out of the world; and that wicked example induced Pútasili to destroy Papúsha.

In October the emperor went to the temple of heaven, and there sacrificed in person, honour- ^{The emperor's} ing at the same time Jenghiz Khán, founder of the dynasty. Tütemür was the first of the ^{sacrifices.} Ywen (or Mungl) princes, who in person had been at the temple of heaven, and made the solemn sacrifice, which, before that time, had been performed by others. After this ceremony was over, a general pardon was published; and a law was made, that, among the

(A) The author, when he wrote this, had not yet found that book.

(B) He composed several other works on the Chinese classical books; the great men under the Kin dynasty;

the books of Lau-tse and Chewen-tse, &c.: the books of Shen-se remain in his family; nor does Gaubil know if they were printed.

emperor's wives, only one should bear the title of empress. It is remarked in a note, in the great history of the Mungls, that Jenghîz Khân had twenty-one ladies, who, besides the princess of Hongkila, his principal wife, had the title of empresses; and that the other emperors, down to Shi-tsu, or Hû-pi-lay, had five or seven: which custom was followed by his successors, till Tûtemûr, who limited their number to one.

Yun-nan submits. IN December the emperor declared his son the prince Alatenatala prince inheritor: but, in January 1331, this prince died, to his father's great affliction. Mean time the prince Alatenasheli, with an army of more than 100,000 men, carried on the war against prince Tû-kyen, who defended himself with courage; but, having been beaten in above twenty battles, in April both Yun-nan and Se-chwen submitted to the victor. However, soon after one of the rebels, named Lû-yu, who had laid concealed for a while, excited new troubles, supported by the brothers and sons of Tû-kyen. But Kyay-lye (C), great general of the Mungls, made a terrible slaughter of his followers, and intirely dispersed them. Two brothers and three sons of Tû-kyen were killed; and another of his brothers fled as far as the sea, where he perished.

A new conspiracy. MEAN time one of the Lamas, of the country of Igûr, which abounds with them, was then chief of the Lamas of the empire, and what regarded their religion; several of the Bonzas of Igûr formed a conspiracy in favour of Ywelû-temûr, son of the prince Honanta, whom the emperor Hayshan put to death.

YEN-TEMUR, who had been created a Vang. or Regulo, by the emperor, had a son called Targay; which young prince was so beloved by his majesty, that he would have him educated in his palace, and sent his own son Yentye-kûtse to be bred up in the palace of Yen-temûr. He likewise this year conferred on Pe-yen the Merkit the title of Vang (or Wang), which is the greatest honour that the emperor can bestow on one of his subjects; and is attended with pensions, but not estates.

Tûtemûr dies. IN 1332 Tûtemûr, according to custom, removed in the spring to Shang-tû; where he fell sick, and died, in August, in the twenty-ninth year of his age; ordering, that one of the sons of his brother Hoshila should be proclaimed emperor^a.

TUTEMUR was the twelfth Khân of the Mungls, and eighth of the Ywen dynasty in China, where he was known under the title of Ven-tsong.

^a GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 267, & seqq.

(C) Or Que-lye, is the name of a general from the west, who did great services for Hû-pi-lay in Yun-nan; but I know not if this be the same, or one of his family: Gaubil.

CHAP. VIII.

The reign of Towhan-temûr, styled by the Chineses Shun-ti.

SECT. I.

The distractions and rebellions which attended his bad government.

Thirteenth. AFTER the death of Tûtemûr, the minister Yen-temûr went to the empress Pûtasbeli, and proposed to advance her son Yentye-kûtse to the empire: but she rejected that motion; and, pursuant to the intention of her deceased husband, caused the prince Ilinchipin, second son of Hoshila (by the empress Papûsha, whom she had put to death), then no more than seven years old, to be proclaimed. This new emperor, known in China under the title of Ning-tsong (A), dying in November, Yen-temûr again proposed to enthrone Yentye-kûtse: but Pûtasbeli would by no means consent to it; declaring, that the empire belonged to Towhan-temûr (B), son of Hoshila, by the princess Maylayti, who was at this time thirteen years of age.

(A) But, as he lived only two months, he is not reckoned among the Chinese emperors. See Du Halde's

China, vol. i. p. 217. fol. edit. We shall observe in a note at the end of this dynasty of the Ywen.

(B) Written Toboantemour by our author Gaubil.

After

a After the death of the empress Parishpa, he was banished into Korea, from whence he had been removed to Queylin Fû, the capital of Quang-si.

THE emperor of the Song, who was carried into Tartary, and became a Lama^a, had lands Reports of him, in that country, where, it is said, he married a princess, and had children by her. This princess, according to some, was Maylayti; and had, by him, Towhan-temûr. After this, prince Hoshila contracted a friendship with the deposed monarch; and, having taken an inclination for Maylayti, married her, and adopted Towhan-temûr. These reports were, without doubt, false; but they were not the less current, for all that, at court, and in the provinces. However this be, the president of the tribunal of mathematics, being consulted about his election, declared it very dangerous to make that prince emperor. Notwithstanding all that could be said to the contrary, Pûtasbeli, persisting in her resolution, sent a great lord to bring the prince from Quey-lin Fû, and declare him emperor.

AT the entrance of the year 1333, the empress having received advice that Towhan-temûr Afraid of was arrived at Lyang-byang, a city some leagues short of Ta-tû, sent thither the guards, the Yen-temûr, princes, and grandees, to meet him. Yen-temûr, as generalissimo and prime minister, appeared at their head, and complimented the prince in the name of the empress regent. After this, placing himself by the prince's side, he spoke to him about the state of the court, and manner in which the ceremony of the installation should be performed. Towhan-temûr appeared afraid at the sight of Yen-temûr; and did not speak a single word: the lords of his retinue seemed likewise to be seized with fear. No wonder the prince should be suspicious of him; since many believed that he was the person, who, by Tûtemûr's direction, put his father Hoshila to death. However that be, Yen-temûr, touched to the quick at Towhan-temûr's silence, delayed the ceremony of his inauguration; resolving, if possible, to exclude him from the throne, and place the crown on the head of Yentye-kûtse.

THE discontent of Yen-temûr gave no small uneasiness to the regent and the prince. This latter, being sensible of the fault he had committed, when that lord went out to meet him, Marries his daughter, endeavoured to repair it, by marrying his daughter Peyaw, and making her his principal wife. Yen-temûr had grand qualities; but he was cruel, and void of modesty. He became enamoured with one of the wives of the emperor Yesun-temûr, and had the rashness to marry her; a thing almost without example. In March he died of his excesses; and his death secured the empire d to Towhan-temûr: who, removing with his court to Shang-tû, the empress regent declared the last will of Tûtemûr; and the grandees agreed to declare the prince emperor.

TOWHAN-TEMUR (C), whom the Chinese name Shun-ti, at first gave all power to the Is proclaimed empress Pûtasbeli, and conferred on her the title of empress-grandmother; but, from that time, resolved to get rid of her. This princess informed her son Yentye-kûtse of Tûtemûr's will, and of what had passed between Ayyuli-palipata and Hayshan. The new emperor, to gain the family of Yen-temûr to his interest, in August caused his wife Peyaw to be declared empress.

TOWHAN-TEMUR soon discovered his inconstant and wavering temper; his aversion to state- Neglects af- affairs, and his inclination to pleasure. Alûwhentemûr, the eighth in descent from the emperor fairs.

e Ogotay, perceiving his natural indolence, shewed him the great number of faults he would commit, in case he governed by himself: he therefore advised him to leave that toil to his ministers; and, by that pernicious counsel, was the first cause of the destruction of the empire of the Ywen (D). Towhan-temûr followed his advice, and thought of nothing but gratifying his passions. Satûn, eldest brother of Yen-temûr, was honoured with the title of Regulo (or Vang) as well as Tangkishî, eldest son of Yen-temûr, and brother of the empress Peyaw. Satûn and Pe-yen were the prime ministers; and were, besides, the great generals of the troops. The history loudly exclaims against the advancement of Pe-yen to this high post, representing him as a man of bad principles, debauched, and void of honour; it adds, that heaven shewed marks of its displeasure the same day that so much honour was conferred on him; for the earth quaked, f and a mountain fell.

THE history likewise records several presages, in 1334, of the unfortunate reign of Towhan-temûr: as that, in the southern provinces, no fewer than two millions two hundred and seventy Calamities of his reign thousand families, that is, more than thirteen millions of people, died; and that, in August, A. D. 1334, there was an earthquake at Ta-tû. The Chinese historians, who composed the history of the

^a See before, p. 389.

(C) The Chinese books of geography say, that one of Shun-ti's daughters espoused Tamerlan, to whom they give the title of Tû-ma, that is, son-in-law of the emperor. Gaubil.—This answers to the title of Kur Khân, given to that prince by the oriental historians, which signifies son-in-law of the Khan. See D'Hierbelot, Bibl. orient. art. Timûr, p. 878.

(D) The history blames the prince Alûwhentemûr, and makes an odious comparison between him and Kau-yau and Chew-kong, who rendered themselves famous by the sage advice which they gave the emperors of their respective times. Gaubil.

Ywen, or Mungl race, lived at the beginning of the dynasty of the Ming (E), who ruined that of the Ywen. These authors have taken great pains to render this emperor odious on all occasions: they have represented his faults in their full light; and set down all the famines, inundations, popular sicknesses, earthquakes, falls of mountains, comets, eclipses, and other events: which they thought proper to shew, that Towhan-temür ought not to have been emperor; and that the Ming (or Ta-ming) wrested the empire from the Mungls with justice ^a.

A point decided,

relating to tablets.

IN October a question was decided, which had exercised the wits of all the Chinese Literati. Several empresses, and, among the rest, Ching-ko, first wife of Hayshan, had no tablets in the hall of ancestors, near those of their husbands, under pretence that they had no children; while princesses, who were only the second or third wives of emperors, were honoured with tablets, because they had borne sons who afterwards enjoyed the title of emperor. The mothers of Hosbila and Tütemür had their tablets, and were there respected as empresses; although they lived in the time of Ching-ko, who was the chief wife, as well as the princess who had the rank and title of empress. One of the great Mandarins, whom Pe-yen consulted, answered, that Ching-ko, although without issue, ought to enjoy, after her death, the honours of empress; and that it was an indecency to honour as empresses those who, in reality, were no more than concubines. Another Mandarin, enemy to him who spoke in favour of Ching-ko, cited the example of Tay-tsung, emperor of the Tang dynasty, who, he said, gave two of his ladies the title of empress. The Mandarin, who wanted Ching-ko only to have tablets, no-way embarrassed with the objection, instead of staying to consider the passage of history cited by his adversary, ran for another, to oppose it, as high up as the emperor Tau; affirming, that the prince did not put the tablet of his mother near that of Tiko his father, because the mother of Tau was not an empress. Every body applauded this answer: Pe-yen rewarded the Mandarin; and Ching-ko had her tablet set up near that of her husband Hayshan. ^b

Tangkishi's conspiracy. A. D. 1335.

IN 1335 Satün, brother of Yen-temür, died; and that death occasioned the ruin of his illustrious and powerful family. Tang-kishi, a prince naturally fiery, and apt to speak his mind, finding all his uncle's places, of which he expected no small share, given to Pe-yen, who, by that means, became the first lord of the court, complained loudly of the injustice done him; and, on this occasion, cried up the services which his ancestors had done the empire, more than became him. At the same time he ran down Pe-yen, saying he was too inconsiderable a person to be raised so high; and, in concert with Talyentali, his paternal uncle, took measures for setting on the throne Whang-bo-temür, son of the rebel prince Siliki, slain in Tartary in the reign of Hü-pi-lay. Talyentali had often refused to obey the orders sent him to come to court. The plot was discovered by a prince of the blood; and Pe-yen was commissioned to seize the conspirators. In June Tangkishi concealed a troop of soldiers to the east of Shang-tü, where the court then was; and the thirtieth of the same month, designed to attack the palace on all sides. But Pe-yen prevented him, and seized both him and his brother Targay, who were then in the palace. Tangkishi was killed immediately; but Targay fled, and, trembling, ran to the chamber of the empress his sister. This young princess was frightened to see her brother wounded, and, with tears, begged his life of her. The empress, being informed of what had passed, sought to save her brother: but she sought in vain; for presently the lords entered her chamber with their naked swords, and slew him in her presence. ^c

Empress put to death.

WHEN they had done their work, Pe-yen went and informed the emperor; who, instead of severely punishing them for daring to enter the chamber of the empress with arms in their hands, consented that Pe-yen should even take and put her to death. Pursuant to this horrid permission, that bloody minister turned executioner, went directly to the apartment of that princess; who, perceiving that he came to seize her, set up a loud cry, and fell on her knees before the emperor, intreating him to spare her life. The hard-hearted husband, after reproaching her with the revolt of her uncle and two brothers, told her he could not save her. These cruel words were her sentence of death. Pe-yen took her away, led her to a house in a neighbouring village, and there slew her with his own hands. Talyentali defended himself the best ^d

^b GAUBIL, hist. Gentchis, p. 270, & seqq.

(E) Among the Chinese, the rule is, daily to commit to writing the actions of their princes, and drop the papers into close chests, which are never opened while the family then reigning possess the empire. On the accession of a new family, the chests are opened, and the history of the preceding is compiled from the memoirs found inclosed therein. Although the custom of having a palace, with halls, for honouring the ancestors of princes, is as antient as the monarchy itself; yet it is not easy to fix the time when the several ceremonies for that purpose were settled, much less of the changes that have been made in them. It is said, that Ti-ko, father of Tau, had four wives; but 'tis difficult to prove that, in his time, there were tablets in the palace of ancestors; and that, in case there were, none but the tablet of the first wife, who was empress, was placed near his. The series of facts and times before Tau is uncertain. Gaubil.—and, in our opinion, for many ages after.

a he could; and, after several fruitless efforts with the lords of his conspiracy, took refuge with prince Whang-ko temür; where being taken and killed, the prince slew himself.

NOTWITHSTANDING the representations of the Literati, a great Mungl lord caused the Examinations examination of their order to be suppressed. The Chineses, who every-where testified their suppressed discontent at this proceeding, set themselves to inquire into the life of that Tatar; and soon found faults enough in his conduct, to render him suspected by Pe-yen, who thereupon sent him into banishment, where he died not long after.

In 1337, troubles arose in the provinces of Quang-tong, Ho-nan, Se-chwen, and the A. D. 1337. province of Koko-nor, where the people appeared discontented with Towhan-temür, and Troubles arise censured his conduct. The Chineses were forbidden to instruct the Mungls, and to keep arms. Mean time, the emperor declared a princess of Hong-kila empress. In May a comet appeared, which was visible for sixty-three days, and had its course from the Pleiades to the head of Scorpio (F).

MACHARTAY, youngest brother of Pe-yen, had the good qualities of that minister, without his faults: he was a good general; and esteemed by the troops. The emperor would have given him the title of Wang, or Regulo, but he constantly declined it. As one of Pe-yen's bad qualities was cruelty, and a bloody disposition, he proposed to the emperor to have all those put to death, whose Se-ing (G) was Chang, Vang, Lyew, Li, and Chau. The occasion of this barbarous demand is not mentioned; but it was rejected, and drew on Pe-yen an infinite number of enemies.

c Toto, son of Machartay, was one of the officers of the guards; and, by his prudent behaviour, soon became esteemed by the emperor, as well as the great men at court, with whose A. D. 1340. intrigues he was thoroughly acquainted. He knew that Towhan-temür was grown suspicious Toto undertakes to of his uncle Pe-yen, ever since November 1339; when that lord, under a false pretence, had put to death Che-che-tü, great grandson of Meng-ko, by Yulong-tashe, his fourth son. Pe-yen was hated by all the world; and had an intolerable pride: for some time he went abroad with the state of a great king; and Toto was one day witness of his pompous train, at a time when that of the emperor was very moderate. The Mungl monarch himself observed it, and was offended. More than this, he believed that Pe-yen had ill designs in his head (H); and Toto knew for certain, that Towhan-temür intended to destroy him. Toto informed his father d Machartay of what had passed; and consulted U-chi-vang, a Chinese Literato, in whom he had much confidence, as having been his governor. U-chi-vang cited the passages, which teach, that a man must sacrifice his family to justice; and that a great Mandarin ought to have no other object in view, than fidelity to the empire.

Toto, who was a lord of parts, having found a favourable opportunity to speak to the e emperor, fell on his knees, and said, that he renounced his family to serve his majesty. Towhan-temür, who believed there was dissimulation in his words, pretended not to understand his meaning. Most of the lords who were about the emperor were creatures of Pe-yen. Shi-kyay and Ali were almost the only two with whom he durst intrust a secret. These he ordered to sound the fidelity of Toto, whose motions they narrowly inspected; and then acquainted e his majesty, that they would answer for his integrity. Hereupon Towhan-temür sent for Toto, and shed tears while he spoke to him of his uncle's behaviour. After this Toto and Shi-kyay, having become intimate friends, resolved to seize Pe-yen; which they did, with the emperor's approbation, in the following manner.

Toto placed new guards in all the posts, and augmented the number of them; ordering f them to give him an exact account of all who either entered or went out. Pe-yen was surprised to see the guard reinforced, without having had notice of it, as great general; and, on that occasion, chid his nephew; who answered boldly, "That too good a guard could not be kept in the palace where was the emperor." On these words, Pe-yen thought fit to strengthen his own guard; and concluded, that he could not depend on Toto. After this, f Pe-yen acquainted the guards, that he wanted to speak to his majesty: they asked what his business was; and understanding that it was to invite him to a hunting, Toto dissuaded the emperor; so that Pe-yen repeated his instances in vain. Towhan-temür ordered Xentye-kotse to encamp without the city: at the same time Pe-yen heard, with astonishment, that Toto and Shi-kyay had caused the city gates to be shut, and kept the keys, after posting troops, devoted to them, in all the quarters of Ta-tü. At night those two lords advised the emperor to change his apartment; and made prince Xentye-kotse to return into the city. They ordered Pe-yen

^c GAUBIL, p. 272, & seqq.

(F) This Chinese manner of expressing the course of the comet deserves explanation. Gaubil.

(G) We think this passage needs explanation, as much at least as that relating to the comet.

(H) Pe-yen was accused of a design either of seizing the emperor or killing him, and setting another on the throne. Gaubil.

to be watched ; and, in February, on the day named Ki-hay, all the titles and places which a that minister had at court were taken from him ; and he was ordered to set out for Ho-nan, there to exercise the office of a Mandarin. He designed, before he went, to salute the emperor, which was refused him ; and, when he was on the road, a second order overtook him, to let him know, that he was banished. After this, he continued his journey ; but fell sick near Nan-chang-fû, capital of Kyang-si, where he died, hated by all the great men, as well as the people (I).

Affairs at court.

UPON this change, Toto, and his father Machartay, had new employments ; but the latter still refused the title of Vang, and even that of Targhan, or Tarkan, which implies being exempt from imposts and service. However, the change of ministry went no farther : public notice was given the Mandarins, that they had nothing to fear, and would be continued in their employments. In June, Towhan-temûr being at Sbang-tû, caused a manifesto to be published through the empire ; wherein he set forth all which the emperor Tûtemûr and the empress Putasheli had done against Hoshila and the empress Papûsha : he complained bitterly, for that they had exiled him, without having committed any offence ; and endeavoured to make him pass for the son of another person than Hoshila. After this, he deprived Putasheli of the title of empress grandmother, and banished her ; which treatment she did not long survive. Prince Tentye-kotse was ordered to depart for Korea : he set out accordingly ; but was killed on the way (K). The tablet of Tûtemûr was taken out of the temple of ancestors ; many of the Mandarins, put in by him, were discharged ; and several of the lords punished, who had served him. In August Towhan-temûr returned to Ta-tû ; and, in December, re-established the examination of the Literati ^d.

Examinations restored.

A. D. 1342. IN 1342, the famine was so great, that the people ate human flesh (L). Two or three leagues to the north of the bridge Lû-kew-kyau (M), is a place called Kin-kew, on the east side of the river When. The Kin emperors formerly made a canal of communication between Tong-chew and Kin-kew, in order to bring up the provisions and merchandizes which came by water to the first city : but this canal, which passed to the north of Ten-king, being found to endanger that capital, was destroyed. In January this year, Toto, son of Machartay, undertook to open it again, with a view to join the rivers When and Pe, as before ; and although this project was opposed by one of the Chinese ministers, on the same reasons which caused it to be stopped up the first time, yet Toto's advice was followed. However, the sand and mud, as the Mandarin had demonstrated, soon rendered it useless ; and the fear of inundations obliged them afterwards to close it up a second time. 'Tis related, that a present was made the emperor this year, from the kingdom of Fû-lang (N), of a horse eleven feet six inches long, and six feet eight inches high ; the body black, with spots of different colours ; and the hoofs of the two hind feet white. The present was much esteemed.

A. D. 1343.
Histories finished.

HU-PI-LAY, at the beginning of his reign, commanded the memoirs for the history of the Lyau and Kin to be put in order. He likewise, after the destruction of the Song dynasty, gave directions to compile the history of the Song : but, notwithstanding the orders of this prince, and his successors, those histories were not finished. Hereupon, in 1343, Toto, son of Macharty ; Timûrtash, son of Toto, prince of Kangli ; Gbew-yang-swen, historian of the empire (O) ; Chang-ki-yen, Lu-tse-cheng, Kye-bi-tse, and other able doctors ; were appointed for this great work ; which was, at length, completed, under Towhan-temûr, each dynasty having its history apart. The greater part of what is well executed in them, is owing to the labour of Gbew-yang-swen. In this work, besides the annals of the emperors belonging to the three dynasties, there are separate chapters, which contain the several kalendars, and astronomical methods, with the astronomical observations of the mathematical tribunal. There is likewise an ample catalogue of the great men of the respective dynasties, with a concise account of what they have done ; and it is there you meet with the works which the learned of the time have composed. The authors have there inserted what they knew of foreign geography ; and there you find descriptions of the countries subject or tributary to the princes, whose history is set forth. The history of the Song hath, besides those accompaniments, a kind of Chinese bibliothéque, where the books composed in China, on all sorts of subjects, are divided into Account of them.

^d GAUBIL, p. 276, & seqq.

(I) When he came to Ching-ting-fû, he asked some old men, who presented him wine, if they had heard the affair of a son who would have killed his father ? alluding to what Toto had done : one of them answered, they had not ; but that they heard there were subjects who would have killed their sovereign. Gaubil.

(K) Ken-tye-kû-tse had been at first declared prince inheritor by Towhan-temûr. The death of that prince is the only thing which the history reproaches the emperor with, in what he did against Putasheli and Tûtemûr. Gaubil.

(L) The history mentions, for the reason before recited, eclipses of the sun, which happened in August and October. Gaubil.

(M) A few leagues to the west of Pe-king.

(N) By which, without doubt, Europe is to be understood. Gaubil.

(O) Native of Chang-cho, in Hû-quang. Gaubil.

a classes (P). 'Tis from these three histories, that the Nyen-i-tse and Tsu-pyen, inserted in the Tong-kyen kang-mû, have taken the greater part of what they relate concerning the dynasties of the Lyau, Kin, and Song.

In October this year, the emperor Towhan-temûr went to the palace of ancestors, to honour the princes of his family : but when he was before the tablet of Ning-tsong (or Ilin-chipan), his youngest brother, he made a difficulty to kneel. Hereupon the great Chinese Mandarins alleged the example of the two brothers Hi and Min (Q), counts of the country of Lû, in Shan-tong; saying, that Hi, though the elder, did not scruple to perform the ceremony to Min, who reigned before him. To support this passage of history, another Mandarin reasoned thus; Your majesty was no more than a subject, when your brother was emperor; now, a subject ought to kneel before his sovereign. Towhan-temûr's objection being thus removed, he fell on his knees, and honoured his brother Ning-tsong, by nine beats with the head. Ancestors honoured.

In May 1344, Toto was honoured with the title of Regulo, and Alûtû, the fourth descendant from Po-eul-chû, or Porji, one of Jenghîz Khân's four intrepids, proposed by him to fill his place of minister. In the same month next year, died Nau-nau, son of Pû-hû-chû, of Kangli (often mentioned before), much regretted by the emperor; who highly esteemed him, and was not offended at his frequent admonitions to love virtue, and govern by himself. He passed for a man of great virtue, and was withal one of the most learned doctors of the empire. He had likewise a younger brother, named Whey-whey, or the Mohammedan, who was a person of great abilities. Toto made Kang. A. D. 1345.

c In 1346, Perku pûwba, son of the minister A-û-tay, slain by order of the emperor Hayshan, having lodged an accusation against the great general Machartay, Towhan-temûr banished that officer to Si-ning, a city of Shen-si (at the end of the great wall): and Toto, having in vain endeavoured to ward off the blow, followed his father. The general being, by a second order, exiled to Sa-se, in the west, a lord of the country of Tûrfân, a great Mandarin, exclaimed against those who thus maltreated a great lord of merit, innocent of the crime laid to his charge: hereupon Machartay was ordered to live at Kan-chew, in Shen-si, where he soon after died. But the world did him justice: every body was persuaded of Perku-pûwba's malice, Machartay's virtue, and the emperor's weakness. His father banished.

d In 1348, Kya-lû, native of Kau-ping, in Shan-si, who knew something of geometry and levelling, was sent to examine the course of the Whang-ho, and its antient bed, in Pe-che-li. He made a map of it, accompanied with a discourse; wherein he proposed raising banks along that river, and turning it into a new channel. Kya-lû was supported by some great lords; and had inspection over the tribunals which were erected for carrying on of public works. We shall see hereafter what were the consequences of this project. In August, Yu-chi, one of the most renowned doctors of the empire, died, at Li-chwen, in the district of Fû chew, in Kyang-si, his native country: he had a considerable hand in the work, intituled, King-chi-ta-tyen. In 1333, Ma-tsû-chang, a great Mandarin, originally of the west of Asia, gave out, that Yu-chi was the person who had written an edict of Tûtemûr; wherein that prince related what he had said touching the birth of Towhan-temûr. Yu-chi, upon this aspersion of his enemy, retired, of his own accord; and although the emperor invited him to return, he always declined it. A. D. 1348. Whang-ho project.

e In November this year, a great lord, following the example of those who, in all times, have hazarded both their estates and lives, to tell the emperors their faults, laid before Towhan-temûr the evils which the empire suffered: he complained, that the misdemeanors of the great men were not punished; and affirmed, that such neglect would ruin the empire: he reminded him of the crimes of Pe-yen the Merkit; and said, it was a scandal to see still at court his brothers, sons, and grandsons. Another Mandarin prayed the emperor, to deprive his wife, the princess Ki, who came from Korea, of the honour and title of empress, which he had given her, although the empress, princess of Hong-kila, was still living (R); alleging, in support of what he demanded, a writing of Hû-pi-lay, in which he took an oath, never to contract affinity with the Koreans. The emperor was passionately fond of the princess Ki, who was mother of the prince whom he designed for his heir; whereas the children which he had by the princess of Hong-kila were all dead. In effect, he rejected the petitions of both Mandarins. The ministers corrupt.

f In 1349, Tay-ping, a lord of great wisdom, moderation, and integrity, was at the head of affairs; and, as he could not bear to see innocence oppressed, he, in spite of the difficulties

* GAUBIL, p. 278, & seqq.

(P) The author forbears mentioning an infinite number of other articles treated of in those histories; because he designs to speak of them elsewhere.

(Q) Two of the twelve princes of Lû, whose annals Konfutsius has written, intituled, Chun-tyew. Gaubil.

(R) Towhan-temûr had three wives, who, at the same time, bore the title of empress; and paid no regard to the order of Tûtemûr, not to give that title to more than one wife. Gaubil.

which lay in the way, demanded, and obtained, the recall of Toto. This prince, on his return, ^a was restored to his place of minister; and, not knowing that he owed his good fortune to Tay-ping, who made no mention to him of the service he had done him, joined with that lord's enemies in an accusation against him. Tay-ping was hereupon turned out of place; and his accusers were going to push their malice farther, when Toto's mother threatened to renounce him, if he did not desist; telling him that Tay-ping was not culpable, and that he had done him no injury. Toto, who loved his mother tenderly, and did not care to give her any uneasiness, ceased to prosecute that lord. Some time after this, Toto came to know the obligations which he had to Tay-ping, and was extremely sorry that he had done so much injury to his benefactor. A friend of Tay-ping having advised him to kill himself, he answered, I have committed no fault: for me to kill myself, would be to confess myself guilty; let ^b us leave the matter to heaven (S). Hereupon he retired, with his family, to Si-gan-fû, in Shen-si.

The prince averse to Chinese learning.

TOWHAN-TEMUR being desirous that his son should learn the Chinese characters and literature, Toto, who was well skilled in both, was pitched on to direct the education of the young prince; and Li-hau-wen was appointed his preceptor. Some Lamas were, at the same time, chosen to instruct the prince in the doctrine and books of Fo. Li-hau-wen took much pains with his pupil: he made an abridgment of the Chinese history to his own time, and of the classic books; with reflections on the causes of the ruin of dynasties, and other remarks, in the Chinese taste, proper to form a prince for government. But his scholar had no inclination for the sciences; and was much taken with the worship of Fo (T). He was an enemy ^c to pains; and the study of the Chinese books required a great deal of application. All that his preceptor uttered, appeared to him obscure, full of empty words, and very unprofitable. One day he said, in Li-hau-wen's presence, "That he did not yet understand any thing which he had explained to him; whereas, in one night's time, he had comprehended the whole doctrine of Fo." These words set all the Chinese Literati and doctors against the prince, of whom they ever had but a contemptible opinion; judging him not fit to govern their country: because he either would not, or could not, understand the books, which, according to them, are so proper to teach the art of governing well ^f.

Arbitrary proceeding.

AMA and Swe-swe, two brothers, natives of the country of Kangli, were at this time very powerful at court; and, though remarkable for their disorderly courses, had free access to the palace of the empress Ki, which they were continually going to. ^d The censors of the empire, and the Chinese grandees, exclaimed against such liberties; and two of them made their complaints of it to the emperor. Ama, upon this, by artful stories, stirred up the resentment of the empress; who complained to Towhan-temür, requiring, that he would punish the two Mandarins, as calumniators, who endeavoured to stain her reputation. The emperor, enraged at what he had heard, banished the Mandarins, one of whom died in the place of his exile. This conduct appeared tyrannical to the Chineses, since the Mandarins had done no more than their duty. Ama, who, besides many other bad qualities, was excessively lewd, appeared to ^e to them to be the person who contributed most to corrupt the emperor, whom they saw devoted to the most enormous debaucheries, and intirely to neglect the affairs of government; placing all his confidence in men of dissolute morals, and without either honour or capacity.

The Whang-
ho project causes insurrections.

IN 1351, the resolutions taken with regard to the new course proposed to be given the Whang-ho (U), or yellow river, considerably augmented the troubles and discontent. Kya-lü, supported by Toto, as hath been already mentioned, had persuaded the emperor to make that river pass, as formerly, through the country of Tay-ming-fû, in Pe-che-li, and fall into the sea of Tyen-tsin-wey. Mean time Cheng-tsun, president of the tribunal of public works, with the mathematicians of Kay-fong-fû, in Ho-nan, went to Tay-ming-fû, and other places in Pe-che-li, to examine the ground; and, after taking the level of it, affirmed, that to clear the old channel was impracticable; that it would require too great an expence; and that Shan-tong would ^f be ruined. All sorts of means were tried to prevail with the president to change his opinion; but he answered, that he would rather die than speak contrary to his judgment in a matter of so much importance to the public. Cheng-tsun was hereupon dismissed, and his place given to

^f GAUBIL, p. 281, & seqq.

(S) He speaks here of the emperor, whom the Chineses call the son of heaven. They believe that his power comes from heaven; and that his orders ought to be obeyed like those of heaven. Gaubil.

(T) This prince seems to be of a different character from Ayyeushilitata, the prince inheritor mentioned hereafter, p. 431: but, for want of the name of the prince mentioned here, we cannot pretend to determine the point.

(U) On this occasion, our author Gaubil gives an account, from the Chinese authors, of the several changes which the Whang-ho, or yellow river, has suffered in its course, from the earliest time.

a Kya-lü, whose advice was followed; and to the titles of his patron ² Toto, was added that of Targhan ^b.

THE works, which were made for turning the Whang-ho, ruined an infinite number of people, and caused new taxes to be imposed; while the peasants could not bear to see their lands taken away, and themselves transplanted elsewhere. The discontent becoming general, different chiefs of parties in every province stirred up the people; so that the Mandarins were greatly embarrassed.

HAN-SHAN-TONG, born in the district of Ching-ting-fü (in Pe-che-li), who had been banished, Han-shan-for his misdeeds, into Shan-tong; taking advantage of the troubled state of things, prevailed ^{tong and} on great numbers of people to rebel, in Shan-tong, Ho-nan, and Kyang-nan. They made him b pass for a descendant of Whey-tsung, eighth emperor of the Song; and took an oath to obey him, sacrificing an horse, and a black ox. Those concerned in this association were distinguished by a red cap. The Mandarins found means to seize Han-shan-tong; but his wife and children escaped. Lyew-fü-tong also, an intrepid man, who supported Han-shan-tong in May, ^{Lyew-fü-} appeared in the field, near Fong-yang-fü, in Kyang-nan. He was presently joined by more than ^{tong rebel.} 100,000 men, and fortified himself in the districts of Nan-yang-fü and Ju-ning-fü, in Ho-nan.
At the same juncture, a pirate, named Fang-que-chen, scoured the coasts of Che-kyang and Kyang-nan, with a great fleet, entered the rivers, plundered the towns and villages, and ruined the trade. One of his designs was, to hinder the transportation of corn, rice, and merchandizes, to the court. The armies sent first against Fang-que-chen were destroyed, and their c generals taken prisoners. After this, the pirate making a sham accommodation, the great Mandarins concealed his revolt: they even caused titles of honour, and employments, to be given to him and his brothers. Mean time, the rebel kept the ports continually blocked up; and did, with impunity, whatever he pleased, for want of honest captains and soldiers to oppose him at sea.

THE emperor having, on his return from Ta-tü, in August, ordered Tesyen-temür, brother ^{Tsü-chew-} of Toto, to assemble the troops, and march against Lyew-fü-tong, that general retook several ^{Whey} places in Ho-nan, and put to death some rebels; but, in reality, Lyew-fü-tong's party grew in strength. In October Tsü-chew-whey took arms in Hü-quang, and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Ki-shü-i, in the district of Hong-chew-fü. He gave a name to the dynasty d which he proposed to found: and the year 1351 is set down, in the history, for the first of his reign. In November a comet appeared, whose tail pointed towards the west: on which occasion it was industriously reported throughout the empire, that heaven, by several visible marks, made known, that it would take the empire from Towhan-temür; and the history relates the superstitious reflections which were made upon the appearance of this comet.

IN 1352 Tsü-chew-whey took Han-yang and Vü-chang in Hü-quang; and, after having seized ^{proclaimed} other posts of importance, caused a fleet to be fitted out, and undertook the siege of Kyew- ^{emperor.}
kyang-fü, on the Grand Kyang. Whether through treachery, cowardice, or disgust with Tow- ^{A. D. 1352.}
han-temür's service, a great number of Tatar Mandarins in Hü-quang and Kyang-fü fled at the approach of the Chinese; and Polotemür, general of a great body of troops which encamped e along the Kyang, abandoned his post, with his Mungls, who dispersed merely for fear of Tsü- chew-whey: these things passed in the first months of the year. On this occasion Li-fü, a Chi- nese grandee of Fong-yang-fü in Kyang-nan, set the Mungls a fine example of fidelity to their sovereign: he sent couriers to all the neighbouring villages, to cut off the retreat of Polotemür's forces, and oblige them to do their duty. Tesyen-temür, a Tatar officer, seconded Li-fü; and, having joined their troops, defeated a detachment of Tsü-chew-whey's army, consisting of 20,000 men. After this, Li-fü ordered a great number of trees to be cut down, and to be thrown, tied together, into the Kyang, to hinder the passage of the rebel fleet: which, coming down the river soon after in full sail, met with this unexpected obstacle; so that they could neither approach Kyew-kyang-fü, nor escape the fiery arrows, which, shot by Li-fü's troops, f burnt several barks ¹.

WHILE Li-fü was so zealously employed to serve Towhan-temür, the general Tükyen-purwa ^{Glorious be-} fled out of the city by the north gate. Most of the Tatar officers followed his ^{barbaric.} example; and the army of Tsü-chew-whey were repairing to enter Kyew-kyang-fü. Upon this, Li-fü, taking what troops remained faithful, and with one of his nephews, who was always near him, mounted the ramparts, to prevent any surprize. The enemy first burnt the west gate; then came to attack the eastern; and, spite of all Li-fü's efforts, entered the city. That brave man still defended himself in the streets on horseback; but, wanting forces, he called out aloud, Kill me, but spare the inhabitants. At these words he and his nephew were cut to pieces. The citizens lamented his death; and Towhan-temür conferred great titles of honour on him. Li-fü

² GAUBIL, p. 234, & seq.

^b See before.

¹ GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 285, & seqq.

was one of the principal Mandarins of Kyew-kyang-fû, and the annals of that city have ranked him amongst the most illustrious of its governors.

Public calamities.

THIS year there happened an extraordinary earthquake at Long-si in Shen-si, which felt its shocks for one hundred days successively. Bones were also found nine or ten feet long, whose antiquity could not be determined. At the beginning of the year 900,000 souls perished by famine and sickness (W). The emperor ordered likewise, that employments should be given, in the tribunals, to the Chineses in the provinces south of the Kyang; who generally, till then, were preferred to places which only concerned commerce and literature. His majesty, about the same time, heard with great concern of the death of general Tay-pûwha, who was slain by the troops of Fan-que-chen, on the coast of Che-kyang; being led, by a relation of that pirate, into the snare unawares: but, when he perceived that he was betrayed, he slew the traitor, with others whom he distrusted; and then, being surrounded on all sides, was killed himself, after a brave resistance. Mean time the army of the rebel Lyew-fû-tong dispersed that of Yesyen-temûr, brother of Toto; who abandoned the open country to the enemy, and shamefully fled to Kay-fang-fû, capital of Ho-nan.

Rebels successful.

Toto's injustice.

THE emperor sent another general in his stead; and was content to say, that Yesyen-temûr did not understand the business of war: but several great Mandarins accused him of having destroyed an army, and, by his cowardice, dishonoured the empire of the Mungls. Towban-temûr, instead of making an example of so great a misdemeanor, intrusted the examination of the affair to Toto, who behaved very ill on this occasion; for he not only defended his brother, but even accused and turned out several Mandarins who had accused Yesyen-temûr. Among the lords of merit, and most capable of serving the state, was Tor-chipan, descended, in the sixth generation, from the illustrious Moboli (or Mûbûli). He had at first been minister, and was very capable of re-establishing affairs: but he was disgusted that nobody would attend to his prudent advice; and would never be any-way concerned in the criminal intrigues of those who governed the mind of Towban-temûr. Tor-chipan was versed in the Chinese sciences: was learned in mathematics, and the art of war. But, as he was one of those who appeared most incensed against Yesyen-temûr, Toto caused him to be banished: soon after which he died at Whang-chew-fû, in Hû-quang, at the age of forty. This severity towards one of the first and most illustrious lords of the empire did much injury to Toto, and infinite hurt to the emperor's affairs.

Tor-chipan banished.

The rebels overthrown.

THE court was greatly alarmed at the news of the taking of Hang-chew Fû, capital of Che-kyang, in July, by the troops of Tsu-chew-whbey. Hereupon Towban-temûr, fearing the loss of the southern provinces, sent a great army under the command of Kyau-wha and Tong-po-syau. The army having crossed the great Kyang, Kyau-wha demanded the advice of the other general officers. Tong-po-syau said, that, as the rebels were infallibly plunged in all sorts of debaucheries in so rich and delightful a city, they could not be in a condition to resist; from whence he concluded, that they ought to go and attack Hang-chew Fû. After much debate, this advice was followed, and the city was assaulted with great resolution. On the other hand, the rebels often sallied, and fought seven most bloody battles: but, after a cruel slaughter of them, the city was taken. This great check much weakened the party of Tsu-chew-whbey, who lost there excellent officers, and more than 40,000 men. In the enemy's army they found many magicians, Bonzas of the sect of Tau, whom they put to death, and burned their books of magic^k.

on two occasions.

Defeat the Mungls.

IN August Toto asked leave to go and besiege Tsu-chew, a city of Kyang-nan, possessed by the troops of Lyew-fû-tong; which was granted him: and, on this occasion, Mlieuulmabomo (X), president of the tribunal of war, made extravagant eulogies upon that minister. Toto attacked the city by the west gate: the besieged made a great sally; but, being repulsed, Tsu-chew was taken and ruined. The minister was hereupon rewarded, and ordered to return to court immediately.

GENERAL Arslân, who commanded the Mungls in Kyang-si, being much beloved by the Myau-tse (Y), on hearing of Tsu-chew-whbey's revolt, enlisted 50,000 of those mountain people, and went with them to Lû-chew, a city of Kyang-nan. An army of Myau-tse in the heart of China was a very odious sight; so that they were dismissed, upon the remonstrance of Tu-que,

^k GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 288, & seq.

(W) In the district of Ta ming fû, in Pe-che-li, only, there died of famine, in June, 500,000 persons. Gaubil.

(X) This is a single word: he was a foreigner. Gaubil.—This seems to imply, that the names of persons which our author has given, for the general, consist of more words than one, although joined together, as if but one. However, we have seldom divided any but such as are Chinese names; although all the rest must consist of two or more monosyllables, as being written commonly from the Chinese characters, and according to the Chinese pronunciation.

(Y) A sort of wild and independent people, mentioned before, who possess the mountainous parts of several provinces of China to the south-west.

- a who had orders to command the troops in that province. This Mandarin fortified Gan-king on the Kyang exceeding strongly, and kept his ground in the midst of the rebels: for at that time most of the province of Kyang-si was in the hands of Tsu-chew-whey's party. On the other hand, the general Sing-ki, having re-assembled the troops, reduced Kyew-kyang and Hsi-kerw. He then marched to attack the rebels, who plundered all the places along the rivers; but, being surrounded, and wounded by an arrow, he was taken. Sing-ki had the reputation both of a good man and a hero. As soon as the rebels knew his name, they fell on their knees, and set victuals before him: they treated him for seven days, in a hut, with all sorts of respect; and were greatly concerned that they could not cure his wound. The general, perceiving death to be near, made a shift to raise himself up; and, having made his reverence to the north, expired: this happened in November. Sing-ki was of an antient family of Ning-hya, at the great wall in Shen-si; and had done great services to the empire.

- Toto, who was under obligations to Ama, being become prime minister, brought that lord into the management of affairs, and got him appointed one of the ministers of state. Ama, supported by the empress Ki, by degrees made himself independent of Toto, and intirely corrupted Towban-temür. He brought into the palace several young debauchés, and Lamas of Tibet, whose hearts were corrupt, and minds poisoned with superstition: their heads were filled with notions of magic and forcery, the consequence of which was revelling and lewdness. They persuaded the emperor, that he should be overwhelmed with happiness, if he would but practise their abominable art, which is called by them Tensher and Pimi (Z). This unfortunate prince, sensible to the evils of the state, and ruin of his dynasty, thought of nothing but to perfect himself in the art which the Lamas taught him. It grieved all the Tatars and Chineses, who had any zeal for the empire, to see that all sorts of debaucheries were by him committed in the palace, in company with Ama, and his brother Swe-swe, Tolo-temür, his brother-in-law, and several other lords, besides the Lamas. Ayewshilitata, son of the emperor, and empress Ki, never would give into the debauches of his father, and did all in his power to drive the Lamas from the court; but his attempts were fruitless. The history observes, on this occasion, that, had the bones of Ama been cut in a thousand pieces, he would not have been sufficiently punished, as having been the first cause of all the evil.

- d For some time the pirates had taken every thing which came by sea; so that Ta-tü suffered much. To remedy this, Toto sent for a great number of husbandmen from the south, on whom he bestowed utensils, cattle, and a good deal of money. His view was, to have corn sown in the environs of the capital, and thence be supplied with provisions, which before came by sea; but this expedient did not answer the purpose. And now things fell into greater confusion than ever. That minister quarrelled with Ama; and this latter, to be revenged, supplanted him.

- In December 1354, Ama impeached Toto of having carried on the war very ill, and converted the revenues of the empire to his own use. His brother Tesyen-temür was at the same time accused of being a debauché. At this juncture Ama was absolute master of the emperor's will; so that, to destroy a man, it was sufficient to accuse him, without proving the charge. They began by depriving Toto of his titles; after which, he and his brother were removed at a distance from court.

- f MEAN while the emperor thought of nothing but entertainments, parties of pleasure, and new ways of gratifying his passions. Sixteen young girls, called the sixteen celestial spirits, were appointed for the dance; other persons were continually employed in prayers and sacrifices to Fo; others to discover what was to come, by forcery; others to sing, and play on music: these were all the affairs of importance which Towban-temür troubled his head about. This prince caused a bark to be made 120 feet long, and twenty broad. It was rowed by twenty-four men, magnificently dressed, and designed either for carrying his majesty along a great lake, from the palace of the north to that of the south; or else for going a pleasuring with him on the same lake; and, while it passed along, one beheld a dragon, whose eyes, head, and claws, were in motion. In the palace was a large press, on which was a niche called that of the three sages. In the middle of the press was the representation of a girl holding a needle, to shew the hours of the day and night, according to the Chinese division of time. When the needle was at the hour, water issued out. On each side was the figure of an angel: one holding a bell, the other a copper basin. When the time of night came, those two spirits beat the watches, conformable to the hour marked by the needle; and, at the same time, several statues, representing lions and eagles, were in motion on the sides. To the east and west of the press was seen a representation of the course of the sun and moon through the zodiac. Before the figure representing the twelve signs stood six antient immortals; who, at noon and midnight, marching two and two, passed a bridge called the holy bridge, and, entering afterwards the niche of the three fages, returned to their first post. They highly extolled the contrivance, as well of the bark, as the other machines, the like of which they had never seen before; and the emperor himself passed for the inventor of them¹.

(Z) The signification of these two words was not known to our author Gaubi.

Han-lin-eul
proclaimed.
A. D. 1355.

At the beginning of the year 1355, a body of rebels, from Ho-nan, crossed the Whang-ho; and, in February, Lyew-fû-tong caused Han-lin-eul, son of the rebel Han-shan-tong, to be proclaimed emperor. This new usurper named ministers and generals: he gave to his dynasty the title of Song, and fixed his court at Po-chew, a city in Ho-nan. The history has marked the years which this power continued.

Toto slain.

Toto, upon his disgrace, was first appointed one of the Mandarins of Whay-ngan Fû in Kyang-nan, and afterwards of Etsina (A). But, this being represented as too slight a punishment for his faults, his goods were confiscated, and he was banished to Yun-nan. Ama, not content with this, counterfeited an order from the emperor, for killing him as soon as he arrived in that province. This order was sent to an officer of the army, who had his family with him; and, instead of killing the banished minister, treated him with honour and distinction. But this benevolence did not continue long: for the officer, having proposed one of his daughters in marriage, on Toto's refusing the offer, thought it done in contempt; and caused him to be slain, in the forty-second year of his age. This unhappy great man was a Merkit by nation, and very knowing in the Chinese literature, as well as affairs of government: but the love of glory, and his brother Yesyen-temûr, made him commit many faults. His conduct, particularly with regard to Tor-chipan, had rendered him odious to the Mungl princes and grandees.

The emperor admonished;

but in vain.

To return to the civil wars. The general Tashepa-tû, arriving, in October, at Huy-chew in Ho-nan, obtained a great victory over Lyew-fû-tong. But although this rebel was defeated a second time by another Tatar, yet he always retrieved his losses; and, after being beaten, still found himself in a condition to undertake new designs. The emperor, having ordered a great council of war to be held in July, to consider of means for security of the provinces attacked by the rebels; a great Mandarin laid hold of the occasion to admonish him of his faults: he said, "that those measures were unavailing, while his majesty continued to live in disorder, and without mending the affairs of government; adding, that he ought to begin by looking into the state of the court, and of the empire, with his own eyes. In the provinces, said he, the officers and Mandarins think of nothing but pleasure, money, and good cheer; and, after the example of the prince, appear insensible at the loss of cities and provinces." The discourse of the Mandarin was commended: but Towhan-temûr never thought of mending his conduct; and left to others the care of reforming the Mandarins.

¹ GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 293, & seq.

(A) A city of Tartary, now in ruins, to the north of Kanchew, in Shen si.

S E C T. II.

The rise of Chû, or Hong-vû, and ruin of the Ywen dynasty.

Rise of Chû.

Fû-Chew.

IT was in June this year that the head of a party named Chû (B), setting out from Ho-chew (C), passed the Kyang, and took Tay-ping: let us hear what the history says on this occasion. The Ywen, coming from the north of Sha-mo (D), made themselves masters of China: the love of pleasure caused them to degenerate; and on all sides they saw revolts. Among the troops, there was no subordination: the years were bad, and the people could not live. It was in the year of the Black Dragon (E) that Tay-tsû raised troops in the city of Hau (F): his intention was, to give peace to the world, and relief to the people. With this view, he associated to himself men of virtue and courage: at the head of whom he reduced Tû-chew, a city of Kyang-nan; and, the next year, took Ho-chew, where he gave evident marks of his love for the people, his greatness of soul, and his knowledge in the art of government. He was quite at a loss how to pass the Great Kyang, for want of barks, when an unexpected succour of 10,000 men, f

(B) This is the famous Chinese who afterwards assumed the name of Hong-vû, and founded the dynasty of the Ming, or Tay-ming; to whom the Chinese give the title of Tay tsû.

(C) A city of Kyang-nan.

(D) The great Sandy Desert called Sha-mo, or Sha-mû, by the Chinese; and by the Mungls, Kobi, or Gobi, which signifies a desert.

(E) Which is the twenty-ninth of the Chinese sexagenary cycle, and fifth of the Mongol cycle of twelve years, answering exactly to that of Christ 1352. Gaubil.

(F) Now Fong yong fû in Kyang-nan; of whose district was Chû, or Hong-vû, and most of the generals who at first associated with him. Gaubil.

and

a and 1000 vessels, came to his assistance. On board of these Chû embarked, with his best officers (F); and, passing eastward, they reduced Nyew-chû-ki and Tay-ping (as before-mentioned).

AMA, who, since the banishment of Toto, was prime minister, in 1356 became struck with the melancholy state to which the empire was reduced; and ashamed to see that he himself had been the principal cause of it, by what he had done to debauch the emperor's mind, and divert him from affairs of government. He was informed of the severe reflections which were made, in all places, on his conduct; and saw that he was abhorred by all the honest men in the empire. Night and day these thoughts troubled his mind, and he thought seriously how to remove the evils which he had brought in. He judged that the best way would be, to oblige Towhan-temür to resign the throne to the prince appointed heir; by whom, and the empress Ki his mother, he was sure to be supported in his design. But, as he stood in need of other helps, he opened his mind to his father; and, after praising the talents of the prince, assured him, that the emperor was become stupid, and incapable of governing.

THIS discourse happened to be overheard by Ama's sister, who was married to Toto Temür, a companion of the emperor in his debauches; and she told her husband of it. This lord was sensible that he was hated by the prince, who did not love debauchery; and, judging that he had reason to fear his displeasure, in case he should become emperor, discovered to Towhan-temür the design of his minister. The emperor, who was more than any thing piqued with what Ama had said of his stupidity, was for putting both him and his brother Swe-swe to death that instant: but, as both had been companions in his debauches, and their mother had nursed the emperor Ilinchipan, he changed his resolution; and was content to forbid them the palace, and have them watched. After this, Sbo-se-kyon, one of the ministers, was ordered to prosecute them; and, on the repeated accusations of the great men, they were sentenced to be banished. They set out accordingly, but were killed on the road. Every body believed that Ama had been destroyed for putting Toto to death; and few people knew the real cause of his misfortune.

IN March Chû defeated the Mungs near Nan-king, capital of Kyang-nan, and took that city, Chû into which he made his entry. Being thus become possessed of it, he did no hurt to any person: he continued the Mandarins in their employments, and did good to all the poor. From this time it was easy to foresee, that, in a little while, he would be master of the greater part of China. With regard to the other chiefs who were in arms, the rebels had been now five years besieging the city of Whay-gan-fû in Kyang-nan, defended by Chû-puwba the governor, assisted by Lyew-kyä, an officer of merit, with a courage and constancy almost without example. But Chû-puwba having accused to the emperor a general, in the neighbourhood, of neglect of service; this latter, to be revenged, resolved to sacrifice the good of the state, by giving him no assistance. For this purpose, at the beginning of the year 1356, he ordered Lyew-kyä to decamp from before Whay-gan-fû, under pretence of sending him to attack a detachment of the rebels; who thereupon invested the city on all sides, dug trenches, and laid the environs under water.

MEAN time the treacherous general remained quiet, without sending the least succours to the place, which he might easily have done. Chû-puwba, upon this, applied to the neighbouring governors of cities for aid, no fewer than nineteen times, yet received no answer. The inhabitants and soldiers, finding themselves thus abandoned, resolved to die with their commander, whom they loved as their father. After they had eaten all the animals, vermin, and leather, to be found in the city, they were reduced to kill those who fell down through weakness, in the streets, and feed on their flesh. At length Whay-gan-fû, which, before the siege, was very populous, surrendered for want of inhabitants to defend it. Chû-puwba was taken, with his son Pan-ko, fighting to secure the western gate, and both were cut to pieces. The eulogiac history of his life says, that, during the siege, he sustained more than one hundred engagements with much valour. Altho' a foreigner, yet the Chinese still boast of the courage and fidelity of Chû-puwba, and compare him to the celebrated Chang-tsun (G).

f IN February the Song rebels having ravaged the district of Si-gan-fû in Sben-si; the general, and prince Alatenasheli, descended from Jagatay, second son of Jenghîz Khân, had thoughts of leaving the city, when a Mandarin proposed sending for Chobantemür, governor of Ho-nan. This general came with 5000 cuirassiers, and cut in pieces the body of rebels: but he was surprised to hear that Kay-fong-fû, capital of that province, had been taken in August by Lyew-fû-tong: and, for all the loss which the Song received near Si-gan-fû, other rebels of the same

^a GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 293, & seq.

(F) The names of them, as mentioned in the text, are, Su-ta, Fong-que-ong, Sbau-jong, Tong-ho, Li-shan-chang, Chang-yu-chan, Teng-you, Keng-kun-yong, Mau-quang, and Lyau-yong-gan.

(G) He was of Nan-yang-fû in Ho-nan, and one of the best officers of the Tang dynasty. The siege of Quy-te-fû, in the same province, which he sustained at several times in the year 757, is one of the finest actions to be met with in the Chinese history. Gaubil.

party appeared near Fong-tsyang fû; but Chobantemür, marching twenty leagues in one day and night, fell upon and defeated them, when they least expected an attack. Mean time Chü made great advances in Kyang-nan, and, among other cities, took Chang-chew-fû and Tang-chew-fû. While the rebels of Tsi-chew-whey's party seized, this year, the capital of Se-chwen, and became very powerful in that province.

Gan-king
taken

THE general Yü-que was exceeding strongly fortified in Gan-king; and had placed good troops in the posts which are on the two banks of the Great Kyang, in the part where that river passes between the mountains Sya kü, in the district of Syew fong-hjen in Kyang-nan. However, Chen-yew-lyang, the general of Tsi-chew-whey, attacked these important posts; and, fighting for four days continually both by land and water, made himself master of them, in spite of the stout resistance of the commander. The passage of the Kyang being thus laid open, the rebel general went and laid siege to Gan-king. Yü-que drove him off at first: but the rebels, who were encamped at Jau-chew-fû in Kyang-fû, came and attacked the west gate, while Yew-lyang assaulted that of the east; and both parties had actually scaled the walls, when Yü-que, at the head of the townsmen, who were willing to hazard their lives, falling boldly on, slew a great number of them, and made the rest give way. For all this, the rebels returned to the charge with more fury than before; so that there was a great slaughter on both sides.

by Yew-lyang.

IN January 1358 the body of rebels which was at Chi-chew-fû in Kyang-nan came and attacked the east gate; that of the south was undertaken by the troops come from Jau-chew-fû; and Yew-lyang assaulted that of the west; while the enemies fleet covered the Great Kyang. Yü-que, invested thus on all sides, after placing the officers in their respective posts; at the head of his bravest soldiers, fell on the enemy, of whom he made a great slaughter: but, while he fought with greatest ardour, the rebels forced the three gates, and took the city. Yü-que, perceiving this misfortune by the fires which were lighted on the occasion, and having already received ten wounds from the multitude of enemies who beset him, ran himself through with his own sword. His wife, sons, and daughters, threw themselves headlong into a well: the officers of the garrison likewise slew themselves, rather than surrender; and a considerable part of the inhabitants chose rather to cast themselves into the fire, than be subject to the rebels. Yü-que was esteemed and beloved by every-body: his tomb is still to be seen at Gan-king. He was born at Lu-chew in Kyang-nan; but was originally of the country of Tan-gü.

Rebels plunder
Shan-tong.

IN March one of the generals of the Song rebels spread an alarm far and near, by the reduction of Tsi-nan-fû, capital of Shan-tong. The Tatar commander of Tong-chang-fû (in the same province) abandoned both the city and country. About the same time Mau quey, one of the best Song officers, came from Ilo-kyen-fû (H): and, joining with him who had taken Tsi nin-chew and Tsi-nan-fû (I), the rebels plundered Shan-tong, and the country about Ta-tü. The first detachment of the Song attacked an important post near that imperial city, whose commander was slain; and, the rest of the Song troops arriving, the court was in great apprehensions. Several of the grandees counselled the emperor to retire, and remove his residence elsewhere. The minister Tay-ping opposed that advice, and called in troops on all sides.

Take the capital.

Lyew Kara-puwba attacked the enemy some few leagues from the city; and, defeating them, constrained Mau-quey, who commanded them, to retire back to Tsi-nan-fû. Tay-puwba, a Tatar general in Pe-che-li, of the illustrious family of Hong-kila, being an enemy to Tay-ping, would not obey his orders; hereupon that minister accused him of neglecting the service, for which he was condemned to die.

Chü's success.

MEAN time Chü became admired in the southern provinces. In December, at the head of 100,000 men, he took U-chew (K); and, assembling his generals, it was determined neither to commit slaughters, nor plunder. While this head of a party (L) took good measures to maintain his footing in the south, Quan-syen-seng, one of the Song generals, penetrated into Lyau-tong, plundered Lyau-yang, and then marched into Korea. On his return from that country, he attacked Shang-tü, which he took, and burnt that beautiful city, with the magnificent palace which the emperor Hü-pi-lay had built there. On this occasion a Mandarin presented a memorial to the emperor, wherein he exhorted his majesty to reform his manners, and follow the burnt.

Shang-tü

^b GAUBIL. Hist. Gentil. p. 296, & seq.

(H) A city in the province of Pe-che-li.

(I) In the French it is only Tsi-nin and Tsi-nan. The author frequently leaving out the last syllable, which distinguishes the rank of the city, the reader is not only deprived of that useful information, but may be often led into a mistake. For instance, meeting with Tsi-chew, he would be apt to take it for a city of the second rank; whereas it is a city of the first rank in Shan-tong, only the final Fû is omitted: but this defect we have generally supplied.

(K) This, we presume, is U-chew fû, in the east borders of Quang-fû; but are less sure, as our author is not punctual in adding the final syllable which distinguishes the rank of cities, as we have just now observed in the preceding note.

(L) It is observable, that Chü is nowhere called a rebel, as the other heads of parties are, nor his followers rebels, because he proved successful; and the Chingis looked on him as their deliverer from the Mongol yoke.

law

- a law of heaven (M). The Mandarin was praised for his zeal, but that was all the effect of his harangue. The love of pleasure had rendered Towhan-temür quite insensible of the evils which afflicted the empire: and there are but few instances to be met with, of a prince, so powerful as he, who saw his dominions lost with so little concern.

MAU-QUEY, one of the principal Song generals, was killed, at the beginning of the year The Song 1359, by a Chinese in Sban-tong. Hereupon several officers, who had served under him, came descried on purpose from Liau-tong to revenge his death, and slay the murderer. These assassinations A. D. 359. begat divisions in the Song party, which from that time dwindled every day.

- b PEYEN-PUWHA TEKIN, an Igar prince, descended from Itügü (or Idiküt) spoken of in the reign of Jenghiz Khan, in the year 1358 commanded at Ku-chew-fü (N), a considerable city of Che-kyang. When this prince, who was brave and experienced, knew that Sin-chew (now Sin-chew Qyang-sin-fü), in Kyang-si, was besieged, he set forward to succour that place. At his approach, Ta-shing-nü, a prince of the blood, and general Hay-lü-ting, a foreigner from the west, came A. D. 1359. to meet, and gave up to him the command. After this he entered the city with his troops, in spite of Chen-yew-lyang, who lay before it; and, having visited all the posts, took an oath to defend it to the last extremity. Ta-shing-nü, Hay-lü-ting, and the other officers, did the same: such an impression had the gallant defence of Gen-king and Whay-gan-fü made on the mind of many commanders. It is needless to relate here in detail the assaults that were sustained, and the sallies which were made: the adverse parties were continually fighting; and Pi-wha Tekin, with the other officers, shewed their valour in its full lustre. At length, provisions failing, the inhabitants fed on human flesh: at the same time one of the rebels got into the city by a subterranean passage. Ten days together both parties fought with great obstinacy; after which, for want of soldiers and provisions, the place was taken in June 1359; when the three commanders before-mentioned, and other officers, chose rather to die than surrender. lyang.

- WHILE these things were doing in Kyang-si, the general Chahan-temür, who had rendered himself illustrious in 1358, by several victories gained over the rebel Song in Sben-si, assembled troops from several places; and in 1359, at a time when least expected, went and besieged Kay-fong-fü, capital of Ho-nan. This great city was then quite unprovided of every thing; and Chahan^c, after the example of Su-pu-tay^d, caused it to be inclosed with a strong palisade. One day he gave a general assault at all the gates, and took the places: but Tsu-chew-whay, with his master Han-lin-cul, made their escape.

MEAN time Peyen Temür, president of the tribunal of war, and Tashe Temür, general in Che-kyang, arrived at Hang-chew-fü, capital of that province; and, having gotten together great quantities of rice, sent it up the Whang-ho into Ho-nan, where it was conveyed by land to the river Wey: by which it arrived safely at Tong-chew, and from thence at Ta-tü. A considerable number of troops were employed to convoy this provision; so that the rebels never dared to attack them. As the scarcity of victuals had, for several years before, occasioned great famines in the imperial city, this relief came very opportunely.

- HOWEVER, the joy which this supply gave the court was damped by the loss of Nan-chang-fü, capital of Kyang-si, taken by Chen-yew-lyang. As soon as the news reached Tsu-chew-whay, the rebel emperor of the Song, he embarked on the Great Kyang for that city, resolving to keep his court there. But his general, who had other designs in view, being determined to prevent him, hastened to Kyew-kyang-fü (in the same province); and, having ordered the gates to be shut, slew those who were about Tsu-chew-whay, whom he afterwards kept as a prisoner, leaving him nothing but the title of emperor.

THE ambition of Ayyewshilitata, the prince appointed heir, caused no less troubles this year at the court of the emperor Towhan-temür, which, besides, was full of intrigues. The prince took a great deal of pains to get his father to renounce the empire; and this was the view also of his mother the empress Ki, who left no stone unturned to gain the minister Tay-ping, without whose concurrence nothing that way could be done. But all her efforts were ineffectual. The minister answered neither one way nor the other. The prince, upon this, thought to get Tay-ping, and other lords, accused: but the great men made the emperor such pompous elegies of this minister, that the prince found he only lost time in attempting to remove him. However, to be revenged of those grandees, he caused several of them to be accused; and had his ends so far, that some of them were imprisoned, and sentenced to die: among them were

^c GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 299, & seq.

^d See before, l. ii. c. i.

(M) By the law of heaven is not to be understood the sacred books of Fo, or any other revelation: for the Chinese Literati, who follow the doctrine of Konfusus, their chief philosopher, pretend to none: but by those words is meant the law of nature, or reason, which is, or may properly be called, the established religion of China; and of which the emperor, as well as all the officers both civil and military in the government, must be, by the constitution of that great and happy monarchy.

(N) Or Kyu-chew-fü, written only Ku-chew in the French.

men of wisdom and authority. This unjust proceeding gained the prince powerful enemies, a and sowed division among the great men, and generals of the army.

The minister retires.

A. D. 1360.

Two miscreants succeed.

ONE of the principal ministers was Nyew-ti-bay, who descended from Porchû, and had governed both the eastern and western Tartary. His air, his prudence, and experience, joined to his high birth, and post of minister, made him appear to great advantage. He was Tay-ping's intimate friend; and it was he who supported that minister against the attacks of the prince, and the empress Ki. Nyew-ti-bay fell sick; and, finding himself near his end, at the beginning of the year 1360, spoke in praise of Tay-ping; and told his friends, that minister could not continue long at court. He died much regretted by the emperor, and the grandees who had at heart the honour of their sovereign. Tay-ping, seeing himself now without a prop, and every day exposed to the intrigues of his enemies, retired to his own house. Thus To- b whan-temûr lost his best servants; and all the authority fell into the hands of two miscreants: one an eunuch named Pû-pû-wha; the other a great lord of Que-lye, called Sbo-se-kyen. These execrable men let all be lost, never acquainting the emperor with any thing, nor minding aught else but to enrich themselves.

Han dynasty.

New distractions.

CHEN-YEW-LYANG, general of the rebel emperor Tsû-chew-whay, having taken from his master all his authority, as before has been mentioned, in May this year caused him to be killed, and assumed himself the title of emperor; giving the name of Han to his new dynasty. Mean time new feuds daily arose among the Mungls. Chaban-temûr, governor of Ho-nan, having recovered from the rebels a considerable part of Shen-si, pretended that those conquests ought to make a part of his government: on the other hand, Polo-temûr, general of the troops at Tay- c tong si in Shan-si, alledged that Shen-si was in his department. These two generals were alone able to have re-established the affairs of the empire; but their disputes made a noise, and caused an irreconcilable hatred between their families. The emperor undertook to settle the limits of their jurisdictions: but Polo-temûr thought himself injured, and took up arms against Chaban: his majesty afterwards gave Polo content, and discontented Chaban, who, in his turn, made war upon Polo: so that both parties had armies in the field to oppose each other. The prince inheritor at length brought about an agreement between them; but it was only a counterfeit one, as will appear by the sequel.

IN August 1361 Chaban-temûr retook Tsi-nan-fû, capital of Shan-tong, with the greater part of that country. At the same time Chû wrested Kyew-kyang-fû, and Nan-chang-fû, in Kyang-si, d out of the hands of Chen yew-lyang.

A Mungl rebel delivered up.

New rebel emperor.

THE emperor Towhan-temûr having often sent officers into Tartary, to desire the princes of his family to send their troops to his assistance; Aliûwen-temûr, eighth grandson of Ogotay, by Myeli, came at length with a formidably army. When this prince was some days march from the great wall, he sent to let Towhan-temûr know, that he came to recover the empire, which he (the emperor) held in wrong to him; and required that he would surrender to him all his right and title. Hereupon Towhan-temûr, instead of receiving aid against his old enemies, found himself obliged to send an army against this new one: but his forces were beaten, and forced to retire to Shang-tû. Aliûwen-temûr, encouraged by this success, proposed to enter Pe-cke-li; and was already in the neighbourhood of Shang-tû, when the prince inheritor mar- c hed to meet him. The officers of Aliûwen-temûr, who certainly imagined they came to succour the emperor, delivered their general to the prince, by whose order he was slain in September.

Chaban-temûr slain.

Affairs of Korea.

MING-YU-CHEN, general of Tsû chew-whay, who had subdued the province of Yun-nan, being informed that Chen-yew-lyang was proclaimed emperor, was resolved also to be independent; and, proceeding to make conquests on his own account, took several places in Se-chwen, and the western parts of Shen-si.

IN June, while Chaban temûr was besieging I-tû in Shan-tong, Tyen-fong proposed to visit the quarters of the imperial camp. Chaban followed his advice; but, when he was entered into the traitor's tent, an officer ran him through with his sword. Koko-temûr, his nephew, but son by adoption, having succeeded him in his titles and dignities, swore to revenge his father's f death. By a passage which he caused to be made under-ground, he entered I-tû; then seizing the principal rebels, particularly Tyen-fong, and him who had murdered his father, he sacrificed them to his manes. The emperor, by the death of that illustrious general, suffered a very great loss, for he was the best officer in the whole empire.

It has been observed before, that the empress Ki, mother of the prince inheritor, was a Korean, and had a great ascendant over the mind of Towhan-temûr. The relations of Ki, proud to see in their family a lady of so much dignity and authority, assassinated Peyen-temûr, king of Korea. The emperor degraded Peyen-temûr, named another king, and declared a lord of a Ki's family, prince inheritor of that monarchy. But the Koreans ordered Towhan-temûr to be told, that they could neither suffer these new impositions, nor the memory of the old king to be defamed. The empress Ki caused their memorial to be rejected; and a general to march into Korea, with forces to execute the emperor's orders. The general, being arrived with 10,000 of Mungls near the river Ya-lû, within the borders of that country, was surrounded by an army of Koreans, who cut them all to pieces; excepting seventeen horse, who ran full-speed to carry home the news of this misfortune.

* GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 301. & seq.

In January 1363 Ming-yu-chen took the name of emperor at Ching-tû-fû, capital of Se-chwen, The Hya dy. and gave his dynasty the title of Hya. Mean time Lyew fû-tong, who had made so great a nafty noise, and was the soul of the Song, was killed in Kyang-nan. The rebels, who followed this b party, again plundered Sbang-tû; that is, what little the flames had left of it. What was still worse, the animosities between Koko-temûr and Polo-temûr every day increased, each party raised troops to oppose the other; and these domestic quarrels did more hurt to Towhan-temûr than the revolt of the Chineses.

THE most formidable enemy Chû had to deal with in the south was Chen-yew-lyang, styled Yew-lyang emperor of the Han: who, being sensibly grieved for the loss of Nan chang-fû in Kyang-fi, exhausted his coffers to raise new forces, and equip a fleet, with a resolution to besiege that city; which was furnished with a good garrison, commanded by Chû-ven-cheng, one of the best generals belonging to Chû. He caused bucklers to be made for defence of his soldiers against arrows and stones: after this, he undertook the siege, which he commanded in person; and, c having given several assaults, at length mounted the walls, from whence he shouted for joy, concluding that he was already master of the city: but he was much surprised to see new retrenchments within, very strongly fortified, and consequently that he had new fatigues to undergo.

MEAN time Chau-te-sheng, one of Chû-ven-cheng's lieutenants, found a conveniency of sending expresses to inform Chû of the danger they were in. On this notice, Chû, without delay, defeated by Chû; cause a fleet to be fitted out at Nan-king; on which he embarked 200,000 soldiers, commanded by his best officers, and put himself at their head. Then setting sail, soon arrived with his forces at Hû-kew (O). As soon as Chen-yew-lyang was informed of his enemy's approach, he raised the siege of Nan-chang-fû, which for eighty-five days he had closely beleaguered; and gave orders to go and attack Chû, whose armament he met in the lake Po-yang, near the mountain Kan-lan (P), on the fourteenth of September (Q). Chû, having divided his naval force into twelve squadrons, Su-ta, Chang-yu-chun, and other of his commanders, attacked and routed the first troops of Chen-yew-lyang; who began to fear the consequences of this first defeat. Next day all the squadrons united, in order to come to a general battle. During the fight, Chû took advantage of a high north-east wind, and burnt one hundred of the enemy's ships; in which several of Yew-lyang's brothers perished.

On the seventeenth (R), Yew-lyang attacked Chû with fresh fury: but, after the fight had continued from seven in the morning to eleven o'clock (S), he was defeated; and his loss was so great, that his insupportable pride was confounded at the sight of his army. One of his generals attempted to seize the post of the mountain Hyay (T); but Chû ordered him to be inclosed, so that he could not retire. The same night his fleet cast anchor at Tso-li, and continued three days facing that of Yew-lyang; who, on the eighteenth of October (U), resolving to break thro' his enemies at any risque, made an attempt: but Chû prevented his design, and attacked him on all sides from five to seven in the evening (X). The battle was fought with equal obstinacy on both sides: at length, Yew-lyang having been killed with an arrow, his fleet dispersed. The son, whom he had appointed his heir, was taken prisoner; and his generals, with their troops, their horses, and barks, surrendered to the victor. However, Chang-ting-pyen, one of his generals, escaped by night, in a small bark, with the corpse of Yew-lyang, and one of his sons, named Chen-li. This famous victory did great honour to Chû; who not only gained a rich booty, but became considerably more powerful by the accession of so many forces.

f YEW-LYANG was one of the greatest captains of his time; and forty-four years old when he died: but his death was of small advantage to the Mungls, whose affairs grew daily worse. New troubles Chinefe grandee, abusing the weakness of their power in the south, set up for himself in Sû-chew-fû, a great and rich city of Kyang-nan; refusing to let the imperial commissioners have the provisions which they wanted to send from thence to the court. On the other hand, Polo-temûr, notwithstanding the emperor's commands, entered with his troops into the district of Koko-temûr:

(O) Hû kew, signifies the mouth of the lake; for here one enters from the Great Kyang into the Po-yang Hû, or lake of Po-yang. It is a town of Kyang-fi, twelve or thirteen leagues to the east of Kyew-kyang fû. Gaubil.

(P) In the lake, five or six leagues south-west, or S. S. W. of Gau-chew-fû. Gaubil.

(Q) Called the day U-tje of the seventh month. Gaubil.

(R) The day called Sin-mau. Gaubil.

(S) From the hour of the Dragon, which takes up from seven to nine; to the hour of the Horse, which includes from eleven to one o'clock. Gaubil.

(T) In the lake, a league and half S. S. W. of Hû-kew. Gaubil.

(U) The day Gan-fû of the eighth month. Gaubil.

(X) From the hour of the Dragon to that of the Hin. Gaubil.

but his army was routed, and two of his best generals taken prisoners. Mean time the prince inheritor, who could never forgive Tay-ping for having dissuaded his father from resigning the empire, set on Sho-se-kyen to accuse him. That minister, who was void of honour, undertook the iniquitous task in November, and Tay-ping was banished into Tibet: but the prince procured him to be slain on the road^f.

A censor banished.

Two eunuchs and Sho-se-kyen, who were at this time absolute masters of the will both of the emperor and prince Ayyewshilitata, got a Mandarin, celebrated for his probity, to be turned out of place. Chen-tsü-jin, a censor of the empire, presented no fewer than three petitions to Towhan-temür, exhorting him to put from court the two eunuchs and Sho-se-kyen; to alter his conduct, and open at length his eyes to the evils which he had brought on the empire by his irregularities; in short, he told him the ruin both of the empire, and his family, would quickly arrive, unless he followed the rules of virtue. Tsü-jin was seconded by other Mandarins: but all their representations were ill received; and Chen-tsü-jin, in particular, was banished to Kanchew in Shen si. As this was in December, he suffered much on the road by the rigour of the season: his exile was the cause of great disaffection; and the Chinese complained loudly of these acts of injustice.

Chü proclaimed king.

A. D. 1364.

In January 1364 the generals of Chü proposed to have him proclaimed emperor; but he declined it, and at first was content with the title of king of U. In this quality he appointed Li-shen-chong and Suta his prime ministers and generals: he afterwards named other officers; and, having assembled the grandees, told them, “That they ought to consider, that he had not accepted the title of king, but on condition to endeavour to make the Chinese happy: and that it was necessary, in the beginning of his reign, to agree upon good laws; in which point the Mungls had been wanting. With regard to the rites and ceremonies, said he, used in religion, I am of opinion, that, in the first place, each of us ought to think seriously of reforming his own heart. He added, as you have been my dear companions, assist me; have nothing else in view; think only of beginning well.”

Takes Vü-
chang fü.

In February that prince set forward, to continue in person the siege of Vü-chang-fü, capital of Hü-quang. The city was taken: and Chen-li, who had succeeded his father Chen-yew-lyang, surrendered, with the officers of his party. Chü gave orders to relieve those in misery, encourage the Literati, and neither plunder nor destroy any-body. This wise conduct procured him an easy conquest both of Kyang-si and Hü-quang. The Chinese submitted to him in crowds: and were proud to see a prince so generous, and moderate in his passions; a friend to men of letters; affable, and studious to govern the nation according to antient laws and customs.

Cruelty of the prince,

MEAN time the court of Towhan-temür was divided into several powerful parties, who thought of nothing but how to supplant and destroy each other. The prince inheritor, instead of seriously endeavouring to gain the love and esteem of the officers, in order to engage them to support the throne, minded only to gratify his private hatred against several lords. He made use of the eunuch Pü-pü-wba, and the minister Sho-se-kyen, to accuse whomsoever he would. They invented crimes; and were not ashamed to imprison, and even put to death, great lords, whose only misdemeanour was, their opposing the criminal intrigues of those two instruments of evil. One of these unjustly-accused lords was Lau-ti-sha, who, to save his life, retired to Polo-temür at Tay-ting-fü in Shan-si. The emperor was informed of the innocence of those persons, and of the murmurs which every-where were heard. Many representations were made thereupon to the prince: but Ayyewshilitata was little acquainted with his true interests; and, instead of desisting from his accusations to mind the public good, engaged himself very indiscreetly in measures, which, he might easily have foreseen, would complete the ruin of the empire (X).

and his injustice.

KOKO-TEMUR was a mortal enemy to Polo-temür; and each of them had his friends and agents at the court. In April the prince caused the general Tükyen-temür to be accused; and, when Polo-temür, his intimate friend, pleaded his innocence, instead of hearing his representations, they deprived himself of the dignity of general at Tay-ting-fü. As Polo-temür knew that this order had been given, without the emperor's knowledge, by the brigues of Pü-pü-wba and Sho-se-kyen, he did not obey it; and, having conferred with the accused lords, took up arms, with a resolution to oblige the emperor to drive those from about him who gave him such bad counsel. Tükyen temür being detached to possess the post of Ku-yong quan, the prince marched from Ta-tü to oppose that general; but was repulsed, and obliged to retire into

Checked by Polo;

^f GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 304, & seqq.

(X) To one who has read the history of the former Mungl emperors, it may seem surprising how this, who was so weak and bad an one, should be suffered to reign so long, or the prince to destroy so many great men by false accusations. But all this may be accounted for from the nature of a court where the head is bad, and the majority of ministers and courtiers are corrupt: for then the head will never want evil instruments, who will assist him in all his designs; and, for reward or ambition, destroy the good men, and even one another, to serve his purposes, and support his tyranny.

a Tartary. Hereupon Túkyen appeared before the imperial city ; which threw every thing there into confusion. This made the emperor inquire into the affair ; and, having thoroughly informed himself, sent for Túkyen, restored Polo-temúr, and delivered up to him both Púpúwba and Sho-se-kyen. After this, the army under Túkyen was sent back to Tay-tong-fú ; and the prince inheritor returned to court by his father's order^e.

THE prince, who now thought of nothing but to be revenged on Polo-temúr, made choice of Koko-temúr to execute his design. He raised an army of 100,000 men, divided into three bódies ; and sent a general, with 40,000 of them, to attack Tay-tong-fú. Polo-temúr, who had friends and troops every-where, left officers to guard that city ; and took measures with Lau-ti-sha and Túkyen-temúr to make himself master of the emperor's palace. He put himself at the head of his troops, and ordered Ku-yon-quang to be taken. In September the prince marched to oppose him, but his army was routed ; and, not thinking himself safe at Ta-tú, whither Polo-temúr followed him with expedition, he left it again with a body of troops, and retired to Ta-ywen-fú, capital of Shan-si. Polo-temúr, being arrived at the city, left his forces without the gates ; and, on the ninth of the same month (Y), entering the palace, followed by several lords, presented himself before the emperor on his knees, and assured him, that, with regard to what had passed, the fault was none of his. Towhan-temúr, who on this occasion let fall tears, and declared him generalissimo and prime minister. Lau-ti-sha and Túkyen had posts under him ; and, in all the tribunals, they had men of their own party.

c POLO-TEMUR began his ministry by causing Tolo-temúr, the principal companion and instrument of the emperor's debauches, to be killed : he drove the Lamas from court, and forbade the exercise of their religion. Had this general stopped there, things might have gone well : but he passed the bounds of prudence ; and, without the advice of his best friends, attempted to get the prince inheritor set aside, and Koko-temúr degraded. Besides this, he gave himself up to all kinds of debauchery, and that was what ruined him. In March 1366 the prince took the field, with a resolution either to perish, or destroy his enemy : his army was numerous, and commanded by Koko-temúr, a general of consummate experience. As soon as Polo-temúr was informed of Ayyewshilitata's march, he caused the empress Ki to come out of the palace ; and compelled her to sign an order for the prince to come to her : but he did not think fit to obey it.

d WHILE Túkyen-temúr was on his march to Shang-tú, to oppose the prince's party, Yesú was detached to make head against Koko-temúr : but when he arrived at Lyang-hyang, he took counsel with the officers, in which it was resolved not to obey Polo-temúr, as being a rebel. Yesú went on to Yong-ping-fú (in Pe-che-li), from whence he sent an express to Koko-temúr ; and then marched into Lyau-tong, to confer with several princes of the blood, who were in those parts. The minister, incensed at this desertion of Yesú, sent an army to attack him : but, he having defeated it, and slain the general, Polo-temúr, more enraged still, marched himself ; yet was obliged to return without doing any thing, by a heavy rain which continued for three days and nights successively. Mean time the empress Ki, knowing the foible of Polo, procured him several young girls of great beauty, by whose means she obtained her liberty, and returned to the palace ; where, under-hand, she effectually wrought the destruction of that minister, by amusing and ensnaring him with the gratification of his passions.

THINGS being in this posture, Ho-shang, one of the principal lords of the court, obtained secret orders from the emperor to kill Polo-temúr ; in which enterprize Shang-tú-ma, Kin-nabay, and Petar, three young lords of resolution, engaged to assist him. They took the opportunity one day in September, when that minister came to acquaint his majesty with the reduction of Shang-tú, in Tartary, by the general Túkyen-temúr. The emperor being at this time in a great hall, with many courtiers about him, Petar separated himself from the rest ; and, placing himself at the door, slew Polo-temúr (Z) as he was about to enter. Lau-ti-sha hereupon fled towards the north : but, a proclamation being issued to kill him, he was taken, and put to death. Túkyen-temúr, who was then at Shang-tú, and did not hear of what had happened at Ta-tú till several days after, would also have made his escape with several cuirassiers ; but was taken and slain. The gates of Ta-tú were shut for three days, on account of these troubles : but, in the mean time, several detachments of the prince's army arriving in the neighbourhood, these troops scaled the walls, opened one of the gates, and plundered great part of the city.

TOWHAN-TEMUR, having thus destroyed his new minister (or rather master), sent his head to the prince his son, with orders to repair to court. He came escorted by Koko-temúr, who was

^e GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 307, & seq.

(Y) The day U-tse of the seventh month. Gaubil.

(Z) He was of the hord of Shan-tsü, and one of the chief Mungl families, descended from Polotay, an illustrious officer in the army of Jenghiz Khán. His father Tashe-temúr, grandfather Isütar, and great grandfather Nyerw-lyen, were famous commanders in chief of the imperial armies. Gaubil.

Koko made
minister.

appointed minister. In the tenth month he was declared Regulo, and generalissimo of the armies. ^a He appeared at court with a train and equipage almost equal to that of the emperor. The prince made instances, that he might be permitted to carry on the war in the southern provinces: but his motion was not complied with. About this time the true empress, who was of the Hongkila family, dying without any children living, Ki, who before was only nominally empress, in the twelfth month succeeded to the rank and honours of the deceased.

Causes new
broils.

At the beginning of this year Koko-temûr, going into Ho-nan, had great disputes with the generals of the province of Sben-si, who would never acknowledge his authority; so that at length they came to hostilities. Thus the empire of the Ywen was attacked in all manners, both within and without: The great men lived independent; the emperor minded nothing but pleasure; and the prince, besides other great faults, had not talents to re-unite the minds of the ^b people, and bring them to labour in concert for the good of the publicⁿ.

Affairs of the rebels.

At the beginning of the same year also the Whang-ho, by its precipitate course northward, made great ravages in Sban-tong and Pe-che-li. Ming-yu-chen, pretended emperor of Hya, died in the third month; and was succeeded by one of his sons, no more than ten years of age. Han-lin-eul, who called himself emperor of the Song, died also in the thirteenth month. With regard to the proceedings of Chû, he took Wbay-gan-fû in the fourth month; and caused a search to be made for old books in the fifth. In the ninth month he sent two generals, with 200,000 men, to make war upon Chang-shi-cheng, who set up for king in one part of Che-kyang and Kyang-nan. They beat his troops four times, and took Hû-chew-fû, one of the most beautiful and rich cities of Che-kyang. At the same time Chû made himself master of Hang-chew-fû, capital of that ^c province, Sbau-bing-fû, Kya-bing-fû, and other important places. In the twelfth month he caused one palace to be built for his court, and another to honour his ancestors in.

The prince in power.

A. D. 1367.

To return to the distracted affairs of the Mungl court. The prince being near Ta-tû, in the year 1367, the empress Ki, his mother, sent a trusty lord to compliment him, and tell him, that she pressed Towhan-temûr to resign the empire. Koko-temûr, who knew this design, sent the escort troops into Ho-nan; and, finding the prince appeared discontented, was obliged to go into that province himself. The emperor, who came to be informed of the differences which subsisted between Koko and the generals of Sban-si, sent an officer to decide them: but that minister slew the officer, and seemed inclined to become independent. Towhan-temûr was, on the other hand, solicited to abdicate the empire: but, although he still refused to part with ^d the title, yet he gave to the prince the whole power, declaring him generalissimo of the armies, and lieutenant-general of the state. This new promotion made Koko-temûr take new measures: he opposed the emperor's orders in favour of Ayyewshilitata; but, at the same time, was accused by one of his discontented officers. Hereupon Towhan-temûr cashiered Koko, disposed of his employments to others, and appointed officers to command the troops of that general. The discarded minister retired to Che-shû (A), a strong place in Sban-si, fully resolved to be revenged on the first occasion. All this could not pass without exciting great troubles; and the Mungl affairs grew worse than ever.

Koko ca-
shiered.

Chû's success,

WHILE Towhan-temûr lost all by his want of conduct, every-thing succeeded with the prudent Chû. This prince, though of an obscure birth, and brought up from his infancy among mean people (B), yet discovered most of the grand qualities which have rendered immortal the memory of the greatest princes. He published the form of the Chinese government which he proposed to introduce; and took for a model that which the Literati boast of so much in Tau, Shun, and the three families (or dynasties) of Hya, Shang, and Chû: he instituted the examinations for men of letters, and military officers; nor did he forget what concerned the tribunal of mathematics. He caused a diligent search to be made for men of merit; rewarding, like a true king, both such person found, and the person finding. All those were acceptable to him who had any talent for military affairs, or navigation, for arts, sciences, or mathematics. He was at no idle expence to serve his pleasures; and had an aversion to every thing which tended to effeminate princes. In the palace, which he built at Nan-king, he forbade laying out too much in costly furniture, and foreign curiosities; especially prohibiting, under severe penalties, immodest pictures and statues. He won the hearts of the mechanics, husbandmen, and other ^f ⁿ GAUBIL, ubi supra, p. 309, & seqq.

(A) In the Jesuit's map it is Tse-cheu.

(B) He had been a servant in a monastery of Bonzas; some say, in so mean a quality as that of scullion, under the cook: in which station he continued for many years, till, in the time of the troubles, he quitted the kitchen for the army. Many such heroes might be found among the commonalty every-where, had they opportunity to exert their genius. Chû, sprung from the dregs of the people, was the shame of emperors sprung from emperors; and the shade thrown by his reign on that of Towhan-temûr, is the stronger for the lowness of his birth. Of the same kind is the famous Laith, Leith, or Leiz, who, from a brasier, became king of Irân, or Persia at large, about the year of Christ 871, and was one of the best monarchs who ever sat on the throne of that kingdom.

a classes of the people, to whom he disdained not to talk himself, and discourse about matters relating to them. He took particular care also to make those amends who had suffered damages, and give them considerable relief. Besides these good qualities, he was endowed with a more than common genius; so that, by the conferences only which he had with the Literati, he soon became master of all that is essential in the Chinese sciences. His valour, military skill, and greatness of soul, joined to his equity, in the distribution of commendations, favours, and employments, made him highly esteemed by the officers, who were strongly attached to him¹.

In the ninth month the generals Suta and Chang-yu-chun reduced Sû-chew-fî, and the whole province of Hyang-nan. They likewise took prisoners Chang-shi-cheng, and all those of his party, with nine princes of the blood; who were all conducted to Nan king, where Chang-shi-cheng died soon after. As for the princes, Chû ordered them to be treated with honour; and sent them, under the care of a Mandarin, to the court of Towhan-temûr. After this expedition, troops were transported by sea into the province of Quang-tong, which, with that of Quang-si, submitted of their own accord: Fokyen did the same.

The south being thus reduced, Chû commanded Suta and Chang-yu-chun to march into the north, at the head of 250,000 men, almost all horse. These two generals, being arrived in Shan-tong, published a manifesto, well calculated to excite the Chinese in favour of Chû, and render Towhan-temûr odious. In this manifesto they set forth, That it belonged to the Chinese to govern the barbarians, and not to the barbarians to govern the Chinese. After this, they fall on the crimes of the Mungl emperors; and the faults of their government since the time of Timûr, who succeeded Hû-pi-lay. They shew, "that those princes have set aside the order of succession: that brothers have poisoned their brothers; and a son taken his father's wives: "that there is no subordination: that they have destroyed the Chinese rules of government; "and paid no regard to the doctrine (or religion) of their nation. After this, they conclude "that the time is come to drive foreigners out of the empire. Here they draw the character "of Chû, whom they declare to be the person chosen by heaven for the master of China; and "instance what the people may promise themselves from the government of so great a prince."

This manifesto, spread thro' the provinces, had a very great effect. Suta and his colleague reduced the whole province of Shan-tong, without any trouble. During this time the distractions continued in those of Shen-si, Shan-si, and Ho-nan; occasioned by the dispute between Koko-temûr and the generals of Shen-si, concerning their respective jurisdictions: nor had the emperor authority enough to put an end to it.

We are now come to the first day of the year 1368, which was one of the most solemn days which the city of Nan-king ever beheld. Besides the rejoicings made on account of its ushering in the year, Chû chose that day to have himself declared emperor of China. He went to the temple of heaven, to make a solemn sacrifice; declared his eldest son prince inheritor, and made several wise regulations. They give him the title of Hong-wû (C); and the year 1368 is reckoned for the first of his reign. After this, his troops entered Ho-nan, and presently reduced that province. In the second month Towhan-temûr, instead of endeavouring to stop the rapid progress of Chû, sent troops against Koko-temûr. This general hereupon retired to Ping-yang-fû, in the south part of Shan-si; and the other generals of the Ywen (or Mungl) withdrew into other cities; more to defend themselves against one another, than against the troops of Chû; whom we must now call Hong-wû, or Tay-tsû, which is the title given by the Chinese to this founder of the Tay-ming dynasty.

In the third month the troops of Hong-wû reduced the fortress and gorge of the mountains of Tong-quan; and, in the seventh intercalary month, Koko-temûr and Ye-sû were set by Towhan-temûr at the head of affairs. Hereupon the generals of Shen-si, the most illustrious of whom was Li tso-tsi, retired towards the west. Mean time the forces of Hong-wû entered Pe-che-li, from Ho-nan on one side, and Shan-tong on the other. In the same month Suta and Chang-yu-chun defeated Poyen-temûr, one of the Mungl generals, who was slain in the battle, fighting valiantly. After this action they took the city of Tong-chew, but twelve miles to the east of Ta-tû; and then prepared to attack the capital of the Mungl empire, now reduced, in China, to very narrow bounds. Hereupon Shelye men, one of the ministers, went to the temple of ancestors; and taking the tablets from thence, retired with the prince towards the north.

The 25th of August Towhan-temûr nominated prince Temûr-puwba regent of the empire of China; and King-tong appointed for defence of the imperial city. Next morning, assembling the great men, princes, and princesses, he declared to them, that he would retire into Tartary. Temûr-puwba, and others, fell on their knees, and, weeping, offered to march out of

¹ GAUBIL, ubi sup. p. 312, & seq.

(C) He gave his dynasty the name of Tay ming. D'Herbelot, p. 991, says, that, in the time of Tamerlane, the kings of Khat-hay were called Daymen Klûn, that is (says Gaubil), king of Tay-ming (or Tay-min.)

Ta-tû, and attack the enemy ; adding, that it was better to die, than dishonour thus, by flight, the imperial family. The emperor was inflexible ; and, the night following, in the midst of his guards, attended by his wives, and those of the prince, as well as by other princes and princesses, took his way towards the north. Chang-yu-chun, informed of Towhan-temür's flight, pursued the imperial family as far as the river Pe (D) ; and took prisoner Maytilipala, eldest son of the prince inheritor (E). The nineteenth of October Hong-wü's army entered Ta-tû, after some small resistance.

Their dynasty
ends.

Thus ended the empire of the Mungls in China, after it had continued 162 years, reckoning from the first of Jenghîz Khân in 1206, to 1368 ; when Towhan-temür withdrew out of China, and Hong-fü finished his conquest, by reducing the imperial city. The Chinese reckon only nine emperors of the Mungls who reigned in China, as hath been before remarked. How many the Mungls compute, does not distinctly appear ; for Gaubil does not expressly mention their number. He only says, in a note at the end of their history, that, if Asükipa or Tyen-shun be placed among them, the dynasty of the Twen will have fifteen emperors. But this cannot be, because, as that dynasty begins with Hü-pi-lay, the four preceding monarchs must be taken away, which will reduce the fifteen to eleven : and if the reign of Asükipa, which is doubtful, be deducted, there will be but ten ; which is still one more than is found on the Chinese list, where Ning-tsong, or Ilin-chipan, brother of Towhan-temür (F), whose reign was but of two months, is likewise wanting.

Towhan-
temür dies.

BUT to return to Towhan-temür, who, tho' deprived of the most valuable part of his dominions, still continued great Khân or emperor of the Mungls, and reigned over Tartary. This prince retired, with his court, to Ing-chang, a city then considerable, twenty-five or thirty leagues to the north-east of Sbang-tû. Where he lived two years ; and then died in the fourth month of the year 1370, in the fifty-first of his age, after he had reigned thirty-five years as emperor of China and Tartary, and thirty-seven as Khân of Tartary^k : so that his reign was longer than those of all his predecessors in China put together, excepting Hü-pi-lay ; which is the more to be wondered at, considering the tyranny and weakness of his government.

Ayyewshilita
succeeds.

AFTER the death of Towhan-temür, his son Ayyewshilitata ascended the throne of the Mungls ; and removed his court to Karakorum ; where, according to the Chinese history, he founded a new dynasty, called the Twen of the north (G). But here, for want of materials, we must break off the history of the successors of Jenghîz Khân in Tartary ; our author Gaubil having carried it down no lower than the death of Towhan-temür. He indeed, in concluding that prince's reign, gave hopes of obliging the world also with those of his successors : but we do not find he ever performed that task (H). Nor are we able to supply the defect from other quarters : for de la Croix has furnished only a bare list of Khâns descended from Tuli, fourth son of Jenghîz Khân, who reigned in Tartary ; which, for the reader's satisfaction, we have here inserted.

List of Khâns,

1. Mangû Khân, son of Tuli.
2. Kublay, brother of Mangû. He was succeeded by
3. Timür Khân, his grandson, surnamed Olajaytû, son of Hakim, or Jetekem ; who reigned twelve years ; and died in 1306.
4. Kushilay (I) Khân, son of Jenesek, son of Termebilay, son of Jeketem, son of Kublay.
5. Togyay, son of Kushilay.
6. Tayzi Khân, son of Nilük, surnamed Bilektû.
7. Anüshîrwan, son of Dara, cousin of Tayzi. This emperor was a prince of excellent morals ; but he gave too much power to the governors of provinces, who acted as sovereigns, and caused many troubles in the empire.
8. Tokatmir, son of Timür Khân.
9. Bisûrdar.
10. Ayke, son of Bisûrdar.
11. Ilenk Khân.
12. Keytmür.

^k GAUBIL, p. 315, & seqq.

(D) Pe-ho, or Pay-ho, which runs by Tong-chew above-mentioned, and has its source a few leagues to the north of Tü-she-keru, an important post of the great wall in Pe-che-li, near the gate of the same name, misprinted, in the French Toucheneo. Gaubil.

(E) Hong-wü treated with much distinction those Mungl princes who either fell into his hands, or surrendered to him. Gaubil.

(F) Ilin-chipan must be included in the fifteen emperors mentioned by Gaubil ; otherwise there would be only thirteen, on leaving Asükipa out of the list.

(G) It might be reckoned a new dynasty by the Chinese, as having no dominion over them : but must be considered only as a continuation of the same dynasty, with regard to the Mungls and Tartary.

(H) This is the more to be regretted ; because, in all likelihood, the missionaries will have no more footing in China ; and, if they should, none hereafter may be qualified for the purpose : for, of all the Jesuits, or other missionaries into that empire, not one of them seems to have had either the judgment, taste, or application, for a work of this nature, as is found in our author Gaubil.

(I) This is doubtless the same name with Hoshila, in the Chinese history ; but we will not say 'tis the name of the same person.

13. Arkitmür;

a 13. Arkitmûr.

14. Elchi Timûr Khân; who went to Tamerlan, and lived in his court, till the death of that prince: after which, he returned to Olugh-yurt (K), where he ascended the throne in 1405.

15. Wanay Khân; who descended in a direct line from prince Artikbûga, fourth son of Tuli Khân.

16. Orday, son of Orday, son of Malek Timûr.

17. and last, Aday, son of Arkitmûr.

THESE two last Khâns lived so obscurely, that they are looked on in the same light with their great ancestor Artikbûga, who never was numbered among the Khâns. From this time, there is no more talk, at Olugh-yurt, of the princes descended from Jenghîz Khân; but only of those descended from Kublai, and who remained kings of China; of whom there is mention made¹.

WE know not well what judgment to pass on this list of Khâns, taken from the oriental authors: for it does not appear, from the Chinese history, that there were any Khâns in the eastern part of Tartary, much less at Karakorum, during the dominion of the Mungls over China; who governed that vast region by their generals, or lieutenants, and seem to have resided at Karakorum. And this is the more probable, as we find Ayyewshilitata, in the year 1370, removed his court to that capital in Tartary; which can scarcely be supposed to be fact, in case there was any Khân of a collateral branch reigning there at the same time, as, according to de la Croix's list, there must have been. Nay, according to that list, they continued to reign there, without interruption, during four successions, after the fifteenth century; for Elchi Timûr Khân is said to have ascended the throne in 1405.

IT therefore seems most likely, that the above-mentioned list of Khâns is spurious, or, at best, drawn up by the oriental historians, from uncertain reports and memoirs, wherein governors of provinces, or the princes of certain powerful tribes, have been mistaken for the Khâns of the Mungls; and the rather, because D'Herbelot informs us, that the only successors of Jenghîz Khân, who are mentioned by the oriental historians, with due exactness, are those of the branch which reigned in Irân, or Persia at large; of whom that author gives a list, and of none else^m.

HOWEVER that be, we cannot but wonder that Mr. Guigues, who undertook to give an abstract of the history of the Turks and Mogols, from the Chinese annals, should, in speaking of the expulsion of these latter out of China, and their re-establishment in Tartary, quit those guides to follow the above erroneous list of princes given by de la Croix. His words are; "The posterity of Kublai, who reigned in China, maintained their footing there, till Hong-wû, founder of a new Chinese dynasty, drove out Tokatmûr Khân. The son of this latter, named Bisûrdar Khân, repassed into Tartary, retiring beyond the great desert: where he fixed a new dynasty, or rather continued the Mogol branch, whilst another branch, descended from Hûlakû Khân, reigned in Persia."

THIS is related by Mr. Guigues, as if taken from the Chinese historians, whom he quotes in the same place. But it appears, from the above history, that the emperor and his son, who were forced out of China by Hong-wû, were different princes: nor does de la Croix say Tokatmûr reigned in China; or that Bisûrdar either passed from thence into Tartary, or was his son. Besides, if that list was to be followed, as nine Mogol emperors reigned in China, Ayke, the tenth Khân, must have been him who was expelled that country: for the princes mentioned therein are reckoned not from Kublai, but from his father Tuli. What renders Mr. Guigues's memoir of less service is, that he does not, by references, or otherwise, sufficiently distinguish the words of different authors, either from one another, or his own conjectures.

IN fine, for want of a continued history of the successors of Jenghîz Khân in the east parts of Tartary, we must content ourselves with such fragments of it as are to be met with, and those relating to affairs only near our own times.

¹ DE LA CROIX. hist. Gengh. p. 400, & seq.

^m D'HERBEL, bibl. orient. p. 382. art. Genghez Khanian.

(K) Olugh-yurt, a city but a little way distant from Karakorum. De la Croix, p. 397.

C H A P. IX.

History of the Mungls, after their expulsion out of China, to the present.

The Mungls
driven

AYEWSHILITATA succeeded his father Towhan-temür in the empire of Tartary, as hath been already mentioned : but we meet with nothing concerning the reign of either him or his successors, for above 200 years after ; excepting that he, and the other princes of his family, had great wars to maintain against Hong-vü, and several of his successors, in China. Sü-ta, Chang-yu-chun, Li-ven-chong, and other generals of that nation, passed the great wall, and harrassed the Tartars with frequent invasions^a. Nor were the latter on their side backward, when any opportunity offered, to repay the injury, and endeavour to recover their footing in China ; the loss of whose rich and fruitful provinces they greatly regretted. As the extracts relating to the Ming dynasty, given by Couplet and Du Halde, speak of the wars which the Chineses had with the Tatars, during the reigns of those princes, it may not be amiss to bring together here, what little those authors say concerning them.

beyond the desert,

AFTER the death of Hong-vü, who drove the Mungls out of China, and prosecuted the war against them in Tartary ; Ching-tsu, or Yong-lo, his fourth son, and third emperor, pursuing vigorously what his father had begun, pushed them beyond the great kobi, or desert, above 200 leagues north of the great wall, with a design to extirpate them : but, on his return from his third expedition (A), he was prevented, by death, which happened in 1425^b. The Mungls, taking heart after Yong-lo's decease, to be revenged for the damages that prince had done them, invaded the empire, in the reign of Swen-tsung, the fifth emperor : but this monarch, at the head of his army, marched against, and defeated them. Swen-tsung died in 1435, and was succeeded by Ing-tsung, only nine years old. The Mungls (B), taking advantage of this emperor's youth, made continual irruptions into the provinces of China which lay nearest their country, and committed all sorts of rapine. At length Ing-tsung, in the year 1449, and fourteenth of his reign, marched beyond the great wall, at the head of a numerous army. But his troops, weakened for want of provisions, were entirely defeated ; and himself, being taken prisoner, carried into the remotest part of Tartary.

take the emperor prisoner,
A. D. 1449.

who is ran-somed.

AT the news of this surprising event, the empress sent a great quantity of gold, silver, and silks, for her husband's ransom ; which the Mungl king received : but, after he had brought the captive emperor to the borders of China, he carried him back again, not thinking the ransom large enough. Nevertheless, a new agreement taking place, some of the great lords were sent to receive Ing-tsung : but the Khán was displeased, thinking all the chief men of the empire ought to have come to meet so great a monarch, with the greatest pomp. He was conducted, by a numerous retinue, to the frontiers of China ; and when near the mountain Tang-kyä-lin, sent to acquaint the court, that he renounced the empire to his brother King-ti, who had usurped the crown from the son of Ing-tsung, who afterwards ascended the throne a second time. In the reign of his son and successor Hyen-tsung, ninth emperor of the Ming, the Mungls, from time to time, came and plundered the provinces ; but, in 1465, the second year of his empire, he cut in pieces their army. From thenceforward we hear nothing of their depredations, till the year 1504, which was remarkable for their irruptions, and the great booty they carried away.

The Mungls
ravage
A. D. 1518.

IN 1509, the Mungls renewed their ravages, the year before the death of Hyau-tsung, the tenth emperor ; whose successor, Vü-tsung, in 1518, would needs march against them incognito, in quality of generalissimo ; from which design he was, with much difficulty, dissuaded by his ministers. Next year, he prepared to retire into either Kyang-nan, or Che-kyang. Hereupon his ministers presented fresh memorials : representing, that, as the Tatars (or Mungls) would look on this journey as a shameful flight, they would grow more insolent ; and that his absence would expose the northern provinces to their irruptions : but he was no less obstinate this time than the former, till, at last, he was diverted from his design by an inundation, which he took for a bad omen. His successor, Shi-tsung, or Kya-tsing, repaired the great wall which separates China from Tartary. From all this, in 1550, the twenty-ninth of his reign, the

the Chinese provinces.

^a GAUEIL, hist. de Gentch. p. 317.

^b DU HALDE's China, Vol. II. p. 255,

(A) These expeditions against the Mungls are not mentioned in the reign of Hong-vü, by either Couplet, or his translator Du Halde.

(B) Called all along Tartars in our authors ; but we use the name Mungls, for sake of uniformity, as well as propriety and distinction.

- a the brother of Tüshetü Khân (H); who being also a Lama, and professing himself a living Po, pretended to be equal to the high-priest himself, and would be treated with the same distinction. The envoys of Kaldan, who were also at the assembly, to support the interest of their master's friend (I), exclaimed against the pretensions of the Kalka Lama, which they looked on as an encroachment on the respect due to their common pontiff; and, on his making no concession, retired in great discontent. In short, to avoid a greater quarrel than that which they came to determine, the envoy of the Dalay Lama was obliged to consent, that the king of Kalka's brother should sit opposite to him. After this, affairs being soon regulated in the assembly, Tüshetü Khân, and the Khûtüktü his brother, solemnly promised, that they would faithfully execute what had been there agreed upon. But, when the estates were separated,
- b instead of keeping their engagement, they delayed performing it, as before-mentioned, under divers pretences.

MEAN time, the Elütü king, offended at the little regard paid to his envoys, and the affront offered the Dalay Lama, in the person of his legate, being pressed also by Shaffaktü Khân to hasten the restitution of his effects; sent an ambassador to Tüshetü Khân, and the Lama his brother, to exhort them to perform their promise; and especially to complain of the latter's disputing precedence with the legate of the Dalay Lama, who had been their common master (K). The Khûtüktü could not bridle his rage, but loaded the ambassador with irons; and having sent a threatening letter to Kaldan, put himself, with the Khân his brother, at the head of a great body of troops, to surprize Shaffaktü Khân. That prince, who expected

c nothing less, falling into the Lama's hands, was drowned by his order: he also put to death one of the most considerable Tayki's, and seized his effects. Not content with this, he invaded the territories of the Elütü Khân (L); and surprizing a brother of his (M), cut off his head. Then fixing it on a spear, exposed it to public view; at the same time sending a domestic of that unfortunate prince with a most abusive letter to Kaldan.

THE Khân, although thoroughly engaged, yet stifled his resentment, till he was in a condition to declare it. Mean time he assembled his people, and next spring, 1688, approached the territories of Tüshetü Khân. The Khûtüktü, who expected no less, had demanded succours of the other Kalka princes; alleging, that he put to death Shaffaktü Khân, for having entered into a league with Kaldan, to make war on all the other Kalkas. Hereupon most of d those princes came, with considerable forces, to the rendezvous on the frontiers. The Khân of the Elütüs being advanced, and finding the enemy's army much superior to his own, thought it best to encamp, in hopes that divisions would soon arise in the army of the Kalkas. As he had conjectured, the chief one of the most numerous standards decamped first, by night, with all his people. Che-ching Khân soon followed his example; and all the rest, one after another, marched off, leaving Tüshetü Khân, and the Khûtüktü his brother, with none but the troops of their own standard.

As soon as Kaldan understood this, he fell upon the enemy, who, making no resistance, were easily routed (N); the two brother chiefs, and their families, having had much ado to escape, with the loss of almost all their baggage, besides the greater part of their army and flocks. All e the Kalkas of Tüshetü Khân's family, wherever found, were put to the sword. He himself was obliged to abandon his camp, and the Khûtüktü his residence, where every thing was plundered or burned; and two fine temples, which the latter had erected at his own expence, were intirely demolished. Kaldan, after this, sent troops, with orders to destroy the country with fire and sword; but especially to kill all the Kalkas, who now fled on every side (O). Tüshetü Khân, and his brother, having retreated to the southern part of the desert, near China, sent to beseech the emperor Kang-hi to take them under his protection, and defend them from an enemy, whose ambition and cruelty they highly exaggerated. His majesty hereupon sent an officer, to know of Kaldan his reason for carrying on the war. The Khân answered, with respect, "That he had undertaken it to revenge the death of his brother; and resolved to

(H) Bentink calls him Zain, or Zuzi (Juji) Khân, prince of the Monguls; by which must be understood the Kalka Monguls, or Mungls, or Juji and Tüshi, whence Tüshetü seems to be used synonymously, as in Juji or Tüshi, the eldest son of Jenghiz Khân.

(I) According to Bentink, the quarrel of Kaldan against Zain Khân was on his own account. But we must prefer the account of Gerbillan, who received his information from the Chinese envoy, and the Mandarins who accompanied him. Indeed the quarrel became, in part, Kaldan's own afterwards.

(K) For Kaldan himself had been bred a Lama at Lafsa, as appears afterwards.

(L) According to Bentink, Zain (or Tüshetü) Khân, invaded the Elütü dominions, by the advice of Kang-hi emperor of China. Excepting in this particular, and the occasion of the war, mentioned in note or two before, Bentink's account agrees pretty well with that of Gerbillan.

(M) Bentink calls him Dorzizap; and says, he was slain among those of the Khân's van-guard, which was defeated.

(N) Bentink says, he got the victory, by feigning a flight, and thereby inducing Zain Khân to divide his forces, in order to pursue him.

(O) According to Bentink, he sent to the place of his residence nine camels loads of ears and locks of hair; whence he judges a horrible slaughter was made: and then, with 30,000 men, drove his enemy within the wall of China.

“ continue it : that he thought no prince would give refuge to so wicked a man as the Kalka a “ Lama ; who being the principal author of so many barbarities, he was determined to pursue “ him, wherever he retreated ; that his punishment equally concerned the emperor ; since he “ had so notoriously violated the oath made before his majesty's ambassador, at the assembly “ of the states, and shewn so little regard to his mediation.”

Pursues the Khûtuktû.

THE Khûtuktû knowing, that if Kang-bi abandoned him, he must infallibly fall into the hands of his enemy, as the Dalay Lama was his utter adversary ; in order to secure himself, offered to become the emperor's perpetual vassal, with his brother, family, and subjects : likewise to engage all the other Kalka princes ; several of whom, during this negotiation, followed his example. Cheching Khân dying the same year, his widow also besought his majesty to receive her son for his vassal, and invest him with the title of Khân, which was not to descend to his family. Kang-bi, on this, exhorted the Elûth Khân to be content with the deplorable condition to which he had reduced his enemies, and desist : but Kaldan remonstrated, that the emperor was equally concerned to punish the violation of a treaty guaranteed by himself and the Dalay Lama. However, he offered to withdraw, provided the Kalka Lama was delivered up, to be judged by the sovereign pontiff. But the Chinese monarch thinking it unworthy his dignity to abandon princes applying to him for refuge ; and, besides, having nothing to fear from the Russians, since the late treaty of Ni-pochew (or Nerchinskoy), took the Kalka princes under his protection, and granted them part of his lands in Tartary to settle on : which gave occasion to the war between him and the Khân of the Elûths ^b.

Invades the empire.

THIS prince, towards the end of July 1690, advanced at the head of a small but well disciplined army, to the frontiers of the empire. He slew or enslaved all the Kalkas encamped along the Kerlon, whose course he had followed for the conveniency of forage ; and pursued the murderers of his brother to the very retreat which the emperor had assigned them. On the first rumour of Kaldan's march, his majesty drew together all the Mungl forces which had been his subjects from the beginning of the Manchew monarchy ; and, being encamped without the great wall, are in some sort the out-guards of the empire. These, reinforced by some Manchew troops (who served as convoys to the president of the militia), and the Mungl officers, were ordered to the frontiers, to observe the motions of the Elûths. The two presidents, with a design to surprise the Khân in his camp, amused him with a treaty of peace ; and, when he was least on his guard, attacked him in the night : but they were vigorously repulsed, and pursued within their own territories, where they secured themselves by taking post on the mountains. ^c

Fights the Chineses ;

ON this advice, Kang-bi sent a great army from Pe-king, which he designed at first to command in person : but, on being dissuaded by his council, appointed his next brother generalissimo, and ordered his eldest son to accompany him. Kaldan was posted to advantage about fourscore leagues from Pe-king ; where, although he wanted artillery, and had but very few troops, he resolutely waited for the enemy. At first his van-guard suffered much from the Chinese cannon, which obliged him to get out of their reach, by changing his post : but as he had a great marsh before him, which prevented his being surrounded, he defended himself with great bravery till night, when both parties retired to their camps (P). The general of the ordnance, who was the emperor's maternal uncle, was killed, towards the end of the action, by a musket-shot, as he was drawing off the artillery. ^c comes to a treaty.

NEXT day produced a treaty, of which the result was, that Kaldan should have leave to retire with his army ; first taking an oath, before his Fo, never to return into the territories of the emperor, or his allies. In his retreat, part of his troops perished for want ; and his nephew Tse-vang Raptan, whom he had left regent, withdrew into a remote country, with all who were disposed to follow him. This was such a terrible blow to Kaldan, that he was three or four years recruiting his army (Q). However, the imperial generals, at their return to Pe-king, were impeached, although they had the better of the engagement : for it is a law among the Manchews, that, if a general gives battle, and obtains not a complete victory, he ought to be punished. The emperor's brother, with some other general officers, were sentenced to lose three years of their revenue, and the rest to be degraded five degrees. They would have suffered much more, but for the interposition of his majesty ; who, on the other hand, bestowed extraordinary honours on the memory of his uncle, killed in the action, whose eldest son succeeded to his posts ; and rewarded all who distinguished themselves, as well as the kindred ^f

^b GERBILLON, ap. Du Halde, p. 260.

(P) According to Bentink, the Khân defeated several bodies sent by Amulan Bogday Khân (so the Russians call the Manchew emperors of China), one after the other ; and that his troops were so brave, or those of the emperor so bad, that, at one time, 1000 Kalmûks (or Elûths) beat 20,000 Chineses ; and another time 10,000 overthrew 20,000.

(Q) It could not then have been so small as 'tis represented ; but it had perhaps suffered before in the expedition.

a Mungls drew near Pe-king, with an army of 60,000 men; but it was entirely cut to pieces, A. D. 1550. and above 200 officers taken prisoners. Next year, the Tatar king sent an ambassador, to ask the emperor's pardon, and leave for his subjects to sell horses in his dominions. Sbi-tsong readily consented: but finding afterwards, that this permission was the ground of continual quarrels between the Mandarins and the merchants, and often occasioned revolts, he absolutely prohibited that trade.

ABOUT the year 1560, Lyew-ban, general of the Chinese army, marching beyond the great wall, the Mungls, on news of his arrival in their territories, fled, and hid themselves in their forests: so that there were no more than twenty-eight of them killed in this expedition, and the whole booty taken was only 170 dromedaries. In 1574, the second year of Shin-tsong, or Van-lye, eleventh emperor of the Ming, the Mungls made an irruption into Lyau-tong, but were intirely routed; and, in 1582, they received a notable defeat, by the general Li-chin, losing A. D. 1582. 10,000 men. Next year, the rivers were frozen; which facilitating their irruptions into the empire, they came in swarms; but were cut to pieces by the Chinese troops. After this, we are told, that the Mungls (called western Tatars, and Tan-yu (*) by the Chinese) gave over to disturb the empire, and lived quietly within their own territories; while the Manchews (named in the Chinese histories eastern Tatars, and Nyu-che, (or Nu-che) began to grow formidable, and, at length, subdued both the Mungls and Chinese ^{Cease their attempt.}.

HAD the successors of Yong-lo vigorously prosecuted what he had begun, they might have intirely reduced the Mungls to a state of subjection: but, as they neglected that affair, or pursued it but remissly, those enemies of China began, by degrees, to take heart, and spread. Hereupon the princes of the house of Jenghiz Khân, each seizing a territory, formed different hords, and grew into little sovereignties. The title of emperor of the Mungls remained to the chief of these princes, called Chabar Khân, or Hân; who was descended from the emperor Kublai, or Hâ-pi-lay, by the elder branch. And to this Khân the other Mungl states (including doubtless the Kalkas), and the Elûths themselves, were tributary; till, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, having made his government insupportable, by his cruelties and debaucheries, his subjects called in the founder of the Manchew monarchy. Thus the Mungl prince became a vassal to the Manchew empire; and was obliged to quit the title of Hân (or Khân), for that of Vang, or Wang, given him by the great grandfather of the late emperor of Kang-hi, who subdued intirely the Mungls about the great wall. ^{Submit to the Manchews.}

THIS prince, called by the Chinese Tyen-tsong, who began his reign in 1627, on the death of his father Tyen-ming ^{Revolt, but subdued.}; taking advantage (as some write) of the intestine divisions which, at that time, reigned among the Mungl princes, found means to reduce them, one after another, not excepting the chief of the family, who retained the name of emperor; and was forced, by his own subjects, to submit like the rest, in the year 1630. After the conquest of China, the title of king (Vang) was bestowed on him, and several other of the most potent princes of the Mungl family. But, in the minority of the emperor Kang-hi, the vassal Khân resolved to attempt not only to throw off his new yoke, but even, if possible, to recover the empire of China. With this view, he began to reunite the other princes in his interest, by a league; which coming to Kang-hi's knowledge, before the design took effect, he immediately sent a small body of troops from Lyau-tong, against the revolter (Chabar Khân). The Mungl prince seeing himself attacked, before he was prepared for his defence, was obliged, with what forces of his own he could bring together in haste, to fight the emperor's army: the event was, that he was intirely defeated, and, in the pursuit, taken prisoner, with his brother and children ^e.

FROM this time the Mungls remained obedient to the power of the Manchews, who at present reign in China: although, we are told, that the head of the Mungl princes, who are descended from Towban-temûr (the last Mungl emperor of China), and very numerous in Tartary, still preserves a great superiority over the princes of the other branches descended from Jenghiz Khân, and his brothers; who are at present chiefs of the Tatar tribes, known under the denominations of Mungls and Kalkas ^f. On this occasion, it may not be amiss to observe, that, as both these nations are the same people (at least considered as such), under different names, the Mungls are those who always remained in Tartary, and the Kalkas such as were driven out of China: who, by way of distinction, perhaps, took that name from the river Kalka, one of those on whose banks they settled; as a third branch or nation of Mungls go, at present, by the name of Elûths, or Alûths, known commonly in Europe by the denomination of Kalmûks. ^{Remain subject.}

THE nation of Halkas, Kbalkhas, or Halbas, for so the word is variously pronounced, or Kalkas written, which is the most numerous, as well as celebrated, of all the Mungl branches, preserved their independency for fifty or sixty years after the Mungls had lost theirs. The princes ^{independent}

(*) Or Tanja, form the title of their ancient emperors. See before, p. 133, & seqq.

^c COUPLET, mon. sinic. tabl. p. 81.—DU HALDE, ubi supra, p. 220. & seqq.

^d DU HALDE, ubi

^e BOUVET, hist. of Kanghi, p. 18, & seqq.

^f GABRIL, ubi supra, 317.

of this branch had at first a monarch, under the title of Khân, or king, although tributary, as the other Kalkas were, to the Mungl prince Chaba Khân, before mentioned. But the Kalkas increasing vastly in time, and those descendants of Kublay, who had only the title of Tayki, growing numerous, the more powerful among them became, by degrees, independant of one another, and of the Khân himself, to whom they paid only a slight homage. Before the war broke out between them and the Elûths, towards the end of the last century, they were divided into seven standards, with each its chief; three of whom received, of the great Lama of Tibet, the title of Khân: although most of the Taykis, who were under them, acted as sovereigns in their respective territories; and paid their Khâns no farther deference, than to allow them the first place in their assemblies, held to determine differences, and consult about public affairs.

under three Khâns.

THE eldest of these three Khâns was named Shaffaktû, and possessed the country to the east of the Elûths, extending from mount Altay to the rivers Selinga, Orkhon, and Tila. The second Tûshetû, or Tûshetû Khân, was the most powerful of the Kalka princes: his territories reached from the three last-mentioned rivers to mount Kentey, whence the Kerlon and Tila derive their sources. The third, Cheching Khân, resided towards the source of the Kerlon, along which river his people spread themselves, to its fall into the lake Dalay, or Kûlon, and also beyond, as far as the province of Solon. These two last princes took the title of Khân forty or fifty years ago (C); but the first long before. These Kalkas were so powerful before the wars, as to give uneasiness to the emperor of China himself. They were no fewer than 600,000 families, and very rich in flocks and horses: but they were almost ruined and destroyed by that calamity; the occasion of which is as follows.

Troubles arise.

A TAYKI, or Kalka prince, called Lopzang-hum Tayki, whom our author Gerbillon saw at the assembly of the states of Tartary, attacked Shaffaktû Khân; and having taken him prisoner, not only put him to death, but seized his estate, with part of his servants. The rest, with his children, fled to Tûshetû Khân, who sending an account of what had happened to all the heads of standards and principal Taykis, invited them to join against the usurper. They immediately assembled their forces, attacked Lopzang-hum, took and sent him to the great Lama, to be punished; requesting that pontiff to invest the eldest son of Shaffaktû Khân with his father's dignity. Their request was granted, and the son re-established in his father's territories; but neither his flocks nor subjects were restored; for Tûshetû had seized them for his own use, by advice of his brother, who was one of those Ho-fo's, or living Fo's, so numerous in Tartary.

Khûrûktû's pride.

THIS Lama, called Tsing-chung-tumba (D) Khûrûktû, had been eight years a disciple of the great Lama at Tibet; where he had acquired such a reputation in the school, that he resolved to set up for himself, pretending to be a living Fo as well as his master. He played his part so well, that those Kalkas adored him as a divinity; and his brother went regularly, on set days, to worship him, gave him the upper-hand on all occasions, and was intirely managed by him. This pretended immortal, by his pride and ill-conduct, occasioned the destruction of his family, and the empire of the Kalkas. Shaffaktû Khân (E) being thus kept out of his effects, contrary to a decree of the assembly; sent ambassadors to the grand Lama, intreating him to interpose his authority with Tûshetû Khân, and his brother the Lama, for a restitution. The Dalay Lama accordingly dispatched a Lama envoy, who, being corrupted with presents, contented himself with fair promises. Shaffaktû Khân, despairing of justice from that quarter, sent his second son, to beseech the emperor of China to espouse his interest. At this time the Kalka princes paid a dromedary and nine white horses, by way of tribute, to Kang-hi, for a free trade to China; although they were not very regular in the payment. Hereupon his majesty dispatched an ambassador to the great Lama, to engage him to send, by a time appointed, a person of consideration into the country of the Kalkas; in order to meet a grandee of his court, to dispose those princes to an accommodation, and to prevent a war².

China inter-poses.

Commissioners meet.

MEAN time, Shaffaktû Khân dying, his eldest son, who was in alliance with Kaldan, Khân of the Elûths, his neighbour on the west, succeeded him as Khân. The envoy of China, and that of the Dalay Lama, being arrived at the court of Tûshetû Khân, they convened a second time the states of the Kalka princes. The imperial envoy, named Argbi (F), sat as president of the tribunal; which is much of the same dignity with the six tribunals at Pe-king. As the envoy of the great Lama (G) represented his master, every one yielded him the first place, excepting

² GERBILLON, ap. Du Halde, ubi supra, Vol. II. p. 259.

(C) That is, about 1650 or 1660.

(D) His name is written differently in Gerbillon's tracts, almost as often as it occurs; viz. Chepzuin-tamba, Chemsin-tamba, and Chunpuzun-tamba.

(E) By this the son seems to have had the same name as the father; or Shaffaktû was a title which descended in the family, as well as that of Khân.

(F) Bentink, in his notes on Alâ'ul-lâzi Khân's history of the Turks, &c. names him Arerna Khan-yba, p. 549.

(G) He was doubtless a Lama; but Bentink says, he was the Dava (or Tipa) of Tibet, who is the great Lama's viceroy, who governs in his name in secular affairs.

a of the slain and wounded. Next year Kang-hi held an assembly of the states of Tartary, wherein all the Kalka princes, with one consent, paid him solemn homage.

THE Khân of the Elúths continued in the territories formerly belonging to Shaffaktú Khân, Yung-hi, and Tushetú Khân, till 1694; when, being recruited with fresh troops, he scoured the banks of the Kerion, and cut to pieces all the Kalkas who fell into his hands. Thence advancing to the borders of Korchin, he sent proposals to the chief prince, to join with him against the Manchews. “What greater indignity (says he), than from masters to become slaves? We are Mungls, and under one law: let us unite our forces, and regain the empire, which is ours by inheritance. I will share the glory and fruits of my conquests with those who will share the danger. But if there should be any Mungl princes, as I hope there are none, so b “base as to chule slavery to the Manchews, our common enemy, let them expect to feel “the first efforts of my arms.” The king of Korchin, as a proof of the fidelity which he had sworn to the emperor, sent him the letter, which made his majesty a little uneasy: for, although he knew the Elúths were too weak to venture to attack him, yet he did not like a confederacy of the Mungl princes, supported by the Dalay Lama; he therefore resolved either to extirpate the Elúths, or compel them to a firm and lasting peace.

WITH this view, in 1696 he invaded Tartary with three armies, in order to inclose them on all sides (R). One of these armies obtained a complete victory; while that under the emperor struck every place with terror. In short, this year, or the next, all these Tatars were either destroyed, subdued, or dispersed. The destruction of the Elúths was so great in this c last war, that, in all these vast countries, there remained no more than ten or twelve thousand families of them (S); and the death of Kaldan in 1697, while the emperor was marching to seek him out in his retreat, completed their ruin: the remains of these unfortunate Elúths being obliged to implore his majesty’s clemency, or take shelter with Tse-vang Raptan, the only surviving prince of that people. The war thus ended, we are told that Kang-hi became absolute master of all the empire of the Kalkas and Elúths; and extended his dominions in Tartary as far as the great deserts and forests which make the frontiers of *Russia*¹. But this is to be understood of the Elúth dominions gained chiefly from the Kalkas on the east of mount Altay: for it does not appear, that the Chinese made any conquests in the country to the west of that grand barrier which remained in possession of Tse-vang Raptan.

d HAVING brought down the history of the two first Mungl branches, the Mungls properly so called, and the Kalkas, to the present time, it remains to handle that of the Elúths: but here our memoirs are still more scanty and imperfect. It does not appear, from any authors yet come to our hands, either when, or on what occasion, the Mungl tribes, who go under the denomination of Elúths, threw off their dependency on the Mungl Khâns reigning at Karakorum (or in the eastern parts of Tartary), and assumed that name; or by what steps they arrived at so great a power, as to become superior to the other two branches of Mungls. There is one circumstance, however, namely, that the Khâns of the Elúths are not descended from Jenghiz Khân, but Timúr Beg, or Tamerlan, which might afford some light into the question, provided we were sure they were all of the same family from the first of them: for e then it would follow, that their empire did not begin till after the year 1400, perhaps about the time of Tonglo: who, having reduced the successors of Hû-pi-lay, or Kublay Khân, and the Mungls in the east, to a very low ebb, gave those more at a distance, in the west, an opportunity of throwing off their dependence, and setting up a Khân or Khâns of their own.

f HOWEVER that be, we find nothing considerable of the Elúths till about eighty years ago (T); at which time, we are told, all the Elúth branches were united under one chief, or king, called Ocbirtu chechin Khân. Prince Ablay, his brother, having rebelled, was defeated, and forced to retire a vast way towards Siberia. The Khân had under him several petty princes of his family called Tayki (U), who were absolute in their respective territories, and paid him what homage and tribute they pleased. One of them, Patûrú Hûm, was very rich, and had been much honoured for his exploits in the wars of Tibet. He left several children, of whom Onchon, the eldest, succeeded him. This prince, during the wars with the Haffak Púrúks (X), falling sick of the small-pox in his camp, was, according to the custom of the Mungls in that

¹ GERBILLON, ap. Du Halde, p. 257. 261.

(R) Bentink says, his army consisted of 300,000 men, accompanied with 300 pieces of cannon.

(S) Our author Gerbillion says, that Raptan found no more Elúths remaining when he came to succeed his uncle.

(T) This must be understood from the time Du Halde wrote, not Gerbillion; otherwise it will carry this fact back to about the year 1610, which is too high up for the father of Kaldan: we therefore suppose Chechin Khân, to have been in this power about the year 1650 or 1655.

(U) Or Tayghi. The Russians call them Taysha, and Tayshi.

(X) So the Elúths call the Uzbek Tartars, who, in return, nickname them Kálmúks; and from them this name came to us, by way of the Russians.

distemper, left alone in his tent ; which the Mohammedan Tatars, posted opposite to the Elúts, a took possession of, and, with proper care, recovered the sick prince.

Slain by Sengha.

ONCHON, not thinking it proper to discover his quality, served three years as a common slave ; during which, the second brother Sengha, not doubting of his death, married his wife. At length the prince discovered himself to the Hassaks ; and promising, upon oath, in case they released him, never to renew the war, they set him at liberty, and gave him a guard of one hundred men to escorte him into his own territories. Being arrived on the borders of them, he dispatched a courier to acquaint his brother with his adventure and return. Sengha, greatly surprised, consulted his wife, to know whom she would chuse in such a conjuncture. The lady answered, that she had married him on a presumption that her first husband was dead ; but, since he was living, she was indispensably obliged to return to him. Sengha, whose love was b equal to his ambition, under pretence of honour, sent trusty persons to massacre the prince, and all his retinue. The crime being committed, he gave out, that he had defeated a party of Hassak Púrúks, without mentioning any thing of his brother. But, the murder soon coming to light, one of the brothers, by the same mother as Onchon, assembled forces to revenge his death ; and, having killed Sengha, restored the son of Onchon to his father's possessions.

Kaldan's revenge.

KALDAN, third son of Patúrú Hím Tayki, by Sengha's mother, had been educated by the grand Lama of Tibet, as one of his principal disciples ; after which he settled at the court of Ochirtú-checking Khân (*), who treated him with great marks of distinction. This prince, having had notice of the foregoing transactions, asked leave of the high pontiff to quit the profession, in order to go and revenge the death of his brother. Leave being granted, he immediately c formed an army of Sengha's old domestics, and some troops lent him by Ochirtú ; with which he took vengeance on the murderers, and seized on all the effects of his brother, as well as the estates of Sengha. He then married the prince's chief wife, the daughter of Ochirtú Khân ; and, his forces increasing daily, he found himself in a condition at last to dispute the kingdom with his father-in-law, to whom he owed his present fortune.

Created Kán.

A QUARREL between their subjects was a pretence for declaring war ; after which he marched with his army into the country of Ochirtú, who received him at the head of his troops. The fight was near the great lake Kizalpú, where Kaldan got the victory ; and, having taken his father-in-law prisoner, caused his throat to be cut, the better to secure the conquest of his dominions : thus he became the head of all the Elúts. The great Lama, to reward his perfidious- d ness and cruelty, gave him the title of Khân (Y), that is, king, or emperor. From that time Kaldan (Z) enjoyed his conquests, and had no wars but with the Hassak Púrúks (or Uzbeks), till 1688, when he invaded and subdued the Kalkas : but, carrying his resentment too far (A), he was ruined in his turn by the emperor of China ^k, as hath been already set forth.

Totally defeated.

BENTINK relates the circumstances of the Khân's death, which might be more easily known to the Russians than the Chineses. According to this author, the loss of the last battle did not so much afflict the Elúts prince, as the death of his wife Guni, or Ani, who was slain in the route. Her body having been found among the dead, the emperor caused the head to be cut off, and carried it along with him to adorn his triumph. Provisions and forage beginning to fail in the neighbouring mountains, where he had with difficulty escaped, most of his followers and horses e died for hunger ; so that he returned almost alone into his own dominions, where he spent two years in great affliction, exposed to the reproaches of his subjects. Perceiving he had nothing for it but to negotiate the affair, he sent his son Septenbaldius to the Dalay Lama, to desire his mediation, which he before slighted. But Abd'ollah Beg, governor of the city of Khamul (B), altho' dependent on the Khân, caused him and his small retinue to be seized in passing through his government, and sent them to the emperor ; who cut off their heads, and confirmed the traitor in his post.

Persons himself.

THE news of this disaster threw the Khân into despair. He assembled all his subjects, exhorted them to live in peace and unity ; and then giving them liberty to retire every one where he pleased, took poison, and died. This was the end of Bosfo Khân, a prince of great genius f

* GERBILLON, ap. Du Halde, p. 257.

(*) The Ochiurti Khân of Avril's imperfect account. See his Travels, p. 150, & seq.

(Y) Gerbillon says it should be written Hán, instead of Khân ; Hami for Kami ; Halkas for Kalkas ; and the like. But, as the H is a strong aspirate or guttural, it seems best expressed by Kh, as it ought to be written, and not with a single K or C, as is commonly the practice.

(Z) Bentink calls him Bosfo or Bosugto Khân ; rather, perhaps, Bussuktú Khân. Bussuk signifies broken, the name given by Ogúz Khân to his three eldest sons, according to Abúlghazi Khân, Hist. Turks, &c. p. 21. Bussuktú seems to have been his title, or surname, and Kaldan his proper name. The same author says, he usually encamped on the lake Yamisb, and in the neighbouring deserts,

(A) We think Kang-hi was to blame for protecting, and not giving up, the murderers of his ally and brother, whom Kaldan had a right to demand.

(B) Khamil, or Hami (as the Chineses pronounce it), at the very eastern extremity of Little Bukhâria, and edge of the great desert between it and China.

a and valour; who, by a series of successes, had made himself terrible to all his enemies, and acquired a great deal of glory.

KALDAN was succeeded by his nephew, eldest son of Sengha, called Tse-vang Raptan (C). Succeeded by Raptan his nephew. This Raptan is said before to have left his uncle's court, while absent in the war; and, by carrying away the greater part of his forces, much distressed him in his affairs¹. The occasion of his desertion was this. A princess, daughter of Ochirtu Khân, had been promised him in marriage: but Kaldan, falling in love with her, took her from him; and, not content with this injustice to his nephew, hired assassins to murder him; who, missing their blow, only struck out one of his eyes. But Bentink says, his eye was shot out accidentally, by one of his domestics, when hunting; and that his flight happened a little before the war in 1688; on the following occasion. The Khân, who bred up at his court three of his brother's sons, took an aversion to the eldest; and, finding no cause to put him to death, he had recourse to a man of great strength, who, under pretence of wrestling with the young prince, handled him so roughly, that a few days after he died. Zigan Araptan, the youngest of the three, alarmed at such a proceeding, which the Khân would have put off as an accident, fled with his friends and domestics: nor could his other brother Dankhinambû, whom the Khân sent after him, prevail with him to return. Although his eldest brother might have been of a haughty turbulent spirit, as the other represented; yet he was resolved, he said, not to trust an uncle who was capable of committing so unnatural a crime.

As soon as Araptan (or Raptan), who kept hidden all this while, heard of his uncle's death, His flight. he presented himself to the Kalmûks, and demanded the succession; which they could not deny him, as being next heir. The Bukhars (or those of Little Bukharia), whom Bussukit Khân (or Kaldan) had conquered some time before, followed their example; and the other provinces, which refused to come in of themselves, were obliged to it by arms. When things were thus settled, the Bukhars conducted him one day to an agreeable grove, consisting of not more than a hundred trees, very bushy, and of a particular kind: where, after being feasted by him for some days, they solemnly invested him with the title of Kontaisb, which signifies a grand monarch; forbidding, under pain of death, to call him by his former name. This prince well deserved that distinction, as having been endowed with great talents: he was remarkable for his genius and mildness (D), courage and piety^m.

d THE new Khân at first lived quietly in his territories, with all but the Uzbeks, and encouraged agriculture; his flocks not affording competent subsistence to his people: but his actions afterwards shewed, that he was no less enterprising than his uncle Kaldan. Not long after his advancement to the throne, Tarkian (Irgben, or Jurkent), capital of Kashgar, revolting, he reduced it by force, and severely punished the rebels. About the year 1703 Ayuka (or Ayuki), one of his cousins, flying from his court, under pretence that he was in fear of his life, passed the river Jaik, with the tribe of Torgaûts, and put himself under the protection of *Russia*ⁿ. About 1716 Kontaisb conquered Tibet^o: but, four years after, the provinces of Khamil and Tursân, in Little Bukharia, were taken from him by the Chinese, on the following occasion. Kontaisb having been informed, that there was, to the east of the Great Gobi (Kobi), or Desart, at the foot of the mountains which separate his lands from those of China, a gold mine, so rich, that it might be worked without much trouble, he sent one of his Murfas (E), with 10,000 men, to take possession of it; but the Chinese and Mungls, falling on them in great numbers, routed, and pursued them to the desert. This the Kalmûks repassed, by favour of certain very fertile vallies, hidden by the high mountains which cross the Gobi on that side from west to east, and were till then unknown to the Chinese.

f THE late emperor Kanghi, to try if any advantage could be made of this discovery, sent a powerful army that way, with a good train of artillery, under his third son (F); accompanied, as was said, by a Jesuit, very understanding in fortifications and fire-works, to assist him with his advice in this expedition. That prince, having passed the deserts by the same

¹ BENTINK apud Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, &c. p. 252, & seq. ap. Du Halde, p. 257.

ⁿ BENTINK, ubi supra, p. 539.

^m Idem ibid. p. 253. GERBILLON, GERBIL. ibid. p. 384.

(C) This is the name he went by in China, and perhaps among the Mungls, who are subject to China. Bentink calls him Zigan Araptan, which is the name used by the Russians. Which of them is the true name, if either be, we cannot tell; all nations having that ill custom of corrupting or imposing names. However, that of Araptan, Raptan, or Rabdan, as it is also spelt, doubtless belongs to it. Perhaps Zigan is a corruption of Tse-vang.

(D) Bentink, as an instance of his moderation, tells us, that he not only pardoned the domestic who had shot his eye out, but also gave him his liberty, to make him amends for the danger he had run of losing his life on that occasion, by the enraged Kalmûks.

(E) A corruption of the Persian word Mirza, which signifies Prince.

(F) He succeeded his father in 1726, under the name or title of Yong-ching.

road which the Kalmûks followed in their retreat, entered the provinces of Khamil and Turfân; and, finding that Kontaisb advanced to meet him with a fine and numerous cavalry, against whom he durst not venture his army in the vast plains of those provinces, he bethought himself of building forts at proper distances, which he took care to furnish very well with cannon and infantry. By favour of those forts he advanced continually forwards in the lands of Kontaisb, and made himself at length intire master of the aforefaid provinces; the Kalmûks not being able all that while to bring him to a battle.

Offers to Russia.

Recovers Turfan and Khamil.

HEREUPON Kontaisb, who saw it was impossible for him to repel the Chineses without infantry and ordnance, the use of which had been till then unknown to the Kalmûks; in the year 1720 sent ambassadors to Peter I. emperor of Russia, then at St. Petersburg, offering to become tributary to him, provided he would send 10,000 regular troops, with cannon, to his assistance; obliging himself, with that small aid, to drive the Chineses out again: but the war with Sweden, which was then on foot, joined to the views which the emperor Peter began to have upon Persia, hindered him from accepting of these advantageous proposals. Mean time the Chineses seized all which belonged to Kontaisb, lying to the east of the desarts towards the frontiers of China, and have there settled colonies of Mungls; but did not meddle with the territories of the Dalay Lama ^p. However, that prince must have recovered those territories not long after; since we are informed by Gaubil, that, in 1726, the Tatars of Hami (or Khamil) and Turfân, as well as Aksû, Kâshgar, Irgben (or Jarkien) and Anghien (G), were then under his protection. His residence was called Harkas (or Urga), on the river Ili ^q (by some called Konghis), of which an account has been given in our description of Tartary.

^p BENTINK, ubi sup. p. 456, & seq.

^q SOUCIET. Obs. Math. &c. p. 176, 177. 180.

(G) D'Anville, in his map, places this town on the river Sir, or Sihûn, about sixty miles north-west from its source; but Gaubil, in Souciét (Obs. Math. p. 179.)

says, it lies some leagues to the south of the source of that river.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. I.

The history of Juji, or Tusshi Khân, and his descendants, who reigned over the Kipjâks, with that of the Khâns of Krîm Tartary.

Kipjâks, their country.

THE Kipjâks, or Kipchâks (A), inhabit the western part of Tartary; and formerly their country was of very great extent, comprising the vast plains reaching in breadth from the Caspian sea to the borders of Russia, which then was contained within narrow bounds; and extending from the Nieper, or Boristhenes, westward, a considerable way in Tartary, to the east of the Caspian sea: so that not only the kingdom of Astrakhân and Kassan, belonging at present to the Russian empire, but likewise all Little Tartary, and some other neighbouring provinces of Europe, were included in it, forming, in the whole, a large empire. This is to be understood of Kipjâk in its greatest extent: nor does it seem to have been less, by more than these last-mentioned countries, when Juji, eldest son of Jenghiz Khân, reduced it under his dominion.

1. Jugi Khân.

WE have already mentioned the exploits of Juji, or Tusshi (B), who accompanied his father in the war against Mohammed Karasîm Shâh. The Khân was so pleased with his conduct, that

(A) They are called also Kipchâks, Kapjâks, and Kapshâks, by authors, as hath been already taken notice of. Their land is named Dasht Kipjâk, or the plain of Kip- jâk, from its being a champain country, consisting of wide extended plains.

(B) And Chuchî, as written in the Chinese history.

a he soon after gave him the sovereignty of Kipjâk, the country of the Jetab, or Gétes, and Turkestan. This prince settled his residence in Kipjâk: where, after making considerable conquests, he died in the year 1226, six months before his father; much regretted both by the Mungls, and his new subjects. We have but few materials from whence to give our readers a satisfactory history of the successors of Juji Khân, in this part of the Mungl empire: for we are beholden chiefly to no more than two funds, and those very scanty ones, being little else than lists or catalogues of the Khâns: one, communicated by Abû'lghazi Khân, of Karazm, in his history of the Turks, Moguls, and Tatars; the other by De la Croix, at the end of his history of Jenghîz Khân. These catalogues disagree likewise considerably with each other, as to the names and number of the Khâns, as well as the dates of actions. For instance, De la b Croix reckons forty-one Khâns to Haji Keray, or Gheray Khân; and Abû'lghazi Khân only seventeen: but we chuse to follow the latter, as he was a descendant of Juji, and reigned in a country not far from Kipjâk. Whence it may be presumed, that he was better acquainted with the history of that region than the Persian authors, from whom De la Croix made his extract; and the rather, as we have already observed, D'Herbelot informs us, that the oriental authors have not transmitted the history of any of the branches of the Mungl empire with tolerable exactness; excepting that which reigned in Persia, of which Hulagû was the founder.

UPON the death of Juji Khân, his father sent immediately his brother Belgatay Utezkim^{2. Bati Khân.} into Dasht Kipjâk, in order to create Batû (C) (or Badû), Khân, in the room of his father. A. D. 1226.
c That prince went to meet his grand uncle, and conducted him to the usual place of his residence, where he was put in possession of the throne; but the solemnity was scarce over, when news arrived of the death of Jenghîz Khân. Hereupon Utezkim returned immediately to Karakum (or Karakorum), and was followed by Batû, called also Saghin Khân, accompanied by his brothers, excepting Togay Timûr, the youngest; who, on this occasion, was left as regent during his absence. Being arrived at court with the rest, they assisted at the instalment of Ugaday, or Oktay Khân, whom afterwards they accompanied in his expedition to Kitay.

THE grand Khân, pleased with the conduct and bravery which he had observed in Batû
d Saghin Khân, at his return gave him a numerous army to go and subdue the Urûs, or Russians, Cherkassians, Bulgars, and other neighbouring nations. He likewise ordered his son Kayuk, who succeeded him, Mangu (or Mengko), son of Tawlay (or Toley), and Baydar, son of Jagatay Khân, to bear him company in this western expedition.

ON his return to Kipjâk, Togay Timûr feasted him and all the princes splendidly for three His conquests. days. After this, Batû gave, in his turn, a feast, which lasted forty days; at the end of which he set forward on his intended conquests. His expedition was crowned with the success which, says our author, every-body knows; and the Khân, having filled all the west with the glory of his great exploits, at length returned to Dasht Kipjâk, where he died some time after, in the capital of the country called Kok-Orda^a. De la Croix puts this event of his death in 1256 (D); and says, he conquered the Alans, Assites, Russians, or Muscovites, Bulgars, and several other nations: that, crossing through Russia, he even ravaged e Poland, Moravia, and Dalmatia. Then marched into Hungary, with a design to go and besiege Constantinople, but was prevented by death; which contradicts Abû'lghazi Khân's account, who says he died in Kipchâk. De la Croix adds, that Batû performed several other considerable exploits, and was reported to have been the most liberal and generous prince in the world^b.

BATU SAGHIN KHAN was succeeded by his brother Burgha: who, on that occasion, gave a f very magnificent feast to all his vassal lords; and distributed several considerable presents^{3. Burgha Khân.} among the chief of them. Nor did he forget to send some of an extraordinary richness to Koplay (Kublay, or Hû-pi-lay) Khân, in order to obtain his confirmation of the choice which his subjects had made of him in the room of Batû. Burgha Khân reigned with no less glory than justice, and was much dreaded by all his neighbours. One time, as he was on the road to visit Koplay Khân, he met with merchants of Great Bukhâria; and, falling into discourse with some of them about the Mohammedan worship, was so affected with the account they gave of it, that he forthwith embraced that religion. He also in time brought over his younger brother Togay Timûr, who accompanied him; and, at his return, published an order

^a ABU'LGHAZI KHAN, hist. Turks, &c. p. 193, & seq.

^b DE LA CROIX, hist. Gengh. p. 387.

(C) Called also Baatû, Bati, and Badû; which, according to Kendamar, signifies strength and hardness in the Mogul language. D'Herbelot, Bibl. orient. art. Batû.

(D) D'Herbelot, from Kendamar, or Mirkind, does the same; so that he reigned thirty years. Batû was of the religion of Jenghîz Khân, which consisted solely in the worship of God. He, by his authority, established Mangû Khân on the throne of the Mungls, in the east of Tartary; and even facilitated the conquest of China. Bibl. orient. p. 190, art. Batû.

for all his subjects to embrace Mohammedism : but he died, faith our author, before he could complete so salutary a work, after he had reigned twenty-five years^c. De la Croix says, he reigned but ten, and that he died in 1266; but, by Abû'lghazi Khân's account, which we prefer, his death must have happened in 1281. The first of these authors, besides taking notice that Bereke, as he calls Burgha, turned Mohammedan, adds, that he was engaged in a very bloody war with Hûlakû Khân of Persia; and that afterwards, being desirous to execute part of Batû's design, he marched as far as Constantinople, ravaging all the country in his passage^d.

4. Mangû Timûr Khân.

BURGHAKHÂN had for his successor his brother Mengû Timûr (E), who was a prince of much courage and conduct. Some time after his advancement to the crown, he gave a tribe, subject to him, called Ak Orda (or the White Orda), to Behadr Khân, son of Sheybani Khân; and the cities of Kaffa and Krim to Orân Timûr, son of Togay Timûr. After this he took the field against the Bulgars; and having, in two years, made considerable conquests on that side, returned to his own dominions. From thence he not long after marched towards the country of Irân (or Persia at large), against Abka (or Abaka) Khân, who came to an amicable agreement with him; which continued with so much friendship, that every year they sent each other presents. But his successor Abmed, son of Hûlakû Khân, having been slain by his (Abka's) son Argûn; as soon as the news reached the court of Mengû Timûr Khân, he sent Tarkay and Turkuchay, two of his generals, with 80,000 men, towards the frontiers of Irân. On advice of this, Argûn Khân detached Amir Togâtur, one of his best officers, with a good body of troops, to meet them, and followed in person with all his forces. The two armies coming to an engagement, in a place called Karabakh (F), that of Mengû Timûr was defeated; which afflicted him so much, that he died soon after^e.

5. Tuda Mengû Khân.

UPON his decease, Tuda Mangû (G), son of Batû Khân, ascended the throne of Kipjâk: but as he overburdened his subjects with taxes, Tokhtagû, son of Mengû Timûr Khân, thought himself obliged to represent to him the injustice of his conduct. This was taken so ill by the Khân, that he was constrained to leave the country: however, he found means to return thither not long after, at the head of a powerful army; and, having gained a battle, in which Tuda Mangû was slain, got himself to be acknowledged Khân.

6. Tokhtagû Khân.

TOKHTAGUKHÂN (H) reigned with the universal applause of his subjects, and subdued a great number of neighbouring cities: but he was carried off by death in the midst of his conquests, after a reign of six years; and was buried in the city of Shari Sarayjik (I), pursuant to his last directions.

7. Uzbek Khân.

UZBEK succeeded his father Tokhtagû; and, though but thirteen years old, reigned with much prudence and resolution. He introduced the Mohammedan worship through all the provinces of his dominions; which procured him the affection of his subjects to such a degree, that, as a proof of it, they assumed the name of Uzbeks, which they have ever since retained, and never had before. After this event, Uzbek Khân tried his fortune twice against Abu Saïd Khân, who reigned in Irân: but without reaping any advantage by those expeditions; and died at his return from the last^f. According to Kondamîr, the first of these expeditions was in the year 1318, the second in the year 1335; occasioned by Uzbek's laying claim to the crown of Iran^g. An account of these expeditions will be given hereafter in the reign of Abûsaïd, one of the successors of Hûlagû. De la Croix, probably by some mistake in the pointing of his author, calls this prince Ertek; and says, he is reckoned the founder of the tribe named Rûs Ertek: it should be Rûs Uzbek. He makes him also the son of Tûl, the son of Kilk^h before-mentioned.

8. Jani Bek Khân.

UZBEK KHÂN had for his successor, in the throne of the Kipjâks, his son Jani Bek, who got the reputation of a very virtuous and devout Mohammedan. He usually resided in the city of Shari Sarayjik, and continually applied himself to the good of his subjects. During his reign, Malek Ashraf, son of Timûr Tâsh, had seized the kingdom of Azerbejdân in Irân, and the neighbouring provinces: but, as he was a great tyrant, and led a scandalous life, many of his subjects left the country, and went over to Janibek Khân. Among the rest was Mobûzo'ddin, a chief man of the law: who, one day, in expounding the Korân in the Masjîd

^c ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 195. sup. p. 195, & seq. faïd Ben Algiaptu,

^d DE LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 387.

^e ABU'LGH. ubi

^f Ibid. p. 197, & seq.

^g D'HERBELOT, Bibl. orient. art. Abû-

^h DE LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 388.

(E) De la Croix says, he was named Mongatmur, or Mankûtem; that he was the son of Dogan, the son of Batû, and surnamed Kilk, which was the name of Jenghiz Khân's great great grandfather. Hist. Genghisc. p. 387, & seq.

(F) Or Karabag, called also Karabog Arrân: a noted place in Arran (a part of Armenia near the river Arras), famous for several battles fought there.

(G) In place of this prince De la Croix puts Kazas, son of Tazaz (called also Tudabekay), son of Dogan.

(H) De la Croix calls him Tokta, or Belgaba.

(I) This seems to be the same place with Shari Saray: the ruins of which are on the east side of the Volga, a little to the north of Zariza, or Zaraygrood, a Russian city, on the west side, in the part where that river and the Don approach each other.

a (or monk), before the Khân, and a great many persons of rank; took an occasion to touch on the scandalous life of Malek Afhrâf; and then addressing himself to Jani Bek, told him, that, in case he did not do his utmost to put an end to the infamous conduct of that tyrant, both he (the preacher) and his subjects would accuse him, before the throne of God, of all the evil which might accrue from thence.

This menace made such an impression on the mind of Jani Bek Khân, that he, without delay, assembled all his forces, and marched into Irân: where, having defeated and slain Malek Afhrâf, he seized all his dominions, with his treasures, which he divided among his subjects, amounting to 400 camels load in goods and jewels, besides other valuable effects. After this, leaving his son Birdi Bek to govern the conquered provinces, he returned to his own dominions. There falling sick immediately on his arrival, he dispatched couriers to his son, that he might see him before he died; but, finding death not willing to allow him so much time, he enjoined the lords of his court to acknowledge Birdi Bek for their sovereign. Soon after this he expired, and was buried in Sbari Sarayjik, in the year of the Hejra 758 (of Christ 1356), after he had reigned seven years¹. De la Croix, with more probability, places the death of Jani Bek in 1349 (K). The same author says, that he marched by the way of Derbend (in Sbîrwân) into Azerbejdân; which had been usurped from the children of Abûsaïd by Malek Afhrâf, who had been his Wazîr, or Vizîr^k.

Birdi Bek, being detained, by affairs of importance, in the provinces of Irân, for two years after his father's death (L), at length arrived; and, having spent three days in lamenting that loss, caused himself to be publicly acknowledged Khân. After this, he abandoned himself intirely to tyranny, and a brutish life. As he reckoned he had a long time to live, he put to death all his relations; for fear any of them should attempt to thrust him out of the throne, which he possessed so unworthily. But his debaucheries soon put an end to his life, which happened in Hejrah 762: and as, with this Khân, the posterity of Mengû Timûr became extinct, the sceptre of the countries of Kipjâk was conferred on the other descendants of *Juji Khân*¹.

AFTER the death of Birdi Bek Khân, Urûs Khân, son of Badakul Oglan, son of Khoja, son of Avas Timûr, son of Togay Timûr, youngest son of Juji Khân, seized the sceptre of the Kipjâks, and reigned for some years very peaceably: till at length Toktamish (M) (or Tokatmish), descended from Togay Timûr, by another branch, attempted to thrust him from the throne; but his troops having been defeated by Urûs Khân, he was obliged to fly for refuge to Amîr Timûr (or Tamerlan), who resided at Samarkant, in Great Bukhâria. A few days after Idigbi Mangap, who had put himself into the service of Tokatmish, followed him, with tidings, that Urûs Khân, and all his forces, might easily be surprised, because he marched at a great rate towards Great Bukhâria. Idigbi Mangap was the son of Kutluk Kaba, a man of distinction among the tribe of Ak Mungls (or White Mungls), whose daughter Timûr had given in marriage to one of his sons, of which marriage Timûr Kutluk was the issue. Upon this advice Amîr Timûr sent Tokatmish with a numerous army against Urûs Khân; whom having defeated and slain in the battle, he found no difficulty to ascend the throne in 777^m (of Christ 1375).^{10. Urûs Khân. Hej. 777. A. D. 1375.}

As we meet with a more particular account of this war between Tokatmish and Urûs Khân in the life of Timûr Bek, written by Sbarîfo'ddin Ali, a Persian author, it may be proper to give an abstract of it on this occasion. While Timûr was on his return from his expedition against Kamro'ddin, prince of Jetab, or the Getes, in the year of the Hejrah 777; he received advice that Tokatmish Aglen, jealous of Urûs Khan, was on the road, to put himself under his protection. Hereupon he sent an Uzbek officer of distinction to bring him to court; where he arrived soon after that monarch had reached his capital. He was received with the greatest honours by Timûr; who also bestowed on him the government of Sabran, Otrâr, Saganak, Sayram, Saray, and other cities of the empire of Kipjâk, which were in his possession. This prince was scarce settled in his new department, before he was obliged to march against Kotluk Buga, son of Urûs Khân; and although this latter was slain in the fight with an arrow, yet Tokatmish, leaving his country to be plundered by the enemy, was obliged to fly to Timûr; who received him with greater honour than at first, and sent him back with fresh forces.

¹ ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 198.
sup. p. 199.

^k DE LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 388.

¹⁰ ABU'LGH. ubi

(K) Taking from thence seven years, for that Khân's reign, it will bring the death of Uzbek Khân to 1342. This does not agree with the account of Abû'lghazi Khân, who says, it happened at his return from his second expedition against Abûsaïd Khân; which, from the date of Kondamîr, happened seven years before. Perhaps Jani Bek reigned longer than seven years.

(L) De la Croix says, he left Tauris immediately.

(M) Toktamish was the son of Tokul Khoja Oglan, son of Saritzza, son of Avas Timûr, son of Togay Timûr.

Invasions of Timûr's dominions.

As soon as Tukta Kaya, eldest son of Urûs Khân, had advice of this, he marched with a very numerous army, and defeated Tokatmish; who, in his flight, was pursued, and wounded in the hand with an arrow, as he passed the river Sibân (or Sir). Being gotten to the other side, he entered a wood alone, naked and wounded: where casting himself on the ground, to get some rest, his doleful moan soon brought thither one of his old captains, who found him just recovered from a swoon; and, after taking proper care of him, brought him to Bokhâra. Timûr, who was there encamped, ordered another equipage to be made for him, as magnificent as the former. Mean time a commander, named Aydekû, of the tribe of Mangût (N), brought advice from the court of Urûs Khân, that he was marching against Timûr, and sought every-where for Tokatmish: at the same time ambassadors arrived from the Khân, to demand that prince to be given up; otherwise to declare war. Timûr answered, that he would protect Tokatmish, and soon meet their master in the field; as he did at Saganak, twenty-four leagues from Otrâr.

Returns, and dies.

THESE vast armies were ready to engage, when there fell a prodigious quantity of rain and snow, followed by so excessive a cold, that the limbs both of men and beasts lost all motion. At the end of three months, during which this weather continued, Timûr, weary of being so long in sight of the enemy, and yet out of action, sent a detachment to attack them in the night; which meeting with 3000 horse, commanded by Timûr Malek Aglen, son of Urûs Khân, defeated them, the prince himself being wounded in the foot with an arrow. Hereupon Urûs Khân, despairing of success, returned home. Timûr likewise marched back to Great Bukhâria: but, as soon as the season permitted, he set forward again, with design to invade Kipjâk; and made so much expedition, that, in fifteen days and nights, he arrived with his army at Jeyran Kaymish, that is, the reeds for deers, a town in that country, whose inhabitants he found fast asleep. Here, being informed that Urûs Khân was dead, he established Tokatmish sovereign of Kipjâk, and the rest of the empire of Tushi (or Fuji); after which he returned to his own dominionsⁿ.

Confusion in Kipjâk.

THIS account of Urûs Khân's death is doubtless more exact than that of Abû'lghazi Khân; because, had he been killed in battle, it would have afforded a subject of triumph to Timûr's historian. De la Croix places no fewer than nine Khâns between Birdi Bey, or Bek, and Urûs Khân; whose names, according to him, are, Kildi Bek, another of Jani Bek's sons; Norûz, who pretended to be a son of Jani Bek; Cherkes Khân, who was likewise set up for a son of the same prince, such were the conjunctures of that time; Kheder Khân; Mazûd Khân, son of Kheder Khân; Bazarchi Khân; Tokay, son of Shabi Khân; Tokluk Timûr Khân, Tokay's nephew; Mûrâd Kojâ Khân, brother of the former^o. But these are not to be considered as so many Khâns, who reigned successively one after the other; but rather as pretenders, or usurpers, who laid claim to the whole, or seized part of it, and reigned at the same time; till they were suppressed by the forces of Urûs Khân. But to return to Tokatmish:

11. Tokatmish Khân Hej. 778. A. D. 1376.

established by Timûr;

ALTHOUGH Tokatmish seemed to be now securely established in the throne of Kipjâk, yet his possession did not long continue quiet: for Tukta Kaya, eldest son of Urûs Khân, dying soon after his father, his brother Timûr Malek Aglen ascended the throne; and, in 778, marching with a powerful army against Tokatmish, after several skirmishes, once more intirely vanquished him. But, by means of a very fleet horse, given him by the emperor, to serve him on such occasions, he escaped, and got alone to court, all his troops being dispersed. The generous Timûr again recruited his losses, and sent him back with several commanders, who had orders to replace him on the throne of Kipjâk: which they accordingly did, in the city of Saganak; and, pursuant to custom, sprinkled on him gold and precious stones. Mean time Orki-timûr, taken prisoner in the late battle, made his escape, and informed Timûr Bek, that Timûr Malek spent both night and day in debauches: that he slept till ten in the morning, which is dinner-time, no one daring to awake him, whatever affairs of importance required it; and that all the people of Kipjâk desired Tokatmish for their sovereign. On this news, the emperor sent to advise that prince to march with all expedition to attack his rival, who had passed the winter at Karatal (O). Tokatmish Aglen immediately departed from Saganak; and, coming up with the enemy, defeated them; by which victory he recovered the throne. Timûr Bek was so rejoiced at this news, that he spent many days in feasting, and released many prisoners. As for Tokatmish Khân, he returned to pass the winter at Saganak; and, raising a great army in spring following, went and re-conquered the kingdom of Saray (P) and Memak with the rest of the empire of Tushi Khân^p.

ⁿ Hist. Tim. Bek. I. ii. c. 20—23. p. 178—186.

^p Hist. Tim. Bek. I. ii. c. 24, 25. p. 187—190.

^o DE LA CROIX, hist. Gengh. p. 388, & seq.

(N) This seems to be the Idighi Mangap of Abû'lghazi Khân, in the translation of whose history the names are often very erroneously written; but we cannot say where the fault lies in the present instance.

(O) Karatal, a place in Kipjâk.

(P) Of which Shari Sarayjik, or Saray, above-mentioned, was the capital.

a WHEN Timûr Kutluk, before-mentioned, grew up, he went to dwell in the country of the Kipjaks, and Idighi Mangap put himself under his protection. This greatly displeased Tokatmish Khân; who, having besides entertained a suspicion that Timûr Kutluk sought to supplant him, endeavoured, without noise, to get rid of so dangerous a rival. But Timûr Kutluk, having discovered the Khân's design, fled for refuge to Great Bukhâria, whither he was followed six months after by Idighi Mangap. Mean time, while Amîr Timûr invaded Irân with all his forces, Tokatmish Khân entered Great Bukhâria, then destitute of troops, with a great army; and, having taken Samarkant, put to the sword a great number of the inhabitants. After this, he set out for his own dominions: but Amîr Timûr, who, on the first news of that prince's march, had returned homewards, followed him with so much diligence, that he overtook him on the banks of the Atel (or Wolga). Tokatmish Khân, finding there was no way to avoid a battle, gave it with all the resolution imaginable: but, the good fortune of Timûr having prevailed over all the conduct of the Khân, this last was obliged to escape by flight, after having lost all his army in the engagement.

AFTER the battle, Timûr Kutluk, who was in the action, with Amîr Timûr's consent, went to look for his subjects, whom he had basely abandoned, for fear of Tokatmish Khân; and, having met with a great number of them on the banks of the Atel, prepared to march with them to Samarkant. But Idighi Mangap advised him not to put it in Amîr Timûr's power to deprive him of his subjects, by distributing them in the cities belonging to his dominions: he told him, that would necessarily reduce him to a state of absolute dependence on Timûr; and therefore counselled him to go settle elsewhere with his people: which the other accordingly did; and retired so secretly, that it is not known whither he went ^a (Q). De la Croix puts two of Urûs Khân's sons between him and Tokatmish, whom he makes the twenty-third Khân; viz. Tokta Kaya (eldest son of Urûs, who died in 1376, the same year with his father), and Timûr Malek Aglen ^b.

TOKATMISH KHAN, at his death, left eight sons (R): but Kaverchik, son of Urûs Khân, seized the Kipjak sceptre, and reigned after him. ^{12. Kaverchik Khân.}

HE was succeeded by his son Barak Khân ^c. De la Croix makes this the thirty-eighth Khân, placing fourteen between Tokatmish and him, in the following order: Timûr Kutluk Aglen, son of Timûr Malek, who had served Timûr in the wars against Tokatmish Khân: Shadi Bek, notwithstanding the installation of Koyrichak Aglen, by Timûr, in April 1395: Pulâd, son of Shadi Bek, although Timûr did not acknowledge him for Khân: Timûr, son of Timûr Kutluk, although not acknowledged by Timûr, who had installed Idekû Khan: Jalalo'ddin; Kerim Birdi; Kepek Khân; Babbira; Kadir Birdi. These five last were sons of Tokatmish Khân: Kadir Birdi was killed in battle against Idekû, before-mentioned. The same, Idekû; Sidi Ahmed; Dervish, son of Alshi Khân; Kuchuk Mehemed, son of Tokatmish; Dolet Birdi Khân, son of Tash Timûr; Barrak Khân, son of Kavarjik ^d. It appears from this great number of competitors for the Kipjak throne, that the country was in much confusion; which daily increased, instead of subsiding.

UPON the demise of Barak Khân, Mahmat (S), son of Hajan Oglan, son of Jabina, son of Tolak Timûr, son of Saricha, son of Avas Timûr, son of Togay Timûr, seized the sceptre of the country of the Kipjaks. ^{14. Mahmat Khân.}

MAHMAT KHAN had for his successor Abûsaïd, surnamed Jani Bek Khân, son of Barak Khân, who left nine sons: Iraji; Mohammed; Kasim, who gave battle to Mohammed Khân Shaybani, in which the latter lost his life; Aytik; Janish; Kamber; Tamish; Awssak; and Jayik. The Uzbeks affirm, that the Khâns of Turkestan are descended from Janish Soltân, fifth son of Jani Bek Khân. ^{15. Jani Bek Khân.}

AFTER the death of Jani Bek, Ghiazoddin, son of Timûrtash, son of Mahmat Khân, possessed himself of the throne of Kipjak, and was succeeded by his son Haji Garay ^e. De la Croix instead of multiplying the number of Khâns from Barak, or Barrak, inserts only two in his list; Kayazoddin Shadi Bek, and Mehemed, son of Timûr Khân ^f. It may be presumed, that Kayazoddin is the same with Abûlghazi Khân's Ghiazoddin (or Gayathoddin, according to the pronunciation of the Arabs), notwithstanding that Haje Keray is represented as the son

^a ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 201, & seq. ubi sup.

^c DE LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 389.

^e ABU'LGH.

^d DE LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 389, & seq.

^f ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 203.

(Q) Timûr made several expeditions, besides this, into Kipjak, against Tokatmish, which shall be related in the reign of that prince; who, as De la Croix observes, defeated him in 1388, 1391, and 1395.

(R) Their names were. 1. Jalalo'ddin; 2. Jabar Birdi; 3. Kayuk; 4. Karim Birdi; 5. Iskander; 6. Abûsaïd; 7. Algha; 8. Kadir Birdi: but, of the six mentioned by De la Croix, three are not to be found among them; viz. Kepek Khân, Babbira, and Kuchuk Mehemed Khân. The other three are Jalalo'ddin, Kerim Birdi, and Kadir Birdi, who, according to that author, were all Khâns in the order mentioned in the text.

(S) Or rather, perhaps, Mahmûd.

of Mehemed, by the authors made use of by La Croix; who are not to be depended on so much as the Khân of Karazm, for the genealogy of the princes of his own nation, and the country from whence the Uzbeks, his subjects, originally came.

17. Haji Garay Khan.

Haji Garay (*) (Ghyeray, or Keray) Khân, who succeeded his father Ghiazod'dîn, left eight sons: Dawlat Yar; Nûr Dawlat Khân; Haydar Khân; Kutluk Sayman; Kildish; Mengli Garay Khân; Yam Gurji; and Avas Timûr. These sons, after their father's death, divided his dominions among them; but their descendants did not long enjoy their respective possessions: for the Urûs (or Russians) seized the whole country of Kipjâk in the year 961 of the Hejrab (of Christ 1553); and, since that time, we hear no more mention of the posterity of Haji Garay Khân. All we know for certain is, that the Khâns of Krîm are sprung from one of his sons: but, as that country is at too great a distance from us, we cannot say which of them it is.

This is all the account given by Abû'lghazi Khân of the Khâns who have reigned in Kipjâk; to which something, by way of supply, may be added from La Croix, relating to Haji Keray Khân, and his successors in Krim Tartary. According to this author, Haji Keray Khân died in 1475. and left twelve sons; which great number of princes was the cause that the empire of Kipjâk fell into confusion, so that three of them were seen to reign as Khâns at the same time. This occasioned a war which ruined several provinces, whereof the Russians got possession: in short, the great empire of Kipjâk had been utterly ruined, if Soltân Mohammed II. who subdued Constantinople, touched with the misfortunes of those princes, had not taken care to succour them. For this purpose, he sent Ghedik Ahmed Pasha, who took the city of Kaffa (T) from the Genoeses, and then that of Mankûp.

Khâns of Krim.

Hej. 876.
A. D. 1471.

HERE he found Mengheli, or Menkeli Keray, son of Haji Keray Khân, who lost his liberty with the rest of the inhabitants. He had been Khân of Kipjâk for some few days; but, having been vanquished by his brothers, fled for refuge to the Christians, and waited an opportunity to remount the throne; on which Mohammed soon after replaced him^y. According to the Turks, Kyeffa (or Kaffa), with the rest of Krîm, was taken in 876 of the Hejrab, which answers to that of Christ 1471. If so, the death of Haji Keray must have been four or five years earlier, at least, than La Croix puts it; especially if, as they say, Mengheli Keray had been a long time in war with his brother, before he took refuge with the Genoeses. They add farther, that the Soltan not only appointed this prince Khân of the Krîm, on certain considerations, but also sent him with an army of Othmâns into Kapchâk (or Kipjâk); which he soon recovered by their assistance, after defeating and killing his brother. This was the first Khân of Tartary appointed by the Turks; and the first who, in the Krîm, ordered the Khotba, in the name of the Othmân emperor, to be used in the prayers^z. They assume the title of Padishâh, or emperor.

Khâns of Krîm Tartary.

18. Mengheli Keray Khân.

1. MENGHELI KERAY (or Ghyeray) Khân succeeded his father. La Croix reckons him the forty-second Khân of Kipjâk: but he was no more than the eighteenth, according to Abû'lghazi Khân; whose numbering thus far, being more exact, we shall follow in the margin, to carry on the succession of the Khâns of Kipjâk: and at the same time begin a new reckoning with this prince at the head of the article, and continue it through the subsequent reigns, to shew their number, as Khâns of Krim and Little Tartary only; of whom La Croix has furnished a pretty accurate list, with the dates of their respective deaths, or advancement.

19. Mehemed Keray Khân.

2. MEHEMED KERAY KHAN succeeded his father Mengheli Keray Khân, in the dominion of Kipjâk, as well as that of the Krîm. And here it may be proper to observe, that all the Khâns, who succeeded Mengheli Keray, took or retained the name of Keray, Geray, or Ghyeray, as the Turks and Tatars pronounce it.

20. Gazi Keray Khân.

3. MEHEMED was succeeded by his son Gazi Keray Khân, who was deposed, after a reign of six months.

21. Saadet Keray Khân.

4. SAADET KERAY KHAN, who gave his brother Sabbîb Keray Khân in hostage to Soltân Selim I. emperor of the Othmâns. From this time the Turks gave one thousand and fifty aspers per day as a pension to the Khâns of Krîm Tartary, and other pensions to the lords of the Tatar court, as appears from the book Kunbo'l Akhbar.

* ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 203, & seq. hist. Othm. p. 112, & seq.

y LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 390.

z CANTEMIR

(*) Whence this name, see Nouv. Mem. des Miss. Levant, tom. i. p. 134.

(T) This city fell early into the hands of the Tatars: but they did not keep it long; for, about 1266, the Ge- noes took it from them, and established there the seat of their commerce in the east; but it was taken from them in 1474, after they had been in possession of it about 208 years.

- a 5. ISLAM KERAY KHAN, son of Mehemed Keray. In his reign the kingdom was divided between two factions; one adhered to Saadet Keray Khan, the other to Islâm Keray Khan. At length, in 1517, the two parties came to blows on the banks of the Niepar, or Boristhenes; and, those on Islâm Keray's side gaining the advantage, Saadet Keray was obliged to fly to Constantinople, where the Othmân emperor gave him a pension to subsist on. After this, Islâm was killed by,
- b 6. SAHHIB KERAY KHAN, who seized the throne; but was himself, after having reigned a long time, deposed by Suleymân II. Soltân of the Turks. The Russians, who had been vassals to the Tatars till the reign of Czar or Tsar Ivan Basiliwitz, took the city of Kazân, or Kasân, situate on the river Kasânkâ, a little to the east of the Volga, from this Khan, on the ninth of July 1552^a; and, in a year or two more, conquered the kingdom of Astrakân, to the south of that of Kazân, with the rest of Kipjak to the west of the river Jâik: so that Sabbib Keray Khan may properly be said to be the last Khan of the race of Jaji Khan who reigned in Kipjak; excepting that part called Little Tartary, which became a part rather by conquest than original occupation. After the subjugation of this large country, the several tribes of Kipjaks and Tatars submitted to the Russians, and still remain in their antient territories.
7. SAHHIB KERAY was succeeded by Dolet (or Dawlat) Keray Khan, son of Mebarek, son of Mengbeli Keray Khan, and died in 1577.
8. DOLET KERAY had for his successor Mehemed Keray Khan, who was deposed for having disobeyed the Othmân Soltân.
- c 9. ISLAM KERAY KHAN (U), who had been imprisoned at Rhodes, was restored: he died in 1588.
10. GAZI KERAY KHAN succeeded: he was a learned prince, an excellent poet, and an able musician. The Othmân Soltân increased his pension to about five pounds English per day; because he had done great services to the Turkish empire, in the war with Persia, where he discovered all the qualifications requisite in a great officer: yet he was deposed for some time, but was afterwards restored; and died in 1607.
11. FATEH KERAY KHAN, who was deposed almost as soon as he was advanced to that dignity.
- d 12. HE was succeeded by Selâmet Keray Khan (son of Dolet Keray Khan), who died in 1610.
13. JANI BEK KERAY KHAN succeeded Selâmet Keray; and, in 1617, marched into Persia by order of the Port. He likewise went to besiege Kaffa, at the head of 40,000 Tatars: nevertheless, he was deposed in 1621; but re-established six years after, in 1627.
14. JANI BEK had for his successor Mehemet Keray Khan, who was killed the same year.
- e 15. ANAYET KERAY KHAN, son of Gâzi Keray Khan, deposed in 1637; and afterwards put to death the same year at Constantinople^b. According to other accounts, he was indeed slain this year by a nephew of his competitor Kantemîr; which latter was put to death at Constantinople, for killing a Tatar. As Anâyet had shaken off much of his respect for the Othmân emperor, his murder was applauded at the Port; who set up his brother, then at Jamboli in Rum-ili, or Thrace, in his room^c.
16. BEHADR KERAY KHAN, son of Selâmet Keray Khan, succeeded Anâyet, and died in 1641^d. This Khan is called Bekbir Gheray by others.
17. MEHEMED KERAY KHAN, another son of Selâmet Keray. He was deposed in 1644, and restored: in 1664 he was deposed a second time.
18. ISLAM KERAY KHAN, a son also of Selâmet Keray. He carried on a war with Poland for fourteen years, and died in 1653.
19. ADEL KERAY KHAN, son of Chûbán Keray Khan. He was deposed in 1671; and sent back prisoner to Rhodes, from whence he had been taken.
- f 20. SELIM KERAY KHAN, who reigned in 1673. We are informed by prince Kantemîr, that the Turks, distrusting the fidelity of Selîm, after the battle of Vienna, advanced Kior Gyeray, of the Chûbán Gyeray family, to the dignity of Khan; but that, in a few months, he was deposed, and the antient race of Gyeray replaced on the throne. That author adds, that it is thought the Chûbán Gyeray will never rise to the same honour again, although they may enjoy the office of Galga Soltân, Nûro'ddîn, and the like, which are in the power of their relations^e. But, if the memoirs of La Croix be true, one of the family of the Chûbán

^a LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 391.
of the Othmân Turks.
p. 113.

^b Ibid. p. 391, & seq.
^d LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 392.

^c See hereafter, the history ^e CANTEM. hist. Othm. nor.

(U) This must be a mistake for Sabbib Keray, who was imprisoned at Rhodes: Islâm Keray was killed.

Gyeray (X) Khâns, was on the throne of Krîm Tartary before, in the person of Adel Keray a Khân. The reason assigned for the supposition, that none of the Chûbân Gyeray family will be advanced for the future, is, that they are of a spurious race: which reflection they retort, in their turn, on the Gyerays of Krîm. However, they are allowed, by the Othmân emperors, to live at Jamboli (formerly Janopoli), before-mentioned, which is the destined seat of the Tatar princes ^f. He was famous in the late war; for, in one campaign, he beat the Russians, Poles, and Germans. After he had been twice Khân, he abdicated, on his return from Mekka; but being made Khân the third time by the Port, in place of his son, the latter revolted; yet was reduced by his brother Soltân Gazi Keray, in 1702, when the Khân was about forty. He was very handsome and well made ^g: he was succeeded by Soltân Gazi, named 38. Dolet Keray Khân.

21. DOLET KERAY KHAN, son of Selîm Keray Khân. This prince was much beloved by his subjects, and accounted a great soldier: but he was deposed by the Port, and sent first to Rhodes, and then to Kbio. b

39. Kaplan Keray Khân.

22. KAPLAN KERAY KHAN. This prince having been defeated in Chirkassia, by some rebels, whom he went to reduce, the Soltân deposed him, in 1708; and re-established in his room Dolet Keray Khân ^h, who had been deposed before him, and is, according to La Croix, the sixty-fourth Khân of Kipjâk.

40. Dolet Keray Khân.

23. DOLET KERAY KHAN, who began his second reign in 1708.

^f CANTERM. hist. Othm. note, p. 113.
130, & seqq.

^g Nouv. Mem. des Miss. Levant, vol. i. p. 102, & seqq.

^h LA CROIX, ubi supra, p. 393.

(X) Chûbân, or Choban, Gyeray, signifies Gyeray the side, over against the Krîm, between it and Chirkassia. The Chûbân Tatars live on the Asiatic kassia.

BOOK VIII.

The history of the princes of the race of Jenghîz Khân, who have reigned in the Great and Little Bukhâria, with part of Karazm.

CHAP. I.

A description of Great Bukhâria.

Bukhâria in general.

BUKHARIA, Bokbâria, Bokâria, Bogâria, or Bobâria, as it may be variously pronounced, is the name given at present to all that region or tract of land lying between Karazm and the Great Kobi, or sandy desert, bordering on China. It signifies the country of the Bukhârs: Bukhâr, as Abû'lghazi Khân informs us, being a Mungl word, importing, a learned man; because all those (formerly) who had a mind to be instructed in the languages and sciences, went, for that purpose, into Bukhâria ^a. Hence it appears, that this name was imposed originally by the Mungls, who conquered this country in the time of Jenghîz Khân. This vast region is divided into two parts, the Great and the Little Bukhâria. It seems somewhat strange, that the above-mentioned author, who speaks frequently

^a ABU'LGH. hist. Turks, &c. p. 108.

a quently of the former, should never once mention the latter: which name, perhaps, may not be so much in use with the Uzbeks, or may have come in use only since the Elûths or Kalmûks conquered the countries comprized under that denomination, in the last century. Both names are in use with the Russians, and it is from them that they came to other Europeans.

THE country of Great Bukhâria is nearly the same with that called by the Arabs Mawara'nahr; its several which signifies, what lies beyond the river, meaning the Jihûn, or Amû, the Oxus of the antient names. Greeks, and is little other than a translation of Transoxana, the name given formerly to those provinces. Under this denomination was comprized all the extent of country possessed by those powers, the Greeks and Arabs, beyond the above-mentioned river; which country, at different times, had different dimensions. Indeed, for the general, Mawara'nahr signified all the space Mawa- or lands intercepted between the Jihûn and the Sihûn, now called Sîr, which separated them from ra Inahr. the territories of the Turks, who, during the dominion of the Arabs in those parts, spread themselves very far over Great Tartary. However, although Abû'lghâzi Khân, in some places, seems to use the words Great Bukhâria, and Mawara'nahr, to denote the same country; yet in other places, the first name seems to be more limited, and even restrained, to the territories of the Khân of Bukhâra, or Bokbâra, one of the three provinces into which Great Bukhâria is at present divided.

GREAT BUKHARIA is also comprized under the name of Turân, or the country of the Turks: Turân which is likewise given, by the Arabs and Persians, to the country situated to the north of the river Amû, in opposition to Irân, or Persia at large, lying to the south of that river; and includes a considerable part of what fell to the share of Jagatay Khân, second son of Jenghîz Khân, from whose descendants, the Uzbeks, of the race of Juji, or Tîshi Khân, conquered it. But here it may be requisite to observe, that Abû'lghâzi Khân employs the word Turân in a different sense, namely, to denote the regions lying between the river Sîr and the icy sea, or perhaps more particularly Siberia; except the word Turân has, through some mistake, been inserted instead of Tûra, as the English translator of that author is inclined to think ^b.

AFTER the conquest of this country by the Mungls, and grant thereof to Jagatay Khân, it took the name of Jagatay, or Zagatay, as our geographers write it; given to it by the Persians, Jagata; Uz- or perhaps the Mungls themselves, in honour of the new proprietor. This name continued so long as the Khâns descended from him reigned in those parts. Upon their expulsion by the Uzbeks, the Persians gave it the name of the country of Uzbek ^c, as before they had done to that part of Tartary beyond the Sîr, which they then inhabited: but it does not appear that the Uzbeks themselves called either country after their own name; at least, Abû'lghâzi Khân never does. However that be, they have been communicated, by their neighbours, to the Europeans; whose geographers, for the general, still use them, and even those which have been long since out of use among the Asiatics.

GREAT BUKHARIA (which seems to comprehend the Sogdiana and Baktriana of the antient Situation and Greeks and Romans, with their dependencies) is situated between the 34th and 46th degrees of extent. latitude, and between the 76th and 92d degrees of longitude. It is bounded on the north by the river Sîr, which separates it from the dominions of the Elûths, or Kalmûks; the kingdom of Kâshgar, in Little Bukhâria, on the east; by the dominions of the Great Mogul, and Persia, on the south; and by the country of Karazm on the west: being about 770 miles long, from west to east; and 730 miles broad, from south to north.

ACCORDING to Bentink, nature has denied nothing to this fine country, to render living in it agreeable: the mountains abound with the richest mines; the vallies are of an astonishing fertility in all sorts of fruit and pulse; the fields are covered with grass the height of a man; the rivers swarm with excellent fish; and wood, which is scarce all over Grand Tartary, is found here in great plenty: in short, it is the best cultivated, and best inhabited, of all the northern Asia. But all these blessings are of very little use to the Tatar inhabitants, who are naturally so lazy, that they would rather go rob and kill their neighbours, than apply themselves to improve the benefits which nature so liberally offers them ^d.

GREAT BUKHARIA is divided into three large provinces, namely, Proper Bukhâria, Samar- Division into kant, and Bâlk, each of which has commonly its particular Khân: altho' sometimes one, by provinces. conquest, is master of two provinces, as happened to be the case about thirty years ago, when the Khân of Proper Bukhâria was in possession also of Samarkant; and this may still be the case, for any thing we know, at this distance, to the contrary.

1. Province of Proper Bukhâria.

THE province of Proper Bukhâria, or Bokbâria, is the most western of the three; having on the west, Karazm; on the north, a desert called by the Arabs Gaznah; on the east, the province of Samarkant; and on the south, the river Amû. It may be about 390 miles long, and 320 broad. Abû'lghâzi Khân, in the history of his own wars, mentions several provinces and towns belonging to Proper Bukhâria (some of which the French editor gives an account of), as the provinces of Duraganata and Gordish, large provinces towards Karazm; Kujin and Karmina, towards the middle of the country. The towns are chiefly Bokhâra, Zam, Wardanfi, Karakul, Siunjbala, Karshi, Zarjui, Nersem, and Karmina.

^b ABU'LGH. hist. Turks, &c. p. 452, & seq. supra, p. 209.

^c TEIXEIRA, hist. Perf. p. 319.

^d ABU'LGH. ubi

Bokhâra city. THE city of Bokhâra, or Boghâr, as our Jenkinson calls it, is, according to that author, situated in the lowest part of all the country; and, by his own observation, in 39 degrees 10 minutes of latitude; twenty days journey from Urkenj, the capital of Karazm. It was, in 1559, of great extent, and fortified with a high wall of earth; was divided into three parts, whereof the castle of the Khân, who resides here, made one; the Murfas, officers of the court, and those belonging to the Khân's retinue, took up the second part; the third, which was the biggest, being possessed by the burghers, merchants, and other inhabitants. In this last division, every trade or profession has its particular quarter. The houses are generally only of earth; but the temples, and many other structures, as well public as private, are of stone, sumptuously built, and gilded; especially the baths, which are so artfully contrived, that the like is not to be seen anywhere else.

*Water runs
under the city.*

A LITTLE river runs through the city, whose water is very bad, breeding, in the legs of such as drink it, worms an ell long, between the flesh and the skin; which working out about an inch every day, are rolled up, and thus extracted; but if they break in the operation, the patient dies. For all this inconvenience, it is there forbidden to drink any other liquor than water and mares milk; such as break that law being whipped through the markets. There are officers appointed to search all houses for aqua vitæ, wine, or brag (or braga); and in case any be found, they break the vessels, spill the drink, and punish the owners: nay, often if a man's breath smells of strong liquor, he incurs a handsome bastinado. This great strictness is owing to the metropolitan (or head of the law) in Bukhâria, who is more obeyed than the king himself: he even deposes him at pleasure; as he served both the king who reigned when our author was there, and his predecessor, slaying him in his chamber in the night.

THE king (or Khân) has neither great power nor wealth. As his revenues are but small, he is maintained chiefly by the city: for he takes the tythe of all things sold there, to the great impoverishment of the people; and when he wants money to pay his debts, sends his officers to seize goods from the shop-keeper, upon credit, whether they will or not. Thus he acted, to pay Jenkinson for some pieces of kersey. However, that merchant was very civilly treated by him, who reigned when he was there, in the year above-mentioned. He often sent for, and discoursed with him, about the laws, religion, and power, of the European countries. At his request, likewise, he sent 100 men in pursuit of robbers (who had attacked his karawan), and recovered part of his goods.

Language,

As the country of Boghâr was formerly subject to the Persians, the Persian language is still spoken there. But the Boghârians are continually at war with the Persians their neighbours, on account of religion, although both nations are Mohammedans (but of different sects). They likewise quarrel with them, because they do not shave the upper lip, as they, and all other Tatars, do: for this reason, they call them kafrs, that is, unbelievers, as they do Christians. They have no gold coin in Bukhâria; and only one piece of silver (A), worth twelve pence English, which the king raises and falls so frequently, that their copper money, called Puli, is more current, whereof 100 make the silver piece.

coin,

and trade.

As to the trade of Bokhâra, Jenkinson observes, that, in his time, there was a great resort of karawâns, from India, Persia, Balk, Russia, and other countries; but he adds, that the merchants are so poor, and bring so few wares, which yet they must wait two or three years to sell, that there are no hopes of any trade in this place worth following. The Indians brought nothing but white calicoes; and carried back wrought silks, red hides, slaves, horses, and such-like: but would not deal with our author for woollen cloths, which they had from the Persians and the Russians.

BENTINCK observes farther, that this city is conveniently situated for trade with the above-mentioned countries; and that the duties do not amount to quite three per cent.: but that the extraordinary oppressions which the foreign merchants have met with, have reduced commerce there to a very low ebb. However, that from hence the dominions of the Great Mogul, and part of Persia, are supplied with all sorts of dried fruits, of an exquisite flavour.

^c JENKINSON'S voyage to Boghar. in Purch. pilgr. Vol. III. p. 239, & seq. p. 465, & seq.

^f ABULGH. hist Turkes

(A) Bentinck says, the money of Persia and the Indies is current here also.

a THE same author gives an account of three or four more of the cities belonging to Proper Karmina city. Bukhâria. First, Karmina; this place is situated in a province of the same name, towards the borders of Karazm, to the north-west of Bokhâra; and is but inconsiderable at present.

WARDANSI lies to the west of Karmina, near the borders of the same country. It is a pretty Wardansi. large scambling town, inhabited by the Bukhârs, who traffic into Persia and Karazm.

KARSHI stands to the north of the river Amû, and is, at present, one of the best cities in Karshi. Great Bukhâria, being large, populous, and better built, than any other in that country (B). The neighbouring lands are exceeding fertile, in all sorts of fruits and pulse; and its inhabitants drive a great trade in the north parts of the Indies.

ZAMIN (C) is a small town on the right (or north-side) of the Amû, towards the borders of Zamin, or Persia, remarkable for nothing but its passage over that river; which is of great advantage to Zam. the Uzbeks of Great Bukhâria, in their expeditions on that side ^g.

2. The province of Samarkant.

THIS province, which is called Mawara'nabr by Bentink, lies to the east of Proper Bounds and Bukhâria, and north of Bâlk. It extends as far as the borders of Kâshgar, in Little extent. Bukhâria; being about 540 miles long, from west to east; and 500 broad, from south to north.

THIS country was formerly full of flourishing cities; but most of them are, at present, Samarkant either intirely ruined, or much fallen to decay. The capital of the province, and indeed of all city. Great Bukhâria, taken in the largest sense, is Samarkant, or Samarkand (D), situated on a river, and in a valley, both which bear the name of Sogd; from whence the Sogdiana of the antients had its denomination. It is seven days journey to the north-east of Bokhâria; and, according to the observation of Ulug Beg (grandson of Timûr Beg, or Tamerlan), who reigned here in 1447, lies in 39° 37' 23" of latitude. Although it falls short, at present, of being so splendid as in times past, yet, Bentink says, it is still very large, and well peopled. It is fortified with strong bulwarks of earth; and its buildings are much in the same condition with those of Bokhâra: some of the private houses are of stone, dug out of quarries which are near the town ^h. Abû'lfeda says, that the streets were paved in his time: that it had a wide ditch round the walls: and that water was conveyed from the river, by leaden pipes, into the city ⁱ.

THE academy of sciences in this city is one of the most eminent to be found among the Its advan- Mohammedans, who resort thither to study, from all the neighbouring countries. The silk-^{tages} paper made here is said to be the most beautiful in all Asia, and therefore in great request throughout the east. The soil produces pears, apples, raisins, and melons, of an exquisite taste; and in such plenty, that the empire of the Great Mogul, and part of Persia, are supplied with them. The little river (that is, the Sogd), which passes by the town, would be of great use to the place, by opening a communication with the neighbouring dominions, if the inhabitants had but the industry to make it navigable.

THE other remarkable cities in this province were, Otrâr, Zarnuk, Tashkunt, Kojand, Kash, Other cities. Sagbanian, Washjerd, and Termed: but of these we meet with scarce any account in modern travellers. Otrâr, called by the Arabs Farâb, is the most distant city from the capital, and Otrâr lies almost due north. It stands in the most north-west part of the province, on a small river, which, two leagues thence, falls southward into the Sîr. This place is famous for the death of Timûr Beg, in 1405 ^k; and, though not considerable at present, was the capital city of Turkestan, when that kingdom or empire was in its flourishing state, under Kavâr, or Kur Khân, as hath been already ^l set forth.

TASHKUNT, at present, belongs to Turkestan; four days journey to the south of which, and seven north-east of Samarkant, stands Kojand, or Kojend, and Kbojend, on the Sîr, being a Kojand. famous passage over that river, as Termed is over the Amû. Sagbanian and Washjerd are seated Termed. on the river Sagbanian, which falls into the Amû. Kash, or Kesh, lies not far to the east of Kash. Karshi, and south of Samarkant. Timûr Beg was prince of this city, before he rose to his future greatness.

^g ABU'LG. hist. Turks, p. 464, & seq.
^h ABU'LG. ubi supra, p. 462, & seq.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 462.
^j See before.

^k ABU'LF. descr. Chorasmia, p. 62.

(B) It lies between Bokhâra and Samarkant. Timûr Beg (or Tamerlan) usually encamped with his army near this city, which stands on the river Tûm. Nakshab, Nefes, and Karshi, are the same place; it had this last name from the palace which Kepck built, two leagues and an half distant; for Karshi, in the Mungl language, signifies a palace. De la Croix, hist. Tim. Bek. p. 65. book i. cap. 13.

(C) Called also Samin, or Zam.

(D) Kant, Kent, Kunt, as 'tis variously pronounced by people who speak different dialects of the Mungl or Turkish language, signifies a city or town; of which Kand, or Kend, are made by other nations.

To these places may be added Anghien, which is the most eastern town of note in all Great Bukhâria: standing near its borders, towards Kâshgar, and not far from the source of the Sîr, on whose northern side it is situated; in the latitude of 40 degrees, according to the Jesuits map of Tibet, drawn from the journals of Chinese and Tatar travellers.

3. The province of Bâlk.

Bounds and extent.

THE province of Bâlk, or Bâlkh, lies to the south of the province of Samarkant, and east of Proper Bukhâria. 'Tis about 360 miles long, and 250 broad.

BENTINK observes, that although this province is the smallest of the three, yet, being extremely fertile, and thoroughly cultivated, the prince draws a fair revenue out of it. The country particularly abounds with silk, of which the inhabitants make very pretty manufactures.

THE Uzbeks subject to the Khân of Bâlk, are the most civilized of all the Tatars inhabiting Great Bukhâria, owing, in all likelihood, to their commerce with the Persians; neither are they given to thieving as the rest: they are likewise more industrious; but in other respects are the same sort of people.

THE country of Bâlk is divided into several provinces; the most remarkable whereof are, Khotlân, or Katlân, Tokbarestân, and Badâgshân. Its chief cities are, Bâlk, Fariyah, Talkhân, Badâgshân, and Anderâb.

City of Bâlk.

THE city of Bâlk is situate towards the borders of Persia, about 50 miles to the south of Termed, and on the river Debashk; which, about 40 miles from thence, to the north-west, falls into the Amû. Bentink informs us, that Bâlk is, at present, the most considerable of all the towns possessed by the Mohammedan Tatars, being large, fair, and well peopled. Most of its buildings are of stone or brick; and its fortifications consist of earthen bulwarks, lined on the outside with a strong wall, high enough for its defence. The Khân's castle is a great structure, after the eastern fashion, built almost wholly of marble, dug out of the neighbouring mountains. The chief cause to which this prince owes his preservation, is the jealousy which reigns among the neighbouring powers; so that he is always sure of being assisted by one, when attacked by another.

As foreigners have free liberty to trade in this city, it is become the resort of all the business carried on between Great Bukhâria and the Indies. To this the fine river, before-mentioned, which passes through its suburbs, contributes not a little. Goods pay 2 per cent. going and coming; but passengers pay nothing at all.

Anderâb.

ANDERAB is the most southern city possessed, at present, by the Uzbeks; being situated at the foot of the mountains, which divide the dominions of the Great Mogul and Persia from Great Bukhâria. As there is no other way of crossing those mountains towards India, with beasts of carriage, but by the road through this city; all travellers, and goods, from Great Bukhâria, designed for that country, must pass this way, paying 4 per cent. On this account, the Khân of Bâlk maintains a good number of soldiers in the place, which otherwise is of no great strength. For the rest, Anderâb is very rich and populous, considering it is but small. The neighbouring mountains yield noble quarries of lapis lazuli, in which the Bukhârs drive a great trade with Persia and India.

Badagshân.

BADAGSHAN (or Badagshân) is a very antient city, and exceeding strong, by its situation, at the foot of those high mountains which separate Hindûstân from Great Tartary. It belongs to the Khân of Proper Bukhâria, and serves him for a kind of state-prison, to secure those he is jealous of. Although the town is not very big, yet it is well enough built, and very well peopled. The inhabitants are enriched by the mines of gold, silver, and rubies, which are in the neighbourhood. They who live at the foot of the mountains gather a great quantity of gold and silver dust in spring, brought down by the torrents, when the snow melts on the top.

Its situation.

THE mountains above-mentioned are called, in the Mungl language, Belûr Tâg, or the dark mountains; in which rises the river Amû, there called Harrat. Badagshân stands on the north side of it, above 100 miles from its source, 230 from Bâlk, and 210 from Anghien, in the province of Samarkant. It is a great thoroughfare for the karawans designed for Little Bukhâria, which take the same road.

Of the inhabitants of Great Bukhâria, their manners and customs.

Inhabitants.

THE inhabitants of Great Bukhâria are of three sorts. 1. The Bukhârs, who are the antient inhabitants. 2. The Jagatays, or Mungls, who settled there under Jagatay Khân, second son of Jenghîz Khân. And, 3. The Uzbek Tatars, who are the present possessors.

* BENT. ap. Abû'lgh. ubi supra, p. 466, & seq.

- a 1. ALL the great towns, both of Great and Little Bukhâria, from the borders of Karazm, ^{to Bukhâria} as far as China, are inhabited by the Bukhârs; who, being the antient people of those provinces, ^{have that name given to them throughout the east.} But the Tatars commonly call them Tajiks; which word, in their language, signifies nearly the same as burghers, or citizen (E). The Bukhârs are well set, and very fair, considering the climate; have generally large eyes, black, and lively; their faces are well-shaped; their noses hawked; hair black, and very fine; their beards thick. In short, they have nothing of the deformity which appears in the Tatars, among whom they inhabit. The women are generally large, and well-shaped, with fine complexions, and very beautiful features.
- b BOTH men and women use calico shifts and drawers, over which the men wear a vest of Thick cloth quilted silk, or calico; which reaches to the mid-leg, and is tied about the middle by a silk-crape girdle, which goes several times round. When they go abroad, they sling over it a long cloth gown, faced, and even lined in winter, with fur. Their head is covered with a round cloth bonnet, like the Polish, with a large fur border: some wear turbans, like the Turkish. Their boots are made like the Persian buikins, but not altogether so neat; and they have a very singular art of preparing horse-hides for the purpose. The women wear long gowns, full, and loose, of the same materials. They let their hair hang in tresses, adorned with pearls, and other jewels. Their bonnet is small, flat, and coloured. Their slippers like those worn in the north of the Indies.
- c ALL the Bukhârs profess the Mohammedan religion, nearly after the Turkish form, except- ^{Religion and} ing in some few ceremonies. They live by following mechanic trades, or commerce, which is ^{trade.} wholly in their hands: but, as seldom any foreign merchants arrive among them, especially in those parts where the Mohammedan Tatars are masters, they resort in numerous karawâns to China, the Indies, Persia, and Siberia, where they traffic to considerable advantage. Although they possess all the towns of these provinces, they never meddle with arms, leaving the business of war and government to the Eliths, or Kalmûks, and Uzbek Tatars, who are in possession, the latter of Great, the former of Little Bukhâria; to whom they pay tribute, which is regulated every year. On this account, the Tatars despise them extremely, as cowardly, simple people; of which several instances occur in Abû'lghâzi Khân's history.
- d THE Bukhârs are utterly at a loss as to their origin; further than that, by tradition, they ^{Their origin} came thither from some distant country. They are not divided into tribes, like the Tatars, ^{unknown.} and many other eastern people; whence many surmise, that they are the descendants of the twelve tribes carried, by Sardanasser king of Assyria, into Media; to which, their having the appearance of Jews, and many customs like theirs, seems to add weight. But our author thinks such conformities too weak for convincing proofs; and we are of opinion, that the Bukhârs not being divided into tribes, is an argument against, instead of for, that idle notion.

2. The Jagatay Tatars.

- c EVER since the reign of Jagatay Khân, second son of Jenghîz Khân, who had, for his ^{The Jagatays.} share, Great Bukhâria, and part of Karazm, those provinces bore the name of Jagatay, and his Tatar (or Mungl) subjects, whom he brought along with him, that of Jagatay Tatars; till Shabakht Soltân having driven out the descendants of Timûr Beg (or Tamerlan), the name of Jagatay gave place to that of Uzbeks. Yet our geographers continue to give the name of Jagatay to Great Bukhâria, although it has ceased above 200 years ago. However, it is still used, to distinguish the descendants of the Tatars who first possessed that region, from those who are the present masters of it, although both, making now but one mixed body, are comprised under the general name of Uzbeks. On the other hand, the troops, and other crown officers, of the Great Mogul of Hindîstân, are called Jagatays by the orientals, because they were the Jagatays who conquered that countryⁿ, under Soltân Babr, after he had been expelled out of Great
- f Bukhâria.

3. Uzbek Tatars of Great Bukhâria.

THE Uzbeks, who possess this region, are generally reputed the most civilized of all the Uzbeks dress, Mohammedan Tatars, although they are great robbers, like the rest. They are clothed, ^{dict.} both men and women, like the Persians (but not so neatly), as low as their boots, which are very clouterly; and the chief of them wear a plume of white heron feathers on their turbans.

ⁿ BENT. ap. Abû'lgh, ubi supra, p. 458, & seq.

(E) They give them this appellation, as a nickname, by way of contempt, for their living wholly in towns, and following merchandize; whereas the Tatars prefer the field, and treat commerce as a base, mean employment.

Their most delicious victuals are pillaw (which is rice sodden in broth) and horse-flesh. Their common drink is kumis (or kammez) and arak, both made of mares milk. Their language is a mixture of the Turkish, Persian, and Mungl tongues; yet they are able to understand the Persians, and the Persians them. Their arms are much the same with those used by the rest of the Tatars, viz. the sabre, the dart, the lance, and the bow, of a larger size than ordinary, which they manage with much strength and dexterity. They have used muskets for some time past, after the Persian manner. When they go to war, a great part of their cavalry wear coats of mail, and a little buckler, to defend them.

Robust and brave.

THE Tatars of this country value themselves on being the most robust and valiant of all the Tatars; and they must needs be people of courage, since the Persians, naturally very brave, are, in some measure, afraid of them. The women also of Great Bukhâria pique themselves on account of their valour. Bernier relates a very romantic story, which was told him by the Khân of Samarkant's ambassador sent to Aureng Zib. The truth is, that these women often go to war with their husbands, and do not fear engaging hand-to-hand with the enemy, when occasion requires it. They are, for the most part, very well made, and tolerably handsome; nay, some of them may pass for perfect beauties in any country.

Always at war.

THE horses of the Uzbeks have neither breasts nor buttocks: with the neck long and freight, like a stick; with the legs very high, and no belly: they are, besides, frightfully lean. But, for all this sorry appearance, they are exceeding swift, and almost indefatigable; very easily maintained withal: for a little grass, or moss, though ever so indifferent, satisfies them in time of need; so that they are the fittest horses in the world for the use which the Tatars make of them. Their masters are commonly at war with the Persians, their incursions being encouraged by the fine plains of Khorassan: but the mountains, inaccessible to their cavalry, hinder them for penetrating into the dominions of the Oreat Mogul. Such of them as feed on their cattle, live under portable huts, like their neighbours the Kalmûks, encamping where-ever they see convenient. But they who cultivate lands, dwell in the villages and hamlets; very few of them living in the cities or towns, which are all possessed by the Bukhârs, or antient inhabitants°. We shall speak of the origin, and other particulars, relating to the Uzbeks, when we come to the history of Karazm.

° ABU'LGH. ubi supra, p. 459, & seq.

CHAP. II.

A description of Little Bukhâria.

Its name;

THE name of Little Bukhâria is given to this country, not because it is less in dimensions than the Great Bukhâria, being in reality much larger: but because it is inferior to it, as to the number and beauty of its cities, goodness of the soil, abundance of inhabitants, and the like. The adjuncts of Great and Little seem to have been imposed, by the Uzbeks, to distinguish such part of the Bukhârs country, as is possessed by themselves, from that which was not subdued by them; and yet the name of Little Bukhâria is never used by Abû'lgâzi Khân, who speaks of Kâshgar, Yarkian, and other countries belonging to it, without comprising them under any general denomination. Before the Uzbeks conquered part of the Bukhârs country, the whole went by the name of Jagatay, or the country of Jagatay, son of Jenghîz Khân, to whose share it fell. It was also called, by the Persians, the kingdom of Kâshgar, from that province, which was the nearest and principal part of the whole. In the history of Timûr Bek, Little Bukhâria is considered as part of Mogulistân, and the country of Jetab, or the Jetes; whom the Persian geographers place in that part of Tartary which lies contiguous on the north.

Bounds and extent;

LITTLE BUKHARIA is surrounded by deserts: it has, on the west, Great Bukhâria; on the north, the country of the Elûths, or Kalmûks, in Tartary; that of the Mungls subject to China, on the east; on the south, Tibet, and the north-west end of China; from both which countries it is separated by two kobis, or deserts, of vast extent, which communicate with each other. It is situated between the 92d and 118th degrees of longitude, and between the 35° 30' and 45th degree of latitude; being in length, from east to west, about 850 miles; and in breadth, from south to north, 580: but if its dimensions be taken according to its semicircular course

- a course from the south to the north-east, its length will be 1200 miles, but its breadth never exceed 140.

THIS region is populous and fertile enough; but the great elevation of its land, joined to the high mountains which bound it in several parts, especially towards the south, renders it much colder than it ought naturally to be (A) by its situation. It is very rich in mines of gold and silver; but the inhabitants reap little benefit by them, because neither the Elûths (or Kalmîks), who are masters of the country, nor the Bukhârs, care to work in them. However, they gather abundance of gold every spring out of the gutters made by the torrents which fall from all sides of those mountains, when the snow melts; and from hence comes all that gold-dust which the Bukhârs carry into India, China, and Siberia. Much musk is likewise found in this

- b country; and all sorts of precious stones, even diamonds; but the inhabitants have not the art of either cutting or polishing them^a.

ALL Little Bukhâria consists of one long chain of mountains, with its branches extending through the kobi, or sandy desert, which, towards the foot of those hills, is interspersed with fruitful plains; so that it may be compared to a long reef of rocks and islands rising in the sea. Regis observes, that between the cities in this country there are no villages (B): whence it happens, that, in travelling a whole day from one to the other, there is not an house of entertainment to be found. He attributes this partly to the genius of the Tatars, who prefer tents to houses; and partly to the nature of the country, which is so divided by branches of the kobi, that it is habitable only in some particular places.

- c LITTLE BUKHARIA contains several distinct states, or countries; but their exact number, bounds, and dimensions, are not ascertained by authors. In the time of Goes the Jesuit, who travelled through it in 1603, it consisted of two kingdoms, Kâshgar in the west, and Ghalis in the east, both under one sovereign: at present it may be conveniently divided into four parts; the kingdom of Kâshgar, and the provinces of Aksû, Turfân, and Khamil, called by the Chinese Hami.

1. KASHGAR is the most western province of the four; or lies, more properly, to the south of Aksû. It hath, in the west, Great Bukhâria; from whence it is separated by a double chain of mountains, with deserts between them. On the south lies Tibet; and, to the east, the great kobi, or desert, which extends as far as eastern Tartary. It may be about 430 miles in length from south to north, and 350 broad from west to east: within this compass we do not meet with more than eight or nine towns mentioned by authors, of which only three are of any great consideration, viz. Kâshgar, Yarkian, and Khotan.

- KASHGAR, written by the Jesuits Hafikar, is called also Ardukand, according to Abû'l-feda. It lies to the north-west of the other two cities, towards the frontiers of Great Bukhâria, at the foot of the mountains which separate that province from the lesser. It stands on the east bank of a river which falls from those mountains, and loses itself in the desert, thirty or forty miles distant from the city. It was formerly the capital of the kingdom: but, as Bentink observes, is very much declined since the Tatars have been masters of it: however, there is still a pretty good commerce carried on with the neighbouring countries, though very inconsiderable to what it was^b. This city, before Jenghîz Khân's conquest, was, for a time, the capital of Turkestan, or the dominions of the Turks, in Tartary; likewise of the western Lyau, or Karakitayans: since then also it has been the seat of kings descended from Jagatay Khân, who seem to have reigned there till the conquest of Little Bukhâria by the Elûths in 1683.

- THE city of Yarkian, or Yerkian, according to Bentink, who writes Yerkeen and Yerkeben Yarkian the (C), is at present the capital of all Little Bukhâria, and situated to the north of Kâshgar, on the banks of a small river, whose waters are not reckoned wholesome. But, as to its situation, he was probably misinformed: for the Jesuits, in their map of this country (which they include in that of Tibet), place it to the south-east of Kâshgar, about ninety miles distant, and on a river, which rises in the mountains, about the same distance to the south-west, and falls into the lake of Lop, about six hundred miles from its source. The same author adds, that Yarkian is large, and pretty well built in the eastern way, altho' most of the houses are of sun-burnt bricks. There is a castle in this city, where the Khân of the Elûths comes to reside for a time, when his affairs require it; whence it is mistaken by some for the place of his usual residence. The country round Yarkian is very fertile in all sorts of fruits and pulse.

THIS city must needs be very populous, and the Bukhârs rich, as it is the centre of all the commerce carried on between the Indies and the north of Asia, Tibet, Siberia, Great Bukhâria,

^a ABU'LGH. hist. Turks, &c. p. 469, & seq.

^b Ibid. ubi sup. p. 471.

f (A) This seems to be contradicted by The present State of Bukhâria, where this country is said to abound with all sorts of fruits and vines; but that the heat is so excessive, that there is no bearing it without-doors. Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, p. 477.

(B) Yet Bentink, and the author of The Description of Bukhâria, say, the towns, which are about twenty, have a great number of villages depending on them. Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, p. 471.

(C) Others, Irken, Irgben, Jarken, Yarkhan, Yarkend, and Hiarkhan.

and China. The late emperor of Russia, Peter I. intended to have settled a regular trade with a Tartarian, by the river Irtish, which would have proved very advantageous to his dominions.

Hotan, or Khotan.

THE city of Hotan, or Hotom, is variously written by authors: 'tis called by Marco Polo, Totam; Hotom, in the map of the Jesuits; Koton, in other maps; Khoten by Bentink; and Khoton by the oriental historians. Abulfeda says, it was incredibly large, and that its inhabitants were originally of Kitay°. It was probably built by the Karakitayans (D) before-mentioned, who conquered this country, and founded a dynasty there in 1124^d. This city lies to the south-east of Turkistan, on the river Hotomnifelon, according to the above-mentioned map. According to Bentink, it is subject to the grand Khân of the Elûths; and still in a pretty flourishing condition, on account of its great traffick with Tibet and the Indies. Liberty of conscience is allowed here by the inhabitants, who are mostly Mohammedans, to all their pagan neighbours. The houses are built with bricks, and the circumjacent country is exceeding fruitful. The citizens pay a certain tribute to the Khân of the Elûths for his protection, and are not incommoded by his people.

Country of Akfu.

2. THE country of Akfu lies to the north of Kashgar, and west of the province of Turfân, about 300 miles in length, and seventy in breadth. Akfu (E), the chief town in this region, is frequently mentioned by travellers; but no account given of it, farther than it belongs to the kingdom of Kashgar. According to the Jesuits map, it stands on the north side of a small river, which runs south-east, and loses itself in the sands. The river Ili has its springs in the mountains in the north-east part of this province; and runs north-westward into Tartary, where it falls into the lake Parkati, about 120 leagues from its source. On the east side of this river, towards the said lake, the late Khâns of the Elûths used to fix their encampments, called Harkas, or Urga, as others write it. More to the west rise the Chui Muren and Talas Muren; on which last stands the town of Sayâm, according to the information of the Jesuits. Both these rivers, after a course of about 180 miles, fall into a lake situate in Great Tartary.

Turfân province.

3. To the east of Akfu lies the province of Turfân; which may be about 200 miles long, and 80 broad. It contains several towns, of which Turfân is the chief. Goes represents it as a strong, well-fortified city: but the later missionaries give no account of its present state, farther than that it is a considerable city, and that it is six days journey from Hami (or Khamil), over a branch of the kobi, or desert; but ten days, by the hills, to the north of this last city, which is the safer way.

Khamil province.

4. THE province of Khamul, Khamil (F), or Hami, as the Chineses call it, is about 180 miles long, and 80 broad. It contains only one small city, of the same name; but is full of houses, and has a few villages, as laid down in the Jesuits map. The inhabitants are a large-bodied people, and very robust; well-shaped, and very neat in their houses. It stands ninety leagues from the gate in the great wall of China called Kyayuquan, and has lands enough round it; yet extends no farther, because that whole tract is nothing but a dry sand, and the most barren part of all Tartary.

Religion, soil.

THIS country, tho' formerly inhabited by idolaters, is now free from them, being possessed by Mohammedans. The soil scarce produces any fruit, except melons; but those of an excellent flavour, and which will keep beyond the season, so as to be served up at the emperor of China's table all the winter°. Gerbillion indeed says, the country produces plenty of good fruits, besides melons and grapes^f. But then he was not in these parts, as the other missionaries were, from whom we have taken the former account.

Country of the Vigûrs.

THE provinces of Turfân and Khamil seem to have composed the country possessed formerly by the Vigûrs, Oygûrs, or Igûrs, whose capital, according to the oriental authors, was Bishbalig: but Gaubil places it eight or nine leagues to the east of Turfân, and names it Ho-chew (according to the Chinese), and says, it is still called Pe-ting-tu-hû-fû; whereas Bishbalig is situated, by him, to the north of Turfân, and the country of Almaleg to the west of that of Bishbalig^g. The Igûrs were likewise masters of the neighbouring parts of Tartary, as far as the river Irtish, and mount Altay.

The adjoining desert.

THE above-mentioned desert, lying between Khamil and the great wall of China, is part of the sha-mo, or kobi. As it affords neither air nor water, travellers, in crossing it, frequently lose their horses; for this reason the Tatars make use rather of dromedaries, who are content with little food, and can be five or six days without drinking. However, the whole desert is not included within this space of ninety leagues: for it has several branches, which, spreading

° Deser. Chorasm. p. 80. edit. Hudson.

China, vol. ii. p. 253.

^f Idem ibid. p. 262.

^d See before, p. 141.

^e DU HAIDE, Deser.

^g GAUBIL, hist. Gentch. p. 13, 126, 127.

(D) Whether the name be Khoton, Koton, or Hoton (which, in the Mungl language, signifies a city), or Khotom, seems uncertain.

(E) Akfu signifies white water; perhaps from the quality of its river.

(F) Marco Polo and Gore the Jesuit, write Khamul; Bentink, Khamil.

a here and there like so many infected veins, divide the country into as many plots, some dry, and quite uninhabited; others fertile enough to subsist a few Tatars^b.

The inhabitants of Little Bukhâria.

THE inhabitants of this country, tho' under the dominion of the Elûths, are, for the general, Bukbârs. These, according to The present state of Little Bukhâria, are generally sun-burned and black-haired; altho' some of them are very fair, handsome, and well-made. They do not want politeness; and are addicted to commerce, which they carry on with China, the Indies, Persia, and Russia. They who deal with them will be sure to be overreached, if they be not on their guard.

THE habits of the men differ very little from those worn by the Tatars. They fall as low as the calf of the leg, with sleeves very wide towards the shoulders, and close about the elbows. Their girdles are like those of the Poles. The garments of the women differ in nothing from those of the men, and are commonly quilted with cotton. They wear bobs in their ears twelve inches long; part and twist their hair in tresses, which they lengthen with black ribbands embroidered with gold or silver, and with great tassels of silk and silver, which hang down to their heels (G): three other tufts of a smaller size cover their breasts. They have necklaces ornamented with pearls; small pieces of coin, and several baubles, either gilded or silvered over, which make a glaring shew. Both sexes carry about them prayers written by their priests, and kept in a small leathern purse, in the nature of relics. The girls, and some of the women, tinge their nails red, with the juice of an herb called, by the Bukbârs, Kena: they dry and pulverize it; then, mixing it with powder-alum, expose it in the air for twenty-four hours before they use it, and the colour lasts a long time.

BOTH sexes wear close breeches, and boots of Russia leather, very light, and without heels, or leather soles; putting on galloches, or high-heeled slippers, like the Turks, when they go abroad. They wear also the same sort of bonnets, and covering for the head; only the women set off theirs with trinkets, small pieces of money, and Chinese pearls. Wives are distinguished from maidens only by a long piece of linen worn under their bonnets; which, folding round the neck; they tie in a knot behind, so that one end of it hangs down to the waist^c.

THE Bukbâr houses are of stone, and pretty good; but their moveables are few, and not very handsome; consisting only of some China trunks plated with iron. Upon these, in the day, they spread the quilts which they make use of at night, and cover them with a cotton carpet of various colours. They have likewise a curtain sprigged with flowers, and other figures; also a sort of bedstead half a yard high, and four yards long, which is hidden in the day with a carpet. They go to bed naked: but always dress when they rise. They are very neat about their victuals, which are dressed in the master's chamber, by his slaves, whom the Bukbârs either take or buy from the Kalmûks, Russians, and other neighbours: for this purpose, there are in the chamber, according to the largeness of the family, several iron pots, set in a kind of range, near a chimney. Some have little ovens, made like the rest of their walls, with a stiff clay, or bricks.

THEIR utensils consist in some plates and porringers of Capua wood, or of china, and in some copper vessels to boil tea and water. A piece of coloured callico serves them instead of a table-cloth and napkins. They use neither chairs nor tables, knives nor forks, but sit cross-legged on the ground; and, the meat being served up ready cut, they pull it to pieces with their fingers. Their spoons resemble our wooden ladles^k.

THEIR usual food is minced meats, of which they make pies in form of a half-moon: they serve for provision when they go long journeys, especially in winter, carrying them in a bag, after first exposing them to the frost; and, when boiled in water, make very good broth. Tea is their common drink, of which they have a black sort prepared with milk, salt, and butter, eating bread with it, when they have any^l.

As the Bukbârs buy their wives, paying for them more or less, according to their handsomeness; so the surest way to be rich, is to have many daughters. The persons to be married must not see or speak to each other from the time of their contract, till the day of marriage; which is celebrated for three days with feasting, as they do three great annual festivals. The evening before the wedding, a company of young girls meet at the bride's house, and divert themselves till midnight in playing, dancing, and singing. Next morning the guests assemble, and help her to prepare for the ceremony. Then, notice being given to the bridegroom, he arrives soon after, accompanied by ten or twelve of his relations or friends; followed by some playing on flutes, and by an Abûs (H), who sings, while he beats two little timbrels: then he makes a horse-race; which being ended, he distributes the prizes, six, eight, or twelve, in number, according to his ability. They consist in damasks, fables, fox-skins, callico, or the like. The parties do not see each other while the marriage-ceremony is performing, but answer at a distance to the questions asked by the priest. As soon as it is over, the bridegroom returns home with his company; and, after dinner, carries them to the bride's house, and obtains leave to speak to her. This done, he goes back, and returns again in the evening; at which time he finds her in bed, and, in presence of all the women, lays himself down by her in his cloaths, but only for a moment. The same farce is acted for three days successively. But the third night he goes to-bed to her in earnest; and, the next day, carries her home.

^b DU HALDE, ubi sup. p. 253. ^c BENTINK, ap. Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, &c. p. 476, & seq. ^k Idem ibid. p. 475, & seq. ^l Idem ibid. p. 422.

(G) These are the same called by Grueber northern Tartary women, of whose dress he has given a print.

Child-bearing. SOME husbands, by agreement, continue with their parents some time longer, and often a whole year, the wife remaining the same time with hers. But if she dies in the interim without children, her relations keep all which her spouse gave her, unless they are pleased to return him one half. The women are reckoned impure forty days after their delivery, and dare not say their prayers all that time. The child is named the third day after it is born, by the father, or some relation; who make it a present of a bonnet, piece of linen, or coat, as he can afford it: they are circumcised at the age of seven, eight, or nine.

Polygamy. ALTHO' polygamy is looked on as a sort of sin by the Bukbârs, yet it is never punished; so that some have ten wives, or more. Any man may at pleasure send back his wife; but then she is intitled to whatever he gave her during their cohabitation. The woman may also part with her husband; but then she cannot carry away the least thing which belongs to her.

Distempers soon cured. WHEN a Bukbâr falls sick, a Mullah is sent for, who reads to him a passage out of some book, and breathes on him several times; then, with a very sharp knife, makes several cuts over and on the side of his face. They imagine that, by this means, they cut the root of the distemper, which they say is caused by the devil. When any of them dies, the priest lays a korân on his breast, and recites some prayers. After this, the body is carried to the grave, which they commonly make in some pleasant wood, and inclose with a hedge, or palisade^m.

Money, and language. THE Bukbârs have no money but copper copeiks, which weigh near one third of an ounce. When they have silver or gold to receive or pay, they weigh it, as the Chinese and other nations doⁿ. Their language, according to Gerbillon, is apparently that of the Uzbeks, differing from the Mungl: but he adds, that this last is commonly understood, by means of the great commerce between the two nations^o.

All religions tolerated. ALTHO' the prevailing (or established) religion, in all the towns and villages throughout Little Bukhâria, is the Mohammedan, yet all others enjoy a perfect toleration; because the Kalmûks (or Elûths), who are masters of this country (though gross idolaters) think they ought not, in conscience, to suffer people to be molested on account of their belief. According to The Description of Bukhâria, the Bukbârs say, that God first communicated the korân to men by Moses and the prophets: that afterwards Mohammed explained and drew a moral from it, which they are obliged to receive and practise. They hold Christ to be a prophet, and have a singular notion about his birth.

Legend of Mary. THE virgin Mary, according to them, was a poor orphan; and her relations, disagreeing about the charge of her education, proposed to decide it by lot. They threw a feather into a vessel full of water, and agreed that he, to whose finger it stuck, should have the maintenance of the child; who, by that means, fell to Zakbariab's care; for the feather, tho' sunk to the bottom, rose, and fastened to his finger, the very instant he put it into the water. One time the business of the temple having kept him three days from home, upon recollecting that he had locked the child up, he ran back as fast as he could: but, instead of finding her dead, as he expected, she was surrounded with all sorts of eatables; which, as she told him, God had sent her.

Conception. THE first time this holy maid was taken after the manner of women, she went to bathe in a fountain which was in a great forest; where, frightened on hearing a voice, she ran to her cloaths: but presently an angel appeared, and told her, she should become with child, ordering her to name him Isay. Mary replied wisely, that lying-in would be painful to her, as she never had to do with any man. Hereupon the angel, breathing on her breast, made her comprehend that mystery; and instructed her in what it was necessary for her to know. In short, Mary conceived from that instant; and, the time of her delivery approaching, went to hide herself, for shame, in the same forest. There, falling in labour, she leaned against a decayed tree, and, in that condition, was delivered. When, behold! at the same instant, the rotten Brings forth Isay.

^m BENTINK ap. Abû'lgh. hist. Turks, p. 482, & seq. sup. p. 261, & seq.

ⁿ Idem ibid. p. 473.

^o DU HALDE, ubi

(H) The Abûs is a kind of priest.

a trunk began to put forth leaves; and the country all around to bloom as in spring. The angels came also; and, having bathed the new-born infant in a fountain, which suddenly appeared within two paces of the place, returned him to his mother; who, going back to her relations, was received with curses, and ill treatment. She took it all very patiently; and, without justifying herself, only desired her son to plead her cause. This he did immediately, with such strength of argument as intirely vindicated his mother; explaining to them the whole mystery of a birth so miraculous, and contrary to nature.

YOUNG Isay, in time, became a great prophet, and a doctor of high authority: but was generally hated and persecuted, especially by the great men, who often sought to slay him; and at last sent two considerable persons to make away with him; but, just as they were about to execute their design, God took him up to heaven, and punished the assassins in a singular manner: for, transforming them one after the other to the shape of Isay, they became exposed to the fury of the people; who, deceived by the resemblance, put them to a miserable death. His assumption.

ALTHO' the Bukhârs, as appears from what has been related, have no notion of the sufferings of Christ; yet they believe in the resurrection, and another life: but cannot be persuaded, that any mortal shall be eternally damned; on the contrary they believe, that, as the dæmons led them into sin, so the punishment will fall on them. They believe moreover, that, at the last day, every thing but God will be annihilated; and, consequently, that all creatures, the devils, angels, and Christ himself, will die. Likewise that, after the resurrection, all men, excepting a few of the elect, will be purified or chastised by fire, every one according to his sins, which will be weighed in the balance. Future state.

THEY say, there will be eight different array, or paradises, for the good; and seven hells, where sinners are to be purified by fire: that those, who will suffer most, are lyars, cheats, and make-bates: that the elect, who do not feel the fire, will be chosen from among the good; viz. one out of a hundred men, and one out of a thousand women; which little troop will be carried into one of the paradises, where they shall enjoy all sorts of felicities, till it shall please God to create a new world, in the room of the present. It is a sin, according to them, to say that the Deity is in heaven: God, say they, is every-where; and therefore it derogates from his omnipresence, to say he is confined to any particular place. Eight paradises.

THEY keep yearly a fast of thirty days, from the middle of July to the middle of August: during this time they taste nothing all day; but eat twice in the night, at sun-set and midnight: nor do they drink any thing but tea, all strong liquors being forbidden. Whoever transgresses these ordinances, is obliged either to emancipate his most valuable slave, or give an entertainment to sixty people: he is likewise to receive eighty-five strokes on the bare back with a leather strap called dura, by order of the Aguns, or chief-priest. Yet our author has observed, that the common people do not exactly keep this fast; and that workmen are allowed to eat in the day-time. They say prayers five times a day: before morning; towards noon; afternoon; at sun-set; and in the third hour of the night; notice being given them by their Abûs, or priests. Their Lent fast.

P BENTINK, ubi sup. p. 478, & seq.

C H A P. III.

The history of Great Bukhâria.

Of Jagatay Khân, and his successors.

e JAGATAY (or Chagatay) Khân, second son of Jenghîz Khân, was a most accomplished prince, and excelled the rest of his brothers. He was also more equitable; and observed, with greater exactness, the laws made by his father^a, whereof he was the keeper and administrator. He had something so severe in his countenance, that every-body was afraid to look at him: however, he was master of a great understanding; on which account Jenghîz Khân gave him for his share of the empire (A), all the country of Great Bukhâria, and half of Karazm; Empire of Jagatay.

^a LA CROIX, hist. Gengh. p. 394.

(A) 'Tis doubtful whether Jenghîz Khân made any such distribution; but he, as well as Batû in Kipjâk, governed under Oktay, on whom, and his successors, all the parts of the empire were dependent; till, by de-greed, they shook off their dependence on the immediate successors of Jenghîz Khân in the eastern parts of Tartary and China.

likewise the country of the Vigûrs (or Igûrs), the cities of Kâshgar, Badâgshân, Balk, and Gaznab, with their dependencies, as far as the river Sir-Indi (or Indus)^b. Abû'l-faraj and Mirkond agree nearly with this division; only the former throws in all Karazm to his lot, and adds Al Malig^c; which yet may be comprised within the countries of the Vigûrs and Kâshgar, that is, Little Bukhâria.

1. Jagatay
Khân.

THIS prince, after the death of his father, chose the city of Bishbâlek (in the country of the Igûrs) for the place of his residence: however, he lived almost continually with his brother Oktay, who loved and respected him as his master, altho' younger than he. In his absence his dominions were governed by Karajar or Karashar Noyan, whom Jenghîz Khân, at his death, gave him for his Wazîr, to preside in his counsels, and command his armies. This lord was one of the most powerful among the Mungls, and the fifth great ancestor, or grandfather, of the famous Timûr Bek, or Tamerlan^d.

A false prophet.
Hej. 630.
A. D. 1232.

As the country was governed with great wisdom and moderation, nothing disturbed the peace of it till the year 630; when Mahmûd, surnamed Tarâbi, from Tarâb, a country town six leagues from Bokbâra, having, by his false miracles, deluded an army of people, went at the head of them, and took that city. After this, he marched against the Mungl generals, who could not venture to attack him for a thick dust with which they were incommoded; inso-much that, although Mahmûd was slain by a random arrow-shot, in the midst of his camp, yet neither the enemy, nor his own soldiers, knew any thing of the matter. Mean time the Mungls, attributing this extraordinary dust to the impostor's skill in magic (B), fled for fear; and their shameful flight animating the Tarâbian rebels, they pursued them, killing above 10,000. At their return, they were surprised not to find their general: but being told, by those who were in the secret, that he had disappeared for a while, the credulous disciples set up his brothers Mohammed and Ali for his lieutenants in his absence.

His followers
exterminated.

By this means the flame spread, instead of losing ground; so that Karashar Noyan (or Nevian), seeing the principal cities daily reduced, at length assembled the chief forces of the empire, in order intirely to suppress the rebels. He began with the city of Bokbâra, which had favoured them; plundered the territory belonging to it, and slew a great number of the inhabitants. This obliged them to sue for pardon to Jagatay, whose clemency easily granted it; while his troops destroyed the Tarâbians without mercy.

Jagatay dies.
Hej. 638.
A. D. 1240.

JAGATAY KHÂN died in the year 638, which answers to the Mungl year of the Od, or Out, that is, the Ox^e: thus writes Kondamîr. But Abû'lghâzi Khân puts his death two years later, and gives this account of it: The Khân had in his court a forcerer, who could deceive people's sight, so as to make them think they saw whole armies march before them. Jagatay, having had the curiosity once to see some such representation, conceived so great an aversion to the man, that, on some complaint against him shortly after, he ordered him to be cast into prison, bound hand and foot, where he died: but the Khân himself was seized not long after with an incurable disease, which carried him off.

Wives and children.

AMONG a great many wives and concubines, Jagatay distinguished two above the rest, who were sisters, the daughters of Kaba Noyan, chief of the tribe of Kankrats (C). The first, named Bussulun, bore him many sons, whom he loved best of all his children. The name of the second was Tarkbân Khatun, whom he married after the death of the first. His sons were seven in number; Mutugan, Muji, Balda Shâh, Sagbin-lalga, Sarmans, Bussumunga and Baydar^f. According to Kondamîr, the eldest son of Jagatay Khân was named Manuka, who had three sons, Bayssur, Kara Hulagû, and Naliga, who succeeded each other. But the same author says, he had no successor who succeeded to all his dominions: for that his sons, and nearest relations, divided his empire among them; and those who had the longest sword, obtained the greatest share. However, we are told that thirty-one princes, who were either his sons or nephews, reigned in this country, called, after him, Jagatay.

2. Kara Hulakû.

THE first of these, according to La Croix, was Bisûmenkay Khân; the same doubtless with the Bussumunga of Abû'lghâzi Khân; who yet does not reckon him among the Khâns of Jagatay, placing Kara Hulakû as his immediate successor. On the other hand, the authors made use of by La Croix say, that Kara Hulakû, son of Metuka (D) (or Mutagan), ascended the throne after his brother Bisûmenkay, by the assistance of Karashar Noyan, who died during his reign, in the year 1254.

^b ABU'LEHAZI KHAN, hist. Turks, &c. p. 165.
^c LA CROIX, ubi supra.
^e ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 166.

^d D'HERBELOT. hist. orient. art. Giagathay, p. 391.
^f D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 390. LA CROIX, ubi sup.

(B) They are infatuated with a stupid notion, that storms of rain, hail, and dust, may be raised by inchantment.

(C) Kongrats, as others; called Hongkila in the Chinese history, as has been often observed before.

(D) Called, by others, Manuka. La Croix.

a MUBAREK SHAH, son of Kara Hulâkû, succeeded; but, as he was very young at his father's death, his mother Argata Khatun took the regency during his minority. La Croix calls her Argana Khatun, daughter of Nûr Alchi Gûrkbân, and makes her the third successor of Jagatay Khân. ^{3. Mubârek Shah.}

THE successor of Mubârek Shâh was Algû, son of Baydar, seventh son of Jagatay Khân; ^{4. Algû.} who, acknowledging Koplay for grand Khân of the Mungls in the east, had for his share all the country from the river Amû, bounding Persia, to mount Altay^s. La Croix calls this Khân Naligû, and sets him before Mobârek Shâh.

BARAK, or Berrâk Khân, son of Yasunta. This prince, in the second year of his reign, ^{5. Barak Khân.} embraced Mohammedism, and took the name of Gayazo'ddin^h. Kondamîr says, he was the son of Bayssur, son of Manuka (or Mutagun) before-mentioned: that he was one of the most considerable princes of his time; and attempted to take Khorassân from his cousin Abûka Khân, son of Holakû, who reigned in Irân, or Persia at large: that, not succeeding in his design, he turned his arms against Kublâi Khân, who reigned in the eastern parts of Tartary and China, where he made great ravages, but was forced to return without subduing any one considerable place: he died in 1260ⁱ. But, if so, he could not have had a war with Abûka Khân, who did not ascend the throne till 1264 (E).

AFTER Barâk Khân's death, the dignity of Khân was conferred on Begbi, son of Sarmans, ^{6. Beghi Khân.} son of Jagatay. La Croix calls this prince Nikepey, son of Saryan.

BUGA (or Buka) Timûr, great grandson of Mutagun, succeeded Begbi Khân. ^{7. Buga Timûr Khân.}

c DOYJI KHAN, son of Barâk Khân, succeeded Begbi Khân, and was reckoned a very just king: he is called by La Croix Dava Khân. ^{8. Doyji Khân.}

HE was succeeded by his son Konja Khân, called by La Croix Kavenjik Khân. ^{9. Konja Khân.}

BALIGA (or Baligû) who was also a grandson of Mutagun, succeeded Konja. ^{10. Baliga Khân.}

THE successor of Baliga in Great Bukhâria was Isan Buga, second son of Doyji Khân. He was named also Amul Khoja; and, on the death of Ilyas or Elias Khoja, son of Toglâk Timûr, ^{11. Isan Buga Khân.} was invited by the inhabitants of Kâshgar, and the rest of Little Bukhâria, to take the sovereignty of that country upon him, as will be related hereafter.

ISAN BUGA KHAN was succeeded by his brother Dui Timûr (left, we presume, to reign, ^{12. Dui Timûr Khân.} upon the other's removing to Kâshgar). This prince is called Dava Timûr by La Croix; who places, between him and Baligû, three Khâns, namely, 1. Abisuka, son of Dava (or Doyji) Khân; 2. Kepek Khân; 3. Elchi Keday Khân, son of Dava Khân^k.

DUI TIMUR had for his successor his brother Tarmashîr; who restored Mohammedism, ^{13. Tarmashîr Khân.} which, from the time of Barâk Khân, had so declined in Great Bukhâria, that scarce any footsteps of it remained. This Khân was slain by his brother Butan Khân, who afterwards seized the throne. The Persian historians, who name this prince Turmasîrîn, make him the sixteenth ^{14. Butan Khân.} Khân, and place his death in 1336: they say also, that he was much feared by his neighbours^l.

BUTAN KHAN was succeeded by his nephew.

JANGSHI, son of Ulugan, brother of Butan Khân. The brother of this prince, named Yasun ^{15. Jangshi Khân.} Timûr, ambitious of the throne, formed a design to make him away: but their mother, suspecting his design, advised Jangshi to be on his guard. Hereupon the Khân immediately took the field against his brother; but had the misfortune to lose the battle, with his life. La Croix calls this prince Jinkeshi, and makes him the immediate successor of Turmesîrîn Khân.

YASUN TIMUR, having thus by force ascended the throne, to be revenged on his mother ^{16. Yasun Timûr.} for discovering his conspiracy to his brother, like another Nero, caused her belly to be ripped up. La Croix calls him Bisîn Timûr Khân, son of Abuken.

DURING the reign of Yasun Timûr, Ali Soltân, a prince of the posterity of Ugaday, or ^{17. Ali Soltân Khân.} Oktay, became so formidable, that neither the Khân, nor the other princes descended from Jagatay, were able to make head against him; so that, after the death of Yasun Timûr, he brought Great Bukhâria under his subjection. La Croix makes Ali Soltân the nineteenth Khân.

AFTER the death of Ali Soltân Khân, Kazan Soltân re-entered into possession of the dominions belonging to the house of Jagatay Khân. This prince was the son of Yasur (or Yasur ^{18. Kazân Khân.} Aglen), son of Urek Timûr Khân, son of Kutugay, son of Bosay, son of Mutugan, son of Jagatay: so that there were, in all, sixteen Khâns of this last prince's posterity (F), who reigned, without interruption, 109 years over the provinces of Mawara'nabr (or Great Bukhâria).

^s ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 163. 167. ^h Idem ibid. & D'HERBELOT. art Barâk Khân, p. 183. ⁱ D'HERBELOT. ubi sup. p. 391. LA CROIX, ubi sup. p. 395. ^k ABU'LGH. & LA CROIX, ubi sup. ^l ABU'LGH. & DE LA CROIX, ubi supra. Hist. TIMUR BEK, vol. i. p. 18.

(E) Possibly this date is a mistake for 1270. See hereafter the reign of Abaka Khân, in the line of Hulakû.

(F) The Persian historians make him the twenty-first Khân of Jagatay; Abû'lgâzi Khân only the eighteenth, and the sixteenth of those who descended from Jagatay Khân.

After them there were indeed other Khâns in that country : but they were such as only bore the name of Khân, without having the power : each head of a tribe assuming the liberty of doing what he pleased, and obeying the Khân no farther than he thought fit^m.

Hej. 733. A. D. 1332. Death and character. SOLTAN KAZAN began his reign in the year 733 : but was very cruel ; and so tyrannical, that, when he sent for the princes his dependents to court on any occasion, they commonly made their wills before they went. Hereupon Mir Kazagan, one of the most considerable princes of his time, in conjunction with others, took up arms against him ; but were defeated in 746, and their leader wounded in the eye with an arrow by Kazân himself ; so that he not only lost that eye, but was wholly blinded for a long time after. The grand Khân hereupon returned to Kershi ; where he had the misfortune to lose so many horses by the severity of the winter, that almost all his cavalry was reduced to march on foot. Mir Kazagan, who had advice of this, without loss of time went and attacked the Khân ; who was slain in the battle, in the year 747.

19. Dâshmen-ja Khân. 20. Payân Kuli Khân. AFTER Kazân Khân's death, Mir Kazagan set on the throne a prince of the race of Oktay Khân, called Dâshmenja Aglen (G) : but soon after put him to death, and at length advanced to the dignity of grand Khân Bayân Kuli, son of Sorgâdû, son of Dava (or Doyji) Khân (H). This prince was esteemed for his justice and liberality ; while Mir Kazagan, who took on him the government of the kingdom, acquitted himself to the satisfaction of every-body, and his own glory. After his death, which happened by the hands of his son-in-law, on occasion of some affront, in 759, he was succeeded his son Mirza Abdollah, who confirmed Bayân Kuli Khân in his dignity : but soon after caused him to be assassinated, to obtain the empress, with whom he fell in love (I) ; and placed Timûr Shâh Aglen on the throne.

Hej. 759. A. D. 1357. 21. Timûr Shâh Khân. TIMUR SHAH KHAN was son of Bisîn (or Yasun) Timûr Khân, son of Ulagan, son of Doyji Khân. But he did not long enjoy his dignity : for the princes, shocked at Abdollah's proceeding, made war upon him ; routed his forces ; and, having taken his brothers, with the Khân, put them all to deathⁿ. La Croix makes him the twenty-fourth Khân ; and, in another place, says, the lords usurped his authority, because he was very weak in his understanding^o : but the usurpation did not begin in his reign.

22. Adel Soltân Khân. ADEL SOLTAN KHAN succeeded Timûr Shâh ; and was the son of Mohammed Pulad, son of Konza Khân, son of Doyji Khân. According to Abû'lghazi Khân, two heads of tribes, Amir Timûr, and Amir Hussayn, nephew of Abdollah, son of Amir Kazagan, seized the Khân ; and, binding him hand and foot, drowned him^p. It must be observed, that this author is a great enemy to these princes, especially Timûr, for taking the power from the descendants of Jenghiz Khân. However, 'tis likely the Khân was made away with by Hussayn ; for there is no mention at all of him, in the history of Timûr Bek, by Sharifo'ddin Ali, excepting occasionally ; where it is said, in speaking of his services done to Hussayn, that the Khân Adel Soltân having fled from Hussayn, of whom he was jealous, altho' he had raised him to the throne, Timûr even pursued, and seized him, after some resistance, and sent him to that prince^q. La Croix places Togal Timûr, and his son Elias Khoja (Khâns of Kâshgar), between Timûr Shâh and Adel Soltân, whom he makes the twenty-sixth Khân^r.

23. Kabûl Soltân Khân. KABUL SOLTAN KHAN, son of Dorji, son of Iljaktay, son of Doyji Khân, was, after the death of Adel Soltân Khân, established in his room by the two lords above-mentioned ; who, in his reign, seized the city of Bâlk, and slew the Khân^s. This happened in the year 765, according to Sharifo'ddin Ali ; who, without mentioning any thing of Adel Soltân Khân, says, that, after the defeat of the Getes, the princes of Great Bukhâriâ aiming at independency, Timûr and Hussayn, to prevent things running into confusion, found it necessary to elect a grand Khân : whereupon Kabûl Shâh Aglen was proposed, and chosen in a general assembly^t.

24. Soyruk Tamish Khân. AFTER the death of Kabûl Soltân Khân, Soyruk Tamish was advanced to the dignity of Khân. He was the son of Danishmanja, son of Kaydu, son of Kasbi, son of Ugaday or Oktay Khân^u. La Croix calls him Siorgatmish Aglen, son of Danishmend ; and says, Timûr gave him the empty

^m ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 168, & seq.

Gengh. p. 396.

Gengh. p. 396.

ubi sup. p. 171.

^p ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 171.

^q Hist. Tim. l. i. c. 26. p. 118, & seq.

^r Hist. Tim. l. i. c. 11. p. 53.

^s SHARIFO'D. hist. Tim. Bek, ch. 1. 2. p. 4. 14. & seq.

^t Hist. Tim. l. i. c. 26. p. 118, & seq.

^u ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 171.

^o Hist.

^p Hist.

^q Hist.

^r Hist.

(G) Hezarfen, a modern Turkish author, calls him Danishmanja Khân, son of Isur Aglen, according to a note in the history of Timûr Bek, translated by La Croix ; which shews, that the list given by him, in his history of Jenghiz Khân, is taken from Hezarfen ; but Abû'lghazi Khân, instead of Danishmanja, puts Amir Kazagan himself ; and says, he was the son of Danishmanja, son of Kaydu, son of Kasbi, son of Ugaday (or Oktay), son of Jenghiz Khân. He says likewise, that he was slain after a two years reign ; nor was it known by whom. But, as the account given by Sharifo'ddin Ali, author of Timûr Bek's history, cannot well fail of being the truth in these two particulars, we have therefore chosen to follow him.

(H) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, he was the son of Surga, son of Doyji Khân, son of Berrak Khân, the fifth of those before mentioned.

(I) According to Abû'lghazi Khân, p. 170. Bayân Kuli Khân had him slain, on suspicion of having a criminal correspondence with his wife : but Sharifo'ddin Ali, our author, is more to be relied on.

a title of Khân, without leaving him the least part of the power^w. He was made Khân in 1369 by Timûr; who, after Hussayn's death, ordered the Khân, Kabûl Shâh (or Soltân), made by that prince, to be slain^x. Siorgatmish reigned nineteen years, dying at Bokhâra, in the year 1388, while Timûr was in his march to Karazm. He was buried at Kâsh, under a monument which he had erected himself. Timûr, as soon as he returned to Samarkant, established Soltân Mahmûd, the late Khân's son, in his father's place^y.

MAHMUD KHAN: whose name Timûr caused to be written on the top of his orders; to make the people believe that he observed the laws of Jenghîz Khân^z, that is, in acknowledging one of his descendants for Khân. This titular prince followed Timûr in his expeditions, particularly that against Bayezîd; and was often sent to make inroads into the Othmân territories; in one of which he died, in 1402, near Sattala in Anatolia (K), where he was seized with a violent distemper^a.

LA CROIX adds another Khân, as the thirty-first, whom he names Tumen Kotluk Aglen; and says, he was crowned by Timûr, in 1690: which could not be, since Mahmûd lived twelve years after. This, therefore, is the last of the Khâns of the race of Jenghîz Khân, who reigned in the empire of Jagatay; for, after Timûr's death, the dignity of Khân was suppressed by his successors, who governed in their own name, and founded a new dynasty.

^w Hist. Gengh. p. 396.

^x Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 124. 128.

^y Idem, p. 316.

^z Idem ibid.

^a Idem, l. v. c. 54. p. 270.

(K) Abû'lghâzi Khân, p. 175, says, Timûr put both Mohammed (or Mahmûd) Khân and Bayezîd to death: but neither seems to be the fact.

C H A P. IV.

The history of Little Bukhâria.

Of the descendants of Jagatay Khân, who reigned in Little Bukhâria.

c ALTHO' Jagatay Khân had to his share both the Bukhârias; yet, after his death, the empire, as hath been already mentioned, became divided among the princes of his family, every one seizing a part, according to his power. 'Tis likely, therefore, that Little Bukhâria separated very early from the Greater; and had a succession of Khâns, till about the beginning of the fourteenth century: when, by some means or other, not mentioned by the authors yet come to hand, the line happened to fail. On this occasion, therefore, we are told by a Tartarian author, that the inhabitants of the cities of Kâshgar and Tarkian, and of the countries of Alatakh and the Vigûrs (or Igûrs), finding none of Jagatay's posterity among them, who was capable of filling the vacant throne, saw themselves under a necessity to call in Amul Khoja, who then reigned in Great Bukhâria, under the name of Isan Boga Khân^a.

d This prince, who was the son of Doyji Khân (and eleventh in that succession), having no children by his wife Satil Tamish, got a slave of his, called Manlaghi, with child. Hereupon Satil Tamish, being incensed, one day, when the Khân was gone a hunting, gave her in marriage to a Mungl chief, named Shiragol, and obliged him to carry her with him into his own country. Amul Khoja, at his return, was informed of what had been done; but, not caring to have any words with his wife, seemed to take no notice of it. Some time after this he died; and, as he left no issue, the state became rent in pieces by the different factions. In this extremity Amîr Yalawji, one of the principal lords of Kâshgar, sent Tash Timûr in quest of Manlaghi; whom at length he found, with her son, called Togalak (or Togluk), playing with his brother-in-law. After this, watching his opportunity, he carried off the boy; who, on his arrival at Kâshgar, was immediately proclaimed Khân by Amîr Yalawji, under the name of Togolak Timûr Khân. (This happened about the year 748.)

e A GREAT part of this Khân's reign was spent in suppressing the factions which opposed him in the countries above-mentioned: but, when he had settled his affairs there, he entered with a powerful army into Great Bukhâria, and brought that province also under his obedience (A). Then, leaving his son Elias Khoja to govern in Samarkant, he returned to the city of Kâshgar, where (about two years after) he died.

^a ABU'LGH. hist. Turks, &c. p. 176.

(A) This was about the year of the Hjrah 762, of Christ 1360; and will be related more at large hereafter; in the history of Timûr Bek, or Tamerlan.

TOGALAK TIMUR was the first descended from Jenghîz Khân, reigning in Kâshgar, who embraced the Mohammedan religion. As he was one day hunting, he observed several foreign merchants in the place which he had pitched on for assembling the game, contrary to his express proclamation. Hereupon, in a passion, he ordered them to be brought bound before him; and asked, how they came to infringe his laws? Sheykh Samalo'ddin, who was among them, answered, that they were ignorant of any such prohibition, as being strangers from the country of Kattak. The Khân replied, It is like you are Tajiks, and, consequently, worse than dogs. If we were not true believers, rejoined the Sheykh, there would be grounds for making no more account of us than dogs; because, in that case, notwithstanding the reason we are endowed with, we should yet be less reasonable than beasts^m.

Turns Mohammedan;

THIS answer having touched the Khân's heart, at his return from the chase he sent for the Sheykh, and, in private, said to him, What is your religion, that you durst make me such an answer a while ago? The Sheykh, upon this, explained the articles of the Mohammedan faith; wherewith Togalak Timûr was so fully convinced of its truth, that he ordered him to repair, at a proper season, to concert the means for establishing it in his dominions. The Sheykh dying soon after his return home, his son Sheykh Rashîdo'ddin, pursuant to his father's orders, repaired to Kâshgar: but, not being able to get access to the Khân, he went one morning to a hill near the castle, where he said his prayers so loud, that he awaked Togalak Timûr; who thereupon sent to him, to know the reason why he bawled so dreadfully. The Sheykh taking this opportunity to execute his execution, that prince would no longer defer embracing Mohammedanism. All the lords of his court followed his example, excepting one; who, standing forth, offered to put his conversion on this issue: There is, said he, among our people, a man endowed with extraordinary gifts; now, if the Sheykh will venture a fall with this person, and throws him, I will embrace his religion; otherwise I will not. The Khân was unwilling to permit such a skill; but, the Sheykh pressing for liberty to accept of the challenge, he at length consented. Rashîdo'ddin hereupon advancing up to the Mungl, with one backstroke of his hand on the stomach, laid him flat on the floor, where for a good while he remained motionless. At length, getting up, he fell at the Sheykh's feet, and declared he was ready to become a Moslem (B). The lord, who had proposed this test, did the same: and all the Mungls who were subject to Togalak Timûr Khân, to the number of 160,000, followed their example.

with all his subjects.

3. Ilyas Khoja Khân.

AMIR YALAWSI, who was instrumental in the Khân's advancement, happening to die, Togalak conferred on Amîr Khudaydat, tho' but seven years old, all his father's employments. Hereupon Kamro'ddin, the youngest of the Amîr's five paternal uncles, desired that he might officiate for his nephew till he came of age. This request the Khân not thinking proper to grant, Kamro'ddin, who was very ambitious, as well as powerful, conceived a mortal hatred against him; yet concealed it during his life: but, after his death, revolted against his son Ilyas Khoja (or Elias Kojâ), who succeeded in the throne of Kâshgar (C), and caused him, with all his family, to the number of eighteen persons, to be assassinated: then, seizing the government, gave the people liberty, by proclamation, to kill any of Togalak Timûr's kindred, who were to be found. This Khân was born in the year 730 (1329); came to the crown at the age of eighteen (that is, in 1347); and died at the age of thirty-four (or in 1362).

4. Kamro'ddin usurper.

AT the time of Kamro'ddin's revolt, Amîr Aga Khatûn, one of Togalak's wives, being delivered of a son named Kezra Khoja; to secure him from the tyrant, trusted him to the care of Amîr Khudaydai, who never could be prevailed on by his uncle to deliver up the young prince; and, war breaking out afterwards between Amîr Timûr (who reigned in Marwara'n-nabr, now Great Bukharia), and the usurper, Khudaydat took that opportunity to send him, under a trusty guard, to the mountains of Badâghshân, where the jasper is found. This war was carried on for some years with much fury; and such equality, that, after five bloody battles, it seemed doubtful which would in the end get the advantage. At length Timûr advancing with a powerful army, at a time when Kamro'ddin fell sick, the troops of Kâshgar, destitute of a chief, betook themselves to flight, not daring to wait for the enemy. As for Kamro'ddin, he was, in this confusion, carried for security, into certain deserts to the east of the capital city: but, after the retreat of Timûr's army, he never could be found (D); although a great

^m ABULGH. ubi suprà, p. 177, & seq.

(B) All this might have been a politic contrivance of the Khân, the better to confirm, and bring about, this great change with the rest of his subjects; for, otherwise, it was a foolish and precarious way of proving the truth of any thing.

(C) See more of this prince in the history previous to the reign of Timûr Bek.

(D) It does not appear when this happened, possibly about 1375, or 1383. See hist. Tim. Bek, l. ii. c. 19. p. 176, & c. 42. p. 235; also the reign of Timûr hereafter.

^a while after his subjects understood, that he resided with one Malek Ajân (E), a man of whom yet nothing is known.

AMIR KHUDAYDAT (F), having hold of this opportunity, brought back Kezra Khoja from his obscure retreat, and caused him to be proclaimed Khân, with the usual solemnities. This ^{5. Khezra Khoja Khân;} prince reigned thirty years over the country of Kâshgar: and all those who have since possessed that throne, have been of his posterity ^c. We know very little of the actions of this prince, excepting what we find in the history of Timûr Bek, who made war on him in 1389, ravaged his country, and capital city Aymal Gîjû; pursued him on one side, beyond the river Irtîsh, and, on the other, to Taldîz (or Yalis) and Karakoja (or Aramuth, near Khamîl, in Little Bukharia); in short, drove him out of Jetab. Next year he made another expedition into ^b the same country; and, at Al Maleg, hearing of Kamro'ddîn, followed him beyond the Irtîsh, driving him into the woods towards Tawlas ^d.

This is all the account we can find relating to this branch of Jagatay Khân, excepting a few scattered particulars. Among the rest, Mahamed was Khân of the kingdoms of Kâshgar Succession and Chalis (that is, of Little Bukharia), in 1603, when Goes the Jesuit travelled through the extinct country, in his way to China; so that, by the foregoing authority of Abû'lghazi Khân, he must have been descended from Kezra Kojâ, as well as the Khân, who reigned in 1665, when that prince finished his history: but eighteen years after, viz. in 1683, Little Bukharia was subdued by the Eldûts, or Kalmûks, as hath been before related ^e.

^c ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 179, & seq. before, p. 443.

^d Hist. TIM. BEK. l. ii. c. 3. p. 325. & c. 9. p. 345. ^e See

(E) It appears from the same history of Timûr Bek, l. iii. c. 9. p. 346, that he was living in 1300, at which time he fled across the Irtîsh, towards the city of Tawlas, into the woods, where fables and ermins are found. See hereafter, in the reign of Timûr.

(F) Or Khudadad, a name common among the Mungls: Timûr had a general or two of the same name.

BOOK IX.

The history of the descendants of Jenghîz Khân, who reigned in Irân, or Persia at large.

CHAP. I.

The reign of Hulagû Khân.

^c FROM the death of Jenghîz Khân, which happened in 625 of the Hejrah, of Christ, Western expe- 1227, the country of Irân (or Persia at large), with the neighbouring countries dition. which he had conquered, were governed by officers appointed by his successors, who reigned at Karakorum, in the eastern parts of Tartary, till the year 651; when Mangu (A), fourth Khân of the Mungls, with a design to extend his empire, raised three great armies: one of them was sent towards Hindûstân, or India; the second to Korea; and the third into Irân. This last, which was the most considerable of the three, the Khân intrusted to the conduct of his brother Hulâgû, who had a general under him of great learning and experience, called Kokân. This army, in the Chinese history, is said to have been designed against the Khalîfah of Bâghdâd ^a; whereas, according to the Persian historians, the Khalîfah was attacked by the under Hulâkû.

^a GAUDEL, hist. de Gengh. p. 113, 136.

(A) In the Chinese history, named Mengko, which seems to be the Chinese pronunciation.

persuasion of a famous Persian astronomer. Possibly it had no particular destination : but was sent in general to make farther conquests, and keep the countries already subdued more in subjection ; by the presence of great forces, and a prince of the blood, who was to unite the whole under one government.

WE have already given some account of this expedition of Hulâkû from the Chinese historians^b ; who, having had very imperfect and confused informations of the affairs of the western parts of the Mungl empire, we shall make no use of them here ; but follow those who lived on the spot, or in the neighbourhood of the countries which were the scenes of action.

Enters Irân. HULAGU (B), the son of Tuli Khân, fourth son of Jenghiz Khân, was surnamed Il Khân ; from whence his posterity took the title of Ilkhanians^c. This prince crossed the Jibûn in the year 653, to enter Irân. He was accompanied by his brother Sontay Ogul, and several great lords from divers parts. He carried with him also his eldest son Abâka, and another called Yasîmun (*), with his wives Dukuz Khatûn, a christian lady, and Al Jay Khatûn. In the ninth of Sbaaban 652, arriving before Samarkant, he encamped there, and lost his brother Sontay Ogul. Soon after Amîr Argûn (made governor of the countries to the south of the Jibûn in 650 (C) came to wait on him, with several lords of that province^d. The first thing Hulâkû did, after examining into the state of the country, was, to purge it of the Ismaelians, who had for a long time committed great disorders there.

Affassins of Irâk. THESE Ismaelians were certain princes, who reigned over part of Persian Irâk, and Mazanderân (D). Their subjects were so devoted to them, that, at their command, they undertook to kill any prince, or other person ; which procured them the name of assassins. There was another dynasty of them in Syria ; whose prince is the same mentioned by the writers of the crusade, under the name of the old man of the mountain ; which is only a bad translation of the Arabic Shaykh al-Jebal (E) ; which word Shaykh expresses not the age, but dignity, of a prince. The Mohammedan writers, moreover, lay to their charge errors in faith ; and, for this reason, give them no other name than that of Melâbedab, or Molbedûn (F), which signifies impious.

Their dynasty. THEIR dynasty consisted of eight princes, who reigned the space of 170 years, till 654 ; when Hulâkû put an end to it, in the person of Rokno'ddîn Khuz Shâb, the last king, from whom he took all his castles in Jebal, which were exceeding strong, and well provided with necessaries^e.

Castles taken. THIS prince had but just succeeded his father Alao'ddîn, when Hulâkû ordered his commanders to attack his castles : five of which he demolished, as not being judged tenable. Before the order reached Kayfran, Kaydbuka had already taken the castle of Shahediz (G), and three other castles, from them. Il Khân, therefore, arriving at Abâsabâd (H), Rokno'ddîn sent a youth but seven or eight years old, who pretended to be his son, in token of submission. Hulâkû, although aware of the deceit, received and dismissed the child with honour. After that, he sent his brother Sbîrân Shâb, accompanied by 300 persons, whom the Mungl prince sent to Jamâlabâd, near Kazwîn ; but dismissed Sbîrân Shâb to tell his brother, that he would allow him only five days to submit himself. Rokno'ddîn signified by an ambassador, that he dared not then come out, for fear of his people, who would fall on him ; but would wait on him the first opportunity. Hulâkû, finding that he wanted only to protract the time, marched, and encamped before the castle of Maymûn Darab. Hereupon Rokno'ddîn declared, he would immediately come forth : but, being prevented by the Molâbedab and Fedayi, Hulâkû bid him wait a while. Then ordering his troops to attack the castle, Rokno'ddîn took the opportunity, while his people were engaged in repulsing the besiegers, to retire to the Mungl camp, with his sons and chief favourites ; where he was kindly received by Il Khân.

His territories reduced. THOSE in the castle, perceiving with how much honour their prince was treated, presently surrendered the fortress ; which was demolished by the Mungls, who soon reduced all the castles which were in that valley. After this, the governor of Al Mût (or Al Marwt) (†) was summoned to surrender that fortress, and refused : but, on the approach of a great body of troops, delivered it up in the eleventh month. At the same time Shâmso'ddîn, governor of the

^b See before, lib. iv. c. 4. ist. dyn. p. 329, & seqq.

^c D'HERBEL. bibl. orient. art. Il Khân, & Holagû.

^d ABU'LFARAJ.

^e D'HERBELOT. ubi supra, p. 503, 620. art. Ismaelioun & Molhedoun.

h

(B) Called also Halâkû and Hulâgû.

(*) In other copies, Tasmerun.

(C) He held the government of them for thirty-nine years, as is noted in the reign of Baydu Khân.

(D) In Khubestân (that is, the mountain country), which makes the northernmost part of Irâk ; and Rûdbâr, a territory of Mazanderân.

(E) Shaykh al-Jebâl signifies not properly the prince of the mountain ; but the prince of Al Jebâl, a part of Persian Irâk ; so called by the Arabs, being a translation of the Persian name Kûbestân, which signifies the mountain country. In this sense Shaykh al-Jebâl is to be understood, if applied to the Ismaelian prince of Klûbestân ; but, if to him of Syria, it must be rendered prince of the mountain.

(F) Melâbedab Khûbestân wa Rûdbâr, the impious of Khûbestân and Rûdbâr.

(G) In other copies, Shâberir.

(H) Ayâzabâd, in other copies.

(†) That is, the castle of death.

a castles belonging to Kabestân (I), which were fifty in number, received orders to demolish them ; in which he was assisted by those who accompanied Rokno'ddîn. All of them were taken, excepting two, Kazdkûb and Lamjâr (K), which could not be reduced in less than two years. The prince also made peace with Hulâkû, on condition to destroy their castles. After which, that prince returned in Dbulhajjeh to the Orda, near Hamadân, and sent Rokno'ddîn, with his sons and wives, to Kazwîn.

In 655 Rokno'ddîn Khâz Shâh desiring to be sent to Mangû Khân, to pay his respects to that monarch, he set out, accompanied by nine of his retinue, and two ambassadors dispatched from Hulâgû. When he arrived at Karakuram, instead of being admitted to the Khân's presence, he was ordered to return, and prevail on his governors to surrender the two castles before-mentioned ; after which, he was told, that he might repair to court, and should be received with honour. With this hope Rokno'ddîn left Karakuram ; but, in the way back, was slain, with those who accompanied him. Hulâkû likewise received a mandate from his brother Mangû, to extirpate the Molâbedab intirely, and leave no footsteps of them remaining. Upon this, he sent Kara Kay Alyabtaktaji to Kazwîn, where he put to death all Rokno'ddîn's family, and slew all the Molâbedab forces : at the same time Utkubâna Nowayn (L), having assembled 1200 subjects of the Ismaelians, put them all to the sword^f.

The same year Hulâkû ordered Azzo'ddîn and Rokno'ddîn to divide the dominions of Rûm between them. The first of these two brothers had dethroned the other, and imprisoned him : but, in 653, Bayejû, the Mungl general in Azerbejân, being obliged to remove his quarters, to accommodate Hulâkû with them, demanded of Azzo'ddîn a place to winter in. This prince, imagining that he fled from Hulâkû, marched to attack him, and was defeated. Hereupon Bayejû released Rokno'ddîn out of prison, and placed him on the throne. On the complaint, therefore, of Azzo'ddîn, in 655, Hulâkû ordered the partition above mentioned ; pursuant to which, Rokno'ddîn repaired to Bayejû's camp, and Azzo'ddîn returned to Koniya (or Ikonium) : but, being afraid of Bayejû, assembled an army of Kürds, Turkmâns, and Arabs ; which, however, was dispersed by Bayejû and another Nowayn : so that Malatîya, and several other places, submitted to Rokno'ddîn. But, Bayejû being soon after recalled towards Irâk^g, things took a turn again in favour of Azzo'ddîn, as hath been elsewhere related^h. Let us now return to Hulâkû.

d. This prince, during the time that he was besieging the castles of the Molâbedab, sent an ambassador to the Khalîfah Al Mostâasssem, to desire his assistance. The Khalîfah would have answered his request ; but the Wazîrs and princes opposed it (M) ; alleging, that Hulâkû did not want forces, but made the demand only to weaken Baghdâd (N), that he might the more easily take it. When the castles were reduced, Il Khân sent another ambassador to reproach Al Mostâasssem for neglecting to send him succours. The prime Wazîr, being consulted what was to be done on this occasion, told them, that the prince ought to be appeased with very rich presents ; but while they were getting them ready, Dowaydâr and his party insinuated as if the Wazîr corresponded with the Tatars, and intended to betray them ; for this reason the Khalîfah, instead of many costly things, sent only a few of little value. Hulâkû, provoked more at this, gave the Khalîfah to understand, that he should repair to the camp himself, or send thither either the Wazîr Dowaydâr, or Soleymân Shâh. But, as none of them would obey Al Mostâasssem's command to go, he sent others ; which not satisfying Hulâkû, he ordered Bayejû Nowayn and Sunjak Nowayn (O) to march by the way of Erbel (or Arbela), while himself took the road through Holwân.

On this advice, Dowaydâr set out from Baghdâd, and advanced near Taakuba : but, hearing that Bayejû had passed the Tigris, and encamped on its western bank, in the belief that Hulâkû was there, left Taakuba, and posted himself over-against Bayejû. Mean time Ibeg al Hâlebi, one of the Khalîfah's Amîrs, having fallen into the hands of the Mungl scouts, they brought him to Hulâkû. On the promise of security, he undertook to conduct his army ; and wrote to his friends at Baghdâd, advising them to consult their own safety, by submitting to the Mungls.

^f ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 330, & seq.

^g Idem ibid. p. 330—334.

^h See before, p. 233, & seqq.

(I) A mistake, perhaps, in the copy, for Khûbestân, a part of Persian Irâk.

(K) In some copies, Kerdkûb and Lamshabr : in D'Herbelot, Kudkûb and Temser. Bibl. orient. p. 503. art. Ismaelioun.

(L) Ikujaba, in some copies.

(M) According to the authors mentioned in the next note, those ministers returned a very injurious answer to Hulâkû's letters ; and threatened him with the anger of God, and the Khalîfah. Lower down, this answer seems to be ascribed to other persons, and to be sent on another occasion.

(N) According to the authors made use of by D'Her- belot, Hulâkû intended, after destroying the Ismaelians, to have marched directly, through Anatolia, to Constantinople ; but was dissuaded by Nasîro'ddîn al Tusi, the famous astronomer, who advised him to turn his arms against the Khalîfah, out of a private pique. Bibl. orient. p. 453. art. Holâgû.

(O) Or Sowinjâk. According to the Persian authors, Hulâgû did not immediately march against Baghdâd ; but spent a long time in making marches and counter-marches, to conceal his design. At length, in 655, he of a sudden turned on that side. D'Herbelot, as in the note before.

for that they were not able to cope with such numerous forces. But they, in answer, haughtily asked, "Who was Hulâkû, and what his forces, to oppose the family of Abbâs, who held the empire of God himself? and even threatened him with the anger both of the Deity and the Khalîfah, for daring to set foot within his dominions (P)." They added, "If he desired to make peace, that he should return to Hamadân, while they intreated Dowaydâr to intercede for him to the Khalîfah, who possibly might pardon his fault." When Ibeg shewed the letters to Hulâkû, that prince only laughed, considering them as an instance of their vanity and rashness¹.

The city
besieged,

AFTER this, Dowaydâr, hearing that the Tatars took the road to Anbâr (*), marched against them; and, meeting Suwinjâk Nowayn, put his troops to flight: but, being met by Bayejâ, he obliged them to turn back with him; and falling, with all their forces, on the victor, defeated him, and slew most of his soldiers; so that he escaped to Bâghdâd with only a few followers. Mean time Hulâkû, in the middle of Moharram 656, encamping opposite to a gate of the city, the Mungls, in one night, built a Siba, or wall, inclosing the eastern side; while Buka Timûr, Suwinjâk Nowayn, and Bayejâ Nowayn, did the same on the west side. They likewise dug deep ditches within the Siba; and, placing their battering-rams, with other engines of war, against the city, on the twenty-second of the same month the attack began; when the Khalîfah, perceiving his inability to defend the place, sent his president of the Diwân, and Ebn Darnûs, to make submission to Hulâkû, with presents of no great value; lest, if they were costly, it might be interpreted as a mark of great fear. Being asked, why Dowaydâr and Suleymân Shâh did not come to him? The Khalîfah sent the Wazîr Alkâmî; who said, in the person of his master, "You demanded one out of the three; and I have sent the Wazîr, who is the greatest of them." Hulâkû answered, "When I was at Hamadân, any of the three would have done; but now I shall not be satisfied with one of them."

and taken,

MEAN time, as the siege went on vigorously on every side, Hulâkû ordered arrows to be shot into Bâghdâd; with billets, promising security to the doctors, and all such as did not bear arms, their families and effects. On the twenty-sixth the Mungls forced the walls of the city; and watched the river, that none might escape by water. Then Hulâkû ordered Dowaydâr and Suleymân Shâh to come to him: but left the Khalîfah at liberty to do as he thought fit. Those two lords accordingly came forth, attended by a great number of the nobility; but, on the way, Dowaydâr turned back, under pretence of taking care lest the soldiers, who were posted in the streets and lanes, should kill any of the Mungls; yet next morning, when he came out of the city, he was killed himself. The inhabitants, after this, sent deputies to intreat protection: and the Khalîfah, seeing there was no way to avoid it, on the fourth of Saffar repaired to the camp, with leave of Hulâkû, who ordered him to lodge in the gate called Kahwâd. Then entering the city, to see the Khalîfah's palace, he commanded that prince to be brought before him. Mostâasssem made him a present of precious stones and pearls, which he distributed amongst his commanders. In the evening, returning to his camp, he ordered the Khalîfah to set apart all the women belonging to him, or his sons, amounting to 700; whom, with 300 eunuchs in their service, he brought forth. After the Mungls had plundered the city for seven days, they ceased either to slay, or make any more captives. The fourteenth of the same month Hulâkû departed from Bâghdâd; and, when he was encamped at night, ordered the Khalîfah, his middlemost son, and six eunuchs, to be put to death².

by the treachery

KONDAMIR, and other oriental historians, relate this important event with other circumstances. According to them, Hulâkû, being incensed with the answer of the Khalîfah's ministers to his letters, ordered his generals to march on both sides of the Tigris, to besiege Bâghdâd. The Mungl troops, which daily increased, ravaged the neighbouring country to such a degree, that in a little time it was intirely ruined; so that they had difficulty to find even grais for their horses. The Tatar army, which consisted wholly in cavalry, having no longer wherewithal to subsist, Hulâkû must have been forced to raise the siege, and retire with shame, as well as loss, if it had not been for the treachery of Atûde ebn Amrân, a slave of a neighbouring governor; who, according to the Nighiariştân, dreamed, the year before, that the house of the children of Abbâs, was on the point of falling; and that he himself should become master of Bâghdâd, and the dominions of the Khalîfah. Ebn Amrân, who happened to be among the besieged, no sooner heard of the distressed condition of the enemy's army, but, by a letter shot into their camp with an arrow, he informed Hulâkû, that if he could prevail on the Khalîfah to send one Ebn Amrân to him, he would find means to support his army for a whole month.

¹ ARU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 336, & seq.

² Idem. p. 333, & seqq.

(P) As having been, in the opinion of Mohammedans, consecrated ground.

(*) A city on the Euphrates, about two days journey from Bâghdâd.

a HULAKU, on this advice, did not fail to demand this man of Mostaâsem, who, being reduced of a slave, to such a state, that, had his son been demanded, he would have gratified him, caused Ebn Amrân to be sought for, and sent him to the Mungl prince; to whom he discovered, that, in the city of Yakûba, or Akêba, of which his master was governor, there was a prodigious quantity of grain laid up in pits. By means of this intelligence, the Mungls were saved from starving with hunger, and enabled to take the great city of Bâghdâd; which was plundered, and intirely ruined, by them, in the year 656. Hulâkû, who owed this conquest to Ebn Amrân, thought he could not do better than confer the government of the city, and its dependencies, on the traitor; who thus saw his dream fulfilled¹.

OTHER authors ascribe the cause of the Khalîfah's ruin chiefly to the perfidy of his prime Wazîr Mowsiyado'ddîn al Kami; who, piqued about some religious peccadillo, disbanded the troops, when there was greatest need of them, and concealed the strength of the enemy from Mostaâsem. He likewise corresponded with Hulâkû, and gave him notice of the best time to march towards Bâghdâd. The Khalîfah was the more easily persuaded to disarm himself, as he was very covetous, and addicted to pleasure: nor would he give over his debauches, for all the representations of the principal lords of his court, till advice was brought, that a great detachment of Mungls, under two of their best generals, were near the city. Then, when it was too late, 10,000 men were, in a hurry, got ready, and sent to reconnoitre them. These meeting the enemy, encamped on the Tigris, to the north of Bâghdâd, a most bloody battle was fought, with doubtful success: but the Mungls having, in the night, cut the bank of a canal drawn from the Euphrates, near which the army of the Khalîfah was ill posted, their camp was laid under-water, to such a degree, that the greater part were drowned, and the rest put to the sword.

MEAN time, Hulâkû arrived, with the gross of his army, before Bâghdâd, and laid siege to it; while the Khalîfah continued his debauches, without minding his affairs, as if the enemy had been at a great distance. At the end of two months, the traitor Alkami retired, with his family, to the camp of Hulâkû, who presently after took the city, in the month of Saffar 656; where every thing was put to fire and sword (Q) by the Tatars; who plundered Bâghdâd of infinite wealth: for it was, at that time, the most rich and powerful city in the world. The Khalîfah Mostaâsem being taken, with one of his sons, after some consultation, was wrapped up tight, in a piece of felt, and, in that condition, dragged through the streets, where he soon expired, when he had lived forty-two years, and reigned above eighteen. His son, who remained, was put to death; the other having been slain at one of the city-gates, which he defended (R) courageously.

THUS an end was put to the race of Khalîfahs, which began in the person of Abûbekr, the eleventh year of the Hejrah, or flight of Mohammed, and had continued in the family of Abbâs for the space of 520 years.

THIS last Khalîfah, although he had neither courage nor conduct, reigned with greater pride and magnificence than any of his predecessors, who were sovereigns in temporals as well as spirituals. When he went out of the palace, on any occasion, he commonly wore a mask, or veil, over his face, to draw the more respect from the people, whom he did not think worthy to look on him^m: and it is probable, says D'Herbelot, that the Mungls put him to that kind of death, to punish his insolent deportment.

AFTER this execution, Hulâkû appointed the president of the Dîwan, the Wazîr, and Ebn Bâghdâd Dunus (or Darnush), to restore Bâghdâd to its former state. Buka Timûr was sent to Hella (*), to try what he could do with the inhabitants; after which, he marched to Waset; where, in one week, he put to death a multitude of people; and then returned to Hulâkû, whom he found at *Siyakûb*ⁿ.

As soon as Badro'ddîn Lâlû, lord of Mausel (or Musol), heard that Bâghdâd was taken, he sent his son Al Mîlek al Sâleb Ismaël, with part of his army, to the assistance of Hulâkû; who, looking on him with a stern countenance, reproached him and his father with their backwardness in bringing their succours; saying, "You waited to see who should get the better; and if the Khalîfah had been victor, would have gone to him, instead of coming to me." Badro'ddîn, terrified when he heard his son repeat these words, which he considered as pre-faging no good towards him, immediately resolved to prepare a magnificent present: to ⁿ ABULFAR. ubi supra, p. 339.

¹ D'HERBEL, p. 453, art. Hulâkû.

^m KONDAMIR ap. D'Herb. ubi sup. p. 628. art. Mostaâsem.

(Q) Mirkand says, all who were found in Bâghdâd, and the neighbouring country, were slain, to the number, as was reported, of 1,600,000 people. Truxara, hist. Pers. p. 309.

(R) Alûlfaraj speaks as if he had been taken, and was slain by Hulâkû's order, by the gate called Kalwâd. (*) Or Hellab, a city on the Euphrates, where stood Talylon: two itages S. by W. of Bâghdâd.

make up which, he not only employed all the precious stones and jewels that were in his own treasury, but stripped his rich subjects of their wealth; requiring the very bracelets off the arms of their women, and the pearls out of their childrens ears. When all was ready, he set out for the mountains of Hamadân, to pay his respects to Hulâkû; who received him very kindly, in reverence to his years; made him sit beside him, on the same estrade; and permitted him to touch his ear-rings, in which were two union pearls of great price. Bedro'ddîn, after paying homage, returned to Mausel, filled with joy, for his own good success; and wondered at the power, majesty, and wisdom, of Hulâkû.

Miyafarekîn
blockaded.

THE same year, Al Asbrâf, lord of Miyafarekîn, made a visit to Al Mâlek al Nâsr, lord of Halep (or Aleppo), desiring aid of him, that he might hinder the Mungls from entering Syria. But Al Nâsr, looking on his apprehensions as altogether groundless, paid no regard to his instances. Hereupon Al Asbrâf went away in anger; and, on his return to Miyafarekîn, not only drove out the Mungl governors, but hung up a certain priest, whom the Kaân (or Khân) had sent to him with mandates. Mean time, the Mungl army, led by Yashmât, son of Hulâkû, following him, came, and invested the city. In one day and night they surrounded it with walls, and a ditch; then placing their engines, vigorously attacked it. But, finding the place was not to be taken by force, they turned the siege into a blockade^o.

Hejrah 657.
A. D. 1258.
Halep summoned.

IN 657, Hulâkû sent an ambassador to Al Mâlek al Nâsr, lord of Halep, with letters, exhorting him to submit himself, and avoid the Khalîfah's fate, by coming to his camp without delay. As his lords would not permit him to obey this summons, Al Nâsr, in a great consternation, sends his son Al Mâlek al Azîz, with a large sum of money, and rich presents. After Al Azîz had waited the whole winter, he received this answer; "We required to see Al Mâlek al Nâsr, not his son. If therefore he be really for us in his heart, let him come to us; otherwise we will go to him." When Al Nâsr heard these words, he was greatly terrified, not knowing what course to take. After this, Hulâkû sent for Azzo'ddîn, king of Rûm, and his brother Rokno'ddîn; who, obeying his summons, were received with great honour and kindness. Then, having divided the dominion between them, he began his march for Syria, taking with him the Seljûk princes; who, on arrival at the Euphrates, were permitted to return into their own country.

Hejrah 658.
A. D. 1259.
Syria invaded,

IN 658, he arrived at Harrân, with an army of 80,000 men, which city, with Roha (or Orfa), surrendered on conditions; nor were any of the inhabitants injured: but those of Sarûj (S) were all put to the sword, for not obeying the Mungl mandate. After this, Hulâkû Il Khân ordered three bridges to be laid over the Euphrates; one near Malatiya, another at Kalâo'rûm, and the third not far from Karkîsia (T); by which all his forces having crossed into Syria, they made a great slaughter, towards Manbej (U). Then the army dividing, in order to reduce the cities and castles, only a few soldiers took the route of Halep. Hereupon Al Mâlek al Moâddham, eldest son of Salâho'ddîn (or Saladin), advanced to meet them; but, being put to flight, returned to the city. The party which marched to Moarrab (or Marrab), ransacked that place: but Hamâb and Hems surrendered on terms. When Al Mâlek al Nâsr heard of these misfortunes, he betook himself, with his wives, children, and most valuable effects, into the deserts of Al Karak and Al Shawbak for shelter.

and subdued.

WHEN the Mungls came to Damaskus, the principal men delivered up the city, which received no manner of harm from the enemy. Hulâkû himself pitched his camp before Halep; and having raised a mount, to command it, began to play his engines. The attack was chiefly made against the gate of Erâk (or Irâk), which was found to be the weakest part; so that being forced in a few days, the Mungls entered, and slew more people than they had done at Bâgbdâd. Nor did the castle hold out long. Then proceeding to the castle Al Harem (X), the inhabitants were willing to surrender; but, not caring to trust to his word, required the oath of a Mussulman for their security. Il Khân consented; and they chose Fakro'ddîn, governor of the castle of Halep, because, they said, he was a sincere, honest man: who being sent to them, took all the oaths they proposed to him; and then they opened their gates, by which a great multitude of people went out, and the Mungls entered. But Hulâkû made them pay for their suspicion: for he first ordered Fakro'ddîn to be slain, and then all those who had been in the castle; without sparing any of either sex, or even the children in their cradles^p.

^o ABU'LFAR: p. 344, & seq.

^p Ibid. p. 346, & seqq.

(S) Sarûj lies to the north of Roha, Roha to the north of Harrân, supposed to be the ancient Haran and Karra.

(T) Malatiyah is a little without the bounds of Syria. Kalâto'l Rûm, or, as pronounced, Kalâto'rûm, is between Someysat, or Samosat, and Al Bir; and Karkîsia stood at the confluence of the Al Khabûr with the Eu- phrates, some leagues to the north of Rabba, or Rakaba.

(U) Manbej is a corruption of Manbe, or Mambe, or Bambe, the ancient Bambyce, or Hieropolis; called by Pliny Magog, instead of Mabog, the Syrian name; an error uncorrected in Hardouin's last edition.

(X) Towards Antioch.

- a AFTER this, Hulâkû returned eastward, leaving in Syria a great commander, named Ket-bîga, with 10,000 horse. When he arrived at Tel Bâsher, he was joined by the army, which had taken Miyafarekîn, and brought with them Al Asbrâf its prince; after putting to the sword the few inhabitants whom the famine had spared: but for which calamity the Mungls could not have taken the city. Il Khân caused Al Asbrâf to be slain; which he afterwards was sorry for; and gave the government to one of that prince's commanders. When he drew near to Mardîn, he sent for the lord of that place; who, unwilling to obey the summons, sent his son Modâfferoddîn; because he accompanied Hulâkû, when in Syria, along with Al Mâlek al Sâleb, son of Soltân Badroddîn Lûlû, late lord of Mausel. Hulâkû bid him go back to his father, and command him to repair to the camp, and not turn rebel; in which case, he said, b it should not fare well with him: but the father, instead of taking his son's advice, imprisoned him.

UPON this, the Mungls besieged Mardîn: but could not have taken it in less than two or three years, had not the king, and most of the inhabitants, died of the pestilence: after which, Al Modâffer surrendered the castle, and all the wealth belonging to it. When the king of the earth, Hulâkû, was informed what that prince had suffered, he treated him with much affection, and appointed him king, in his father's room. Mean time, Ketbîga, who was left in Syria, having found out Al Mâlek al Nâsr's lurking place, sent men to seize and carry him to Hulâkû: who was pleased to see him, and promised to restore him to his kingdom. But, while fortune seemed to flatter his hopes, news arrived, that Kotuz, Soltân of the Turkmâns (*), who reigned in Egypt, hearing that Hulâkû was returned homewards, and had left Ket-bîga behind him, with no more than 10,000 men, raised a great army, and attacked that general; who was killed in the battle, his forces defeated, and his children taken prisoners, on the 27th of Ramazân. When this advice reached Il Khân, who was then in the mountains of Al Tak (Y), he was enraged; and ordered Al Malek al Nâsr, with his son Al Mâlek al Dbâber, and all belonging to him, to be put to death.

THE execution was performed in the following manner, as Mobayo'ddîn al Magrebi, the only person who escaped the slaughter, told our author. One day, while Mobayo'ddîn attended Al Nâsr, who was asking him some questions about his fortune, there came a Mungl commander, at the head of fifty horse, whom the prince went from his tent to meet, and asked to alight: but the officer desired to be excused; saying, he came to acquaint him, by order of Hulâkû, that, as this was a day of rejoicing, he was desired to be present at the feast, with his brother, sons, and all his retinue, excepting the domestics and slaves. Upon this, they all, to the number of twenty, mounted their horses, and set forward. But, when they were come into a narrow valley, with high rocks on every side, their escort made them all alight, and then surrounding, fell to bind them: which when Mobayo'ddîn saw, he cried out, That he was an astrologer, who consulted the stars, and had something of moment to reveal to the king, the lord of the earth. Hereupon they set him aside, and then slew the rest, none escaping except two of Al Nâsr's sons, and the astrologer; who was joined as an assistant to Khoja Nasîro'ddîn, in making astronomical observations at Marâgha.

c Kotuz, Soltân of Egypt, after the victory above-mentioned, recovered Syria; and having placed governors in Halep, Damaskus, and the other provinces thereof, returned homewards, to recruit his forces, in order to oppose the Mungls: but when he had gotten as far as Gazza, Bibars, called Al Bundokdâr the lesser, rising against, slew him, and seized the kingdom. This Soltân, who became very famous, took from the Franks all the cities and castles which they possessed along the coast of Syria. However, in 659, the Mungls entered Syria a second time, under the command of a general named Gûgâlki; and having proceeded almost as far as Hems, making great spoil, and destruction of people, returned to Halep. There he ordered all the inhabitants, and villagers who had retired, to go into the plain; under pretence of numbering and conducting them to their respective homes: but when they had got a good way on the journey, he said to them, "If your hearts had been sincerely towards us, you would not have fled from us;" and, without any more ceremony, put every soul of them to the sword; so that none of them escaped, excepting those who were wise enough to stay in Halep. In the mean time, as soon as the Egyptians understood that the Mungls had evacuated Syria, they entered that country, and seized it anew.

f THE same year Alao'ddîn, son of Badro'ddîn Lûlû, lord of Senjar, fled into Egypt: and, Mausel soon after, wrote to his brother Al Mâlek al Sâleb Ismaël, prince of Mausel: setting forth the power of Bundokdâr; and advising him to become a vassal to the Soltân, who, after driving out the Mungls, would make him lord not only of Mausel, but several other provinces. When

^a ABU'LFAR. p. 348, & seq. D'HERB. p. 454.

(*) Third of the Bahrite Mamluks.

(Y) Another Copy reads Al Atlak

Al Saleb had read the letters, he laid them under his bed : but Shamso'ddin Mohammed Ebn Yûnes al Bâashîki, one of his father's commanders in the country of Niniveh, watching his opportunity, took them, and, departing forthwith, rode off to Bâashîka. As soon as the king missed the letters, he suspected Shamso'ddin, and sent for him back, with design to put him to death : but Ebn Yûnes, making the messengers drunk, set out, in the night, with his family and effects, towards Erbel (or Arbela), giving out, that Al Mâlek al Sâleb intended to destroy all the Christians in the country of Niniveh, and then retire into Syria : upon which rumour, almost all the Christians of that quarter flocked to Erbel ^a.

Confusion
there.

NEXT morning, the messengers, not finding Ebn Yûnes, imagined he was gone before to Mausel. But when Al Sâleb saw that they had returned without him, taking it for granted, that he was gone to bring the Mungls upon him, he, in great consternation, left the city, with many of his principal men, and what effects they could carry off ; and went directly for Syria, without spoiling and then destroying the Ninivitisb Christians, as he at first designed. Soon after he had departed from Mausel, a difference arose among his commanders, some of whom followed him, and others returned to the city ; among which latter, was Al Ammo'ddin Senjar : but Tarkân of Karazm, wife of Al Mâlek al Sâleb, Yasan, a judge, and their partisans, shut the gates against them. However, being let in by Mobayo'ddin Ebn Zebellak, at the head of a great body of the citizens, Tarkân, and her friends, retired into the castle : the contrary party, at the same time, fell upon the Christians, spoiling and killing all, excepting such as turned Mohammedans. Al Sâleb had likewise, before his departure, agreed with the Kûrds, to come down with their forces upon Niniveh ; which they did two days after, and, after spoiling the Christians dwelling there, either killed, or carried away captives, all who remained. ^b

The city
besieged,

MEAN time, a rumour being spread, that the Mungl forces were advancing through Al Fâzîreh (or Mesopotamia), the Amîr Al Amo'ddin Senjar, with his party, left the city ; and, being joined by the Kûrd commanders, went to meet the Mungls, led by Turîn, judge of Mausel : by whom they were surrounded, and all cut to pieces. After this, the affairs of Mausel ran daily more into confusion, when, towards the end of summer, a report flew, that the Mungl army was coming ; and, in effect, not long after, it did come, under the command of Samdagû, a great general, who favoured the Christians, and besieged Mausel. In a little time, advice being brought, that Al Mâlek al Sâleb was returned from Syria, the Mungls withdrew a little way from the city, to let him enter ; and then sat down before it again. In one night they built a wall round it, and then began vigorously to attack the place. At length, provisions failing in the city, Samdagû, to delude Al Sâleb, made him very fair promises, and even forbore hostilities. During this cessation of arms, advice was brought, that an army from Syria was on its way to aid Al Sâleb, under the conduct of a general named Barlû. Hereupon the Mungls set forward ; and meeting the enemy near Senjâr, surrounded and slew them all, carrying away much spoil. ^c and surrendered.

AFTER this, Samdagû so far wrought on Al Mâlek al Sâleb, by his artifices, that the former, opening the gates, came out to him, without any apprehensions, preceded by musicians and jesters. But he was no sooner lodged in the camp, than the Mungl army entered the city ; where, for eight days, they plundered it, and killed an infinite number of people, besides those whom they made slaves of. Among the rest, there was slain Alao'lmalk (Z), son of Al Mâlek al Sâleb, whom, having intoxicated with wine, they cut in two, by the waist, near the castle. Then making Shamso'ddin Ebn Yûnes governor of the city, Samdagû departed, carrying with him Al Mâlek al Sâleb to Hulâkû, who ordered him to be put to death. But Shamso'ddin did not long enjoy the fruits of his perfidy ; for, in 661, one Al Zaki, or Erbel, accused him of defrauding the family of Badro'ddin of money and jewels ; and also of poisoning him, by means of Mowaffek, a Christian physician. Ebn Yûnes, denying the fact, was bastonadoed, to extort a confession : but, while he underwent the punishment, a paper dropped from him, containing some verse of the Korân ; which Al Zâki said was a charm against the Mungls. Hereupon he was put to death, and his accuser made governor in his room ^d.

A famous observatory.

MEAN time Hulâkû, who, after his expedition into Syria, had returned to Azerbijân, there to take some repose, assembled the principal astronomers to be found in the Mohammedan countries : to whom he gave large pensions, and furnished all sorts of necessary instruments for making observations, at Marâgha (A), where he built a famous observatory. He died in 663 (B), after he had reigned absolutely six years, since the death of his brother ^e : for the authors made use of by D'Herbelot suppose, that this prince, during the life-time of Mangû Khân, governed Irân, as his deputy ; but that, on his death in 657, he succeeded as fifth Khân of ^f

Hej. 663.
A. D. 1264.
Hulâkû dies.

^a ABU'LFAR. p. 350, & seqq.

^b Ibid. p. 353.

^c D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 454.

(Z) In another copy Alaeddin al Molk.

(B) Or 664, according to some authors.

(A) A city on the lake of the Skâb, about forty miles to the south-west of Tabriz, or Tauris.

a the Mungls, in that part of Asia^u. However, it appears, from what has been elsewhere related, that Koplay Khán was the immediate and true successor of Mangú, not only at Karakorum, but in all parts of the Mungl dominions, or empire; and that Hulákú actually acknowledged Koplay as such. 'Tis true, his successors in Irán did, at length, throw off their subjection to the successors of Jenghíz Khán, in the east: but it is not expressly mentioned under what prince this happened.

One of the principal wives of this monarch, named Dugház Khatún, was a Christian, and accompanied him in all his military expeditions; being much esteemed by him, for her prudence and knowledge. She died not long after him; and was buried near her husband, in the same city. It is reported, that Hulákú demanded in marriage the daughter of Michael Paleologus, emperor of Constantinople (C), who drove the Franks out of that city: but 'tis more probable he asked her for his son and successor Abáka Khán; who married her, on her arrival, in Irán, which happened after his father's death.

The dominions which Hulákú left at his death are reckoned up by Ebn Shobnah, as follows: The great province of Khorassán, of which Nisabár was, at that time, the capital: Jébúl, or Persian Irák, the country of the Parthians, whose capital was Ispáhán: Irák Arabi, called also Irák Babeli, comprising Assyria (or Kürdestán and Khaldea), whose metropolis was Bághdád: Adherbiján (or Azerbejân), that is, Media, its chief city Tabríz, or Tauris: Párs, or Proper Persia, its capital Shíráz, formerly called Cyropolis; for Eshékhar, or Persepolis, was then in ruins: Khúrestán, or Khúzeftán, the antient Susiana, whose capital was Tóster, or Sháster, formerly called Susa, of Persia: Diyárbekr, which comprehends part of Assyria, or Kürdestán, and Al Jazíreh, or Mesopotamia, whereof Mússal (or Mosul), built near the antient Niniveh, was the capital: lastly, the country of Rúm, or the Romans, containing Armenia, Georgia, and Asia minor, whose capital was Koníya, the antient Ikonium^{*}.

The same author remarks, that the Mungls, or Tatars, in all the conquests which they made, were never defeated, excepting that once under Ketbúga, as before-mentioned. But it is not fact, as D'Herbelot affirms (perhaps without any authority), that all those countries were conquered by Hulákú: for Irán, or Persia at large, was subdued by Jenghíz Khán. Nor does it appear, from what goes before, that any considerable part of it had revolted, or thrown off its subjection to the Mungls, excepting the country of the Ismaelians. On the contrary, there seems to have been no considerable change in the state of those countries, from the account given by Abú'lfaraj^v; who informs us, that Munkáka (or Mangú) Khán, in 650, the year before Hulákú was sent into Irán, had appointed Argún Aga to govern the kingdoms of Khorassán and Hindústán, Mazanderán, Irák, Párs, Kermán, Lúr, Arrán, Azerbejân, Gorjestán (or Georgia), Mausel (or Mesopotamia), and Syria. It appears also, by the proceedings of Bayejú Nowayn, that the Khán's authority extended even to Anatolia. So that Hulákú came to the government of nearly as many countries as were in his hands at his death; and may be said rather to have more fully settled and completed the old conquests, than to have added new ones.

The oriental historians begin this dynasty of Mungl princes with Jenghíz Khán, as hath been observed above: but as Hulákú was the first of his descendants who reigned in Irán, we shall set him at the head of it. Abú'lfaraj dates the commencement of the Mungl dynasty in Irán, or Persia at large, from the destruction of the Khalifat, in the year 656. The Persian historians give him a reign of six years only, reckoning from the death of Mangú Khán, in 657.

According to Mirkond, Hulákú, before his death, divided his dominions among three of his sons, Abáka (D), Yashmut, and Tandon; to the first he gave the kingdoms of Irák, Mazanderán, and Khorassán; to the second, Arrán, or Armenia, and Azerbejân; to the third he assigned Diyárbekr and Rabíya, which are two provinces of Al Jazíreh and Mesopotamia. Hulákú had, besides these three sons, two others, Nikúdar Oglán, and Targabe (or Targhiyeh) Khán, who had no share in their father's partition of his dominions; yet one of them obtained the empire himself, and so did the children of the other^z.

^u D'HERBEL. ubi sup. p. 454.

^{*} D'HERBEL. ubi sup.

^v Hist. dynast. p. 327.

^z MIRKOND ap. Teixeira, hist. Pers. p. 309, & seq.

(C) Abú'lfaraj says, Hulákú demanded the emperor's daughter in marriage: that she was met at Cæsarea, in Asia minor, with a messenger, with the news of Hulákú's death; but as she could not return to her own country, she proceeded to the court of Abáka, who took her to himself.

(D) Teixeira spells most names of persons and places very ill; for Abáka Khán, he writes Haybka Kan; and, for Yashmut, Hyaxemet.

C H A P. II.

The reign of Abâka II Khân.

2. Khân
Abâka.
Hej. 663.
A. D. 1264.

AF T E R the death of Hulâkû, his son Abâka was, in an assembly consisting of his sons the princes, and the ladies his widows, unanimously acknowledged for his successor. He was a prince endowed with prudence, capacity, learning, and knowledge; which good qualities rendered him dear to every-body, and gave him success in all his transactions, both domestic and foreign ^a.

His first regulations.

As soon as this prince ascended the throne, he sent one of his brothers to Dârbend, on the Caspian sea, and another into Khorassân, to shut up the passages into his dominions from the descendants of Tûshi or Jûji Khân on one side, and those of Jagatay Khân on the other. He declared Sunjak (or Sowenjak) Nowayn general of his armies, and his lieutenant throughout his empire: gave the employment of grand Wazîr, and president of his councils, to Shamso'ddîn Mobammed, who made Bahao'ddîn, his son, Wazîr of Ispâhân; and Alao'ddîn Atbao'l Molk, his brother, Wazîr of Bâghdâd. Under the wise government of this latter, that capital recovered its lustre, which it had lost by the arms of Hulâkû; the people flocking from all parts to settle there: on the contrary, Bahao'ddîn exercised so much rigour at Ispâhân, that he often involved the innocent in the same punishment with the guilty; nor could the advice of his father Shamso'ddîn, to whom frequent complaints were made, reclaim him, till death freed the inhabitants from his severity.

Invaded by Barkah, Hej. 664. A. D. 1265.

AT the beginning of Abâka's reign, Barkah Khân (A), of the race of Jagatay Khân, who reigned in Great Bukhâria, having marched with forces on the side of Dârbend, with design to break into Persia, Shamat, brother of Abâka, who was posted in that city, opposed his entrance; and, after a battle, which he obtained against him, obliged him to retire in 664. But this defeat did only irritate that prince: for, soon after, he set on foot an army of 300,000 men, with which he threatened utter desolation to Persia, had not Abâka Khân marched in time with all the forces of his empire. Barkah Khân, after conducting his numerous squadrons through the vast plains of Kipjâk, round the north side of the Caspian sea, had forced the narrow passages between that sea and mount Kaukasus, commonly called the Iron Gates (B); and was already arrived on the banks of the river Kûr, when Abâka Khân appeared at Teflis, capital of Gurjestân, that is, Gorja, or Georgia; but, as the two armies were on the point of giving battle, Barkah Khân, very happily for Persia, was taken out of the world; for, immediately on his death, his army divided, and returned into Tartary ^b.

and Borak Khân. Hej. 666. A. D. 1267.

IN 666, Borak Oglan (C), who was also of Jagatay Khân's race, sent to the court of Abâka Khân one Massûd, under pretence of a compliment: but, in reality, to pry into the state of affairs; and observe the roads which were to be taken, in order to attack Persia. This being perceived by a soldier, he gave advice thereof to Shamso'ddîn the grand Wazîr, who continued to treat him with great civility, as if he suspected nothing; resolving to have him seized, or cut off in his return: but Massûd had taken such precautions, by causing horses to be placed along the road, that the men sent after could never overtake him. Borak Khân, having received the necessary informations from this spy, in 667 passed the Jihûn, or Amû, with 100,000 horse; and, having presently reduced the great province of Khorassân, where he met with small opposition, he advanced as far as Azerbejân, where Abâka had the bulk of his forces. The Tatars, who came foremost, were soon repulsed: and at length, the year following, the two armies faced each other not far from Herât. There a bloody battle was fought; wherein victory, after a long suspense, declared in favour of Abâka, who became master of the field, with all the baggage and booty of the enemy. Borak, after this defeat, was obliged to repass the Amû; and Abâka, having left his brother Benshîn with troops sufficient for the guard of Khorassân, returned to Azerbejân ^c.

^a ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. 355.
art. Abâka.

^b KONDAMIR ap. D'Herb. p. 1. art. Abâka.

^c Ibid. p. 2.

(A) Called also Berrak Khân: he was fifth Khân thereof; see before, page 465: but, as there he is said to have died in 1260, and it is not likely he would go so far about, through the dominions of another prince; possibly this might be Bereke, third Khân of Kipjâk, whose death is placed by La Croix in 1266, co-incident with that of Barkah Khân. See before, p. 446.

(B) In the Mungl or Turkish language, Damir Kâpi, the same with Dârbend, which, in Persian, signifies the shut gate. The Arabs call it Bâb al Abwâb, the gate of gates.

(C) This, doubtless, must be Bereke, or Barkah, fifth Khân of Jagatay; but then his death must be placed, not in 1660, as it is in D'Herbelot and La Croix, but in 1670, or later, and so indeed his distance from Hulâkû seems to require.

a THE same year that Abâka was proclaimed Khân, Bundokdâr (D), lord of Egypt, sent to invite Hâtem, king of Armenia (E), to submit to pay him tribute, and settle a commerce between their respective subjects. As Hâtem would not consent to this, for fear of the Mungls; Bundokdâr, without more ceremony, invaded his dominions. The Armenian king, upon this surprise, made a journey, to crave aid of Nefji, the Mungl governor in Rûm (or Anatolia); who answered, that he could not assist him without Abâka's order. Mean time the brothers and sons of Hâtem marched, with what forces they could raise, to oppose the entrance of the Egyptians, but were defeated; and, one of the king's sons being slain, the other was taken prisoner. For twenty days the enemy plundered Sîs and Ayyâs, carrying away great numbers of people captives. At length, when they were gone, Hâtem came with an army of Mungls and Rûms (F); who, finding nothing but a waste country without people, fell to making good cheer, and consumed every thing which the Egyptians had left.

b HATEM, grieved for the devastation made in his country, but more for the loss of his Lesser Armenia, sent to offer Bundokdâr cities and castles, with a good sum of money, for his ransom. Bundokdâr made answer, that he would release him, provided only Sankar al Afhkar, who was a slave among the Mungls, should be sent to him. Hâtem, on this, made a journey in 668 (G) to the court of Abâka; who, pitying his tears, bad him go back, and promised to send Al Afhkar to him, if he was to be found. Accordingly, next year, Al Afhkar was conveyed to him from Samarkant; and, being transmitted to Bundokdâr, this latter returned Hâtem's son in exchange. Afterwards Hâtem made another journey, to intreat that he might resign the crown to his son: to which Abâka consented. But the joy this favour created, was greatly allay'd by a dreadful earthquake, which, in 670, happened in Armenia; and, besides overturning many castles, destroyed above 100,000 people, not to mention the cattle ^d.

c IN the year 675, Abâka Khân went to pass the winter at Bâghdâd. About the same time died the celebrated Khoja Nasîro'ddin al Tûsî, who was eminent in all kinds of philosophy, and wrote many books on different subjects. This same year Hâtem's son, now king of Armenia, understanding, by his correspondents, that Bundokdâr intended to invade the country of Rûm, through the instigation of some of the natives, gave notice to the Mungl commanders to be upon their guard: but, Berwânab having persuaded them that it was a false alarm, they neglected their security; so that the Egyptians came upon them when they were in liquor, and d slew them all, with 2000 Georgians, out of 3000 who were along with them: however, they did not fall unrevenged, a multitude of the enemy having been slain. After this success, Bundokdâr marched to Kaysariya (or Cesarea), where he staid fifteen days, but did no manner of harm to that city; saying, he came not to ravage the country, but deliver its lord from slavery.

e WHEN this news reached the court of Abâka Il Khân, he was greatly enraged; and, assembling his forces, marched towards the country of Rûm: but, before he arrived, the Egyptians were withdrawn into Syria. Then sending for Berwânab, he received him without seeming at all offended; and carried him to the camp, under pretence of consulting with him what number of men would be sufficient to secure Rûm against the Egyptians. There, at a banquet, he plied Berwânab well with mares milk, for he drank no wine; and giving a sign, when the latter went out to make water, an officer in waiting followed, and killed him. Bundokdâr, on his way to Egypt, died at Hems in Syria; some say, of poison; others, of a wound in the fight, from a Mungl arrow ^e.

f KONDAMIR relates concerning this war, that, as soon as Bundokdâr had ascended the throne of Egypt, he was resolved, before he ventured to engage with the Mungls, to inspect himself into the condition of their forces. With this view he set out, accompanied by three or four persons only, and visited all the countries which the Mungls possessed on this side of the Euphrates. At his return, he sent a courier, by way of gallantry, to Abâka Khân, who had then newly succeeded his father Hulâkû, acquainting him, that having, for his diversion, made a tour over his (Abâka's) dominions, he had left, in a certain inn which he named, a jewel of value, in pledge of the debt he had contracted, to defray his expences; and desired that he would send it to him. Abâka was so complaisant as to remit the jewel to the Soltân by another courier, with very obliging letters on the occasion; and thus matters

^d ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 356, & seq.

^e Ibid. ubi sup. p. 357, & seq.

(D) He was fourth Soltân of the Turkish Mamlûks, or slaves, who reigned in Egypt after the family of Ayûb, or Salâho'ddin.

(E) This is to be understood of the Lesser Armenia, in Anatolia; of which Sîs, about two stages to the north of Skanderûn, or Alexandretta, was the capital. Hâtem is the same name with Hayton, Haithon, or Aïten, among Europeans.

(F) That is, people from Rûm, or Anatolia; probably for the most part Greeks.

(G) According to Mirkond, he had war this year with Bora Khân, who marched with an army from Chagatay (or Great Bukharia), but was defeated, and forced back. Teixîra, ubi supra, p. 310.

passed between the two princes, without coming to hostilities^f. But, as the contrary appears a from Abû'lfaraj, we perceive here a great defect in the Persian historian; who, besides, mentions nothing of Abâka's expeditions into Rûm and Syria.

Mongols invade Syria.
Hej. 679.
A. D. 1280.

Hej. 680.
A. D. 1281.

A. D. 1282.

They are defeated.

Abâka's death.

Suspicion about it.

IN 679 Sayfo'ddîn Kelâsen, surnamed Al Alfî (H), having seized the dominion of Syria and Egypt, after the death of Mâlek al Sâleh, son of Bundokdâr, Sankar al Asbkar before-mentioned, who had opposed his advancement, fled to Rababa (on the Euphrates), and confederating with Isa Ebn Mohanna, a Bedwîn (I) prince; sent an ambassador to invite Abâka Il Khân into Syria, promising to deliver into his hands both that country and Egypt. On this engagement an army was sent, in the year 680, under the command of Kungortay, a younger brother of Abâka; but when, in winter, they arrived in Syria, Al Asbkar, being afraid to join them, shut himself up in the castle of Sâbyîn. The Mungls, for all this, advanced as far b as Hâlep; and, having destroyed all the places in their passage, returned into Irân. However, next year (K) they invaded Syria with 50,000 troops, under the conduct of Munga Timûr, youngest brother of Abâka, accompanied by the king of Armenia, with all his forces. The enemy, led by Al Alfî and Al Asbkar, who were now reconciled, met them between Hamâb and Hems, where a battle was fought, in which the Mungls prevailed: but, when they were on the point of gaining the victory, and had even put the Syrians to flight, the c Arabs of the tribe of Bâni Taglab rushed out of an ambuscade on the left wing of the Mungls; who, thinking themselves surrounded by numerous troops, took to flight, followed by the main body. Mean time the right wing, in which was the king of Armenia, with 5000 Gorjans, not minding the ambuscades, put to flight the Egyptians who opposed them; and, pursuing them to the gates of Hems, killed a considerable number; nor gave over the slaughter, till the news of the flight of their companions drew them off. In their return, they fell in with certain troops of the enemy, who followed their flying squadrons: here-upon the battle was renewed, in which many were slain on both sides; but at length they returned laden with spoils.

WHILE Munga Timûr was on his march back through Al Fazîreh, some of his domestics, who had been tampered with, gave him poison one day, after he came out of the bath. The prince, finding himself much out of order, turned off towards Nisibîn, where he died. The people of the country were seized with great fear at this disaster; and, laying hold of Al Sâfi al Karkûbi, bound him, and carried him round all the market-places in Al Fazîreh, d after which they put him to death. This year was fatal likewise to Abâka Il Khân himself. He made a progress first to Bâghdâd, from whence he went back to Hamadân, where he celebrated Easter day with the Christians, in their church (L). Next day one Bahnâm, a Persian, gave him a magnificent feast: but on Tuesday he found himself very ill, and became delirious; so that he died on Wednesday the twentieth of Dhu'lhajjah, after a reign of seventeen years e.

ON the occasion of the death of this prince, Kondamîr relates, that, soon after the defeat of his army in Syria, under his brother Munga Timûr, great troubles arose at court: for one Magdo'molk Yezdi having, in concert with some of the principal lords, prejudiced Abâka Khân against Shamso'ddîn his prime Wazîr, the authority of this minister daily diminished: e he had likewise the mortification to see his brother Atbo'molk arrested, and called to account for matters laid to his charge. At the same time Abâka happening to die pretty suddenly at Hamadân, it was judged that his death was hastened by a draught which Shamso'ddîn had caused to be given him^h.

^f KONDAM. ubi supra, p. 2.

^g ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 360.

^h KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 2.

(H) He was seventh Soltân of the Turkish Mamlûks, or third from Bundokdâr.

(I) The Bedwîns, or Badwîns, commonly called Bedo-wins, are the field Arabs.

(K) Kondamîr, in D'Herbelot, places this in the year 669, twelve years earlier; but that cannot be, since Bundokdâr lived till the year 676.

(L) Some authors say he was a Christian.

C H A P III.

S E C T. I.

The reign of Nikûdar Oglan, or Ahmed Khân.

- ^a A B A K A I L K H A N being dead, the princes of the blood, and the great men, with one consent, conferred the government on Abmed, son of Hulâkû by Kutay Khatûn; as judging him most worthy to reign, and that the empire belonged of right to him after his brother. To all the qualities requisite in a prince, he joined a great knowledge of things, and was very munificent. Accordingly, one of his first acts was, to distribute the treasures which he found, among his sons, the grandees, and the army; nor was his benevolence confined to the Mungls alone, but was extended to those of all other nations, especially the principal men among the Christians². His Mungl name was Nikûdar Oglan (A); but, after he had embraced Mohammedism, which he did the first of all his family, he assumed that of Ahmed. On occasion of his conversion, he wrote a long letter (B) to Al Mâlek al Mansûr ^{3. Khân Ahmed. Hej. 681. A. D. 1282.} Kelawn, Soltân of Egypt and Syria, who was at that time the most considerable of all the Mohammedan princes; to let him know that he would publicly profess the Mussulman religion; and offered his favour and protection to all the professors of it. According to the Persian historians, he succeeded Abâka, in prejudice to Argûn, that prince's son; and confirmed Shamsô'ddîn and Attho'molk his brother in all their employments; delivering up to them Magdo'molk, their capital enemy, to dispose of as they should think fit. This Soltân's change of religion excited great troubles in his family, and at length throughout his dominions; because the Mungls or Tatars of those times had an extreme aversion for the Mohammedans, although they loved the Christians; so that this prince, though endowed with several excellent qualities, could never gain their affections.
- ^b TH E S E troubles began in the very first year of his reign, at which time Attho'molk departed this life. His nephew Argûn, who could not bear to see him upon a throne, which, he pretended, belonged to himself, retired immediately into the province of Khorassân, where he made preparations to dispute the sovereignty with his uncle; but did not declare himself openly till the year 683, when he came to encamp with his forces at Damegân. As soon as Ahmed received advice of these motions at Bâghdâd, he caused his forces to march, under the conduct of Al Inâk (C), a sage and valiant commander, who soon dispersed the troops which Argûn had assembled. This young prince, being thus left without an army, was obliged to return to Khorassân, and at length to shut himself up in the castle of Burdeb; whither Al Inâk did not fail to go and besiege him. However, without using force, he drew him out, by promising to reconcile him to his uncle: but, as soon as he arrived at the imperial camp, he was confined by the Soltân's order, and guarded by 4000 men. ^{Argûn revolts. Hej. 683. A. D. 1285.}
- ^c A F T E R this Abmed, believing that he had no sort of danger to fear, resolved to return to Ahmed at Bâghdâd, there to enjoy the sweets of peace. Before his departure, he gave directions to the Amîr Bûga, who guarded Argûn, not to let him live above seven or eight days. But Bûga, in concert with several other lords of the court, who could not relish the soft and delicate manners of the Soltân, resolved to set Argûn at liberty, and fall upon the quarters of Al Inâk. This design being immediately put in execution, Al Inâk was slain, with the principal officers of the Soltân who had remained in the rear-guard of the army; which latter was on the march. Argûn put himself at the head of the most resolute troops, and pursued the Soltân; who, having received information of this revolt, escaped from the city of Esfarayn, where he then was, to the camp of his mother Kutay Khatûn, which was towards Serâb in Azerbejdân. But the scouts of Argûn followed him so swiftly, that they soon overtook, and brought him to the camp of his nephew. This prince forthwith delivered him into the hands of Soltâna Kungortay, his mother-in-law; who put him to death, to revenge the loss of her child. ^{and put to death.}

² ABU'LFAR. ubi sup. p. 361.

(A) That is, according to Mirkond, in Teixeira, Nikûdar the good son.

(B) Abû'lfaraj has given a copy of that long letter; wherein he acquaints the Soltân, that he had an inclination for Moslemism from his youth, and desired to live in peace with the Mohammedan princes: that, to spill the blood of Moslems being contrary to his principles, he had therefore put a stop to the war which had been decreed in the Kuriltay, or diet, called by his brother Abâka: that he had provided for the security of the pilgrimage to Mekka; and given liberty to all foreign merchants to trade in his dominions.

(C) Or Al Yanâk, as in Abû'lfaraj.

dren, whom he had served in the same manner. This happened in the year 683^b, after he had reigned two years and two months.

ACCORDING to Abû'lfaraj, Abmed had ordered Al Yanâk to bring Argûn after him to his mother's residence, for which he intended to set out next morning: but that, at night, breaking the affair to a certain great lord, he said, he could not be secure, unless he made away with Argûn, and the rest of his nephews. When the Amîr Bûga came to understand Abmed's intention, he staid behind the Soltân next day, under pretence of business; and, when night came, made known to all the princes of the blood what Abmed had resolved upon. The princes, pierced with anger at this news, went all in a body to the place where Argûn was confined, and brought him forth; then, mounting him on a horse, they rode to the quarters of Al Yanâk; and, rushing on, slew him, and all the great men concerned with him, in the tent. After this, they ordered what they had done to be published through the camp, which remained very quiet on the occasion. Next morning they sent a numerous body of forces to pursue Abmed, whom they overtook; and, having pillaged his whole Orda, brought him back with his hands bound. Hereupon they deposed Abmed, as not fit to govern; and set Argûn on his father's throne, on Wednesday the eleventh of Jomada prior, in the year above-mentioned.

MANY of the Amîrs and great lords were for having the deposed Khân put to death. Argûn told them, that he would not consent to have his uncle slain; but should leave it to Kungurtay, his mother-in-law, and her sons, to dispose of him as they thought fit. This being resolved on, he was delivered into their power; and, after a few days respite, her sons in retaliation, deprived him of life, on Wednesday the second of Jomada posterior, to revenge the blood of their father, which he had shed^c. On his death the crown returned to the sons of Abâka Khân.

^b KONDAMIR, ubi sup. p. 72. art. Ahmed.

^c ABU'LFAR. p. 367.

S E C T. II.

The reign of Argûn Khân.

4. Khân Argûn.
Hej. 683.
A. D. 1284.

AS soon as Argûn was upon the throne, he gave the chief post in the empire to Bûga,^d or Boga, who disposed of every thing with an almost absolute power. Shamsô'ddîn Saïd, who was president of the Diwân, that is, chief of the councils (A), in the reign of Abmed, upon that prince's deposition, retired from court; and had already left Ispahân, in order to go into Hindûstân, when Argûn, whose good-will he suspected, sent for him, and confirmed him in his office: but Bûga, finding his authority thus divided, presently contrived how to get rid of him. To do his business the shortest way, he accused Saïd of poisoning his father Abâka; and the too credulous prince, without examining the depositions of the witnesses, sacrificed that great man to the ambition of his rival, who wanted to put in his place a creature of his own^a.

The Wazîr
Saïd

THIS is the account of Khondamîr, the Persian historian: but Abû'lfaraj relates the affair with other circumstances. According to him, Argûn received the information (but it is not mentioned from whom) in the reign of Abmed; and thereupon sent Shamsô'ddîn to acquaint the Khân his uncle; desiring, at the same time, that Saïd might be delivered up to him. As Abmed refused to grant his request, Argûn concluded that he was pleased with his father's death. When Argûn was settled in the throne, the president of the Diwân fled to the mountains of Awbâz, to the tribe of Kurds named Al Lûr; whose prince, Yûsef Shâh, delivered him up to the Khân. Shamsô'ddîn, after offering 100 Tûmans in gold to save his life, desired time to raise more money, by selling the residue of his estate, and borrowing of his friends. Having, by this means, made up eighty Tûmans more, he brought them: and, on delivering them, said, This is all I am able to raise; do with me what you think fit. Hereupon Argûn ordered him to be put to death; and he was accordingly executed on Tuesday the fifth of Shaabân 683.^f put to death.

SHAMSO'DDIN was a man endowed with great understanding and experience; perfectly versed in all the arts of government, and eminent for his humility: he always saluted those he met first, and suffered no man to prevent him^b. Several elegies were composed, to con-

^a KONDAMIR ap. D'Herb. p. 126. art. Argoun.

^b ABU'LFAR. p. 368.

(A) A dignity superior to that of prime Wazîr.

a sole the people for his loss: and the historians report this circumstance of his death, that, when the executioner entered, to perform his office, he made the ablution usual before their prayers; and then opening the Korân, to draw the Fâl, or good lot, met with these words: "They who say to God, 'Tis you who are our master; and to those who walk in the right path, and conformable to that belief, God will send angels to comfort them in their afflictions, and assure them of the paradise which has been promised to them."

HOWEVER this be, Bûga, seeing himself delivered from such a colleague, set no bounds to A Jew Wazîr: his ambition; and rose to such a pitch of authority, that he had but one step more to become master of the whole. At length he took off the mask; and, in 686, revolted openly against the Soltân: but did not push his fortune any great length; for he was slain miserably, in the Hej. 686.

b midst of his enterprize. After Bûga's death, a Jew, named Saedo'ddawlet, by profession a physician, and very agreeable in conversation, became so much in favour with Soltân Argûn, that all the affairs of the greatest lords of the empire depended on him. He put many of his own nation and religion into employments; without hurting, however, the interest of the Christians, who were very powerful at court. The Mussulmans were the only people who had no credit there, especially since the death of Saïd; which made them murmur continually against both. Argûn, at the solicitation of these latter, had taken from them (the Mussulmans) all the places belonging to the judicature, as well as the finances. In short, the two ruling parties carried things so far at last, that they denied them access to the Soltân's camp; and, in the end, forbade them to appear at court. A. D. 1287.

c ARGUN, say the historians, had promised the Christians to convert the temple of Mekka into a church; where, instead of worshipping the Almighty God, they would have adored statues and images. But Providence, which always watches over the preservation of Moslemism, and the prayers of good Mohammedans, prevented this great revolution; for Argûn fell sick at that very juncture. All they, throughout the empire, who had an interest in the life of that prince, spared neither prayers nor alms; and the Jew Saedo'ddawlet, who was prime minister, sent express orders into all the provinces, to re-establish the things which he had unseasonably changed. But, as the moment of the Soltân's death was fixed, neither their prayers nor alms availed any thing. Mean time Argûn grew extremely weak, and was even near his last agony, when he had the mortification to understand that his favourite the Jew was assassinated by his enemies. In fine, the Soltân died in the year 690; and the Mussulmans, reckoning his death among the miracles of Mohammed, say, that it restored Moslemism, which had received a great dishonour under this prince's reign. Hej. 690. A. D. 1291.

SOME Arab historians, as Abû'Iseda, relate, that the favourite Jew was put to death on a suspicion of having poisoned his master. Whether this accusation was true or false, it is certain, that the enemies of the Jews, who had beheld, with envious eyes, the great authority they were in, and, it may be, suffered many injuries at their hands, took this occasion, after the death of the Soltân and his minister, to be revenged, by making a cruel massacre of them. The Jews massacred.

e It was Argûn Khân who confirmed Massûd, son of *Kay Kaw*s, last Soltân but one of the Seljuks of Rûm, in the dominions which his family then possessed in Asia minor ^c.

^c KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 126, & seq.

S E C T. III.

The reign of Ganjatû Khân.

f THIS prince, named also Kaïktu (A) and Kaykatû, was the son of Abâka Khân, and succeeded Argûn Khân in the empire of the Mungls in Irân. Kondamîr, the Persian historian, remarks, that the true name of this prince was Aykatû, or Gaykatû, which, in the Mungl language, signifies marvelously fine and shining. He adds, that this prince, notwithstanding his debauches, was the most liberal of all the descendants of Hulâkû; and administered justice with so much circumspection, that, under his reign, no innocent person suffered death. Babi Bok, or Basbi Bog, was generalissimo of the armies of this prince, under the title of Amîro'l Omara; and Khovajeh Sadro'ddin Khaled Zenjani was his prime Wazîr. ^{5. Khân Ganjatû.}

GANJATU KHAN sullied all the good qualities which he was possessed of, by his excessive lewdness. At length, several lords of his court, whose daughters he had seized to put in his Harâm, conspired against him, and some of them were imprisoned on the occasion: but Gencrous, but debauched. Hej. 694. A. D. 1294.

(A) This happens by changing the punctuation, or diacritical points, of the nun and jîm, so as to convert these letters into ya and kha.

Slain by conspirators.

the rest sent privately to Badû Ogul, son of Targay (B), and grandson of Hulâkû, then governor of Bâghdad, informing him; that, in case he took the field without delay, he might easily become master of the empire. Baydû, having gathered what troops he could at so short a warning, advanced towards Mogân (C), where Ganjatû waited for him with his army: but this prince, finding himself betrayed and abandoned by his generals, escaped to a certain grotto; whither being followed by those lords whom he had imprisoned, and who had been released by the rest of the conspirators, he was by them assassinated, in the year 694^a.

THIS is the account of Kondamîr: but his father Mirkond relates the occasion of the rebellion differently. According to this author, he would have introduced paper money into Persia, to pass, as it did in Ketau Kotan (D): but it met with great opposition, chiefly from his uncle Badû, who, on this pretence, made war on, and slew him, in 693, after he had reigned b for three years^b.

^a KONDAM, ubi sup. p. 359. art. Gangja.

^b MIRKOND ap. Teixeira, p. 311.

(B) Targhi, or Targhiyeh. See Pocock, suppl. ad hist. dynast. p. 2.

(C) A great plain in Azerbijân, bounded on the north by the rivers Arras and Kûr, and on the east by the Caspian sea.

(D) By this must be understood Katay, or perhaps Little Bukhâria.

S E C T. IV.

The reign of Baydu Khân.

6. Khân
Baydû.

THE partisans of this prince, having slain Ganjatû, saluted him emperor in the city of c Hamadân, and afterwards caused him to be proclaimed through all the provinces and cities of the empire. The first thing he did, on ascending the throne, was, to testify his gratitude to Dogajar, who had been the principal instrument of his advancement, by giving him the chief command of all his troops; at the same time he made his friend Jamâlô'ddîn president of the Diwân, or his council. Mean time Gâzân, or Kâzân, who, from the death of his father, possessed the government of Khorassân, resolved to revenge the death of Ganjatû: and, for that purpose, consulted with the Amîr Newrûz Gâzi; with whom, for some time past, he had been in friendship. This Amîr was the son of Argûn Aga, who had possessed Khorassân as governor, under the descendants of Jenghîz Khân, during the space of thirty-nine years (A). After his father's death, he became an officer in the court of the d emperor Argûn Khân, where he continued till such time as that prince put to death Bega, his friend and relation: for, being in fear of meeting with the same fate, he fled to the most eastern part of Irân. There, making open profession of Mohammedanism, he waged war upon the enemies of that religion, and gained several great advantages over them. On this occasion he had many quarrels with Gâzân, who then governed the province of Khorassân: but at length, matters being accommodated between them, the Amîr came to kiss the feet of that prince, and thenceforth became his best friend.

Gâzân takes
arms.

GAZAN having consulted Newrûz about the manner of wresting the provinces of Azerbijân and Irâk out of the hands of Baydû, to join them to Khorassân, which he already possessed; that Amîr told him boldly, that if he would embrace Mohammedism, he would do his utmost e to put him in possession of the empire, and expel his rival. Gâzân, without hesitation, gave himself up to the direction of Newrûz; and, soon after, made public profession of Moslemism, in the city of Firûzkûh: where a great number of persons embraced the same faith, and entered into his party. When this was done, he set forward with a numerous army, shaping his march towards Ray: and, being arrived near that city, sent an ambassador to Baydû, to demand the murderers of Soltân Ganjatû: but no regard was paid to his application. Hereupon he resolved to make use of hostilities; and his scouts having met with the van-guard of Baydû's army, defeated, and took most of them prisoners; while the rest carried the news of this rupture to their camp^a.

Comes to terms.

GAZAN, after gaining this advantage, having recourse to artifice, sent a second ambassador f to Baydû, to excuse what had happened, pretending it was done without his knowledge. This apology having been accepted of, it was agreed that the two princes should have an interview, each accompanied with a certain number of persons in his train. They met, and a

^a KONDAM, ubi sup. p. 173. art. Eaidu.

(A) As he was made governor in 650, as mentioned in the reign of Hulâkû, he must have died in 689, the sixth or seventh year of Argûn Khân's reign.

a conference was held ; in which, after many compliments on both sides, Gâzân demanded of Baydû the government of the provinces of Pârs and Irâk, to hold of him by way of homage. The Khân (B), who desired nothing so much as peace, yielded to his request : after which it was agreed, that, the day following, a splendid entertainment should be made, for joy of this accommodation ; and that the two princes should visit each other in his tent. But Gâzân, having been informed that a plot was laid to assassinate him on his entering the Khân's tent, broke off the conference, and immediately returned with his army into Khorassân.

HOWEVER, so soon as he arrived in that province, he sent a third ambassador to acquaint Baydû ^{Baydû eriz : them.} that the cause of his hasty return, without taking leave of him, was, the advice he had received of a revolt among some of his officers ; and prayed, at the same time, that he would send his orders into the two provinces above-mentioned, for delivering them up to him, pursuant to his grant. Baydû dissimulated the chagrin which Gâzân's abrupt departure had given him ; and directed Jamîlo'ddîn, his Wazîr, to dispatch the orders for putting the officers of that prince in possession of those provinces. Jamîlo'ddîn did so : but, at the same time, gave orders underhand to the contrary ; so that Gâzân's officers were obliged to return, without accomplishing the business which they were sent about. Hereupon the Amîr Newrûz, who managed the affairs of Gâzân, persuaded that prince to depute him to go to the Soltân's court, under pretence of soliciting his interest there : but the real end of his embassy was, to form a party against Baydû, in favour of his master. In effect, he managed his intrigue so well, that, having gained Dogajar, prime minister of Baydû, they agreed together to dethrone this prince, and set up Gâzân in his room.

MEAN time Baydû, who had some suspicion of Newrûz, caused him to be watched, and would not suffer him to stir out of his palace : but that Amîr assured him, with so many oaths, that, if he would permit him to return to Khorassân, he would deliver Gâzân bound into his hands, that at length he obtained leave. It is reported, that, as soon as Newrûz returned to Khorassân, to save his oath, he sent a kettle tied up in a bag to Baydû ; thus joining railery to his knavery : for Gâzân, or Kâzân (which word is pronounced indifferently either way), signifies, in the Mungl or Turkish language, a kettle. The Soltân perceived, by this proceeding, that he had made a false step, in letting the Amîr Newrûz escape out of his hands : but now there was no help for it. In effect, that lord, after having corrupted the principal officers of Baydû's court, went back, to dispose Gâzân to put in execution the design which he had long thought upon ; while Shamso'ddîn arrived very seasonably to forward the enterprise : for he informed Gâzân, who was then at Sebzawâr, of the divisions which reigned among the lords of Baydû's court, and the general aversion which the people had to his person.

GAZAN finding, by this intelligence, that things were arrived at the pass he wished them at, lost no time, but sent Newrûz before with the van-guard of his army. This commander set out immediately, and spoiled the country where-ever he came : at the same he made such haste, that, in one night's space, he reached a camp, which was only two days journey distant from that of the Soltân. So soon as Dogajar, and those of his cabal, who had the chief posts in the Khân's army, heard that Newrûz was arrived, they, like base traitors, left their camp, and went over to his troops. The unfortunate prince, thus abandoned by his army, had nothing for it but to fly ; and, thinking he might be safe in Nakhshivân (or Nakhshivân, in Arrân), took the road to that city : but Newrûz pursued him so hotly, that he overtook him by the way, and put him to death (C), after a reign of no more than eight months, in the year 694 ^b.

^b KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 178, art. Baidû.

(B) Our author commonly uses the word Soltân instead of Khân, the former being the name for king, or sovereign prince, most used in Persia.

(C) Mirkond, in Teixeira, says the Wazîr, who seized him, carried him back to Tauris, and there dispatched him : but Kondamîr says, he was put to death at Nakhshivân.

S E C T. V.

The reign of Gâzân or Kâzân Khân.

f GAZAN KHAN, who took the name of Mahmûd, after he turned Mohammedan, was the son of Argûn Khân. This prince was no sooner on the throne, than he received advice that some of his kindred had passed the Jibûn, in order to dispute it with him. Hereupon he sent Newrûz against them with a potent army ; who obliged those princes to return, and leave Gâzân to enjoy in peace a kingdom which he governed with much wisdom and equity. In effect, he often sat himself in his court of justice, where all his subjects might freely make their complaints against the greatest lords and prime ministers of his court ; whom a he obliged to make satisfaction, according to the wrongs which they had done^a.
Mod. Hist. Vol. II. 6 H freely

puts to death

THE Amîr Newrûz, who had rendered his master such signal services in Khorassân, was again sent thither in quality of governor : but he was no sooner arrived, than several lords of the country, who sought that preferment, and envied his advancement, created a suspicion of him at court ; this they confirmed, by means of a letter of Newrûz, which they pretended to have intercepted, and sent to Sadro'ddin Khâled, president of the diwân ; by which he seemed to enter into combination with the king of Egypt, to make war on Gâzân. As soon as the Soltân was informed of this plot, he, without inquiring farther into the matter, immediately assembled his troops, in the year 696 ; and, sending them into Khorassân, under the conduct of Kutluk Shâh, ordered that general not to return to court, till he had punished Newrûz b for his rebellion. Gâzân was at this time at Hamadân, where he usually resided, altho' he had been crowned in Tauris, the capital of his empire ; because the disputes which he had in Syria, with the king of Egypt, obliged him to be near that province (A). Kutluk Shâh, having entered Khorassân, presently constrained Newrûz to abandon his government, and retire towards Fâkro'ddin Mâlek Kûrt, who was his son-in-law and creature : but this faithless prince, forgetting all his obligations, as well as duties of alliance and hospitality, delivered him up, loaded with chains, into the hands of Kutluk Shâh ; who put him to death on the spot, and sent his head to Gâzân.

Hej. 696.
A. D. 1296. his general Newrûz,

and treasurer.

Hej. 697.
A. D. 1299.

In 697, Gâzân gave the government of Khorassân to Soltân Aljaptu (or Aljaytu), his brother ; who had many disputes with Mâlek Kûrt, on account of the nearness of their dominions : c but at length they came to an agreement, by means of the Mufti Shehâbo'ddin Jâmi. In 699 Gâzân caused his Wazîr Sadro'ddin Renjâni, surnamed Sadr Jêhân, to be prosecuted for mis-managements in the finances ; but, in reality, to strip him of the great wealth which he possessed. This minister having been put to death, his employment was divided between two considerable officers of state.

Invades Syria.

Hej. 702.
A. D. 1302.
His forces defeated.

His death,

THE same year Gâzân entered Syria, and gave battle to Nasser, son of Kalawm, Soltân of Egypt, near the city of Hems ; in which the latter being defeated, escaped with no more than seven horsemen. After this, Kutluk Shâh, the Mungl general, took Damaskus, by composition, and all the rest of Syria was subdued : but, shortly after Gâzân had repassed the Euphrates, to return to Hamadân, the Syrians cut the throats of all the Mungl garrisons thro' d the country. In 702 Gâzân made a second expedition into Syria, and came to Halep ; where having spent some time to divert himself, he left the care of recovering that province to Kutluk Shâh, and his other generals. Mean time Nasser, hearing of his return into Syria, was come with a powerful army to Damaskus ; where he waited for the Khân, who had already passed the Euphrates, in his way back : while his generals deceived by their spies, and knowing nothing of Nasser's arrival, advanced towards Damaskus, expecting to surprise it ; when, of a sudden, their vanguard, having descried the army of Nasser, was obliged to come to an engagement. The battle was long and bloody (B) : but altho' the Amîr Jubân did surprising things, yet, not being well supported by the other Mungl officers, who turned their backs to the enemy, the latter gained a complete victory. e and acts.

KUTLUK SHAH, having been thus vanquished, retired with his forces, of which he had lost 10,000, into Persia ; and, near Kazwîn, joined the Soltân, who rewarded the valour of the Amîr Jubân, and punished with the korrah, or whip, according to the Mungl discipline, those who had not done their duty. Not long after this, he became bedridden ; and died, greatly lamented by all his subjects, in a place named Shâm Gâzân, that is, the Damaskus of Gâzân f. This was a town built by this emperor of the Mungls, near Tauris, in imitation of the Syrian Damaskus, and adorned with a stately mosque ; where he was interred in the year 703. It was the only sepulchre of the Mungls which remained standing in the time of Kondamîr, about 200 years after. He built two other cities, to which he gave the names of Kaberab (or Kayro) and Halep. In the year 702 this prince established Kaykobâd, son of Feramorz, last Soltân of the Seljuks of Rûm, or Anatolia, in the sovereignty of those dominions^c. Gâzân, according to Al Jannâbi, died the thirteenth of the month Shawal, near Hamadân (others say in Ray) ; and thence was conveyed to Al Shâm, near Tauris, after he had reigned eight years and about ten months. Some say he was taken off by poison.

^a KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 363. art. Gâzân. Pocock. suppl. ad Abû'lf. p. 2.
p. 363. art. Gâzân. ^c D'HERBEL. p. 773. art. Sham Gâzân.

^b KONDAM. ubi sup.

(A) But Tauris is as near Syria as Hamadân.

(B) Abû'lfeda Ismael, prince of Hamah. a great historian, and the most famous geographer of the east, was in the army of Nasser when this battle was fought.

S E C T. VI.

The reign of Aljaytu or Aijaptu Khân.

- ^a THE name of this prince, who succeeded his brother Gázân in 703, is variously written S. Khân Al-by authors ; as Aljaptu, or Ollaptu, and Oljaytu, according to the author of the Magmu ^{jaytû.} Al Rashîdiab (A), who dedicated his work to him. This last word is written also Aljaytu, ^{Hej. 703.} and, with some little variation, Aljâytû, which, according to Al Jannâbi, signifies the great ^{A. D. 1303:} emperor. He relinquished the religion of Jenghîz Khân, and became a Mohammedan; upon which occasion he assumed the name of Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed Khodâbandeh; which last word signifies, in Persian, the servant of God: but, instead of Khodâbandeh, as Al Jannâbi and others have it, Abû'Isfeda and Ahmed ebn Yusef write Khorbândâ ^a.
- THIS prince came from the province of Khorassân to Arrejân (B), where he was crowned Builds Soltania.
emperor; and gave the post of Amîr al Omara (C), which is that of generalissimo, to Kotluk ^b Shâh; dividing the office of prime Wazîr between Rashîdo'ddîn and Saado'ddîn: but this latter, being some time after suspected of committing certain misdemeanours, was put to death, and his place assigned to Ali Shâh. In 704 Aljaytu built the city of Soltania, and made it the seat of his empire (D). In the time of his abode here, several lords of Syria and Egypt came to implore his assistance against Mûlek al Nasser, son of Kelawn, Soltân of Egypt. Aljaytu, who ardently desired to recover Syria, which his ancestors had possessed, passed the Euphrates in 712, with a great army, and encamped at Rubabat, near Damaskus. Several skirmishes ^{Hej. 712.} happened between the Syrian and Mungl forces: but they never came to a pitched battle (E); ^{A. D. 1312.} for the Wazîr Rashîd, by this management, brought about a peace between the two powers; and Aljaytu returned to Soltania.
- ^c HE was no sooner arrived there, than he received advice that Kepek Khân and Bissur Oglan, Repulses the two princes of Turkestan, had passed the river Amû, with a design to reduce the province of Turks.
Khorassân. These invaders had already defeated Yessawl and Ali Kushji, the principal commanders in that province, when Aljaytu marched against, and compelled them to repass the Amû with great precipitation. This irruption of the Turks induced the Khân to confer the government of Khorassân on his son Abûsaïd, sending with him considerable troops to defend that province; and the Amîr Sunej to direct his affairs. The young prince began his government by punishing the two generals before-mentioned, who had fled from the Turks; and caused such exact justice to be observed in all respects, that he quickly restored peace and commerce to that large province.
- ^d NOT long after this, Bissur Oglan, having quitted the interest of Kepek Khân, went His death.
over to Abûsaïd; which turn must have occasioned a great war between the neighbouring ^{Hej. 716.} powers: but the death of Aljaytu, which happened in 716, prevented the storm. This prince ^{A. D. 1316:}
died at the age of thirty-six, after he had reigned twelve years (F); and made justice flourish in his dominions more than any other of the family of Jenghîz Khân. He had a great zeal for the Mohammedan religion; and honoured the chief professors of it, especially those of the sect of Ali; in favour of whom he caused the names of the twelve Imâms to be engraved on his coin ^b.

^a KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 88. art. Algiaptu; & Poc. suppl. p. 3.

^b Idem ibid. p. 88. art. Algiaptu.

(A) This was the Wazîr Rashîdo'ddîn, mentioned afterwards. It is a great collection of Arabic learning, and to be found in the king of France's library N° 1.; being the largest volume, and in the best order, of any D'Herbelot had met with among the Arabs. He was author also of the Jama'at-warîk, or history of the Turkish tribes, mentioned before, p. 123. See also D'Herb. p. 711. art. Rashîd Thabib.

(B) Or Al Rajân, a city of Khûzestân; but, by some geographers, ascribed to Pârs, or Proper Persia, one day's journey from the Persian gulf.

(C) Amîr al Omara signifies commander of commanders; Omara being the plural of Amîr.

(D) According to Mirkond, he built this city in 705, and removed his seat from Tauris, where he before resided; and, the next year, possessed himself of the provinces of Gheylân and Rasht. Teixeira, p. 312.

(E) According to Mirkond, in Teixeira, he recovered Shâm, or Damaskus.

(F) Twelve years and nine months, according to Mirkond, who says, he first brought up the custom of taking away the children of Christians and Jews, to educate them in their manner, and be served by them.

S E C T. VII.

The reign of Abûsaïd Khân.

9. Khân
Abûsaïd.

Hej. 718.
A. D. 1318.
Amîr Jûbân regent.

Repulses the Uzbeks.

His troops revolt.

Marries Abûsaïd's sister.
Hej. 719.
A. D. 1319.

ABUSAID, surnamed Behâdr Khân, succeeded his father Aljaytu, and was crowned in ^a the city of Soltânia. He immediately confirmed Rashîd and Ali Shâh, his father's Wazîrs, in their employments; and made Jûbân Noyân (A) generalissimo of his forces, who governed the empire as tutor to the young prince, then but twelve years of age.

IN 718 Ali Shâh so far wrought upon the Amîr Jûbân by his management and presents, that Rashîd'ddîn was turned out of his office, and some time after put to death. The same year Bayfûr, a prince of the royal blood of the Mungls, revolted against Abûsaïd; and, advancing from Khorassân into Mazânderân, threatened to march on to Soltânia itself, if the Soltân had not sent a potent army, under the conduct of the Amîr Hûssayn Kurkhân, to reduce him to obedience. The Soltân at this time passed the winter at Karabâgh (in Arrân); where advice came, that Uzbek Khân (B) had crossed over the great desert of Kapjâk (or Kip-jâk), and made himself master of the city of Dârbend. This obliged him to depart immediately, with the few troops which he had about him, to go and encamp on the Kûr, in order to hinder the Tatars from passing that river. On the other hand, the Amîr Jûbân, who had followed the Amîr Hûssayn, to appease the troubles raised in Khorassân, no sooner heard of the irruption of the enemy, than he turned back, to strengthen the army of Soltân Abûsaïd. ^b

As the Tatars had hitherto done nothing but plunder the country, without undertaking any thing of consequence, their army was much diminished; so that Shâh Uzbek, finding himself no equal match for the Soltân, whose forces were now considerably increased by reinforcements, resolved to break up his camp, and retire: but, being followed at the heels by the Amîr Jûbân, he lost a great number of men in his retreat. After this success, while Abûsaïd ^c marched back to Soltânia, the general caused several of the principal officers of the Soltân's army to be whipped, according to the Mungl discipline; for not having done their duty in his absence, and then proceeded towards Gorja (or Georgia). Mean time the officers, who had received the correction, plotted to revenge that disgrace; and engaged in their party several officers, who bore with impatience the severe humour of the Amîr Jûbân ^a.

THE malcontents, having formed a pretty considerable army among themselves, followed that general, who had already entered Gorja; and, while he had left his camp, to go on some enterprise against the enemy, they seized on, and pillaged it. After this surprise, which reduced the Amîr to great want of every thing, they gave battle to, and defeated him. Jûbân stood ^d in need of all his courage, but more of his wit and address, to save his person out of such imminent danger. In effect, by making use of several stratagems, he at length escaped; and, by marching many round-about ways, arrived at Soltânia. The Khân, not thinking himself safe in his capital, while the rebels continued in arms, gathered all the troops he could in haste, and marched to chastise them. The revolters, losing all respect for the Soltân, gave him battle, but were defeated; and it was on this occasion that Abûsaïd got the surname of Bahâdr, or Brave, by rushing into the midst of the enemy.

IN 719 the Amîr Hûssayn Kurkhân, who was at war with Bayfûr in Khorassân, obtained so many advantages over him, that he at length constrained him to repass the Amû into Great Bukhâria; where he was slain some time after, in fight with a prince of the race of Jagatay, ^e son of Jenghîz Khân. In 721 the Soltân married his sister, named Satibeg, to the Amîr Jûbân, whose nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. Next year Timûrtash, son of Jûbân, who was governor of the country of Rûm, or Anatolia, revolted against Abûsaïd; setting up for sovereign in his department. The Amîr, on this advice, tho' in the depth of winter, set out with a powerful army, to bring him back to his duty: which the son no sooner understood, than he laid down his arms, and put himself into his father's hands; who carried him as a prisoner to the feet of the Soltân. By this means Abûsaïd was appeased; and pardoning the son, in consideration of the father's services, restored him to his government.

^a KONDAM. ap. D'Herb. p. 33. Aboufaïd.

(A) Written by some Noyân, by others Noyân. This person is named also Amîr Jûbân. In Abûlghâzi Khân's history Zûpânî, that is, Jûpânî, or Chûpânî; and, in Teixeira Chûbân; the Persians often using the p for the Arab b. Abûlghâzi says, the chiefs of the tribe of Saldus, from father to son, bore that name. Hist. Turke, &c. p. 188.

(B) Called afterwards Shâh Uzbek: the titles of Shâh, Soltân, Khân, and sometimes Mâlek, being given indifferently, by the oriental historians, to the kings or sovereigns of different nations, with no small impropriety.

^a IN 723 Ali Shâh the Wazîr died; and his post was given to Sayn, lieutenant-general of the Dilbliges Amîr Jûbân. Some time after this, the Amîr gave his daughter, named Bâghdâd Khâtûn, ^{him.} one of the greatest beauties in all Asia, in marriage to the Amîr Hassan Ilkbânî, son of Sheykh Hâssayn (C): but this marriage proved very fatal to him; for Soltân Abûsaïd, having fallen in love with that lady, demanded her in marriage of her father. Now, according to the laws of the Mungls, every private person was obliged to repudiate his wife, when the Khân had a mind to espouse her. For all this, the Amîr Jûbân never would consent to his daughter's divorce; and even uttered disrespectful words against this young prince, who required nothing contrary to the laws, or his own duty ^b.

^b ABUSAID at that time dissembled the resentment which he conceived at this refusal: while ^{Out of favour.} the Amîr Jûbân, thinking to cure his passion by absence, sent his son-in-law and daughter to Karabâgh; and carried the Soltân, against his inclination, to Bâghdâd, there to pass the winter. But Abûsaïd's love, far from diminishing by this separation, only increased the more. Mean time the Wazîr Sayn inflamed the aversion of the prince against Jûbân, by several false reports which he framed, relating to the conduct of the Amîr and his sons. As these practices of the Wazîr came to the knowledge of Damashk Khowajeh (or Khoja), son of the accused, one of the chief officers of the Soltân's household, and who had oftenest access to him, he took care to send his father an account of them. On this occasion the Amîr Jûbân took a very bold step: for, under pretence of going to quash some insurrections which were begun in Khorassân, he departed hastily from Bâghdâd, and went to Soltâniâ, carrying with him the Wazîr ^c Sayn, as it were by way of hostage for his son, whom he left at court.

^d THIS son remained there, to direct all affairs: for Jûbân, who had the intire mananage- ^{His son Da-} ment of them, communicated them to none but him. It happened, at length, that Damashk, ^{malik} abusing his father's authority, disposed so absolutely of all things, that Abûsaïd had little left to him besides the name of Soltân. This prince, weary of being always under guardianship, discovered his dissatisfaction to some of his confidants; and they informed him, that Damashk carried on an intrigue with one of the wives of the late Soltân Aljaytû, his father. On this advice, the prince ordered Damashk to be watched, to discover the truth; and, in a short time, was himself witness of a rendezvous made by the two lovers. The Soltân, wounded in his ^{put to death.} honour, as well as authority, by this insolent minister, would readily have signed the order ^e for his death: but as none of his domestics durst undertake so dangerous a task, he found there was a necessity of leaving things to chance; which soon turned out to his wishes. For it happened, at this very juncture, in 727, that some heads of men, who had revolted in the pro- ^{Hej. 727.} vinces, having been brought to the Soltân's palace, a report was spread, that they were the ^{A. D. 1326.} heads of the Amîr Jûbân and his adherents, which had been sent from Khorassân. This rumour so frightened Damashk, that, without inquiring into the truth of the matter, he left the palace, in the night, with only ten men, and took to flight. As soon as Abûsaïd was informed of this, he sent after him Mesr Khowajeh, one of his confidants, who overtook, and cut off his head, which he brought forthwith to the Soltân.

^e THIS prince, delivered from the son, proposed soon also to get rid of the father: for this ^{Raises an ar-} purpose, he sent strict orders to the officers of Khorassân to seize the person of Jûbân; and cou- ^{my.} riers to those of other provinces, to put to death all who could be found, either of his relations or dependents. But as these officers lived in good understanding with that general, instead of executing the Soltân's mandate, they immediately gave him notice of it. Upon this intelligence, he lost no time: for, making use of the favour and credit of his friends, he set on foot an army of 70,000 horse, with which he moved towards Kashân; whither the Soltân was advanced, with all the forces which he was able to assemble. Jûbân, before he left Khorassân, caused the Wazîr Sayn to be slain, by way of reprisal, for the death of his son; and Abûsaïd, to be even with him, appointed for Wazîr Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed, a person of learning, son of Rashîdo'ddîn, whom the Amîr had also put to death, as before hath been related.

^f MEAN time, the Amîr Jûbân marched forward, with design to make himself master of the ^{His troops ac-} court, and the person of the Soltân. When he came to Semnân (in Kumes), he made a visit ^{sent.} to Rokno'ddîn Alao'ddawlet, whose tomb is still respected there, by Mohammedans, for his great sanctity; and, after some conferences with him, promised, on oath, to follow strictly his advice in every thing: proposing, as a testimony of his sincerity, that the Sheykh should go from him to the Soltân, to demand the murderers of his son, and the conditions of a good peace. Abûsaïd received the Sheykh with respect, and did him a thousand honours: but refused either to deliver up the assassins, or, in any sort, treat with Jûbân. The Amîr, enraged at this refusal, no longer kept any measures with the Soltân; and came to encamp within one day's march of his ordû, or imperial camp, in a place named Kuba. But he did not continue long in that post : for several of his principal officers, who intirely owed their fortunes to him, abandoned him, with 30,000 horse, and went over to their sovereign.

^b KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 32. art. Aboufaïd.

(C) The same with the Amîr Hâssayn Karkhân, mentioned a little above.

He retreats.

As the Amîr Jûbân, after such an instance of inconstancy in so considerable a part of his troops, could not prudently confide in the rest of them ; he quitted his camp, and took the road of the desert of Nubendijân, with design to retire into Khorassân. This long and difficult march, joined to a farther desertion of his officers, so weakened his army, that, being no longer able to support his party in that province, he resolved to repair to Turkestan : a country where there were several great princes, who often made incursions into the dominions of Abûsaïd, as hath been already remarked. This resolution would probably have proved very advantageous to the Amîr, had he pursued it : but his evil destiny so ordered it, that, when he came to the river Morgâb, he of a sudden changed his mind, and turned back, to throw himself into the arms of Gayâtbo'ddîn, surnamed Mâlek Kârt ; whom he had bred up from his youth, and advanced to the principal posts in the armies of Asia.

Betrayed, and slain,

MALEK KURT proved not more faithful to him than the rest : for having, at the same time, received an express from the Soltân, with dispatches full of great offers and promises, if he would send him Jûbân's head, the first visit of this ingrate was that which he made him by the executioner. The Amîr could never obtain so much as the favour to see him : so that finding he must die, he required three things of him. First, That, as soon as his head was severed from his body, he should send one of his fingers, which was double at the end, to the camp of Abûsaïd. Secondly, that he would cause his body to be sent to Medinah, there to be buried in a chapel which had been built at his expence. And thirdly, That he would convey his son Jalayr, whom he had by Satibeg, to the court of Soltân Abûsaïd his uncle. These three requests being granted him, the executioner cut off his head : which Mâlek Kurt sent immediately to the Soltân, and set out soon after himself, to receive the reward of his perfidy. But he was much surprised, when he understood, on the road, that Sheykh Hassan had divorced his wife, the daughter of Jûbân, and sent her into the Soltân's harâm. What still more increased his chagrin was, that Sheykh Hassan, by this submission to the desires of Abûsaïd, had obtained the employment which he expected at court ; and that Bâghdâd Khâtûn (D) had gotten an intire influence over the mind of the prince.

By Mâlek Kurt.

THIS disagreeable news made him resolve, before he proceeded any farther, to send his orders into Khorassân, to put to death Jalayr, son of the Amîr Jûbân ; whose life he had preserved, at the request of his father, though contrary to the Soltân's orders. After this second execution, he continued his route towards Karabâgb (E), where Abûsaïd then resided : but, through the great credit which Bâghdâd Khâtûn, who was married, in a solemn manner, by the Soltân, possessed at court, he received but a very cold reception ; and was considered rather as the murderer of the Soltâna's father, than a person who had rendered a great piece of service to Abûsaïd. He was even made to wait in the camp, all the time which the corpses of Jûbân and his son were bringing from Khorassân to Awfân ; where the Soltân ordered them to be put into the hands of the pilgrims of Mekka, to bury them at Medinah. To defray this expence, he caused 40,000 dinars to be paid to them ; and gave to Mâlek Kurt no other reward, than the permission of returning to his own country. With regard to the Amîr Jûbân, we shall only observe farther, that he had always passed for a good man, a lover of justice, and a great zealot for his religion.

Hej. 732.
A. D. 1331.
Sheykh Hassan promoted.

IN 732, some persons envying the good fortune of Sheykh Hassan, and uneasy at the great power which the Soltâna had in affairs, began to whisper about, that this princess still carried on a secret intimacy with her first husband. As these reports came, at length, to the Soltân's ears, he banished Sheykh Hassan to the castle of Kamakb (F) ; and shewed great coldness to his new spouse. But the falsity of those insinuations having been discovered, and the authors of such black calumny punished, Abûsaïd restored the Soltâna and the Sheykh to his favour ; and even conferred on the latter the government of part of Rûm, or Asia Minor, which, at that time belonged to his dominions.

Hej. 736.
A. D. 1335.

IN 735, Shâh Uzbek made a second irruption into the territories subject to Soltân Abûsaïd ; who, next year (G), marched to fight his enemy : but he was scarce arrived in the province of Shîrwân, when the heat, and malignity of the air, threw him into a dangerous sick-

* KONDAM. ubi sup. p. 33. art. Abûsaïd.

(D) According to Mirkand, in Teixeira, Abûsaïd gave her the title of Khândekar, which was the royal style ; and that he put the whole government into her hands, which she managed with much wisdom and discretion, while he diverted himself with reading, being very bookish. 'Tis added, that his judgment was sound, and his person graceful.

(E) According to the same author, Jannûbi, and the Nighiarijlân, he spent his summers in Soltâniya, and his winters at Karabâgb.

(F) Kamakb, or Kemak, as some authors write, stands on the Euphrates, twenty-one miles to the south of Arzenjân, in Rûm, or Anatolia.

(G) This year, 736 of the Hejrah, of Christ 1335, was remarkable, as well for the birth of Timûr Beg, or Tamerlan, as for the death of Abûsaïd.

a nefs. For this, his physicians prescribed bathing: but one day, after taking medicines, while he was in the bath, he fell into a swoon, and died not long afterwards. The author of the preface to the Jafar Nâmeb writes, that the Soltâna Bâghdâd Khâtûn, perceiving a change in this prince's affections towards her, gave him poison, which took away his life, at the age of thirty-two, of which he had reigned nineteen years. His corpse was transported to Soltânîyâ, with a pomp worthy of so great a monarch, and inhumed in the sepulchre of his ancestors (H). Arbab Khân, his successor, caused the Soltâna to be put to death, who was accused of being concerned in the death of Abûsaïd; and had been convicted of corresponding with Shâh Uzbek, who disputed the crown with him ^d.

^d KONDEM. ubi sup. p. 34.

(H) He was buried near his father Khodabandeh, under the fine dome of the monk of Soltânîyâ; on the walls of which, the whole Korân is written, in golden characters. La Croix, hist. Gengh. p. 404.

C H A P. IV.

Dynasties which sprung up on the death of Abûsaïd Khân.

b ON the death of Abûsaïd, in 736, the empire of the Mungls in Irân, or Persia at large, fell all to pieces, and into great confusion: for, after him, they acknowledged no single monarch of the race of Jenghîz Khân; but cantoned themselves in the several provinces, which were plundered by the frequent wars which the lords waged among themselves, every one aiming at the sovereignty, and to reduce the rest under his power. Nor did these disorders cease, till the time of Timûr Beg, who, after the conquest of the countries to the north of the Jibân, or Amû, turned his arms against those to the south of that river; and, in a short time, brought all the jarring princes of Irân under his obedience.

c AMONG the petty dynasties which, during this interval of distraction, sprung up in that great region, historians mention two Mungl, which rose out of the ruins of their empire, immediately on the death of Abûsaïd. The first, called Il Khânian, its princes being descended, in a direct line, from Hulâkû Khân, surnamed Il Khân. The second, named Jûbânian, or Chûbânian, as being founded by the family of Jûbân, or Chûbân. The first had four princes, who reigned from the year 737 to 813, the space of seventy-six years. The second had but two, who held the scepter only twenty years, that is, from 738, two years after the death of Abûsaïd, to 758; though some make their dominion end two years sooner. The Il Khânians reigned in Arabian Irâk and Azerbejân; the Jûbânians in this latter province, and the Persian Irâk. Although these two dynasties were cotemporary, and their affairs blended together, yet we shall treat of them separately; but avoid all repetitions, except what must be used to make the necessary connections.

S E C T. I.

The dynasty of the Il Khânians.

Reign of Sheykh Haffân Buzruk.

d THIS dynasty had four Soltâns, or princes; the first of whom was Amîr Haffân, or Haffân Nowyân, son of the Amîr Haffâyî Kurkhân, one of Abûsaïd Khân's generals, mentioned in the reign of that Soltâh. Haffân married the famous Bâghdâd Khâtûn, daughter of the Amîr Jûbân, or Chûpân, with whom Abûsaïd was enamoured; and, after the death of her father, divorced her, to gratify that prince: who, in 732, conferred on him the government of the Mungl dominions in Rûm, or the country of the Romans, meaning chiefly Anatolia. This Haffân was surnamed Buzruk (A), or the great, in the Mungl or Turkish language, to distinguish him from Haffân, surnamed Kujuk, or the lesser; who, near the fame

(A) In the English translation of La Croix's history of Genghîz Khân, p. 404, he is named Buzure Haffân; a mistake, perhaps, for Buzurc, or Buzurk, as that author seems to have read it.

same time, founded the dynasty of Jûbânians^a. Arab Shâh says, that Hassan Buzruk was the son of Hussayn; and Hussayn, the son of Ak Buga; that Ak Buga was the son of Id Khân; and that Id Khân descended from Sberfo'ddin Sebîb Alkân, or Ilkân Argân, son of Abûsaïd. Arabshâh does not say who this Abûsaïd was^b; yet D'Herbelot will have him to be Abûsaïd Khân. But this cannot be; since Hassan Buzruk was cotemporary with Abûsaïd Khân, and, from circumstances, older: whereas his ancestor Abûsaïd was, at least, five or six generations earlier than Abûsaïd Khân. The same author furnishes no more materials relating to this founder of the Il Khânian dynasty. But Abû'lgbâzi Khân gives us some farther particulars of his history. According to this author, on the death of Abûsaïd, those of the tribe of Suldus, the heads of which bore the name of Zûpani, or Jûpani (B), put the sceptre into the hands of Arpa, or Arba Khân, descended from Artokbuga (C), son of Tawlay (or Tuli) Khân.

Arba Khân.

SOME time after this, Ali, a chief of a tribe of the Virats, by the great credit which he had in the city of Baghdâd, caused Musa, descended from Hulâkû (D), to be proclaimed Khân there: who marching to attack Arpa Khân, defeated, and slew him; whereby he became master of all his territories^c. This Alî Khân, according to D'Herbelot, reigned no more than six months (E); and, on his coming to the crown, put to death Bâghdâd Khâtûn, the beloved wife of Abûsaïd Khân^d, for the reasons already mentioned, in the reign of that prince.

Musa Khân.

As soon as Sheykh Hassan Jalayr (F), called also Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, who was then very powerful in the provinces of Rûm (or Anatolia), heard that the people of Baghdâd had proclaimed Musa in quality of Khân, he caused Mohammed, a descendant of Hulâkû (G), to be acknowledged Khân of the Mungls in that country. This prince, immediately on his advancement, got together a great army, and marched from Rûm to the borders of Irân. At the news of his approach, Musa Khân marched as far as Tabrîz (or Tauris) to meet him: but coming to a battle, was intirely defeated; and having in the action lost Ali (H), by whose interest he had been raised to the throne, he fled for shelter to the Virats.

Mohammed Khân.

ADVICE of this revolution coming to the knowledge of Sheykh Ali, son of the Amîr Ali Koshji, who, at the same juncture, commanded in Khorassân, he hastened to Bastân, and there proclaimed Togay Timûr, one of the descendants of Fujikar, brother of Jenghîz Khân, who formerly resided in Mazânderân. Soon after, being joined by Musa Khân, they all three went in quest of Mohammed Khân: but the Sheykh Hassan Jalayr advancing against them, with a powerful army, as far as Yagarm Rudh (I), intirely routed them. Musa Khân lost his life in this action (K): but Togay Timûr and Sheykh Ali escaped into Khorassân.

Togay Timûr Khân.

WHEN Sheykh Hassan Kujuk (L), who commanded on the borders of Rûm, in the time of Abûsaïd Khân, received information of the ill success of this battle, he gathered in haste a numerous army, and took the field against Mohammed Khân, and the Sheykh Hassan Buzruk. After some skirmishes of no moment, the competitors came, at length, to a decisive battle near Nakhsivân; in which Mohammed Khân being killed, and his forces defeated, Sheykh Hassan Buzruk fled for shelter to the city of Soltâniya. On this occasion, Sheykh Hassan Kujuk conferred the government of Tabrîz (or Tauris) on a lady named Satibika (M), while he marched in pursuit of his enemies. Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, perceiving the victor pressed him close, and that there was no likelihood of escaping out of his hands, implored his clemency, and surrendered himself at discretion. After this, Sheykh Hassan Kujuk returning to Tabrîz, Satibika delivered

^a D'HERBEL. p. 489. art. Il Khân.
KHAN, hist. Turks, p. 188.

^b ARABSHAH, hist. Timûr, l. iii. § 3.

^c ABU'LGHAZI

^d D'HERBEL. p. 34, & 382, art. Abûsaïd & Genghîzkhaniân.

(B) Jûpani, or Jûbani, is the gentile name of Jûban, formed by adding the final i.

(C) Arba Khân was the son of Senghigân, son of Mâlek Timûr, son of Arfakâ Buga, son of Tuli, son of Jenghîz Khân. D'Herbelot, p. 382. art. Jenghîz Khânian. La Croix makes Arpa Khân the son of Ali, son of Baydu Khân, son of Targay (or Tarighi), son of Hulâkû. Hist. Gengh. p. 404.

(D) Musa was the son of Ali, son of Baydu Khân, son of Targay (or Targbiyek), son of Hulâkû Khân.

(E) According to La Croix, he died in 1335.

(F) By this, he seems to have been of the tribe of Jalayr. Soltân Ahmed likewise is, by Sharîfo'ddin, in the life of Timûr Bek, called Ahmed Jalayr.

(G) Mohammed Khân was the son of Yol Kutluk, son of Timûr, son of Anbarji, son of Mangu, son of Hulâkû Khân, according to Abû'lgbâzi Khân: but La Croix makes him the son of Majuni, son of Amîjin, son of Hulâkû Khân: he puts his death in 1337; and says, some call him Mahmûd. Hist. Gengh. p. 405.

(H) La Croix calls him Ali Shâh; and says, he was another Khân of Hulâkû's race. Hist. Gengh. p. 404.

(I) This seems to be a river; which, in the Persian, is called Rudh: the dh being sounded like te, in them, this, &c.

(K) Mohammed caused his head to be cut off. This happened in 1336. La Croix, p. 405.

(L) This is the grandson of Hassân, son of the Amîr Jûbân, founder of the Jûbânian dynasty. Abû'lgbâzi Khân, to distinguish him from Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, calls him Sheykh Hassan Kboja; possibly, because the authors he made use of do not add the surname of Kujuk, which we, to prevent confusion, have put instead of Kboja; as, afterwards, we have substituted Buzruk for Jalayr.

(M) This must be Satibeg, daughter of Abûsaïd Khân, and married to the Amîr Jûbân, grandfather of this Hassân, who was son of Timûrtayeb. La Croix names her Shâh Zâdeb Shâhibek Kârûn; and places her as the sixth Khân among the eight Khâns, which, according to his authors, reigned after the death of Abûsaïd.

a him the keys of that city, after she had governed there a whole year; and the Sheykh, to recompense her fidelity, married her to Soleymân, a lord descended (O) from Hulâkû.

SOME time after this, the Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, having found means to escape out of the hands of his conqueror, fled to Bâghdâd, and caused Jehân Timûr (P) to be proclaimed Khân. This done, he set forward, to try his fortune once more against the Sheykh Hassan Kujuk: but, having met with another defeat, he retreated to that capital; and believing he had reason to be dissatisfied with Jehân Timûr, deposed him, and seized the supreme authority himself. It does not appear that he had any farther contest with Hassan Kujuk, whose death seems to have happened not long after (Q): nor do we meet with any thing relating to him further (R), than that he died in 757, after a reign of twenty years; and left for his successor his son Soltân Avîs.

Jehân Timûr
Khân.
A. D. 1356.

The reign of Soltân Avîs, or Weîs.

AVÎS, or Avîs (called also Veîs, or Weîs, and commonly Sheykh Avîs, or Veîs), on the death of his father Sheykh Hassan Ilkhâni, surnamed Buzruk, succeeded to the states which he possessed (S); at a time when several Mungl princes, descended from Jenghîz Khân, had divided the empire of Abûsaïd Khân, the last sole monarch of Irân, amongst them. In 759, Sheykh Avîs entered Azerbejân, with an intent to conquer it; and defeated Akbijuk, who was master of that province (T), although attended with a powerful army. Akbijuk, on this disaster, fled to Tauris; but, not thinking himself safe in that city, he abandoned it to his enemy, and retired to Nakhshivân, on the borders of Armenia. Avîs would have found no more enemies in all that great province, if he had not procured them himself, by his severity: for having put to death forty of the principal lords of the country, he so alienated the minds of the rest, that they joined with Akbijuk, and put him in possession of all which he had formerly lost. Thus Avîs being constrained to abandon his new conquest, retired with a shattered army to Bâghdâd, which he made his residence. However, he did not lose courage on this reverse of fortune, but still pursued his first design: for, the next spring, he caused fresh troops to march towards Tauris; where having surprised Akbijuk, who had been disturbed all the winter by another enemy, named Mohammed Modhaffer (U), or Mozaffer, he seized his person, and put him to death.

d IN 765 Avîs was engaged in troubles at home: for, while he was in Azerbejân, Khawâja Merjân, with whom he had there left the command of the troops in his absence, refused to obey his orders; and obliged him to come in person, at the head of his forces, to bring him to his duty. But this expedition was soon finished: for Merjân opened the gates to him; and received pardon for his transgression, on making new protestations of fidelity. After taking one year's repose in his capital, he of a sudden fell upon the cities of Mosul and Mardin in Diyâr-bekr, and reduced them both in a very short space. In 772 Soltân Avîs marched against the Amîr Veli, who had subdued the province of Mazânderân, after driving out Toga Timûr Khân (X), whom he put to death; and, having defeated him in battle, pursued him as far as Sem-nân, towards the borders of Khorassân.

e AFTER this victory, Avîs returned to Bâghdâd; where he resided in peace till 776, when he fell sick; and, his distemper increasing, the principal ministers intreated that he would give

2. Soltân
Avîs.
Hej. 759.
A. D. 1357.
Conquers Azerbejân.

A. D. 1358.

Quells a rebellion.
Hej. 765.
A. D. 1363.

Hej. 772.
A. D. 1370.

His death.
A. D. 1374.

c ABU'LGH. ubi supra.

(O) Soleymân was son of Mohammed, son of Sangu, son of Tashmut, son of Hulâkû Khân; so writes Abûl-ghazi Khân. La Croix, less accurately, says, he was the son of Sanki, son of Abmed, whom some called Shemed, son of Hulâkû Khân. The same author makes him the seventh Khân; and says, his wife gave him that title, in 1338.

(P) Jehân Timûr was son of Alfrân, son of Kojestû Khân, son of Abâka Khân, son of Hulâkû Khân. Kojestû of Abûl-ghazi Khân is the same with Kaiktû, or Ganjatû Khân; that is, the eighth Khân of La Croix, who seems to have made his fourth and fifth out of Togay Timûr: the first called Tagur Khân; the second Bûka Timûr Khân.

(Q) Viz. in 745; for he is reckoned to begin his reign in 738, and to have sat on the throne seven years.

(R) For we know not what to make of what La Croix says, that Buzruk Hassan at last got himself crowned king of the Medes (he must mean Azerbejân), and afterwards of Khaldea, by the reduction of Baghdâd, Hilleh, Wâset, and Bârab, which had been possessed by Mâlek Ashraf the Chubanian, unless Ashraf had taken them from him before.

(S) Hassan Buzruk seems to have been master of Bagh-

MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

dâd, and the places dependent on it, or of Arabian Irak at most, at the death of Hassan Kujuk. 'Tis possible he enlarged his dominions in the remaining eleven years of his reign, and during that of Mâlek Ashraf (the successor of Hassan Kujuk); who was a debauched prince.

(T) Here we meet with a difficulty. Azerbejân was conquered by Jani Bek, eighth Khân of Kipjâk, in Hejrah 746, A. D. 1355: then returning, he left his son Birdi Bek, who did not return till two years after his father's death, which happened in 758: so that Birdi Bek must have staid in Azerbejân till 759, if not till 760. Yet, in the text, we are told Akbijuk was master of that province in 759. How happened this? did Birdi Bek leave it to Akbijuk? or did Akbijuk seize it after Birdi Bek's departure? This seems to be the case; since La Croix tells us, that Birdi Bek left the country of Azerbejân to Soltân Avîs.

(U) This might have been Mobaraze'ddin Mohammed, founder of the Mozaffrian dynasty in Pârs or Proper Persia, in 718, where he reigned forty-two years.

(X) Before called Togay Timûr Khân, set up by Sheykh Ali.

orders about the succession ; for he left four sons, Hassan, Hussayn, Abmed, and Bayezîd. His answer was, that he chose Hussayn for his successor ; and that Hassan should be content with the government of Bâghdâd. The ministers replied, that Hassan, being the eldest, would possibly not rest satisfied with that disposition. Upon which the Soltân said, You know that which must be done. By these words the ministers concluding, that the Soltân gave them power to do that which they judged most good for the state, seized Hassan, and put him under a strong guard. As Avîs lost his speech not long after, so that he could not explain himself farther with relation to Hassan, as soon as his eyes were closed, the ministers of state, who were desirous to secure the crown to Hussayn, put Hassan their prisoner to death, and buried both the father and son on the same day ^a.

His character. SOLTÂN AVIS reigned nineteen years. According to Arabshâh, he was a religious, good, and just prince ; had few vices ; and many virtues, which were visible in his aspect. He was an excellent commander, and very courageous ; a great warrior, and successful in his expeditions : was well beloved and respected by all degrees of persons ^b. But, in what the same author adds, that this prince resigned the crown to Hussayn (whom he calls his eldest son), to lead a devout life, on account of a dream which he had of his death ; and that he died, after having lived holily more than thirty years, he seems to have been mistaken : since the Persian writers are silent as to any such thing ; and what is related above, appears more probable.

The reign of Soltân Hussayn.

3. Soltân
Hussayn.

Hej. 784.
A. D. 1382.

Slain by Ahmed.

HUSSAYN, second son of Sheykh Avîs, or Veîs, had the surname of Kurkbin ; because he was nearly related to the Mungl Soltâns of the race of Jenghîz Khân, as well as that of Il Khâni, as being descended from Hulâkû. This prince, who was possessed of Arabian or Babylonish Irâk, and Azerbejân, carried his arms into Persian Irâk ; and probably would have subdued that province, had he not been prevented by the rebellion and fratricide of his brother Abmed, in the following manner. In the year 784 Soltân Hussayn sent Adel Aga, general of his troops, to besiege certain castles belonging to the city of Ray, or Rey, in Persian Irâk ; and having, for that purpose, given him the greater part of his forces, Abmed took the opportunity ; under pretence of some discontent, to retire from the city of Tabriz, or Tauris, where the court then was, to that of Ardebîl (about thirty miles distant). The Soltân being informed of this retreat, immediately sent an express after him, to order his return : but this prince, who had great designs in his head, refused to obey the command ; and, at the same time, raising what troops he could, came and surprised his brother, who remained in a manner disarmed in his capital. Hussayn, not being in a condition to make resistance against this unexpected attack, endeavoured to conceal himself, that he might not fall into Abmed's hands : but he was soon discovered, and brought before his unnatural brother, who ordered him to be put to death ^c. Arabshâh relates, that Abmed revolted in the latter Jomada of the year 783 ; and, after keeping his brother a year in misery, put him to death ; at which time he was turned of twenty. According to the same author, this prince, whom he names Jalâlo'ddîn Hussayn, was the most virtuous, and worthy to reign, of all the sons of Sheykh Avîs, in whose steps he trod : he was good to his subjects, and very generous, full of courage and magnanimity ^d.

The reign of Soltân Ahmed.

4. Soltân Ahmed.

MOGHITHO'DDÎN AHMED, commonly called also Abmed Jalayr (A), third son of Sheykh Avîs, having put his brother Hussayn to death, immediately assumed the title of Soltân ; but was in danger of losing it almost as soon as he had usurped it : for his younger brother Bayezîd, frightened at the horrid murder which he had committed, fled for refuge to Adel Aga, who commanded the army. This general, shocked at the horrid act no less than the young prince, immediately acknowledged him for lawful Soltân, and marched in pursuit of Abmed ; who, not having forces sufficient to resist his, fled in his turn, and retired to Marvand. However, while Adel Aga persisted to pursue Abmed, and had almost gotten him into his hands, the principal officers of the army mutinied against him, in favour of the usurper ; so that he was forced to retire with his new Soltân to the city of Soltâniya. Abmed, on this advice, did not fail to throw himself immediately into Tauris : but he was no sooner arrived there, than he received the news that Sheykh Ali and Pîr Ali were advancing to besiege him.

^a KONDAM. ap. D'Herbel. p. 149. art. Avis.
ubi sup. p. 149. & 464. art. Avîs & Houssain ben Avîs.

^b ARABSH. ubi sup. l. iii. §. 3.
^d ARABSH. ubi sup.

^c KONDAM.

(A) Called Moghitho'ddîn in Arabshâh, and Abmed Jalayr in Sharîfo'ddîn's life of Timûr Bek.

- a AHMED, tho' not sufficiently prepared for such a sudden attack, yet, being full of courage, Expelled and marched out of Tauris to give them battle. The two armies were now in fight near a place restored.
called Heft Rûdb, or the seven rivers, when Omar Kiptbâki went over with his troops from Abmed, and joined Sheykh Ali. As this piece of treachery lost him the victory, of which he seemed already secure, he found he had no other course left but to retire in haste to the city of Nakhsbiwân, and obtain succour of Kara Mohammed the Turkmân, first prince of the dynasty named Kara Kuyunlu, or the Black Sheep. This prince intirely re-established the affairs of Abmed: for, joining him with 500 horse, they marched against their enemies; and defeated them so effectually, that both Sheykh Ali and Pir Ali were killed on the spot. After this victory, Abmed returned in triumph to Tauris; but he did not remain quiet long: for Adel
b Aga still maintained his ground in Soltânîya with Soltân Bayezîd, and gave him no small uneasiness; till Timûr Bek, in the year 795, subdued Persian Irâk, when that city, with the rest, fell into his hands.

BUT at the same time Timûr took this thorn out of Abmed's side, he thrust a worse into its Expelled by place: for, the same year, that conqueror marched to besiege him in Bâghdâd, from whence Timûr.
the Soltân fled, leaving his capital at the mercy of the enemy. A party of Tatars pursued Hej. 795.
him hotly as far as the plain of Kerbela, on the west side of the Euphrates: where, after sever- A. D. 1392.
al skirmishes, Abmed, by stratagem, escaped out of their hands, with Kara Yûsef the Turk- mân; who had accompanied him ever since the great service which he had done him at the battle of Heft Rudb. After this narrow deliverance, they continued their road, nor stopped c till they arrived in Anatolia: but, not finding themselves safe enough there, they passed into A. D. 1398.
Egypt, under the protection of Al Mâlek Al Nâsser Farraj, second Soltân of the Cherkassian Mamlûks, who began his reign in 801. This prince, who, through fear of Timûr's power, was willing to hold a good correspondence with him, did not fail to send him notice of the arrival of these two new guests.

TIMUR, on this advice, wrote to Farraj, that, if he would give him some proof of his Detained in friendship, he should send him Soltân Abmed under a strong guard, and keep the Turkmân Egypt.
prisoner. The king of Egypt, willing both to preserve the laws of hospitality, and in some measure satisfy Timûr, set guards upon the refugee princes: but, as they had liberty to converse together, they formed a league among themselves, by which they engaged to remain firm in the d Soltân of Egypt's alliance, and to assist each other against all opposers, as soon as they should recover their liberty; which did not happen till the year 807, after the death of Timûr. As Hej. 107.
soon as Farraj received this news, he loaded his prisoners with caresses, and dismissed them: A. D. 1404.
but scarce had Kara Yûsef gotten out of the Egyptian dominions, when, putting himself at the head of his Turkmâns, he seized great part of Irâk Arabi, and Al Fazîreh, or Mesopota- mia. Farraj, highly incensed at this irruption, complained in sharp terms to Soltân Abmed, on whose account that conquest was made: but receiving no satisfaction, he intirely withdrew his protection from him.

MEAN time Abmed, losing no courage, altho' he saw himself abandoned by so powerful an Recovers ally, had recourse to stratagem: he put himself, with some of his people, in the habit of men- Bâghdâd.
e dicants; and, by that means getting into Bâghdâd undiscovered, stirred up a great tumult against the governor, who there commanded in behalf of Omar Mirza, to whom Timûr had given it. The effect was, that the governor was driven out; and then Abmed, appearing among the inhabitants, was proclaimed Soltân by them. Towards the end of the year 808, while A. D. 1405.
Abûbekr Mirza, grandson of Timûr, was engaged in the siege of Ispâbân, Sheykh Ibrâhîm, king of Sbîrwân, came and reduced the city of Tauris. On this news, Abmed immediately set out from Bâghdâd with his army: but, on his approach, Ibrâhîm returned to Sbîrwân; while the Soltân, entering that city, became again in possession of all his dominions; on which account he made great rejoicings.

NEXT year Sheykh Ibrâhîm, after he had reduced Ispâbân, resolved to pay Abmed a visit; Defeated and f and, having marched to Tauris, obliged him to leave that city, and fly full-speed to Bâghdâd. slain,
In the mean time Kara Yûsef, taking advantage of the divisions which reigned among these neighbouring princes, who made war upon each other, fell with his fresh and warlike troops upon the province of Azerbejân, and subdued it intirely within the space of two or three years.
Abmed, unable to see this conquest without regret, resolved, in 812, to attack the Turkmân; Hej. 812.
and wrest out of his hands a country which he considered as the patrimony of his ancestors. A. D. 1409.
For this purpose he took the opportunity, when he was most employed in the war which he then carried on against Kara Othmân (prince of the White Sheep dynasty), in the Greater Arme- nia, and surprised Tauris; which he entered in 113, without any resistance. Kara Yûsef no sooner heard this trick which Abmed had played him, than he marched with his troops against g the Soltân; who advanced to meet him with all his forces, two leagues from Tauris, where a most bloody battle was fought between these two princes.

by Kara Yûsef.

THE Turkmân obtained the victory in so complete a manner, that the Soltân had scarce time a to save himself in a neighbouring garden, where he remained hidden for some time; but, being at length discovered, he was presented to his vanquisher; who reproached with his late treachery, but without depriving him either of his life, or the title of Soltân. However, he disposed of his dominions, and laid him under an injunction never to attempt any thing against his authority. But, not long after, the principal lords of Irâk Arabi, who were incensed against the Soltân, counselled Kara Yûsef to cut him off; alleging, that this prince, who was naturally of a restless disposition, would not remain long without involving them in some new war, which would complete their ruin. The Turkmân followed their advice; and commanded both him and his children to be put to death that same year, 813 (B). Thus ended the family of Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, which had raised itself to a very high pitch of grandeur as well as power; b and that of the Kara Kuyonlu, or Black Sheep, succeeded in its room^c.

Hej. 813.

A. D. 1410.

His character.

It appears from the above history of this prince, that he was of a cruel, tyrannical, treacherous, and turbulent disposition; which is agreeable to the character given him by Arabshâh: who informs us, that, after he was become master of Bâghdâd, by the murder of his brother Husfayn, he gave a loose to his violent and unjust humour, by treating his subjects very ill; and never ceased from doing mischief, depriving them of their effects and lives at pleasure. In short, his debauchery, cruelty, and rapines, grew at length so intolerable, that it was reported the citizens of Bâghdâd called in Timûr to relieve their misery. The same author recites two lines which his Soltân wrote to that conqueror, when he fled before his army: the sense of which is, If I have been maimed, so that I cannot fight; yet I have not been so lame, but that I am able to run. These verses were cutting, as they hinted at a lameness in the arm and leg, such as Timûr is reported to have had^f.

^c KONDAM. ubi sup. Avis, Ahmed

^f ARABSHAH, ubi supra.

(B) The reader will meet with several other particulars relating to this prince, in the history of Kara Yûsef and Timûr Bek; which it will be necessary to consult, in order to explain some obscurities which may occur in the next.

S E C T. II.

The dynasty of the Jubânians, or Chubânians.

The reign of Sheykh Hassan Kujuk.

1. Soltân
Hassan Kujuk.

SHEYKH Hassan Kujuk, or the Lesser, so called to distinguish him from Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, or the Greater, founder of the dynasty of the Ilkbânians; was the son of Timûrtash, son of the Amîr Jubân, or Chûbân (A), who was tutor to Abûsaïd Khân, and general of his armies. In virtue of these great employments, he acted as regent during the minority of his pupil; and discharged his trust with so much justice and fidelity, that, as soon as he heard that his son Timûrtash had rebelled in the country of Rûm, or Anatolia, of which he was governor, he marched against him, and brought him in chains to the foot of the throne, for Abûsaïd to dispose of him as he thought fit: but having afterwards disoblinded that prince, by refusing to consent to the divorce of his daughter, whom he had married to Sheykh Hassan Buzruk, and give her up to his embraces, conformable to a law among the Mungls, which intitles the Khân to the wife of any of his subjects; Abûsaïd never rested till he found an occasion of destroying him, as hath been already related in the history of his reign. c

Rise and
power.

A. D. 1355.

As for Timûrtash, that prince not only pardoned his crime, the Amîr Jubân being then in favour, but also restored him to the government of Rûm, where, for the future, his conduct was free from blame: but, not thinking himself safe in that country after the death of his father, in 727, he took shelter in the court of Al Mâlek Al Nasser, Soltân of Egypt. Thus matters stood with his family till the year 736: when, on the demise of Abûsaïd Khân, who left no issue, Hassan, surnamed Kujuk (B), son of Timûrtash, seeing the governors of provinces set up for sovereigns in their respective departments^a, and assume the title of Soltân, or prince, believed he had no less a right to aspire to a crown. In order to compass his design, he returned to the country of Rûm, where his father had many friends; and, assembling a considerable number f of troops, marched into Azerbejân, against Mohammed Khân and Hassan Buzruk, whom he vanquished, killing the first in battle; and so distressing the latter, that he at length surren-

^a D'HERBEL. p. 403. art. Gioban.

(A) It has been noted in the former section, that this name belonged to the chief of the tribe of Saidus.

(B) Abû'lghazi Klân calls him Sheykh Hassan Khoja.

dered

a dered himself into his hands. It is true, Buzruk made his escape to Bâghdâd some time afterwards; and, having set up another Khân in the room of the deceased Mohammed, marched to try his fortune anew against Hassan Kujuk: but he was again defeated, and took refuge in Bâghdâd, as has been related in the foregoing section.

MEAN time Hassan Kujuk became every day more formidable; and it is not known how far he would have carried his conquests, if he had not been cut off, in the midst of his career, by a violent death, in the following manner. This prince having caused one Yâkûb Shâh to be arrested on some occasion or other, his wife, who had an intimacy with that person, imagined the secret had been discovered; under which apprehension, she took the opportunity, while Sheykh Hassan was fast asleep, after hard drinking, to cut his throat. It is remarkable, that, notwithstanding this Sheykh was so powerful, he never assumed the title of Khân^b. This prince founded the dynasty of the Jûbânians in 738, two years after the death of Abûsâid Khân, and reigned seven: during which time he was always at war with some or other of his neighbours, and made himself master of Azerbejân and Persian Irâk; which dominions he left to his brother Mâlek Ashrâf^c. Murdered by his wife. Hej. 738. A. D. 1337.

The reign of Mâlek al Ashrâf.

c SHE Y K H Hassan Kujuk having come by an untimely death in the manner above related, his brother Mâlek al Ashrâf succeeded him in the usurpation of the supreme power; and, immediately after, conferred the dignity of Khân upon Naw Shîrwân, one of the descendants of Hulâkû Khân: but, in a short time, repenting of what he had done, thrust him from the throne to which he had advanced him, and seized it for himself. As this prince was very tyrannical, and led a most scandalous life, great numbers of his subjects, and, among others, the chief justice, left his dominions, and went into Kipjâk, where Jâni Bek Khân then reigned; to whom they represented the actions of Mâlek Ashrâf in such a light, that he thought himself obliged in conscience to invade his dominions^d. Accordingly he set forward; and, after a long march, entered Azerbejân; in which, advancing as far as the city Khui, or Koy, he was met by Mâlek Ashrâf with nearly equal forces: but, victory declaring in his favour, the latter was defeated and slain, in the year 756. Hereupon Jâni Bek Khân seized his dominions; and divided among his subjects all the treasure of that usurper, which amounted to 400 camel-loads of gold and jewels, besides other valuable effects. After this, the Khân returned home, leaving his son Birdi Bek to govern the conquered countries^e. The oriental authors give to Mâlek Ashrâf a reign of thirteen years. ^{2.} Soltân Mâlek al Ashrâf. Hej. 756. A. D. 1355.

^b ABU'IGH. KHAN, p. 190. hist. p. 191, 198.

^c D'HERB. ubi sup.

^d See before, p. 447.

^e ABU'LOHAZI KHAN

B O O K X.

The history of Timûr Bek, commonly called Tamerlan, and his successors.

C H A P. I.

The transactions preceding Timûr's reign.

Sharifo'ddîn Ali.

AMONG the many oriental authors who have written the life of this great prince, two are particularly famous. The first is the Mûlla Sharifo'ddîn Ali, a native of Yezd, in Pârs, or Proper Persia; who wrote in Persian (A), at the command of Ibrakîm Soltân, son of Shâh Rukh, son of Timûr, in the year 1424, nineteen years after the death of that conqueror. Not only Kondamîr, but all other historians, agree that he is the most valuable of all those who have written on the subject, on account both of the delicacy of his style, and completeness of his work^a: nor is this to be wondered at, when the reader is informed, that it was compiled from a journal, or memoirs, wherein the minutest actions and discourses of Timûr on all occasions were penned down by Tatar and Persian secretaries, who always attended him for that purpose. To these were added, reports of facts, by several officers and great lords who were upon the spot; after they had been verified, in the presence of Timûr, by other credible witnesses, whom he examined himself^b.

Ahmed Arab-
shâh.

THE second author is Ahmed ebn Arabshâh, a Syrian, who wrote in Arabic; and, thirty-five years after the death of Timûr, published his history; which is reckoned by Golius to comprise all the elegance of that language^c (B). But this author lived at too great a distance to be acquainted with the actions of that prince so well as the former; besides, being prejudiced against Timûr, like several other Turkish and Arab historians, for having conquered their countries, he takes all occasions to vilify and blacken his character. These writers make him originally a shepherd, who raised his fortune by robbing on the highway; they have changed his name from Timûr Bek, or Beg, to Timûr Lenk, which signifies lame, pretending that he was lamed by an arrow, with which he was shot by a shepherd whose sheep he was stealing; and from hence Europeans have formed the name of Tamerlain, or Tambourlan^d.

The first followed.

As the first of these two authors (C) is, in many respects, to be preferred, we judged we could not do better than give the reader an abstract of his history; yet adding, by way of notes, what we thought proper, from Ebn Arabshâh, and others. Our giving the history of this prince, as well as Jenghîz Khân, in some detail, may serve to make the reader some amends for the scanty memoirs relating to the intermediate successors of the latter. And indeed, from the reign of one great prince, we receive more useful knowledge, by the variety of extraordi-

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, pref. edit. p. 6, & seq.
& VATIER's Translat. of Arabsh. pref. p. 6, & 11.
Translat. of Arabsh. pref. 6, & 11.

^b Ibid. pref. auth. p. 30.

^c Ibid. pref. edit. p. 8.

^d Hist. Tim. Bek, pref. edit. p. 8. & VATIER's

(A) This history is intituled, Zafer Nameh Amîr Timûr Gûr Khân; that is, The history of the conquests of prince Timûr, son-in-law of the Khân.

(B) The work is intituled, A memorial of the wonders of destiny, in the life and actions of Timûr; composed by Ahmed, son of Arabshâh. The history of Al Hafin, or Hafin, and others, are full of fables, and not much to be regarded.

(C) They have been translated into French, the first by M. Petit La Croix the son; the second by Mr. Vatier; and Golius gave an edition of it in Arabic. The history of Timûr Bek has been translated into English; and both are valuable, for the considerable light which they give into the geography of several countries of Asia.

a nary events which happen, than from those of many others, who have made no great figure in the world. But, before we enter directly upon the reign of Timûr Bek, it will be proper to recount certain transactions which preceded it, and, in effect, prepared the way to his future grandeur.

It hath been already mentioned^c, in the history of the Khâns who succeeded Jagatay in Confusion in Great Bukhâria, that, after the death of Kâzân Khân, in 747, the princes of the empire assumed the government, and made the Khâns at pleasure; leaving them little more than the bare title, Hej. 747. A. D. 1346. while themselves usurped all the authority. The first of those princes was Amîr Kazagân; who, in the administration of affairs, acquitted himself with a conduct which deserves to be immortalized in history.

b AFTER the death of Abûsaïd Khân, eighth successor of Hulâkû in Îrân, or Persia at large, who died in 1335, the affairs of that country fell into confusion for want of a successor of the race of Jenghîz Khân to succeed in his dominions, which the princes and governors divided among themselves; and as the Turks, Moguls, and Tatars (D), had no longer the sovereign power in Khorassân, Mâlek Hussayn, surnamed Moazo'ddîn, son of Mâlek Kayazo'ddîn, prince of Herât, capital of that country, took advantage of the conjuncture to extend his authority. Hej. 747. A. D. 1346. Mâlek Hussayn. Massûd, surnamed Vejedîn, king of the Serbedâls, who, on the death of Abûsaïd, had formed a small kingdom at Sebzawâr, a strong city towards Nisâbûr, to put a check to this rival, marched from that fortress in 743 (1342). The armies met near Zâve, between both cities; and that of Mâlek Hussayn was defeated. But this prince, rallying 300 horse, fell on the Serbedâls while they were plundering his camp, killed their general, made a great slaughter, and took all their camp, the young king escaping by flight^f. On this victory Mâlek Hussayn assumed the authority of a king; and, knowing that Kâzân's tyranny had thrown Jagatay into confusion, made incursions as far as the borders of Andekûd and Shebûrgân, near Bâlk, in Khorassân. Mir Kazagân, on this advice, passed the Jibûn, or Amû, with the grand Khân, and princes of the empire, and marched towards Herât; near which Mâlek Hussayn, with 4000 horse, and 15,000 foot, expected him: but, after an obstinate battle, his troops were defeated, and he fled into the city only with his guards. Next day the Jagatays besieged the place, which held out vigorously for forty days; at the end wherof, Hussayn, weary of the leaguer, with the consent of his lords, proposed, in case Mir Kazagân would withdraw his forces, to go next year, and ask pardon of the grand Khân and him. Mir Kazagân, who was of a sweet and merciful temper, consented on those terms, and returned to Great Bukhâria in 752^g. Oppos'd by Kazagân.

MEAN time the commanders of Mâlek Hussayn's army set up his brother Mâlek Baker: but he was restored next year, by the bounty of Mir Kazagân; who, now having sent his son Mirza Abd'allah to conquer Karazm (which he effected), after passing the spring, as usual, at Karânver, went to spend the summer and autumn at the city of Munek, for the conveniency of hunting. One day, parting unarmed from Sâli Saray with only fifteen persons, he crossed the Jibûn, with design to hunt in the country of Arbenk: but, while he was in the chace, Kotluk Timûr, his son-in-law, in revenge for an affront, fell on him with a company of robbers, and slew this great prince; but some of his officers, pursuing the assassin, overtook and killed him; Hej. 752. A. D. 1351. who is slain. then carried back the body of Mir Kazagân to Sâli Saray, in 759. Upon his death, all the princes paid homage to his son the Mirza Abdo'llah, who immediately confirmed Beyan Kâli in the dignity of Khân. After which, contrary to the advice of the princes, he removed to Samar-kant with the grand Khân, whom he caused to be assassinated, to secure himself of the empress, with whom he had fallen in love; placing on the throne Timûr Shâh Aglen, son of Bisun (or Yasun) Timûr Khân. Hej. 759. A. D. 1357.

Timur Shah Khan did not long enjoy his dignity: for, the princes offended at Abdo'llah's proceeding, Beyan Seldûz, the chief of them, raised an army at Hissar, or Shaduman; and, being joined at Kesh by Haji Berlâs, Timûr Bek's uncle, marched to Samarkant; where Abdo'llah (E) being routed, and his brothers taken, they were both put to death, together with the Khân of his making. The two princes, who were at that time in great reputation and authority, made themselves masters of the country, and took on them the government. Beyan Seldûz was of a good-natured and pleasant disposition: but, as he loved wine to excess, and seldom passed eight days without a debauch of that kind, it bred great confusion in his kingdom, and made the princes set up for sovereigns, some through ambition, and others in their own defence^h.

THE city of Kash, or Kesh, with its dependencies, remained in the possession of the princes Timûr and Haji Berlâs, as it had done from the time of Karashar Noyân, the lieutenant of Jagatay Khân. The country of Kojend was in the hands of prince Bayezîd Jalayr: Mir Hussayn, Empire divided.

^c Page 466.^f Hist. TIM. BEK, l. 1. c. 5.^g Ibid. p. 6—11.^h Ibid. p. 11—15.(D) These names, with that of Jagatays, are promiscuously used by our author.(E) This young prince fled to Andevâb, a city of the little kingdom of Badaghân, where he spent his days.

son of Mufella, son of Mir Kazagân, made himself master of Kabul, and several other lordships; where he maintained himself, as long as he was able, in the dignity of his grandfather. Olaja Boga Seldus became sovereign of Bâlk: and Mehemed Koja Aperdi, prince of the Naymâns, took possession of Shebûrgân: the kings of Badâgshân fortified themselves in their mountains; while Key Khofrû and Olaja Itû Aperdi seized Katlân and Arbenk: lastly, Kefer Yesûri, prince of the tribes of Serpol and Takun, assumed the title of king. All these princes were continually at war; and some were slain in battle, particularly Mehemed Koja Aperdi, in a rash attack upon Mâlek Hussayn, prince of Herût.

Togluk Timûr Khân.

A. D. 1359.

TOGLUK TIMUR KHÂN, prince of Jetab (F), son of Aymel Koja (G), son of Dava (or Doyji) Khân, to whom the crown of this country belonged; taking advantage of the confusion which at this time reigned there, in 761 invaded it with a great army, by way of Tisbkunt and Khojend; the prince of which, Baezîd Jalayr, judged it prudent to join them. Haji Berlâs, after raising troops at Kash and Kârshi, thought fit to retire into Khorassân. Prince Timûr Bek, who was but twenty-five years old, and had but just lost his father Tragay, concluded the only way for him to save his patrimony, and serve his country, was, to give way to necessity, and submit to the grand Khân. This submission was so acceptable to Togluk Timûr's commanders, who had entered Great Bukhâria, that they conferred on him the command of a toman, or 10,000 men, which had belonged to his great ancestor Karasbar Noyân; and the principality of Kash, or Kesh, with its dependencies. Soon after this, a dissention arising between the said commanders, they marched out of the country, to attend their master^b.

Timûr assists Hussayn

MEAN time Amîr Hussayn, intending to make war on Beyân Seldûz, sent to desire aid of Timûr Bek, Kesûre Yesûri, and Bayezîd. These princes agreed to assist him; and, while the two first went to join him, the third was sent, to excuse this step, to Togluk Timûr Khân: but finding, when he came to Kojend, that the Khân was returned home, he proceeded no farther. The other two princes having joined Amîr Hussayn, they all marched to Hissar, or the fortress of Shaduman; and Beyân Seldûz, not being in a condition to oppose them, fled to Badâgshân, whither they pursued him. This obliged the king, Shâh Babao'ddîn, to fly also; by which means the whole country fell into the hands of Amîr Hussayn, who afterwards put to death Key Kobâd, brother of Key Kosrû, prince of Katlân. The war being thus finished, Timûr Bek and Kesûr Yesûri returned home; but were not there long, before Amîr Hussayn sent again to desire their assistance against Togluk Seldûz, who had broken the peace by several acts of hostility. The princes hastened to his aid: but the enemy fled on the news of their approach.

against other princes.

TIMUR BEK, being on his way back, was informed that his uncle Haji Berlâs was on his return to Kash; and had joined Mir Bayezîd, with design to attack Kefer Yesûri. Hereupon he joined prince Kefer with his troops, and marched towards that city: Haji Berlâs, on this advice, marched thither also. The two armies meeting, a bloody battle was fought; in which Timûr gained the victory, and obliged his uncle to fly to Bayezîd at Samarkant. The two princes resolved to follow him thither: but, in the way, all the troops of Kash, by what motive is unknown, abandoned Timûr, and went over to Haji Berlâs. This desertion raised a jealousy in Kefer Yesûri; which he making known both by his words and behaviour, Timûr at length quitted him, and returned to his own country; where his uncle gave him a kind reception, and conducted him to Mir Bayezîd.

Escapes a plot.

THESE resolving to renew the war against Kefer; Timûr, who longed for an occasion to revenge the affront, readily joined with them, and marched at the head of the van-guard. He met the enemy, beyond the mountain of Kash; and, after an obstinate fight, obliged them to fly. This victory secured Bayezîd in the throne, and Haji Berlâs in possession of his territories. Yet these two princes had a consultation, the next day, to the disadvantage of Timûr: who, discovering it in the council, pretended his nose bled; and went out: then, returning home, he mounted his horse, and retired with his arms into the field; by which means he avoided the snare. As soon as his uncle heard of his departure, he sent to desire him to raise the troops of the desert, and return to his assistance against two princes who threatened them with war. Timûr did as he was intreated; and defeated Ali Gurguri near Termed, which he entered.

Togluk Timûr Khân.

A. D. 1360.

MEAN time Togluk Timûr Khân, of Jetab (or the Getes), renewing his design of conquering Great Bukhâria, in 762 marched on that side with a great army. As soon as he arrived at Kojend, Mir Bayezîd, prince of that place, paid him his respects: Beyân Seldûz, went to meet him as far as Samarkant; and Haji Berlâs at this time made no scruple to wait on him. But, the Khân having seized and put to death Mir Bayezîd, Berlâs, for fear of the like treatment, fled with a few troops, and crossed the Jibûn (or Amû). There, being overtaken by the regi-

^b Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 15—22. c. 3 & 4.

¹ Ibid p. 22—28. c. 5.

(F) He was king of Kâshgar, or, more properly, Little Bukhâria, with perhaps the neighbouring parts of Tartary on the north.

(G) Or Amul Koja, the same with Isan Buga, eleventh Khân of Great Bukhâria.

a ment of Kashmîr, a bloody battle was fought, in which Shugam Berlâs was killed; yet Haji Berlâs, with his brother Idekîl, escaped, only to be slain by robbers at the village of Korash (dependent on Sebzawîr): which, on the reduction of Khorassân soon after, Toghluk Timûr Khân gave to Timûr Bek, who slew the murderers of his uncle. The Khân likewise confirmed him in the sovereignty of Kash; and of a Toman which descended to him by the death of Haji Berlâs.

After this, Toghluk Timûr Khân marched against Amîr Hussayn, who waited for him at the river Vâkesb: but Key Kosrû, prince of Katlân (whose brother, Key Kobîd Hussayn had put to death), going over to the Getes, that prince fled; and was pursued across the Jibûn, as far as Kondoz. The Khân, after this, returning to Samarkant, put to death Beyân Seldûz, on suspicion of harbouring inclinations to revolt: but behaved obligingly to those whom he judged to be sincerely in his interest; and, having brought the empire of Jagatay to submit to his authority, gave the government of the conquered countries to his son Elias Kojâ Aglen. Several lords and great officers were ordered to attend him, under the command of Bikîjek; and Timûr had the principal administration of affairs under the prince: after which, Toghluk Timûr Khân returned to his capital ^k.

When the Khân was gone, prince Timûr, observing that Bikîjek's proceedings, in contempt of his master's authority, would throw things into confusion, thought fit to withdraw from court, and repair to Amîr Hussayn, in the desert of Kivak. The two malecontent princes went to Tekil, the governor of Kivak; but, he having a design to seize them, they left him. Tekil pursued them with 1000 horse: but, though they had only sixty men, they made so brave a stand, that, when they had but seven men left, the enemy were reduced to fifty; who still continued the fight, and had twice slain Hussayn, but for Timûr. At length, the first having dismounted Tekil with an arrow-shot, the latter dispatched him with a pike; whereupon the battle ended. After this, the two princes thinking it safer to part, Timûr crossed the desert, with his wife Turkhân Aga, Hussayn's sister, and came to Jûrfey, where he was surrounded by Turkmâns; and must have fared ill, if he had not been known by one of them, who prevented their attacking him, and put him in a condition to join his brother-in law at a place called Mahmûdi, in the desert.

MEAN time Ali Bey, having advice of their arrival, with sixty horse, surprised and carried them prisoners to Makhân (H); where he detained them for two months, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his brother Mohammed, from Thûs (or Mashâd); he also seized the presents which Mohammed sent them, and dismissed them with one lean horse, and an old camel. In this distress Mobarek Shâh, prince of Sanjer, went in quest of them with several fine horses, and other necessaries; which enabled them to pursue their design of returning privately into Great Bukhâria. Timûr, being known at Samarkant, retired to Kesh, and thence to *Kandabâr*¹. From hence, at the request of the prince of Sistân (or Sejestân), they marched to his assistance with 1000 horse. In their return they were intercepted by some people of the country; in which conflict, Timûr was sorely wounded in the hand (I). At length, arriving at Arsif, near Bakalân, they were there joined by several princes, and bodies of men. Others, hearing of the success of their affairs, broke with the Getes, and went to meet them in the country of Bâlk. There they were opposed by Abûsaïd, son of Tayfû, Mengheli Buga Seldûz, and Hayder Andekûdi, three princes, their enemies, with 6000 men. The battle, which lasted from morning till night, was renewed next morning; and, altho' the troops of the two princes were much inferior in number, yet, by Timûr's valour, they gained the victory.

Of two thousand horse, which remained, Timûr took one moiety; and, passing the Jibûn at Termed, sent scouts to Kolûga, or the iron gate. But these, falling asleep, were surprised by Ajûni, brother of Bikîjek; so that, while Timûr thought himself secure, both the scouts and enemy arrived at his camp. The soldiers, not having time to draw up in order, were under a necessity to repass the river; which they did in barks, while Timûr made a stand in an isle, to favour their design. The two parties remained in sight of each other for thirty days; after which, Timûr, having burnt the barks, went to join Mîr Hussayn at Kulm, on the borders of Bâlk. From thence they marched towards Badâghshân: and, having gathered troops, went and encamped near Ghûlek. Here they learned that a new army of Getes was arrived in Great Bukhâria; and that several princes were encamped between Jâla, and the bridge of Senghîn, with 20,000 troops. This news caused 6000 men to desert the princes: yet Timûr, not dismayed, marched with 2000 men to dispute the passage of the bridge^m.

^k Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 28—31. c. 6.

¹ Ibid. p. 31—37. cap. 7.

^m Ibid. p. 37—44. c. 8.

(H) Or Makhân, a city in Khorassân, from whence the Othmâns are said to have retired into Asia Minor, on the irruption of the Mingls.

(I) This wound seems to have lamed him; and hence possibly the Turkish historians make him lame of a leg. This he revenged afterwards at Sistân, by putting to death the author of it.

Defeats the Getes.

THIS prince, after maintaining the fight from morning till night, finding himself not strong enough to execute his design, had recourse to policy. He left 500 men at the foot of the bridge; and, swimming over the Jibûn with the rest, in the night, went and posted himself on the hills.

NEXT morning the enemy, perceiving, by the tracks of horses, that troops had passed the river, abstained from fighting that day. When night came, Timûr ordered his men to approach them, and light fires on the tops of the hills. This struck the Getes with such fear, imagining themselves surrounded with a numerous army, that they fled in disorder; but not towards the bridge, because they believed the men posted there to be much more numerous than they were. Mean time Timûr, perceiving the effect of his stratagem, came down from the mountains; and, being joined by Hussayn, made a great slaughter of the enemy. This defeat gained great reputation to Timûr, who recovered Kash by another stratagem.

Another overthrown

Hej. 765.

A. D. 1363.

with great slaughter.

ABOUT this time Elias Kojâ, who was encamped at Tâsh Arighi, four leagues from Kash, received advice of the death of his father Toghluk Timûr Khân. But Timûr, whose troops were much increased since the late victory, proposed to pay him a visit before his departure, though his army was greatly inferior to that of the enemy. He encouraged them by declaring, that, in his sleep, a voice said to him, Fear nothing; for the most high God will graciously give thee the victory. With this assurance, they marched against the Getes in two bodies; Hussayn commanded the right wing, and Timûr the left. The new emperor likewise divided his army into two bodies; and, putting himself at the head of the left wing, gave the conduct of the right to Mîr Tokatmûr and prince Bikîjek. The two armies being at length engaged, Timûr broke thro' the enemy with such fury, that he threw the right wing into disorder, and drove the first rank upon the second. Having put them to flight with great slaughter, he advanced to attack Bikîjek and Tokatmûr in the rear, whom Hussayn had engaged in front: so that, notwithstanding the number of their troops, and bravery of their generals, they were compelled to follow their companions. Tokatmûr, with other generals, were killed; and Bikîjek, with Elias Kojâ Khân himself, besides other great commanders, taken: but these two being known by some of Timûr's soldiers, they generously gave them their horses, and let them escape. Timûr pursued the enemy to the river Yam, where he made a great slaughter; then crossing the Sihûn (or Sîr), at Kojend, in pursuit of the Khân, encamped at Tâshkunt.

New Khân elected.

THE two princes, observing that the rest, who had joined them against the Getes, paid them no great deference, and aimed at being independent, found the only way to prevent things running into confusion, was, to elect a grand Khân; and, having represented this in a general assembly, proposed Cabul Shâh Aglen; who was accordingly chosen at Samarkant. Then, causing him to ascend the throne, they presented him with the royal cap, after the custom of the Turkish kings, and bowed nine times before him.

Timûr's gratitude.

A. D. 1364.

AFTER the election of Kabul Khân, Timûr made a great feast; which being over, he proposed to deliver out of prison Amîr Hamid, lieutenant-general of the Getes, whose father had been his friend, and prince Eskânder his companion. Hussayn consented, altho' the latter was his enemy. When those, who assisted at the assembly, were returned home, Timûr sent two Amîrs to release the prisoners: but their keepers, seeing the Amîrs at a distance, and imagining they came to put Hamid to death, to save them the trouble, knocked him down, and cut off his head. This mistake proved fatal also to Eskânder: for, when Amîr Hussayn heard of it, he sent to demand that prince; who was sent to him, and put to death.

New invasion

THINGS seemed now to be in a settled condition; when, the beginning of next spring, news was brought that the Getes were marching towards Great Bukhâria. The princes, having passed the Sihûn at Kojend, met the enemy at Exam, between Tâshkunt and Chinaz: the Amîr Hussayn commanded the right wing, and Timûr the left. The Getes were led by the emperor Elias Kojâ himself; and, tho' they were by far inferior in number to the troops of the princes, yet they overcame them by help of the stone Jedi (K), which, steeped in water at a certain hour, has power to produce tempests, rain, and thunder. However that be, such a storm and deluge fell, that the earth shook like a sea; and this excessive moisture bred the esterka, a cruel distemper, which renders the limbs paralytic, and dries up the body to skin and bones.

of the Getes.

FOR all this, when the rain was over, the princes attacked the enemy courageously: but the Getes, who had covered themselves and horses with felts, brought for the purpose, received them with such vigour, that their forces were obliged to fly. Timûr at length rallied them, and a terrible carnage ensued: every man must have been slain, had not Shem Kân Noyân (brother of Amîr Hamid before-mentioned, who commanded the enemy's right wing), been slain by prince Taku Berlâs, as he was rising to strike Timûr with his sabre. As soon as Elias Kojâ Khân heard that his general was killed, he retreated with his troops, who were pursued by ^a Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 44—53. cap. 9, 10, 11.

(K) We have already taken notice of this superstition among the Mangli and Tatars.

^a Timûr. Mean time the left wing of the Getes pressed on the right wing, even to the guards of Amîr Hussayn. The fight was bloody, and the enemy triumphing, when Timûr advanced, and put Shams'o'ddîn, one of the generals, to flight. This gave Hussayn an opportunity to rally his troops; and he might have obtained the victory, had he followed Timûr's advice to advance: but, whether through envy or presumption, he twice abused the messengers sent, for that purpose, by Timûr; who, seeing so fair an opportunity lost, thro' Hussayn's caprice, gave over the attack, and resolved to be revenged. When the other was recovered from his ill humour, he sent several messages to Timûr, to intreat him to come and see him: but this prince, weary of his manner of acting, refused to go.

^b NEXT morning the battle was renewed, and, the Getes being soon put to flight, Timûr pursued them. In the way, his men perceiving the standard of prince Shams'o'ddîn, who was separated from the rest, with a great number of troops, they gave over the pursuit, and turned towards the white standard: the enemy likewise, perceiving them, rallied, and returned to the charge. The fight was bloody; and at length Timûr's forces were defeated: a great number perished in the sloughs and marshes; many more were killed in the pursuit; more than 10,000 were slain in the whole. This famous battle, called that of Lay, or The Slough, was fought in Ramadin, in 776. After this great defeat, Hussayn, and the other princes, crossed the Jihân, and returned to Sheberto: but Timûr staid in the country, with a resolution to oppose the Getes. However, finding his endeavours vain, he in some time repaired to Bâlk, where he took no small pains to augment his forces ^c.

^c MEAN while the Getes laid siege to Samarkant, at that time without a citadel. The inhabitants defended themselves a long time very bravely: but, provisions at length beginning to fail, they must have surrendered, had not the loss of three-fourths of the enemy's horses by a mortality, obliged them to retire. The principal men of the city hereupon assumed a superiority over the rest, and caused great disorders in the place. On this advice, Timûr and Hussayn, having renewed their friendship more strongly than before, agreed to be at Samarkant the beginning of spring; where they put to death all the Serbedâls who had usurped the authority, excepting Mulâna Zâde (L), whom Timûr saved through a motive of piety. It was now that Hussayn, seeing all obstacles removed, discovered his insatiable avarice, and meanness of spirit. Altho' Timûr had as much, or a greater, share in the war, he even taxed his domestics. He exacted vast sums of the princes who had lost all in the wars; and, although he saw his sister's jewels among the cash which Timûr lent them to make up the demand, he did not hesitate to receive them. Indeed, when Timûr gave his horses, to satisfy for 300 dinars (or gold ducats) which remained unpaid, he would not take them; but waited till Timûr discharged that debt another way.

^d THE lords, highly incensed at this conduct of Hussayn, resolved to break off the union between him and Timûr: to whom, after humbling the other, they proposed to give the absolute power; as he was of a sweet temper, generous soul, and, in short, possessed of every virtue necessary to form a great prince. To bring this about, they wrote Hussayn word, that Timûr, offended with the grand Khân and him, was raising forces to attack him. Hussayn, on this, sent to desire Timûr would come to Samarkant, to confront his accusers. Timûr immediately went thither, and his accusers fled to Kojend: but, finding Hussayn still harboured his suspicion, and knowing his temper, one day opened his heart to the princes, declaring his intention to remedy the evil. Shîr Babrâm, and Babrâm Jalayr, on this, took off the mask; declaring their hatred, and design of all the princes to break with Hussayn: hereupon they entered into a treaty with Timûr to make war on him, and then retired. Shîr Babrâm, having raised troops at Katlân, began hostilities against Hussayn: but this politic prince, by his artifice, gained him over to his interest. For all this, Timûr pursued his enterprise; and, having at length raised an army, consisting of the most valiant men of the empire, in autumn 767 detached prince Seyfo'ddîn, with the van-guard, against Hussayn; who, on this, sent a treaty drawn up in the most enticing manner, to soften Timûr: but this prince would pay no regard to his overtures. However, as the governor he had left at Samarkant (M), and some other princes, had before gone over to Hussayn; so, on this occasion, the tribe of Tesûri deserted him ^e.

^e MEAN time Hussayn set forward with a great army: but, aiming still to over-reach his rival, sent another letter to him, with the korân; and, declaring that, by virtue of that book, his intentions were sincere, proposed a conference at Shekichek, each to be accompanied with no more than 100 men. Timûr, convinced of the deceit, was not for going: but, to gratify the

• Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 53—63. c. 11, 12.

P Ibid. p. 63—73. cap. 13, 14.

(L) They were all, or most of them, ecclesiastics, and this Mulâna the chief of them.

(M) About the same time also died his wife Olâja

Turkbân Aga, sister of Hussayn; who thereby lost the cement of union with Timûr.

princes, who chose peace, if it could be had, went. He took 300 men; and, leaving 200 at a some distance, advanced with the rest to the place of interview. Hussayn, after putting Shir Babrám to death, detached 3000 men to surprise Timúr at Dehno; of which a peasant, who had been a domestic of this prince, fled from the enemy to give him notice. But the officer, who stood centinel at the palace, not giving credit to what the man said, sent him away, without mentioning the matter to Timúr: so that, when this prince was near the place of rendezvous, he was alarmed with the appearance of those forces; whose march he stopped in a narrow passage, and then made his retreat fighting.

Timúr surprises Karshi.

THE army, to whom news was brought of Hussayn's treachery, concluding all was lost, dispersed themselves; and Timúr, with the other princes, retired to Makhán, in Khorassán, where he kept a saray of women. There he stopped all the karawáns; and, when he gave them leave to depart, took the road to Herát in their sight, as if he designed to go to that city. This the merchants reporting, when they arrived at Kársbi, Amír Mússa left the fortress, intending, with 7000 men, to visit Uzkunt: but Timúr, when the karawáns were at some distance, returned to his old station; and, having staid while the merchants might be going to Kársbi, set out for the same place, altho' he had but 200 men, and there were 12,000 in the neighbourhood of that city, which makes the action so much more remarkable. Being arrived near Kársbi, with several lords who accompanied him, he went with only two more; and, walking round the walls with great precaution, at length perceived a proper place for scaling. On this, Timúr returned; and, sending 100 men with ladders, to mount the wall, went, with an hundred more, to wait for the opening of the gate in the morning: but the scalers, having succeeded in their design, came and opened it for him, after slaying the drunken guards in the arms of their mistresses. Timúr made himself master of the city, while the troops seized the castle, where they took Mehemed Bey, son of the Amír Mússa.

Defeats Amír Mússa.

A. D. 1366.

THIS lord, being very young, was suffered to escape, that the news might cause his father's troops to disperse. Instead of this, he and Málek Behádr, next day, invested the city with 12,000 horse: but they were so harrassed and beaten by the sallies of only 100 men, that at length Mússa fled with his 7000 horse; and left Málek, who still stood his ground, with 5000 Koronas (N): yet, as soon as he perceived Timúr advancing with his horse, he fled likewise; and, being pursued, his men dispersed. In the pursuit, Timúr, perceiving the wife of Amír Mússa, who fled with Málek Bahádr, called to him to quit her. Málek, to save his life, which, on that condition, was promised him, abandoned the lady, and fled before. For all this, the lady continued her flight full speed; and, as Timúr alone pursued, a servant offered to shoot, if he advanced. The prince, who had neither buckler nor arrows, taking him for a better archer than he was, stopped, till Dawlet Sháh joined him; and, covering his head with his buckler, renewed the pursuit. On this, the valet let fly at him: but, missing his aim, he fled as fast as the rest, so that Dawlet Sháh was not able to come up with them. Azú Mulk, then nine months gone with child, was soon after deliver'd of a princess, named Tímán Aga, who was afterwards married to *Timúr*⁹.

Retires to Makhán.

THIS prince wintered at Kársbi; where he gave the government of Amúya to Nikepeysba; and that of Bokhára to Manúcha; whose son-in-law, Ali Yefúri, came and submitted with his tribe, after often refusing to obey Timúr's summons. Amír Hussayn was astonished at the recital of what had passed: yet, having raised an army, he set out from Sáli Saray; and sent Amír Mússa before, with 10,000 Koronas, who encamped at Shekedálik. Timúr at first intended to attack them in the night; but, having only 200 men, he thought fit, after appearing in sight of the enemy, to retire to Bokhára; and from thence to Makhán, by way of Merú. Mean time Hussayn came and besieged Bokhára, where Manúcha and Ali Yefúri made a brave defence: but their soldiers, having suffered by venturing too far in a sally, could not be brought to fight afterwards. This obliged them to pass by night to Makhán, and leave the city to the enemy. Soon after, Timúr set out with 600 men to reduce Nikepeysba, governor of Amúya; which having done, he went and defeated the army of the Koronas, encamped near Bokhára; and then returned to Makhán.

Attempts Karshi.

TIMÚR, unable long to be idle, crossed the Jibán again with 600 men, and sat down before Kársbi: but, hearing 500 Koronas were at Kuzimondak, he marched to attack them, not knowing that they had been joined by several other troops. However, after a bloody fight, he drove them back as far as their main army, which he advanced to reconnoitre: and, on their approach, rushing forward like a lion, in less than an hour, intirely routed this vast multitude. In the pursuit to Shekedálik, they took the principal officers prisoners, with a great booty. Timúr resolved not to give the enemy time to recover their loss, but march against Amír Hussayn:

⁹ Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 73—85. cap. 15, & seq.

(N) Koronas are a militia.

however,

a however, the princes refusing to assist in that enterprize, he returned to Samarkant. At his approach, the governor Ushâra Babâdr sallied out with the Amîr Mussa's troops, but was routed, and hardly escaped; yet he made another sally, with 1500 raw soldiers, who fled at the cry of Timûr's men. While this prince diverted himself in the delicious valley of Sogd, news arrived, that a great body of Koronas was encamped on the Tûm, and Amîr Hussayn with a numerous army at Kârshî.

On this advice, Timûr thought proper to defer his revenge; and, disbanding his other forces, with his first 600 men retired towards Kojend, where he crossed the Sibûn. ^{Crosses the} Understand- ^{Sir.} ing here, that Key Kosrû and Babrâm Jalayr were at Tâshkunt, with 7000 Getes, just brought from Jetâb, he turned that way; in hopes Babrâm, who had by his means recovered his patrib mony, and had sworn to join him against Hussayn, would assist him, when now in his power: but not finding the friendship he had reason to expect, he reproached the Amîr with his ingratitude. On the contrary, Key Kosrû, who was son-in-law to Togluk Timûr, Khân of Jetâb, entertained Timûr magnificently, at his palace, for a month; promised to join him against every body, and to give Rakia Khân, his daughter by another wife, to the Mirza Jebân Gîr, Timûr's eldest son^r.

MEAN time, Amîr Hussayn having entered Sebz, with a great army of Koronas, sent before ^{Defies the} 20,000 men, under the command of Amîr Mussa, and his most considerable generals; who, ^{enemy.} through fear of Timûr's valour, detached three great squadrons, by different roads, to intercept that prince's passage. Timûr, accompanied by Key Kosrû, and 2000 Getes, on this advice, e crossed the Sibûn (or Sîr) at Kojend; and, with 1500 men, in the night, attacked Jebân Shâh, who had with him the same number, and dispersed them. Next day, he defeated Khermân, with his 1000 soldiers, at Dizâk: then, with 200 horse only, departed, to attack Mâlek Babâdr, who had with him 3000. When the enemy saw the thirty men so well equipped, who were sent before, advancing with great boldness, they were surprised; and, taking them for the vanguard of the Mungls, that is, the Getes, began to fly. Timûr pursued; while the fugitives approaching the main body under Mûssa, caused them to fly full speed also, to rejoin Hus- fayn.

WHEN this prince saw them, he was wroth; and, departing with the Khân, sent 10,000 ^{Peace with} choice men as scouts, to attack the two princes; who marched to Barsin with 1500, and there ^{Hussayn,} d caused the trumpets to be sounded; the noise of which so frightened the enemy, that they fled back to Hussayn. After which, Key Kosrû went to winter at Otrâr, and Timûr at Tâshkunt. In spring, the messengers, whom Timûr had sent to Jetâb, returned; and brought word, that a numerous army was coming from thence to his assistance. As this news soon reached Hussayn, he resolved to make peace with Timûr; and, the better to succeed, applied to the doctors of Kojend and Tâshkunt, to dispose him to it. The Mollahs undertook the task; and urged the danger which the state was in of being ruined by war, and the Muslmâns being plundered, as well as slaughtered, by idolaters (O). These remonstrances, with a dream which followed, determined Timûr to resolve on peace, and to go himself to Hussayn, as the most effectual way, to agree on articles. He was met near Sâli-saray by the Amîrs Mûssa and Olajia Itû, on the e part of Hussayn, to ask pardon for all that had passed. When the peace was settled, the princes disbanded their armies; and having regaled themselves with diversions, Timûr returned to Kash, to enjoy the sweets of this delightful kingdom.

Not long after, while Amîr Hussayn and the Khân were gone to reduce the kings of ^{who repairs} Badâghshân, who had revolted, Mâlek Hussayn, prince of Herât, sent forces to ravage the pro- ^{Balk.} vinces about Bâlk, which were subject to the Amîr. On this news, Timûr set forward, to repulse the enemy, who did not wait for him. After which, he went in quest of the Khân and Amîr; who, meeting him at Kondoz, renewed their friendship. They then marched to reduce Pulâd Buga and Ak Buga, who had revolted at Kâbul; which, after some loss, they effected.
In their return from this expedition, Hussayn asked Timûr's advice in relation to a design he f had to reside at Bâlk. Timûr endeavoured to dissuade him, by the example of his uncle Mirza Abdo'llah; who, contrary to the advice of his lords, would remove his seat to Samarkant.
Although Hussayn could not but approve of Timûr's counsel, yet he did not follow it: but prevailed on him to go to that city; where, as soon as he arrived, he began to rebuild the fortress of Hendwân. This was in 769^t.

MEAN time, advice arriving, that an army of Getes were on the march towards Great Buk- bâria, the two princes set forward to repulse them: but, while the enemy wintered at Tâshkunt, ^{Watches the} discord arose among the lords of Jetâb. Kamro'ddin, of the tribe of Uglat, Kepek Timûr, and ^{Getes.}

^r Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 85—100, c. xvi—xx.
cap. xxi—xxiii.

^s See before, p. 499.

^t Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 100—110,

(O) The Getes, or Mungls, of Kashgar, and the parts of Tartary eastward, were, for the general, idolaters.

Shirawl, joined against Haji Arkenut, who resolved to give them battle. When they were ready to engage, a peace was clapped up; and Arkenut returned home. But the other two, instead of following him, retreated with their troops; and Shirawl's son cut off Arkenut's head: which putting the Gete army into disorder, obliged them to retreat. Timur was for pursuing them in this confusion: but, as the king of Badagshân had renewed his irruptions into Hussayn's dominions, this prince prevailed with him to march on that side. On his approach the enemy fled: yet at length they fought, and were routed; Sheykh Ali, the king, being made a prisoner.

In great danger.
A. D. 1368.

HOWEVER, part of those who fled having defeated Jebân Mulk, Amîr Hussayn's son, who pursued them, and taken 630 horses; Timur, enraged, ascended the mountain: but as his soldiers, being fearful, would not follow him, he, with only thirteen horse, seized a narrow pass, where he fell on furiously, and defeated the enemy; altho' he confessed this was the roughest battle he had ever been engaged in. Mean time, fifty of their foot, covered with their bucklers, boldly marched up, and let fly a shower of arrows at Timur: at the same time, 200 more advanced, to second them. But the prince escaped this danger, by the address of Elchi Bûga; who running up to them, on foot, began to wheedle them, touched them several times on the neck, and speaking in a soothing manner: The person you see, said he, is the great Timur: he will restore you your slaves: why then do you fight to no purpose? You know, if you are either killed or made prisoners, you will bear the blame of having your slaves taken. When the soldiers heard that prince's name, they gave over fighting, kissed the earth in token of submission, and sent two of their number to beg pardon. Timur promised to return their slaves, provided they brought the horses and bucklers they had taken, next morning, to his camp; which they performed.

Hussayn's jealousy.

NOT long after, Amîr Hussayn having sent to acquaint him, that Mehemed Beyân Seldûz and Key Khosrû had made war on him, Timur left Badagshân: On which notice, the rebels wrote to him the cause of their discontent, and begged his assistance. As the prince knew this letter was intercepted by Hussayn, he became jealous that Hussayn did not shew it him at their interview: and, at his return to Kesh, three persons came to tell him, Hussayn designed to surprise him. This was confirmed by a lord, who shewed him a letter from the Khân Kabûl Shâh (P); importing, that Amîr Mûssa had orders to watch an opportunity to seize him. Timur, far from distrusting so much, or fearing danger, went to know the truth of this from Hussayn, whom he met on the bank of the Jibân (or Amû): but, as he was about to speak, word came, that the enemy was near; and being desired to march forthwith against them, he set forward with the troops; on whose approach, Sheykh Mehemed and Key Kofrû fled. After the pursuit, Timur returned to Kesh; and Hussayn went to Bâlk, to reside in the castle of Hendwân ^u.

Timur declares war.

ALTHOUGH Timur's attachment to Hussayn was all the latter's support, yet he ceased not to do him ill offices. He sent for all that prince's subjects in Kash, to people Bâlk, and to bring away Timur's sister: because her husband, Amîr Muyad, had, in his drink, killed a man, and fled. He likewise dismissed prince Jebân Ghîr, whom Timur had placed near him. Upon all these provocations, he took counsel with Amîr Mûssa, and other lords: who after having concluded to make war on Hussayn, as a prince not to be trusted, as well as an oppressor of the people, they began the rupture, by the death of Ali, brother of Kezer Tefûri; and then Timur boldly declared war against him at once.

Joined by the princes.

HAVING raised troops, he kept with him Mûssa, to command the rear; and, after consulting his astrologers, departed from Kash: but, at Kuzar, that Amîr, as usual, seized with a panic fear, returned to Samarkant. Timur seemed to take no notice of this action: but sent Siorgatmish Aglen, with the Amîrs Muyad and Hussayn Berlâs before, as scouts, who found those of Amîr Hussayn at Termed. At Boya, within three leagues of that city, Timur met the holy Seyd Bereke, the most considerable of the Sharîfs, or descendants of Mohammed: who presenting him with a drum and standard, which are the usual marks of sovereignty, as if inspired, sang a hymn, predicting Timur's future grandeur. Here that prince contracted an inviolable friendship with this great Sharîf; and ordered, that after his death he should be buried in the same tomb, with his face turned side-ways: that at the day of judgment, when every one should hold up their hands to heaven, to implore assistance of some intercessor, he might lay hold on the robe of this child of the prophet.

Rejoins Bâlk.

TIMUR, having passed the Jibân, or Amû, and encamped at Kulm, was there joined by a great number of princes, who hated Hussayn, and came from all parts with their troops. Among the rest, were the Amîr Olajia Itû, placed in Kondoz by Hussayn; Sheykh Mehemed, king of Badagshân, whom Timur had invited; the Amîr Key Kofrû, who had fled from ^u Hist. TIM. BEK. p. 111—117, c. 24, 25.

(P) It is the Khân Aiel Seldûz in our author, by some mistake; for Kabal Shâh was now Khân, and succeeded Aiel Khân.

a Katlân, to avoid Huffayn; the Amîr Yâkûz, with the troops of that country; and Zende Hasbâm, with the herd of Aperdi: so that Timûr saw himself at the head of a powerful army. Then he gave Siorgatmish Aglen the title of Khân; and having regulated his army, departed for Balk. As soon as he arrived, he blocked up the city on all sides, and besieged the citadel, called Hendwân. The enemy made a vigorous defence: they sallied out to repulse the confederates; and the two armies fought with unparalleled courage till night. In this battle, prince Omar Sheykh, a son of Timûr, fighting bravely, though but fifteen years old, was shot through the foot with an arrow, and though the surgeons drew a hot iron through the wound, he bore it with extraordinary patience*.

b NEXT morning, at sun-rise, the besieged made another sally, and renewed the fight. Huffayn ^{Huffayn suri} ^{renders:} who at a distance beheld this terrible encounter, perceived his affairs to be in a desperate condition. Timûr sent to acquaint him, that, if he desired his life, he must submit, and deliver up the fortress. Huffayn, for once, acting with prudence, sent two of his sons, with the Khân he had set up, offering to resign his crown to Timûr; and only requesting a free passage out of the citadel, in order to go in pilgrimage to Mekka. Timûr having granted this request, the Amîr sent again to acquaint him, that he would depart the next day; and requested a promise, that no person should attempt any thing against his life. Timûr yielded to his desire: but Huffayn was so accustomed to break his word, that he suspected the prince could not keep his promise; and therefore went out the same night, with two servants. After wandering for some time, not knowing where to go, he arrived at the old city of Balk: and, when morning came, thro' fear, got upon the minâra (Q) of the principal mosk, where he hid himself.

c THIS prince might have escaped, if the time fixed by fate for his death, says our author, ^{taken, and slain,} was not come: for a soldier of Timûr, who had lost his horse, going up, to try if he could perceive it from thence, spied Huffayn, whom he knew. The Amîr, who, in his prosperity, had never the least generosity to a soldier, flung down a handful of pearls; and, promising greater things, made the man swear he would not discover him. But the soldier, as soon as he got down, ran to Timûr, and related the whole. When the officers and soldiers heard this, they ran to the mosk; while Huffayn, who perceived them coming down, hid himself in a hole. But, still pursued by ill-luck, a skirt of his garment happened to be seen: so that, being taken, he was carried bound to Timûr; who, unwilling to break his promise, said to the Amîrs who were near him, "I renounce the right I have of taking away his life; and cancel the sentence of his death, by which I might revenge myself." But when Huffayn was dismissed from Timûr's presence, Kây Kofrû, prince of Katlân, desired that the Amîr might be delivered to him, in order to do justice on him for taking away his brother's life. Timûr exhorted that prince to forego his resentment; while the remembrance of his antient friendship, as well as alliance, with Huffayn, melted him into tears. Upon this Olajia Itû, an Amîr of years, and great experience, imagining, that if Huffayn escaped, through Timûr's affection, they might all repent of it afterwards, made signs to Kây Kofrû and Muyad to go out of the assembly: which they did, without asking Timûr's leave; and, taking horse, followed Huffayn, and slew him.

d AT length the fortress of Hendwân being taken, Konsâid and Norûz Soltân, two of Huffayn's sons, were burnt, and their ashes scattered in the air. His two other sons, Jebân Mulk and Kalil Soltân, fled into India, where they perished. The Khân whom Huffayn had set up, was also put to death (R). Timûr got all the treasure which that prince had amassed with so much avarice; and kept four ladies of his seray to himself; these were, Saray Mulk Khânûm, daughter of Kâzân Soltân Khân; Olûs Aga, daughter of Boyan Seldûz; Islâm Aga, daughter of Kezer Yefûri; and Toji Turkhân Kâtûn. He gave the great queen, Sevenj Kottûk Aga, daughter of Turmesbîrîn Khân, Huffayn's first wife, Dilshad Aga, to Zende; and the other ladies to considerable lords. He likewise ordered, that the inhabitants of Balk, who had shut themselves up in the citadel, with their late prince, should return to the old city, and rebuild it. The citadel, as well as palaces of Huffayn, were all razed to the foundations; and every thing belonging to him destroyed, that there might remain no footsteps of a prince so hated^y.

* Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 118—125, c. 26, & seq.

y Ibid. 125, & seq.

(Q) Steeple, or turret, built near the masjeds, or mosks, from whence the muzims, or cryers, proclaim the times of prayers. La Croix.(R) This was Kabul Shâh (or Soltân) Klân.

C H A P. II.

The exploits of Timûr, from his enthronement, to the reduction of Iran, or Persia at large.

Timûr
enthroned.

AFTER taking of Bâlk, all the Amîrs, princes, and generals of the army, the Khâns of Termed, and Seyd Bereke, chief of the Sharîis, who had predicted Timûr's advancement to the throne, assembled in that city, and unanimously chose him to fill the imperial seat of Jagatay. When the lucky hour arrived to perform the ceremony of coronation, Timûr ascended the throne, placed the crown of gold on his head, and girded himself with the imperial belt, in presence of the princes of the blood, and the rest, who all kneeled down before him; and, having wished him prosperity, made him sumptuous presents, sprinkled handfuls of gold and precious stones upon his head, and gave him the title of Sahab Karân; which words signify, the emperor of the age, and conqueror of the world. This happened in the Mungl year of the Dog, which answers to that of the Hejrah 771, in the month of Ramazân. He treated the inhabitants with the utmost rigour, beheaded some, imprisoned others, enslaved their wives and children, burnt their houses, seized their riches, and ravaged the country. Thus he rooted out the rebels, and, at the same time, distributed the plunder among his lords and officers.

Hej. 771.
A. D. 1369.

A plot discovered.

FROM Bâlk, Timûr returned to Kash; where he appointed officers of state, both military and civil. He then repaired to Samarkant, which he made the seat of his empire (A). The Amîr Mûssa, who had deserted Timûr through discontent, as is before mentioned, on that prince's success, fled to Turkestân; but, being pursued, fled back to Zende Hashâm, at Shebûrgân in Khorassân, and prevailed on him to revolt. Timûr having ordered the Kûrûltay, or dyet, to be held, and Zende Hashâm not appearing, he sent him a threatening summons; but this young prince, instead of obeying, imprisoned the messengers. Hereupon the emperor went with an army, and besieged him in Sefiddez, or the white fort. At the sight of the imperial troops, Zende Hashâm lost courage; and, having sued for pardon, delivered up the Amîr Mûssa: whom instead of punishing, Timûr feasted, and loaded with favours, giving him the command of a tribe, and a province. For all this, Hashâm rebelled a second time; but being besieged in Shebûrgân, submitted a second time, was pardoned, and received among the officers of the court^a.

Invasades the Getes.
Hej. 772.
A. D. 1370.

IN the year of the Hog, which answers to 772, Timûr crossed the Sibûn (or Sîr), to invade the country of the Getes; two of whose princes, Komze and Orenkitmûr, submitted to him, with their tribes and countries, the government of which he gave to Kepek Timûr; who soon after rebelling, he marched against him, by way of Sayrâm, on the borders of Jetâb, and, in a month, reduced the enemy. Mean time, the Amîr Mûssa, and Zende Hashâm, forgetting all their obligations, conspired, with Abû-Is-bâc, and others, to seize Timûr, while hunting: but the plot being discovered, the conspirators were tried, and convicted: yet the emperor put none of them to death. He pardoned Mûssa, on account of his great age, and relationship by marriage; only banished two Sheykhs, as descended from Mohammed; and condemned Zende Hashâm to a dungeon at Samarkant.

Attacks
Karazm.

AS soon as Timûr was returned to his capital, he sent ambassadors to Hussayn Sofi (B), king of Karazm, to demand restitution of the countries of Kat and Kivat (C); which he had seized five years before, during the troubles, though belonging to the empire of Jagatay. Hussayn's answer was, That he had conquered them by the sword; and that Timûr might recover them the same way, if he could. Hereupon Mullah Jalâlo'ddîn, who was the emperor's Mufti (D), to prevent bloodshed, desired leave to try what he could do: but the Karazmian, instead of listening to his advice, imprisoned the Mullah. On this notice, Timûr, in 773, marched at the head of his army, by way of Bokhâra; and, at Sepaye, on the Jibûn (or Amû), defeated the enemy's scouts. From thence they arrived at Kat, which they invested. Kûcbey Mâlek was ordered to go down into the ditch, but being afraid to venture, the Chaus Komûri readily obeyed. He was followed by others; who advancing towards the breast-work, Sheykh Ali Behâdr first laid hold of it, and would have mounted. Mobasber, envying him this honour,

Hej. 773.
A. D. 1371.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 130—141, l. ii. cap. 1—4.

(A) This removal was contrary to his own advice given before to Hussayn, whom he would have dissuaded from removing from Sari Saray to Bâlk, as a thing highly imprudent, and dangerous. See p. 505.

(B) Son of Tangbaday, of the tribe of Konkegrat, called also Kunksrat, Kongrat, and by the Chinese, Hunksits.

(C) This seems to be the same place with Kayul, in Abû'l-ghazi Khân's history. See the description of Karazm hereafter.

(D) Or chief priest, who decides affairs of the law.

a took hold of his heel, and both fell; yet Ali returned, and got upon the parapet. Then the soldiers, having forced a passage, on all sides, into the town, seized the governor, and put the greater part of the garrison, as well as the inhabitants, to the sword; carrying away the wives and children, whom Timûr next day set at liberty. As for Kûcbey Mâlek, he ordered him, for his cowardice, to be bastinadoed, and then led to Samarkant, tied to the tail of an ass.

AFTER this, he advanced, and his van-guard having defeated the enemy, at Jiwi Kor-lan, he ordered inroads to be made on every side; so that all the provinces of Karazm were ruined. Hussayn, being in no condition to defend himself in the city of Karazm (E), sent to beg pardon, and demand quarter: but, diverted by Kay Kosrû, who promised to go over to him, with his Tomân, he marched out with his troops to the river Kawn, six miles from the capital. However, he was repulsed; and finding himself blocked up in his fortress, soon died with grief. His brother Isîf (or Yusef) Sofi, who succeeded him, had recourse to submission: and as Timûr thought that Sevina Bey, commonly called Khân Zâdeb (F), the daughter of Ak Sofi, Isîf's brother, who was reckoned the greatest beauty in the world (G), would be a fit match for his son Jebân Ghîr, he granted peace, on condition of the marriage. On his return to Samarkant, he ordered Kay Kosrû Kattani to be arrested, and prosecuted for his intrigues with Hussayn Sofi: of which having been convicted, he was delivered, bound, to the officers of Amîr Hussayn, who put him to death, to revenge the murder of that prince; and his province given to Mehemed Mîreke, son of Shîr Babrâm, his relation ^b.

c WHEN Kay Kosrû was apprehended, his son Soltân Mahmûd, with two other lords, left the court, and retired to Karazm; where they persuaded Isîf Sofi to violate the peace: and accordingly, in autumn, he laid waste the country of Kat. But, in Ramazân 774, on the news of Timûr's march, he sent persons to intercede for him, and renew the treaty; promising forthwith to send the princess Khân Zâdeb to Samarkant. Next spring, Timûr dispatched ambassadors, with rich presents, to conduct to his court that princess; who set out with a portion of precious stones, jewels, and furniture, of great value. Timûr gave her a magnificent reception; and the marriage with his son was solemnized with the greatest pomp, after the happy moment had been fixed, with the exactest care, by the most learned astrologers, and profound philosophers.

d IN the month of Shawal 776, which was the beginning of the Mungl year of the Hare, Timûr set forward on his march to Jetâb, sending before his son, the Mîrza Jebân Ghîr, with the van-guard. When they had passed Sayrâm, and were arrived at Jarûn, a town of Jetâb, they were informed, by a prisoner, that Kamro'ddîn (H), prince of the tribe of Uglat, was encamped with an army at Gheuk Tûpa, or the blue hill, where he waited for Haji Bey, not expecting any enemy. On this advice, they hastened their march: but Kamro'ddîn, getting intelligence of their approach, retired to an inaccessible place, called Birkey Gûrian, where there are three defiles of mountains, extremely steep; and three great rapid rivers. Jebân Ghîr was now advanced to the third defile, where Kamro'ddîn had fortified himself, and having attacked his forces, with great slaughter, till night, they took to flight. Next morning, the prince pursued them; and Timûr, coming up at sun-rise, detached some of his chief captains, who swam along the stream of the river Abeile (I). When they got on the enemy's lands, they plundered all who did not submit ^c.

Timûr went on to Baytak; from whence he sent the Mîrza his son, with a great army, to fight and seize Kamro'ddîn. The prince, having ruined the cantons which are in Uch-fermân, found his enemy in the mountains, whom he pursued, and obliged to abandon his troops. He ravaged all the country, razed his palaces, and, among other ladies, seized on his wife Buyân Aga, with his daughter Dilshad-aga. After Timûr had waited fifty-three days at Baytak, he received this news; and, on his way home, married the princess Dilshad-aga. Then setting forward again, marched by Tassi Daban, and encamped at Ozkunt. Here Adel Shâb, son of Babrâm Jalayr, now dead, gave him a splendid entertainment, and presented him with some fine horses. Under this mask, his design was, in concert with two other lords, to have seized Timûr: but conceiving strong suspicions, by the motions of the conspirators, he left the assembly, and thus frustrated their plot. During the winter, when he was returned to his capital, they came and confessed their crime; while Timûr politically pretended to have known nothing of it, and, at the same time, highly caressed Adel Shâb.

^b Hist. Tim. Bek. p. 143—156, c. 7—11.

^c Ibid. p. 157—165, c. 11.—14.

(E) The same with Urjengh, called Korkanj, and Tarjania by the Persians.

(F) That is, the daughter of the Khân.

(G) The poets say, since Adam; and that she had the genius of an angel, and shape of a fairy.

(H) He usurped the kingdom of Kâshgar from Ilyas Khoja Khân, as related before, p. 468.

(I) This seems to be the river Ili, rising in Little Bukhâria, on which the Khân of the Eluths encamped. Ab-ili signifies the water Ili.

Punishes the plotters.
Hej. 777.
A. D. 1375.

IN the beginning of the year 777, the troops were ordered to assemble, as if to invade Karazm. As soon as the Amîrs arrived at the imperial city, the Sheykh Mehemed Bayan Seldûz (one of the conspirators in the late plot) was apprehended; and his crime having been fully proved, he was delivered into the hands of Heri Mulk Seldûz, his relation, who put him to death, in revenge for killing his brother. Ali Dervîsh and Mehemed Dervîsh, being equally guilty, were also put to death. In spring, Timûr sent several Amîrs, with 30,000 horse, into Jetâb, with orders to search diligently for Kamro'ddîn, and, when found, to put him to death. After this, he marched with a great army towards Karazm; and being come to Sepaya, on the Jibûn, saw Turkbân Erlût, another of the conspirators, pass over with his troops, as willing to join him: but through some sudden fear, he immediately returned to his Orda, near Korbwân. Pulâd, who was ordered to pursue him day and night with some troops, having passed Andkûd, overtook him at Farâz (or Otrâr), on the Sibûn. The two parties fought like lions: but, at length, the enemy flying, the victors pursued, and Pulâd alone overtook Turkbân; who, finding his horse tired, got off, and brought down Pulâd's with an arrow. He let fly another at his enemy, before he was able to get up: but, as it went through his cap, without hurting him, Pulâd rushed on; and closing him, after a long struggle, flung him on the ground, and cut off his head. At the same time, an officer brought the head of Tûrmîsh, brother of Turkbân, and both were laid at the foot of the throne^a.

Amîrs revolt,

AMONG the Amîrs sent to Jetâb, Sâr Buga and Adel Shâh, conspiring with Katay Babâdr, Elchi Buga, and Hamdi, whom Timûr had left governor of Andekbân, on the frontiers of Turkeftân, got together their Ordas of Jalayr and Kipjâk, and marched to Samarkant, which they besieged. Hereupon Ak Buga, the governor, wrote word of this to Timûr; who, though he had already passed by Kat, and was arrived at Khas, immediately returned. While he encamped near Bokbâra, the Mîrza Jehân Ghîr, who advanced before, met the rebels (obliged to raise the siege) at Karmîna, and defeated them. After which, they retired to the deserts of Kipjâk, and lifted themselves in the service of Urûs Khân, emperor of that country. Sâr Buga and Adel Shâh had not been long in the service of that prince, before they fled from his court, after having killed his lieutenant, and went to Jetâb; where they persuaded Kamro'ddîn to join them, in making war on Timûr. Hereupon that prince marched to the country of Andekbân, where Omar Sheykh, Timûr's second son, was governor: but, being deserted by the Hezâra of Kûdak, he retired to the mountains, and sent his father word, that the enemy, with a great army, had ruined Andekbân.

Kamro'ddîn
defeated.

THIS news so incensed Timûr, that he immediately set out for Jetâb. On which advice, Kamro'ddîn commanded his household and Orda to leave Atbâshi, while he remained in ambush with 4000 horse. Timûr coming to the place, and suspecting no such snare, sent his Amîrs, with all the army, in pursuit of the enemy; while he followed, with no more than 200 men to accompany him. Kamro'ddîn, glad of this occasion, sallied out with his men upon the emperor; who, no way dismayed, spurred his horse against the enemy, and, being obliged to expose his person, performed surprising acts of valour; which were so well seconded by his soldiers, that they at length defeated that numerous host. After this, he met Kamro'ddîn again at Sengbez Agâjeh, and constrained him to fly. Ucbkara pursued him so closely, that, at length, he obliged him to return, with eight men only; who being surrounded by the Amîr's soldiers, Kamro'ddîn, after having his horse killed, had much ado to get off on foot; wounded in several places.

Death of Jehân Ghîr,

BEFORE the last battle, Timûr dreamed, that in one of the forty-six visions, which were esteemed prophetic, he saw the Sheykh Bûrhâno'ddîn Klich; and having humbly begged of him to pray for his son Jehân Ghîr, then sick at Samarkant, the holy man only answered, Be with God (K). This, with another dream he had afterwards, increased his melancholy, and convinced him, that he should lose his dear son; whom he found dead, at his return to that capital. This prince, who was but twenty when he died, was buried at Kash; and left two sons; Mohammed Soltân, by Khân Zâdeh; and Pîr Mohammed, a posthumous son, by Bâkti Mulki Aga, daughter of Elias Yefûri.

and Adel
Shâh.

TIMUR about this time being informed, that Adel Shâh Jalayr was in the mountains of Karabuk, beyond Otrâr, sent thither two Amîrs, with fifteen horse; who having found him at Aksîma, a spy-tower on the top of mount Karajik, put him to death, according to law. Soon after, Mîrza Omar Sheykh, with several Amîrs, were sent against Kamro'ddîn; whom they met, and defeated, on the borders of Kûratû, a country of the Getes^c.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 165—170, c. 14.—16.

^c Ibid. p. 170—178, c. 16—18.

(K) We insert such particulars, as proper to shew the character of this prince; who, tho' a great, and, in other respects, a wise, judicious man, was yet a dupe to the superstitious folly of dreams and fortune-telling; owing to the force of bad instruction when young.

^a THE troops were no sooner returned, than Timûr resolved to march in person into Jetâb; ^{War in} and his van-guard were so lucky as to come up with Kamro'ddin, at Bugam Afî Gheul: where, ^{Kipjâk.} after a furious battle, they put him to flight, ravaged his country, and reduced his subjects to obedience. After pursuing him as far as Kûchar, Timûr returned to his capital, by way of Oynagû and Uzkunt. That prince, when at Kûcbâr, being informed, that Tokatmîsh (or Toktamîsh) Aglen had withdrawn from the court of Urûs, Khân of Kipjâk, in order to come over to him, sent Tumen Timûr Uzbek to meet and conduct him to Samarkant; where he was received with great honour. Timûr heaped favours on him, and gave him the government of several places for his subsistence. He likewise assisted him against Urûs Khân, who soon after attacked him; entered his dominions with a great army, and placed Toktamîsh on the throne ^b of Kipjâk. This prince being driven out, he restored him again, in 778. But as these wars A. D. 1376. have been already related more at large, in the history of that empire^c, we shall say no more about them here.

THE sovereignty of Timûr seemed now to be arrived at the summit of felicity, many of Timûr's his officers bearing the titles of Khân and Soltân; when, to increase his happiness, in the ^{greatness,} year of the Serpent, and that of the Hejrah 779, in the month of Rabiyo'laker, the Mîrza Shâh Rukh was born. Soon after this, Timûr made a fourth expedition into Karazm. Whilst ^{Hej. 779.} he was at Otrâr, to observe Urûs Khân, Isûf Sofi, king of that country, sent an army to Bokhâra, which ravaged the province, and carried off whatever they could meet with. Timûr, on this, sent an ambassador, to complain of these hostilities: but Isûf, instead of shewing any ^c reason, threw the ambassador in prison. He did the like to a second envoy; and sent Tui Bogay, surnamed the robber, with his followers, to carry away the cattle of the Turkmâns, which were about Bokhâra. However, Timûr let him alone for this year, the remainder of which he spent at Zenjir Saray, after he had married Tuman Aga, daughter of Amîr Mûssa; for whose sake he adorned Samarkant with several beautiful monuments, and, among the rest, a pleasure-house, to the west of that city, called Bâgbi Behîst, or, the garden of paradise^d.

IN Shawal 780 Timûr set forward with his army; and, entering Karazm, invested the ^{Karazm} town of Eski Skuz (L), while several parties ravaged the country. On this, Isûf or Yusef ^{c. conquers.} Sofi sent a challenge to Timûr; who, putting on his armour, contrary to the prayers of his commanders, went to the edge of the ditch, and called on Yusef to come out: but that prince ^d thought it safest to keep within the walls. However, Timûr, having received some melons from Termed, judged it might be thought uncourteous if he did not send Yusef some, when he was so near him; this was done in a gold basin, delivered at the wall. But Yusef had so little courtesy, that he ordered the fruit to be thrown into the ditch, and gave the basin to the town-porter. After this, the besieged sallied; and frequent skirmishes drew on a general battle; in which the enemy were defeated, and retired into the city. After this, Timûr order- ^{Hej. 781.} ed the Amîrs to begin the siege of the capital; which having continued near four months, in ^{A. D. 1379.} which time the castle was ruined, the Khân Yusef Sofi died with grief, as the emperor had predicted (M). At the same time the batteries being renewed, and breaches made, the town was ^e attacked, and at length taken, after a very brave resistance. The city was pillaged, many of the inhabitants killed; and all the learned men, as well as tradesmen, sent to Kash.

THIS city, which had long before this been a seminary of learning, hence was surnamed Kash walled. Kûbbet Elilmi Veledeb, that is, The dome of science and virtue: it was also called Shâbr Sebz, or The green city, from the verdure of its gardens and meadows. At the end of the year 781 the emperor declared it his ordinary residence in summer, and the second seat of the empire. He therefore inclosed it with new walls; and built a new palace, called Ak-saray, from the exceeding whiteness and height of its walls. After this, he divided the city among his Amîrs, and the troops of his household.

IN winter Timûr sent to summon Mâlek Kayâzo'ddin Pîr Ali (son of *Mâlek Hussây*n, prince Mâlek Kaya- of Herât, who died in 1369) to the Kûrultay, or assembly of the states, which was to be held ^{zo'ddin sum-} the next spring. Pîr Ali pretended submission to the summons: but delayed the messengers ^{maned.} with excuses, in order to finish the fortifications of Herât; which he had encompassed the year before with a wall two leagues in circuit, inclosing the suburbs, and gardens without the wall of the old city. These things were reported to Timûr at the time when Ali Bey, son of Argûn Shâh Jûn Garbani, returned to his obedience, and was pardoned. The emperor even consented that his daughter should marry his grandson Mebemed Soltân, son of Jebân Ghîr; and conferred with him about his design upon Herât, whither Ali Bey promised to go in spring^h.

^f See before, p. 447.
c. 26—29.

^g Hist. Tim. Bek, l. ii. p. 178—193, c. 19—26.

^h Ibid. p. 194—201,

(L) This, possibly, was the old city of Karazm, Kor-kanj, or Urjengh, or some part of it; for by what follows, it was this city which was besieged.

(M) The author, on several occasions, intimates as if Timûr had the spirit of prophecy. La Croix.

Timûr's
ambition,

IT was Timûr's ambition of universal monarchy which made him undertake such glorious things: he used to say, that it was neither fit nor decent that the world should be governed by two kings. About this time many rebels had seized the provinces of Irân, and set up for independent monarchs. This exceedingly displeased Timûr; who, having conquered the kingdom of Turân, which Jenghîz Khân formerly divided between his sons Tushtî and Jagatay, he resolved to subdue the emperor of Irân, or Persia at large. Preparatory to this, he made his son, the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, then but fourteen years of age, governor of Khorassân; and sent him thither, accompanied with several Amîrs, and fifty companies of horse. The Tatar troops, having crossed the Jibûn, passed the autumn, and most of the winter, at Bâlk and Shêbûrgân; but, towards the end of that season, took from Mâlek the town of Badghîz.

He invades Mâlek.
Hej. 782.
A. D. 1380.

TOWARDS the end of the year 782, Timûr, having raised a great army of Turks and Tatars, crossed the Jibûn, and advanced within the country of Khorassân. When he arrived at Andekûd, his devotion prompted him to visit the illustrious Santan Baba Senkû, one of those Darwish who make profession of folly (N). This person, in an enthusiastic fit, flung a breast of mutton at the emperor's head; who, believing this to be a good augury, said: "I am persuaded that God will grant me the conquest of Khorassân, because this kingdom has always been called the breast, or middle, of the inhabitable world." This prediction, says our author, had its effect. Timûr left Andekûd; and, as soon as Mâlek Mehemed, brother of Mâlek Kayazo'ddin, who was then in the fortrefs of Saraks, had notice of his march, he came before the throne, and had the honour to kiss the imperial carpet, as well as to receive many caresses and presents. When, after a long march, the army had passed by Maru Arrûd, commonly called Morgâb, they at length encamped at Chekedalek, eleven leagues from Herât.

Fâshenj
besieged,

HERE the emperor sent to desire Ali Bey to raise troops forthwith, and join him, according to the league between: but he not only refused to obey, but imprisoned the envoy. As Mâlek Kayazo'ddin had that day taken Nishâbûr from the Sarbedals, Timûr marched to Jam (O) and Kûsîpa, that the enemy's troops, who were in those ports, might not join Mâlek. The governor of Kûsîpa went to meet the emperor; who, after paying a visit, at Taybâd, to the learned and virtuous doctor Zayno'ddin Abubekr, marched to Fûshenj, about twenty-five miles short of Herât, and besieged it. This town was surrounded with high walls, a good rampart, and deep ditch, full of water. Its other fortifications were so strong, that no citadel could compare with it: yet the soldiers, crossing the ditch on planks, advanced to the wall, and made a great slaughter of the enemy with their arrows. Timûr, who often rode round the place without armour, to encourage his men, was wounded with two arrows. Mean time some Amîrs mounted the wall, while others forced the gate; and entering also by the breaches, put to the sword all who escaped their hands before. Thus Fûshenj was taken at the first assault; after which, the army marched to Herât, and laid siege to that city¹.

Herât surrendered.

THE troop of Gûris (or Gowris), reckoned the most valiant men of Irân, made a sally: but, being forced to retire, after a bloody conflict, the citizens, to save their lives, and fine houses from destruction, refused to make resistance: so that Mâlek, finding he could not bring them to a second sally, was obliged to submit; and, coming out to beg pardon, kissed the imperial carpet on his knees. Timûr gave him a vest of honour, caressed, and then dismissed him. This was in Mubarram, the first month of the year 783. Then the conqueror ordered the treasures, and other riches, which the Gowri, or Gawri, kings had amassed for several years (consisting of silver coin, brute precious stones, the richest thrones, crowns of gold, vessels of plate, gold and silver brocades, with other curiosities), to be carried away: he likewise commanded the walls, both old and new, to be razed. A tax likewise was levied on the inhabitants, for their ransom; and the gates of the city, covered with iron plates, and adorned with sculptures and inscriptions, were carried to Kash. After this, Mâlek Kayazo'ddin was ordered to deliver up to the fortrefs of Eskilj, called also Amân-kûb; then governed by the Amîr Gowri, his youngest son, reckoned the most brave and experienced lord in the kingdom, whom Mâlek prevailed on to deliver up the place, accounted by him impregnable.

Hej. 783.
A. D. 1381.

Others places
submit.

TIMUR, highly pleased with his success at Herât, sent troops to conquer Nishâbûr and Sebz-wâr: but, as the affair of Ali Bey disturbed him, he marched in person to Kellât and Tûsh (or Mashhâd), making a visit to the tomb of Abû Moslem Merûzi (P), in the way. Ali Bey, on advice of the emperor's march, came out and submitted; so did the governor of Sebz-wâr;

¹ Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 201—208. c. 30—32.

(N) These are natural fools, or blockheads, at least they pretend to be so, of whom the east is full. The Mohammedans have an extraordinary veneration for them; and say, that God loved them before their creation, and, on that account, did not endue them with reason; so that they are incapable of offending. La Croix.

(O) Jam is about seventy miles to the east of Nishâbûr.
(P) General of Abûl Abbâs Saffâr, first of Khalifahs of the house of Abbâs, to whom these princes owed their advancement. La Croix.

a and both were received with favours. He then proceeded for Esferayîn (Q.), belonging to the Amīr Veli, (or Wali), prince of Mazānderān. The soldiers immediately rushed on the walls, in which they made considerable breaches; and, entering the place, put to the sword a great number of people, and demolished all the houses of that great city. After this, Timūr sent an ambassador to the Amīr Veli; who submitted, and promised shortly to repair to his master. While the emperor diverted himself at the pleasure-house called Ogāl Natā Taylak, they put to death the robbers of Kūrashe; who had killed the Amīr Haji Berlās and his brother, Timūr's near relations, as before-mentioned.

b TIMUR, having made several regulations in the political state of Khorassān, confirmed Mālek Ali Bey Kayūzo'ddīn, prince of Herāt, and the other Amīrs, in their respective governments; after ^{revolts.} which, he returned to his own dominions, and passed the winter at Bokhāra. But, while he diverted himself in that proud city, his pleasure was embittered with the loss of his daughter Taji Khān, called also Akia Beghi, married to Mehemed Bey, son of Amīr Mūsā; a princess who had scarce her equal in beauty and virtue. He was so deeply afflicted at her death, that, when advice was brought that Ali Bey, in conjunction with the Amīr Veli, had besieged Ali Muayd, whom he had left governor of Sebzawār, he was no-way moved; nor would have resented the insult, but for the remonstrances of his sister Kotluk Turkhān Aga, who urged the bad consequences which would attend his neglect of affairs. Roused by the words of this princess, he assembled his forces; and tho' it was in the midst of winter, set forward from Bokhāra. He crossed the Jibūn with his army, over a bridge of boats; and, having passed by Makhān, c encamped in the neighbourhood of Kelāt, where Ali Bey shut himself up; nor could be prevailed on to submit, either by threats or promises: relying on the mountain whereon that fortress was built, which he imagined to be inaccessible^k.

TIMUR, to deceive the Bey, went down to Korān, dependent on Abswerd (R); where he ^{Kelat} gave out, that he intended to invade Mazānderān. On this report, Ali Bey took heart; and ^{besieged.} sent the horses, sheep, and other animals, which had been shut up in the fortress, to graze again in the meadows: when on a sudden the emperor changed his route, and returned to Kelāt, which he invested on all sides. Ali, seeing himself thus unexpectedly beset, had recourse once more to Timūr's clemency; and promised, in case his majesty would come to the gate of the town, with only a few persons, that he would repair to the gate, and ask pardon for his faults. To which the emperor agreed. The walls of Kelāt were built on the brink of a high d mountain; and along them was a narrow passage among the rocks, which was shut in by a gate, and joined to that of the town. Here the treacherous Ali Bey placed men in ambush, with orders to kill Timūr, who went to the place appointed, with only five horsemen: but the assassins, by some mistake, staid in their concealment beyond the time, and even forgot to leave open the door by which the emperor was to have entered; so that, after waiting a long time for Ali Bey, he returned to his camp.

As soon as he arrived there, in Rabiyo'lawel 784, he ordered the troops of Mekrit and Ba- Tenshiz dāgshān, the fittest in the world to clamber mountains, to scale the walls. They were follow- ^{reduced.} ed by Timūr with a troop of brave officers; and made such a slaughter, that Ali Bey promised ^{Hej. 727.} by oath to make his submission next day to Timūr, at the gate of the town; which he did. ^{A. D. 1382.} But as he was indulged in his request, not to repair to court till next day, he in the night barricaded the passages by which the imperial troops had ascended the mountain, and again violated his engagement. Fourteen days after, the emperor went to the fortress of Kabkaba, in the road to Bawerd, which he rebuilt: but sent Siorgotmīsh Khān, with the Mirza Ali, and the brave Sheykh Ali Behadr, to block up the passages to Kelāt; while he went to reduce Ter-shīz. This is a famous fortress, almost inaccessible, as being situated in the mountains; and reckoned impregnable, for its high walls, and ditches wide and deep: it was garrisoned with Gowri's, as well as provided with arms and provisions. The enemy were so obstinate, that they would not evacuate the place at the command of Mālek Kayāzo'ddīn himself; but, the f walls and breastworks being battered down, they begged for quarter; and were inrolled, for their bravery, in Timūr's troops^l.

ABOUT this time Jalalo'ddīn Shāh Shūja, king of Pārs (or Proper Persia), sent one of his ^{The Amīr Veli} principal officers, with a letter, to assure the emperor of his services and sincere friendship, ^{and} accompanied by rich presents. In return for which, Timūr sent others, with an envoy, to demand the daughter of that prince for the Mirza Pīr Mehemed, son of the late Mirza Jebān Gbīr. After this, he marched towards Mazānderān: at which news the Amīr Veli had recourse to submission; and promising soon to repair to court, Timūr withdrew again with his army.

^k Hist. Tim. Bek, p 208—219. c. 32—37.

^l Ibid. p. 219—227. c. 37—39.

(Q) A city between Nishāpūr and Jarjān, dependent on the former; called also Al Michrejān. La Croix.

(R) A town to the north of Tūs, in the desert of Kizak, formerly called Bayerd. La Croix. — Also Bawerd and ibard, as in At ū'ghāzi Khān's history.

Ali Bey
submit.

Mean time Sheykh Ali Babâdr mounted the walls of Kelât in the night, with only a few domestics : but, mistaking his way in the dark, was perceived by the enemy, who began a bloody fight : yet, when their quivers were emptied on both sides, some persons, through a religious motive, brought about an accommodation. Ali Bey met and embraced the Sheykh Ali Babâdr; and, after entertaining him for several days, went with him to the imperial camp at Radekbân; where he was received into favour, at the intercession of the Sheykh, with whose behaviour on this occasion Timûr was highly pleased.

Put to death.

THE emperor, having now entirely reduced the kingdom of Khorassân under the obedience of the Mirza Mirân Shâh, dismissed his troops, and halted to his capital. Ali Bey, with the Amîr Gowri, and his brother Mâlek Mehemed, sons of Mâlek Kayazo'ddîn, were sent bound to the Mirza Omar Sbeykh at Andekbân: but Mâlek himself, and his eldest son Pîr Mehemed, were kept at Samarkant. These were all put to death, except Pîr Mehemed, on the following occasion. During the winter, Mâlek Mehemed, son of Mâlek Fakro'ddîn (S), to whom Timûr, in pity of his poverty, had given the government of Gowr; being joined by Abûsaid Espâbed, whom that monarch had also released out of prison, marched to Herât with a troop of Gowri's, and, assisted by other rebels, committed all sorts of disorders. The governor, and other officers, having retired to the fortress of Ektiâro'ddîn, the rebels burnt the gate, and put all the Turkish garrison to the sword, who had jumped off the walls to save their lives. On this advice, the Mirza Mirân Shâh marched from the river Morgâb, where he was then encamped, to Herât; and slew so many of the rebels, that his soldiers built a high tower of their heads^m.

Jetah invaded.
Hej. 785.
A. D. 1383.

IN 785 died the princess Dilshadaga, wife of Timûr; and a few days after, Kotluk Tûrkân Aga, his eldest sister: famous for building hospitals, mosques, colleges, and other public works. These losses deeply affected him for a long time: but at length, reflecting that an hour only, employed by a prince in executing justice, is of more importance than the worship given to God, and all the prayers made during one's whole life, he applied himself by degrees to public affairs. Having learned that there were some commotions in the country of the Getes, the greater part of whom were not Mohammedans, he ordered the Mirza Ali to march thither with an army, and destroy those seditious people; then to pursue Kamro'ddîn, the author of those troubles. He sent after them Sheykh Ali Babâdr, and other Amîrs, with 10,000 horse; who, at Atakom, met the first party on their return, they being defeated and plundered by the people of Babrîn; but afterwards took revenge on them with great slaughter. They all went back together, in pursuit of Kamro'ddîn, to Iffigbeul, and thence as far as Gbeuk-topa (or the Blue Hills); but, not finding him, returned in autumn.

Cruel punishment.

MEAN time Sheykh Dawd, whom Timûr had made chief commander in Sebzawâr, having slain the governor Taban Babâdr; the Mirza Mirân Shâh laid siege to the place, and slew abundance of the rebels: but the Sheykh Dawd escaped to the fortress of Bâdrabâd, which the prince sent troops to invest. On this advice, the emperor detached the Sheykh Ali Babâdr and Uchkara Babâdr, at the head of a great army, against the Amîr Veli, prince of Mazânderân; and marched himself towards the country of Sistân (or Sejestân), which was in rebellion also. At the beginning of Ramadân 785, his army sat down before Herât, whose inhabitants, as was mentioned, were joined with the Gowri rebels: from thence he marched to Sebzawâr, which was attacked and forced. Near 2000 slaves, taken, were piled alive, one upon another, with mortar and bricks; as a monument to deter others from revolting, and punish the inhabitants of that city. After this he sent his van-guard to Sistân; and followed with the rest of his army, which consisted of 100,000 warriors. In his way, prince Shâh Jalalo'ddîn, of Fârah (or Pârrab), came and submitted to him. The army likewise took the fortress of Zâreb (T), with the slaughter of near 5000 soldiers, of whose bodies they made a mountain, and with their heads erected a tower.

Sistân
besieged;

WHEN the emperor arrived at Sistân (U), he ranged his army round it in form of a crown. Presently there appeared some lords deputed from Shâh Kotbbo'ddîn, to offer tribute to Timûr, and the usual customs: but, during this conference, the besieged sallied out in multitudes with good troops. Timûr, who knew of their design, placed 2000 men in ambush; while an Amîr advanced with a few horse to begin the fight, and then turned to the right, pretending to fly. The enemy, who were only foot, encouraged by this feint, pursued them vigorously to the place of ambuscade; where the horse, rushing out, after a bloody fight, drove them to the gates of the town. Next night 2000 of the enemy sallied out to surprise the besiegers, and advanced

^m Ibid. p. 227—233, c. 39—41.

(S) This Mâlek Mehemed and his brother were cousins-germans to Mâlek Husayn, father of Mâlek Kayazo'ddîn.

(T) In Sistân or Nimruz province, near a lake of the same name.

(U) It is also called Sejestân, or Sajestân, and Zaranj. It stands on the river Senarûs, a branch of the Hermand, which falls into the lake of Zereh (or Zareh). The province, which has the same name, is otherwise called Nimruz (that is, the southern country). La Croix. This author says, it is a part of Khorassân; but it is indeed a distinct province, of considerable extent.

a as far as the tents, and even to the middle of the camp: but they met with so warm a reception, that those, who escaped being killed, with great difficulty got back to the town^a.

NEXT day the army assaulted the place on all sides, and at the same time the besieged ^{taken, and de-} made a sally; but were repulsed by the Mîrza Ali, with 500 horse, who entered the town ^{destroyed.} with the enemy. However, they were opposed by a strong party, who shut them in, and began a furious engagement: but Akitmur Babâdr, being informed of what had happened, halted with 1000 horse, and, cutting the gate to pieces, delivered Mîrza Ali and his men out of the hands of the enemy. The king, Shâh Kotbô'ddîn, despairing to defend himself, came out of the town to ask pardon of the emperor; who granted it, and distinguished him b from the other princes by his favours. Mean time between 20 and 30,000 of the populace, sliding down by the walls, advanced to attack the besiegers, who repulsed them with great slaughter. Then, pursuing their victory, they gave a second assault; and, having made several breaches in the walls, entered the city, which they left desolate: they not only demolished the walls and houses, but slew all the inhabitants, men, women, and children. Thus was this fine city destroyed, and all the treasures of the Sîstân kings carried away, in the month of Shawal. The king Kotbô'ddîn, generals of the army, and governors of provinces, were sent to Samarkant.

FROM Sîstân the army marched to Bost (W). In their passage they took the fortrefs of Other cities Tak: and, when they came to the river Hirmen (or Hendmend), destroyed an antient monu- ^{reduced.} ment there, called the bank of Rûstem. Being informed at Kuke Kala, that Tûmen Nikûdari, revolting, had besieged Kij in Mekrân, the emperor sent the Mîrza Mîrân Shâh with troops to reduce him; and although the Amîr Sayfo'ddîn, his old friend, strove to reclaim him, he continued obstinate, and was killed in the first onset. As the army marched by the upper part of the Hirmen, the prince of Mam Katû waited on Timûr with presents: but, as Timûr knew him to be the person, who, when he returned from Sîstân with the Amîr Hussayn, had wounded him in the hand, he ordered him to be seized, as soon as he was gone out from his presence, and shot to death. After this, the troops, on their march, took the city of Mam Katû and Kala Surk, that is, red castle. Then arriving at Hezarpezh, where 3000 of Tûmen's subjects had fortified themselves in the mountain, they took it by assault, though d deemed impregnable; and put them to the sword, to punish them for the disorders they committed. The like was done at Debne, another citadel, which the tribe of Tagâchi had seized, and towers built of their heads, as usual.

THE army proceeded next to attack the Ougani (X) of Kûb Soleyman, a fortrefs on a moun- ^{Kandahâr} tain of that name, who had lately submitted, and were now revolted. A bloody battle was ^{taken.} fought, in which several brave men were killed: but, the place being at length taken, the Ougani were all put to death, according to the laws of Jenghîz Khân. From thence Jebân Shâh Yakû Babâdr was sent to Kandahâr, which he carried by assault; and, seizing the governor of the province, sent him to court, where he was hanged. Timûr, on his arrival there, rewarded Jebân Shâh, and then dispatched him with forces to Kelât (Y); which, after several assaults, e he took and demolished. Sîstân, Zablestân, and their dependencies, being thus brought into subjection, the emperor disbanded the Amîrs, officers, and troops; then setting out for Samarkant, he arrived there in fourteen days. Soon after, a son was born to him, named Ibrahim Soltân; but this prince did not live long, dying very young.

AFTER Timûr had staid three months in his capital, to pass the delightful season, he resolved ^{Invades Irân} to march to Mazânderân. He staid some days at Bâlk, for the arrival of several bodies of ^{afresh.} troops; which, amounting to 100,000 men, considerably increased his army. Being come ^{Hej 786.} to the river Morgâb he took the road of Burkey Tâsh; and, coming down from Saraks, went ^{A. D. 1384.} to Bâverd (or Abiverd), and thence to Nesâ (Z), where he learned that the Amîr Veli had shut himself up in the citadel of Dûrân (A). On the way thither his van-guard met that of f the Amîr, and came to a battle. Mobasher, who began the attack, was shot in the face with an arrow, which, entering near his teeth, went out at his neck: but, notwithstanding his wound, he rushed on his adversary, and cut off his head. The enemy, scared at this action, fled; and Timûr rewarded Mobasher's courage. The army, on their arrival at Dûrân, besieged it; and, after several assaults, took it, putting the governor and garrison to the sword^o.

^a Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 223 . 241. c. 41—44.

^o Ibid. p. 241—253. c. 44—48.

(W) A town of Sîstân, on the borders of Zabulestân, or Zabîstân. La Croix. Others, with De l'Isle, place it in Zabulestân, on the borders of the province of Kandahâr.

(X) These are the Augâns, Augvâns, or Afgâns, who lately caused such troubles in Persia.

(Y) A town in the kingdom of Koran, near Kandahâr; different from Kelât, in Khorassân.

(Z) Nisay, or Nesay, as in Abûlghâzi Khân's history: it is called also Little Damascus. La Croix says, it is a city in the desert of Kiwak, between Khorassân and Karazm.

(A) A city of Khorassân, now belonging to Karazm, to the north of Nesâ, towards the river Amû.

Astarabad destroyed.

FROM Dûrûn they marched by Chilawn, a country full of villages; and, passing the river at Jorjân, encamped at Shasumân: there, the two armies meeting, a bloody fight ensued. These skirmishes continued twenty days; at the end whereof the Amîr Veli advanced, and fought with heroic valour; but was at length obliged to fly, and many of his best officers fell in the pursuit. Toward evening, Timûr ordered thirty companies to lie in ambuscade; and, in the night, the Amîr Veli sallied out of the fortress upon the right wing commanded by prince Mirân Shâh, who marched against him: and, at the same time, those in ambuscade fell on: so that, being put to flight, many of his troops fell into the pits which they had dug to entrap the enemy. After this, the army, marching forward, arrived in the morning at Astâr abâd (B), capital of Mazânderân, where they burnt and destroyed every-thing, without sparing even sucking infants. This war happened in the month of Shawal 786.

Lokmân restored.

THE Amîr Veli fled the same night, with his wives and children, by the way of Langaru, to Damgân; and, leaving them in the fortress of Shîrdekûb, marched to Ray, or Rey (C). The troops sent in pursuit almost overtook him at that city; which made him fly into the woods of the country of Rusteyndâr, and thus escaped. This Amîr was son of Sheykh Ali Bisûd, one of Taghitmûr Khân's commanders, who was slain, at the same time with his master, by the Sarbedâls. Veli, who was present, escaped to Nesa; where at length becoming powerful, he marched to Astâr abâd, which he reduced: while Lokmân Pâdi Shâh, son of Teghitmûr, fled, and wandered from place to place; till, lifting into the service of Timûr, this monarch, after taking that city, restored to him the government of it.

Soltân Ahmed flies.

THE emperor, leaving above two-thirds of his army to winter at Astâr abâd, marched with the rest towards the kingdom of Ray. Soltân Ahmed Sheykh Avîs Jalâyr, who was then at Soltânîya in Irâk, alarmed at this unexpected approach, left a strong garrison there, under the command of his son Akbûga, and retired to Tauris. Mean time Omar Abbâs, at the head of three-score horse, set out towards Soltânîya, in the terrible snows, to gain intelligence. The enemy, on the news of his march, departed in great haste, with their young prince, for Tauris; but, as they were not all gone out when Omar Abbâs arrived, that commander entered the place sword in hand, and made himself master of it. Timûr, who, in spring, came to Soltânîya, having sent to Shîrâz for Sarek Adel (one of the greatest lords belonging to Sheykh Avîs, then in the service of Soltân Zeyn al Abo'ddîn, son of Shâh Shuja, lately dead), conferred on him the government of that province, and the territories dependent on it; leaving with him also with an army, to subdue the neighbouring countries.

Hej. 787.
A. D. 1385.

Soltânîya taken.

AFTER this expedition, Timûr returning from Soltânîya, entered the mountains of Rusteyndâr; and, as the princes of the country fled, he easily became master of it. The Amîr Veli, on this news, fled also from Yalûs; while the army turned towards the cities of Amol and Sarye (or Sari); but the princes, who possessed those places, prevented the danger, by offering to pay tribute, and obey Lokmân Pâdishâh, prince of Astâr abâd. Timûr, having thus reduced Irân, as far westward as Soltânîya, returned to the seat of his empire.

Kipjâks take Tauris.

DURING the winter, Tokatmîsh (or Toktamîsh), Khân of Kipjâk, sent an army of near 90,000 men, by way of Dârbend, to attack Tauris. In this army, who were for the most part infidels, of a merciless nature, there were twelve Aglens (D), princes of the royal blood of Tushti, with several Amîrs. The inhabitants of Tauris having, by advice of the Amîr Veli, who had retired thither, fortified their city, repulsed the enemy for eight days; but at length the army of Toktamîsh Khân, being more numerous than that of the besieged, became masters of the place, where they exercised all manner of cruelties and abominations. Then having, in six days, pillaged all the treasures, which had taken up many years to amass, they carried them off, with numerous slaves, to their own country ^P.

Lorestân reduced.

A. D. 1386.

TIMUR, when he heard of this devastation, was greatly incensed at it, and confirmed in his resolution to conquer Irân: which, being in confusion for want of a sovereign, was subject to such invasions, and liable otherwise to fall into the hands of some other power; which might prove detrimental to himself. In the year 788, therefore, he crossed the Jibûn with a formidable army; and, after a long march, arrived at Firûzkûb (E). Here being informed of the outrages committed by the people of Lûrestân, or the country of Lûr (Lor, or Lawr), who had lately attacked and plundered a Karawân of pilgrims, passing through their country to Mekka; he thought himself obliged to chastise such villains. Therefore, taking with him every fifth man, he marched thither with all expedition; ordered Urujerd, with the neigh-

^P Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 253—260. c. 48—51.

(B) Situated at the south-east corner of the Caspian sea.

(C) In all probability the antient Ragau, or Rages.

(D) All the princes of the blood of Tushti, or Jaji, are surnamed Aglæ. La Croix.

(E) A fortress in Kâbeştân, or Persian Irak, a few leagues to the north-east of Ray.

a boursing places, to be plundered ; and at length reduced Korram abâd, an almost impregnable fortress, whither the robbers of Lûrestân were retired ; the greater part of whom, being taken, were thrown headlong from the tops of the mountains. Having thus subdued this little principality (F), he rejoined his army at Nabawend, a city not far off, to the south-west.

THIS monarch, having received advice that Soltân Abmed Jalayr had raised troops at Bagh-dâd, and returned to Tauris, hastened towards this last city, at the head of his army : but the Soltân, not willing to wait his coming, fled. Troops being sent to pursue him, overtook and plundered his baggage. Hereupon he abandoned his army, accompanied with some troops : but, at the salt-pits of Nemekzar, beyond Nakchivân, was overtaken again by Elias Koja, son of Sheykh Ali Babâdr, with a small number of horse. The Soltân made a brave resistance ; and Elias, having been disabled by a wound, gave him an opportunity of escaping. On this occasion there happened many disorders at Nakchivân ; where, among other damages, the great dome of the palace of Ziao'l Mulk was burnt. Mean time several great lords and Sharifs of Azerbejân came to submit to the emperor : and a sum of money was imposed on the inhabitants of Tauris, by way of ransom for their lives.

THE whole kingdom of Azerbejân being now reduced, the court remained at that capital during the summer. Here Sarek Adel (G) was put to death by a sling from the walls ; and the most skilful masters in every art and science were sent to Samarkant. At the same time the Amîr Veli was seized wandering in the province of Kalkal (*), and put to death. In autumn the army marched to Merend (or Marand) ; and then to the river Urûs (H), which it passed, over the bridge of Ziao'l Mulk, one of the most magnificent in the world, built all of stone, of a vast length, and flat at top. It is in the territory of Nakchivân, near the town of Zulaba (I) : one of its arches, which joins to a mountain, at whose foot the river runs, is sixty cubits wide : there is another of fifty-five cubits. There is also a great gate at each end, made out of the rock : the whole not to be equalled for beauty.

THE army, after reducing the citadel of Korni, and town of Surmalu, on the river, which they found in their road, came to Kârs ; a town with a citadel so strongly built of stone, and difficult of access, that those of the country deemed it impregnable : for all this, the governor Pirûz Bâkht, a Turkmân, after a very brave defence, was obliged to surrender the place ; which was plundered, and then razed to the ground. As Timûr's aim, from the first, was to make war on the infidels ; because it is recommended by God to Mohammed, as the most excellent of all actions ; so, being at this time so near Georgia, he resolved to make war on that country, which he had long before meditated. With this view he decamped from Kârs, though in very frosty weather ; and, by way of Kitû, arrived at Teflis, capital of that country, which was well fortified with strong walls, besides a citadel : but, by the valour of Timûr's troops, the city was taken, and prince Mâlek Ipokrates brought in chains to the camp. After this, the emperor took the diversion of hunting : the soldiers first made the circle called the Nerk ; and then performed the Jerk, by approaching towards the centre, so to inclose the game⁹.

THE army being encamped at Sheki, near the mountains, several bodies were sent into different parts of the country, which reduced many cities and provinces. The Lekeziens were pillaged, and most of them slain : the provinces of Tenk-gûl and Akjev were subdued. The camp removing to Kabala, or Kambala, the Amîrs razed Kala Surk, or the red castle ; and from thence, by Karabâgh-surgâb, came to the Kûr (or Cyrus), which they crossed, over a bridge of rafts. Then, marching to Berdaa (in the province of Arân), that city submitted without any opposition. When they came to Karabâgh (or the black garden), Timûr sent for Ipokrates ; and used such convincing arguments, that he turned Mohammedan. He presented the emperor with a coat of mail, reported to have been that which the prophet Dawd, or David, forged in a smith's shop ; and made proof, by soaking and drying it several times. Timûr, in return, made him several presents, and permitted him to return home : which good treatment of their princes induced most of his subjects to embrace the Muslimân faith.

AT this time the Amîr Sheykh Ibrâhîm, prince of Shîrwân, distinguished for his power, honesty, and noble descent, came and submitted to Timûr. Among other parcels of presents, there was one of eight captives, whom he had bought ; and, as some person said that the ⁹ Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 260—269. cap. 51—54.

(F) Its prince was Mâlek Azzo'ddin ; but it is not said what became of him.

(G) He had fled from the court of the Ilkhânian kings, or of Soltân Abmed, to that of Timûr.

(*) Part of Khilân, or Ghilân.

(H) Or Aras, of old Araxes.

(I) Possibly, a mistake for Julafa, or rather Julfa. The bridge is mentioned by Tavernier, c. 4. p. 19. who tells us, it was destroyed, with the city, by Shâh Abbâs, to prevent the Turks from settling there.

ninth piece was wanting (K), he presented himself, to make up the number : which action a so highly pleased the emperor, that, besides other bounties, he bestowed on him the kingdom of Shîrwân, and its dependencies, with the title of king ; under which he became famous. Other sovereigns followed this prince's example ; particularly those of Ghilân, or Kilân, who, confiding in their mountains and woods, marshes and sloughs, which rendered access difficult, as well as in the strength of their walled places, had not obeyed any king for many ages.

Defeats the Kipjaks.
Hej. 789.
A. D. 1387.

TIMUR, having passed the winter at Karabâgh, on the banks of the Urûs (or Aras), in the beginning of the year 789 marched to Bardaa. Here he received advice that Toktamîsh, Khân of Kipjâk, had revolted ; and sent an army to make an irruption into Azerbejdân, by the way of Dârbend, contrary to the counsel of his principal lords : but Ali Bey, and Kazanîshi, who had killed his own father, having found access to him, persuaded him to break off friendship with the emperor, and become his enemy. As soon as they were arrived near the Kûr, troops were sent over to observe their motions ; who were defeated : but, a strong body being detached to support them, under the command of the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, Haji Sayfo'ddîn, and other princes, the enemy were soon put to a shameful flight. They were pursued as far as Dârbend, and a great number taken prisoners, whom Timûr generously released ; after mildly reflecting on their Khân's breach of treaty without any provocation.

Destroys Alen-jik.

FROM the Kûr he marched to Gheukche Tenghîz, that is, the blue sea, where the empress Saray Mulk Khanûm arrived, with her two sons, from Samarkant. At length he proceeded to Alenjîk, where there was a fortress belonging to Soltân Ahmed. Three days after, his soldiers, in the night, ascended the mountain adjoining to this place ; and, at day-break, attacking it, made themselves masters of the lower citadel, which they destroyed. Those who guarded it fled to the upper fortress ; where, for want of water, they at length capitulated, promising on oath to depart. But, just as the besieged were going to perform their agreement, so great a rain fell, that, in twenty-four hours, all their cisterns were filled with water ; and the people, having quenched their thirst, put the enemy to defiance : who, suspecting no such contravention, had descended the mountain, and returned to the camp. Hereupon the siege being renewed, the walls were at length battered down, and the water turned off ; so that in a short time the fortress was taken, and razed to the ground^r.

Chastises the Turkmâns.

AT this time advice arriving, that the Turkmâns were continually molesting the Mohammedans ; that they robbed the Karawâns, not sparing even those of Mekka ; and that nobody could pass in safety by the places where they dwelt, Timûr left the province of Nakchivân, and marched towards them. In the way, he ordered the baggage to repair to Alatak ; and, when he arrived at the castle of Bayezîd, formerly called Aydîn, his troops pillaged it, and carried off all which the inhabitants had left in the adjacent country. Passing farther to the castle of Avanik (L), where Mefer, son of Kara Mehemed, resided, they ravaged all the country likewise. From hence they marched to Arzerûm, which they took the same day they arrived. Timûr, who encamped on the river Shia-shûr, sent an ambassador to persuade Tabarten, sovereign of Arzenjân, to submit ; which he did, and consented to pay the karaj, or tribute (M). After this, he sent three of his best squadrons, under command of the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, in search of Kara Mehemed (N), father of Kara Yusef, the Turkmân ; whose lands they ravaged, carrying away their wives and children ; but found him not. However, another squadron, detached on the same errand, at length discovered him on the top of a mountain, and attacked him there ; but, the place being rendered inaccessible by the steep rocks, they returned to the camp.

Reduces Armenia,

FROM thence Timûr marched to Mûsh (O), which was plundered ; and at length arrived at the city of Aklât (P), which submitted to him. Then, proceeding to Adeljawz, the prince thereof came out to meet him with presents, and was confirmed in the possession of his principality. The emperor continued his march by the lake of Vân ; and, having passed Bend Mahi (Q), at length arrived at Alatak, where the baggage and body of the army waited for him. After this, the forces advanced to Vân and Vastân. Mâlek Azzo'ddîn, who commanded in the former, shut himself up in the citadel, which is very strong, situated on the

^r Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 269—278. c. 54—58.

(K) It is the custom also to present nine pieces of a fort.

(L) Wân, or Vân, situated in the Upper Armenia. La Croix.—On the eastern side of a lake called that of Vân, also Aktamir.

(M) Which the Mohammedan princes exact from the Christians and Jews.

(N) Chief, or founder, of the monarchy of the Kara Kuyonlu, or black sheep ; whose history is given hereafter.

(O) A village in the Lower Armenia, at the foot of a mountain, from whence springs a little river : it is two days journey from Mayafakîn, and three from Aklât. La Croix.

(P) Or Eklât ; called also Kellât, and Kalât, the capital of Lower Armenia.

(Q) A place where a little river falls into the lake of Vân ; and where are caught a great many little fish called tarrik. La Croix.

a ridge of a mountain, and bounded on one side by the lake. The army used all their efforts to take both the castle and the town. Two days after, the prince came out, and submitted; but, the inhabitants refusing to surrender, the siege was renewed; and the fortress, which had never been conquered before, was entered on the twentieth day by the soldiers; who slew a great number of those robbers, and cast down many from the mountain top, tied neck and heels.

TIMUR, having ordered the castle of Vân to be demolished, went to Sâlmâz (a city of and Kûrde-Azerbejdân), where he left Mâlek Azzo'ddin in possession of all Kûrdestân. At the same time flân. the prince of Armitzek came to submit himself, and was confirmed in the principality of Armit.

b After this, the emperor marched to Marâgha, and from thence to Ghilân: from whence, in Hej. 785. A. D. 1387. autumn 789, he set out to conquer the kingdoms of Fârs (or Pârs) and Irâk. He had some time before sent to summon to his court Zayno'labeddin, prince of Shîrâz (R), whose father, Shâh Shûjah, before he died, had recommended him to Timûr's protection: but this prince, instead of obeying the summons, seized on and imprisoned the envoy. The army, taking its route through the country of Hamadân, arrived at Jerbadekbân (S); from whence the emperor marched, and encamped before Ispâhân. Immediately the governor Seyd Muzaffer Kâshî, maternal uncle of Soltân Zayno'labeddin, with other chief men, came out to implore the mercy of Timûr; who entered the city, and lodged in the fortress of Tabarrûk: then placing a garrison there, and a governor, returned to his camp.

c THE quarters of the city were shared among the Amîrs; each of whom sent a commissary Ispâhân sub- into his quarter, to collect the money granted by the inhabitants to redeem their lives. But, mits. while every thing seemed in a quiet state, a rash young fellow, of the suburbs, named Ali Kuchapa, a smith, in the night, caused the drum to be beaten in the city. On this, a rabble gathered, who cut the throats of all the commissaries, and more than 3000 Turks: so that none were saved, in this massacre, excepting such as the wiser inhabitants of each quarter defended from those villains; who also slew the guards, and seized the gates. Next morning, when Timûr was informed of this sedition, he ordered his army to take the city by force; and, when they had carried it by assault, sent men to guard the quarter of the Sharîfs, and doctors of the law: but ordered all the rest of the inhabitants to be put to the sword, except- The inhabit- ing those who had preserved any of his soldiers. To make sure work, every company of ants slaugh- d men was obliged to furnish a certain number of heads: but many soldiers, who were unwilling to kill the Musulmâns, bought heads of the executioners, to make up their respective quotas. At first a head was sold for twenty dinârs Kupeghi: but, when every one had the number he was taxed at, it yielded only half a dinâr; and at last no person bought any. On the other hand, the soldiers, who were less scrupulous or humane, killed all they met; and, by the tracks of feet in the snow which fell, traced those who fled to their hiding places, where they put them to death. According to the registers of the Divân, the number of heads amounted to 70,000; which were laid in heaps on the walls, and afterwards piled up in towers, as usual. This terrible slaughter happened on Monday the sixth of Zu'l Kaadeh, in the year before-mentioned.

e AFTER the reduction of Ispâhân, Timûr marched towards Shîrâz: on which advice, Zayno'labeddin, prince of Pârs, or Proper Persia, fled with his troops to join Shâh Mansûr, Pârs and Ker- governor of Toštâr (T), his cousin-german: but his soldiers, being bribed, went over to Mansûr; who, seizing the imprudent prince, first imprisoned him, and afterwards his treacherous troops, confiscating all their effects. Mean time the emperor arriving at Shîrâz, on the first of Zulhajeh, that metropolis, with the whole kingdom, submitted to him. The governors, assembling, agreed to pay 1000 tomans (U) Kapeghi; and the Kotbah was read in Timûr's name. Here Shâh Yabîa, prince of Yazd, a city of Pârs, nephew of the late Shâh Shuja; Soltân Ahmed, prince of Kermân, brother of the same Shuja; and Abu Ishâk, his grandson, from Sirjîan; all the neighbouring sovereigns; also the Atabeks of Lor (W) and Gurghîan Lar (X), came and made their submission; while the troops went to pillage the countries which refused to obey the summons.

* Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 278—290. c. 58—60.

† Ibid. p. 290—299. c. 60—62.

(R) At present capital of Pârs, as the Arabs write Fars, or Proper Persia: but at that time Esfakar, or Asiakar, supposed to be the ancient Persepolis, is said by our author to have been the metropolis.

(S) A city of Khuzestân, a part of Persian Irâk, called also Ghilpayghan, or Gulpaykhân.

(T) Formerly called Kushter, or Shushter, in the province of Abuâz, which is part of Khuzestân. Abû Isfeda says, this town is the most antient in the world. La Croix.

(U) A toman is worth twenty French crowns. La Croix.

(W) A nation in Khuzestân. La Croix. Some place it in Persian Irâk.

(X) A city and province of Pârs.

C H A P. III.

Wars with the Kipjâks and Getes. Conquest of the countries to the Euphrates.

Tokatmîsh
Khân repulsed. IN the interim advice came, that Tokatmîsh, Khân of Kipjâk, defeated by Timûr in the west, had gone round, and attacked his dominions in the east. His army, having passed by Saganâk, sat down before Sabrân; but were obliged to raise the siege. However, as they continued to ravage the country, the Mîrza Omar Shейkh marched from Andekbân; and, being joined by the troops left at Samarkant, crossed the Sibûn (or Sîr) in autumn. They met the enemy's army in the field of Juklik, five leagues to the east of Otrâr; and fought till night: when Omar Shейkh, carried by his intrepid valour, breaking through the enemy's army, was missed by his own; who thereupon fled. However, the Mîrza escaped to Andekbân; and, having rallied his troops, set out a second time: but, when he got to Kojend, news came that Ankatûra, nephew of the Amîr Haji Bey, of the tribe of Irkanût, forgetting the emperor's favours, with an army from Mogulestân, was already arrived at Sayrâm and Tâshkunt. Omar Shейkh immediately returned to cut off their retreat; and came up with them before Aksiket. The armies, for some days, marched along the banks of the Sibûn, in view of each other, waiting for an opportunity of engaging to advantage ^a.

The Getes defeated. AT length, one night, Anketura, leaving 1000 men in his camp, with orders to light fires, that the Mîrza might think all the army was still there, marched with the rest of his troops, and crossed the Sibûn in a convenient place. At the same time Omar Shейkh advanced against and fought him: but, as the enemy far surpassed him in number of forces, he desisted, and entered Andekbân. Anketûra pursued him, and aimed to seize all the avenues: but the Mîrza, to prevent him, sallied out, and fell upon the Getes, rushing into the midst of his enemies; till Tukel Babâdr made after him, and led his horse back by the bridle: after which, Anketûra, weary of the expedition, returned homewards. Mean time the troops of Kipjâk pillaged the towns of Great Bukbâria; and, being met at Bokbâra by another body of their army, besieged that city. But, as they were always worsted in their attacks, they raised the siege, and made incursions through the country; in one of which, they burnt Zenjîr Saray (A), (one of the emperor's palaces) whither they were conducted by Soltân Mahmûd, son of Kay Kofrû Katlâni.

New conquests settled. WHEN Timûr received advice of this invasion, he gave the government of Shîrâz to Shâh Yahîa, nephew of Shâh Shuja; that of Ispâhân to Soltân Mehemed, son of Shâh Yahîa; that of Kirmân to Soltân Ahmed, brother of Shâh Shuja; and invested the Soltân Abu Is-bâk, Shâh Shuja's grandson, in the government of the province, as well as city and castle, of Sirjiân, which he bestowed on him and his heirs for ever; signing all their patents with the imperial signet called Altomga, that is, the mark of the red hand. Then the emperor sent all the great Amîrs belonging to the court of the late Shâh Shuja, with all the handicraftsmen of Shîrâz, to Samarkant: after which, he set out for that city, at the end of Moharram 790. As soon as the enemy heard that he had crossed the Jibûn with his army, they thought fit to fly back to Kipjâk, and were pursued as far as Bilen.

Cowardice punished. As it appeared strange to this monarch, that, in the battle of Juklik, the army of Tokatmîsh Khan should get the better of his troops; he ordered the Amîrs, who were in that battle, to be examined in council, and the transgressors prosecuted. Among the rest, Berat Kojâ had his beard shaved (B); and, after being severely reproached for his cowardice, they painted his face with ceruse and vermillion; put a coiffe on his head, as if he had been a woman; and made him run barefoot through the city. On the other hand, Kuche Mâlek, who, with thirteen men only, had attacked, in the night, 300 infidels of Ankatûra's troop, and delivered several prisoners out of their hands; received as a reward, among other favours, a principality, for him and his descendants, with the privilege of Terkân ^b.

^a Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 290—299. c. 60—62.

^b Ibid. p. 299—305. c. 62—63.

(A) Two leagues from Kârshî. Which insult was revenged afterwards by the burning of Saray, capital of Kipjâk. See La Croix, hist. Tim. Bek, l. iii. cap. 60. p. 514.

(B) There is no greater reproach among the eastern nations, than to have the beard shaved, after it is once grown; especially if done by the common executioner. La Croix.

a In the beginning of the year before-mentioned, Timûr departed for Karazm; and, when he came to the river Shedris (C), learned by a deserter, that Ilitmiş Aglen (king of that country), and Soleymân Sofi, had quitted that kingdom, and retreated to Kipjâk. Hereupon he sent some troops in pursuit of them, by way of Komkint and Kîz; who, overtaking them, made a great slaughter, and plundered their baggage. When he came to the capital of Karazm, he ordered the inhabitants to remove, with their goods, to Samarkant; and razed that great city to the very foundations, sowing the ground with barley, to punish his enemies making war upon him. However, three years after, in 793, Mîsfk being sent by Timûr to Karazm, he re-peopled the country, and brought it up to its antient splendor. He surrounded with walls not only the cities of Kât and Kivâk, but likewise all the demesnes of the Khân; that is, the part of Karazm which Jenghîz Khân gave to Jagatay Khân. Affairs of Karazm. Hej. 790.

b DURING Timûr's expedition into Karazm, Mehemed Mireke, son of Shîr Babrâm, whom he had made governor of Katlân, and honoured in marriage with his daughter Soltân Bâkt Begum, revolted, and marched to Termed, but could not take that city. On the first news of this rebellion, the Mîrza Omar Shейkh pursued the rebels, who thereupon dispersed; which broke all Mireke's measures, who fled to the kingdom of Katlân. Being followed by the Mîrza, he hastened to the narrow pass called Darey Darvâz, to seek protection of Shâh Jalâl'eddîn (D), who refused him entrance into the castle: to add to his affliction, most of his domestics abandoned him. Mean time Omar Shейkh could get no tidings of him: but, while he staid in Katlân, waiting the event, one of his officers, in his way to Samarkant with some domestics, arrived at a fountain in Katlân: where observing the tracks of horses which had gone out of the common road, he had the curiosity to follow them; and had no sooner passed some hills, than he perceived Mehemed sitting with four servants, while their horses fed on the grass. He immediately surrounded, seized, and bound them: then sent notice to the Mîrza, who ordered him to put Mireke to death. Revolt of Mireke.

c AT the same time that Mireke rebelled, the Amîr Jêhân Shâh departed from Kondoz with the Tomâns of Bûrûlday, Taykhân, and Aperdi. In their march, that of Bûrûlday revolted, and returned back: the Amîr, with some troops, pursued them to Bakalân, and pillaged their houses. After which, hearing of Mireke's rebellion, he prepared to march against him; and hastened to the Jibûn with part of the forces: where he was to be joined by two other commanders with the rest. But, as soon as night came, Junayd Bûrûlday, and his brother Bayezîd, revolting with the squadrons they commanded, consisting of 3000 horse, fell on Jêhân Shâh, who had no more than sixty men: yet this valiant general, having the river on his back, advanced with his soldiers against the rebels; and, when they had emptied their quivers, had recourse to their lances and swords. Mean time Koja Yusef, son of Olajîa Itû, sent Jêhân Shâh word, that he was hastening to his assistance. This news giving the men new heart, they held firm till night; when Yusef arrived with 100 men, and fell so vigorously on the enemy, that they fled, while many were slain in the pursuit. and Bûrûlday suppressed.

d WHEN Timûr was on the way to Karazm, Siorgatmiş Khân fell sick at Bokbâra, and died Mahmûd there; and, at his return, Soltân Mahmûd (E), son of the deceased, was established in his place. After this, he married the Mîrzas Mehemed Soltân, his brother Pîr Mehemed, and the Mîrza Shâh Rukh. electd Khân.

e AT the end of the same year, Toktamîsh Khân, of Kipjâk, brought a numerous army into the field, composed of the troops of Russia, Chirkassia, Bulgaria, Kipjâk, Krîm, Kassa, Allan, and Azâk. Timûr, on this news, departed, with the troops of Samarkant and Kash, to the place of rendezvous, six leagues from his capital; from whence he sent orders through the empire for his troops to repair thither: but, before any could arrive, advice came that Ilitmiş Khân, with a vast number of horse, had crossed the Jibûn at Kojend, and encamped not far distant. The emperor, without waiting for any other troops, contrary to the intreaties of his lords, set forward, through the snow, which was already so deep that it touched the bellies of the horses. For all this, he marched night and day; and, shortly after, was joined by the Mîrza Omar Shейkh, with the troops of Andekbân. The Kipjaks defeated, Hej. 791. A. D. 1389.

f TIMUR then sent a body of horse to fall on the enemy's rear; and block up the passages, to hinder their retreat. Next morning they came in sight of the enemy; and immediately made the great cry Sûrûn, to begin the fight. After a bloody battle, the enemy were obliged to fly; and, being pursued, many flung themselves into the Jibûn, to avoid the sword;

* Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 305—315. l. iii. c. 1, & seq.

(C) Which runs into the Jibûn; and divides the kingdoms of Jagatay and Karazm. La Croix.

(D) Prince of the frontiers of Tibet, inhabiting the mountains between that country and Katlân. La Croix.

—This must be understood of the country of Little Tibet, to the north of Kashmîr, in Hindûstân.

(E) By mistake, called in the history Mehemed.

sword ; while the rest, meeting with the troops sent to cut off their retreat, were hemmed in, and the greater part cut to pieces. Timúr then returned to his capital ; and, in the month of Safar 791, encamped near that city ; waiting for the troops from all parts of the empire, which arrived in the beginning of spring. In the month of Rabîyo'lawel he departed for Kipjâk ; and passed the Sibûn at Kojend, over a bridge of boats, at the head of a formidable army. The van-guard surprised the enemy's scouts, and cut most of them to pieces : the rest fled to Toktamîsh Khân, who had laid siege to Sabrân, but was obliged to raise it ; and, as soon as he heard that Timúr had passed the river, fled with precipitation through the desert. He was pursued for some time as far as Sarek Uzân, on the river Arch, by a body of troops ; who killed several of the enemy's rear, and then returned to Aksûma (F), where the emperor was encamped.

Sarbedâl kingdom ruined.

TIMÚR then advanced forward ; and, having passed the town of Bilân and Sarek Uzân, at length came to Alkûsûn, a village of Kipjâk. Here being informed that the Sardebâl princes (G), and Haji Bey Yun Garbânî, were revolted, with the garrisons of Kelât and Tûs, he sent the Mîrza Mirân Shâh to Khorassân, with the main body of the army. In his way, he caused Mâlek Pîr Mehemed, son of Mâlek Kayazo'ddin, prince of Herât, and his son Mahmûd, to be put to death at Samarkant ; so to remove the cause of the disorders in Khorassân. He did the same by Zayn al Abeddin, prince of Shîrâz ; so that there remained not one of those Kûrd (H) princes. At Babrabûd, near Tûs, he met the Sardebâl kings, who fought with great resolution : but, being surrounded by the Mîrza's troops, were all cut to pieces, excepting prince Malûk, and two or three of his guards. Mean time the Amîr Akbûga, from Herât, who had besieged Tûs, took it ; and, though Haji Bey fled, he was seized at Semnân in Kûmes ; and, being sent to the Mîrza, was put to death.

Timúr
marches
Hej. 791.
A. D. 1389.

MEAN time Timúr was prevailed on by his lords to quit the farther pursuit of Toktamîsh Khân for the present, and turn his arms against Kezra Kojâ Aglen (king of Jetab) and Ankatûra. He parted from Alkûsûn in 791, and took the road of mount Urnak (I) ; beyond which, being in great want of water, they found in the desert a vast meadow covered with ice and snow, though in the midst of summer, which relieved both men and cattle. Having hunted at Aygber Yali (on the river Tik), they at length came to the town of Shipar Aygber : where they defeated 1000 horse belonging to Ankatûra, who, they learned, was at Uronk, or Uronkyar, another town of Jetab. The army halted thither : but, the guide having lost his way in the night, Timúr next day divided it into two bodies ; one he kept himself ; and gave the other to the Mîrza Omar Sheykh, to seek the enemy. After passing through many towns and villages, he encamped at Karaguchûr, a temple of the Mungls ; while the Mîrza, taking another road, at length came up with Ankatûra, at the town of Kûbâk : where he defeated and made him fly to Kalkamaburji (K) ; leaving to the victor his cattle and daughters, who were exceeding beautiful ^a.

into Jetab ;

ON his return, he was ordered to go in quest of part of the army sent out before on another occasion. He was accompanied only with fifty persons, but they were all princes, Amîrs, and generals. When he arrived at the plain of Ichmas Alagheul (L), they met with 800 of the enemy's horse ; whom, though six to one more numerous, they defeated, after a bloody fight, and returned with their cattle to the camp at Karaguchûr. As Timúr staid here to fatten his horses, he detached 30,000 men toward Artish (M), in quest of the enemy. When they arrived at the Irtish (N), they marched along that river ; and many passed into the isles, and other places, where they slew and took a great number of prisoners, with their effects. At their return, the enemy decamped ; and, passing the great desert, after many days journey, arrived at Aymal Gîjû (capital of Jetab) (O) ; where he lodged in the palace of Saray Urdam, with great magnificence.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 315—328. c. 2—5.

(F) A spy tower in Kipjâk, mentioned before.

(G) Sarbedâl, or Serbedâl, signifies Head on the branch, because the factious among them hung their turbâns on branches of trees, in token of resolution. Twelve of them reigned forty-five years, from 737 to 788, in Sebz-avâr : the last of these kings was Koja Ali Muayd, who died in the camp of Timúr. La Croix.

(H) Perhaps, rather Gowri princes,

(I) The residence of Ogûz Khân, founder of the Mungl empire ; called also Urnak Lornak. La Croix.

(K) An antient castle on the frontiers of Jetab, and north of Turkestan. La Croix.—By Turkestan the author must mean here the country of Kâshgar in Little Bukhâria, which is so called at one time by the oriental writers, because Kâshgar was the residence of the Khâns of the Turks.

(L) A plain in Jetab, near the river Irtish, where there is a salt lake. La Croix.

(M) Artish, or Irtish, a town of Mogulestan. La Croix.—The same, perhaps, with Ardish, often mentioned in the reign of Jenghîz Khân.

(N) Formerly called Artish ; a river which runs thro' all the country of Jetab and Mogulestan, and falls into the Obi. La Croix.—By Mogulestan, is not to be understood the antient country of the Mungls, to the east of mount Altay ; but that part of Tartary, on the west side, possessed by the Elûths or Kalmûks.

(O) Capital of Jetab, and frontier of Mogulestan. La Croix.—It is difficult to fix the situation or bounds of these countries, according to this author, who seems often to vary in his description of places.

a AFTER this, Timûr, in order effectually to root out the Getes, divided his army into several bodies, under so many generals, who were to take different routes; being provided both with guides, and memoirs of the roads. The Mirza Omar Sheykh, crossing the mountain Dûbeshin Andûr (near the lake Artak gheul), went as far as Karakoja (P), three months journey of the Karawân from Samarkant: another party went to the town of Kara Arf, and valley of Shûrûjluk, in Mogulestân: Kodâdad Hussayni, with a body of 20,000 men, arriving at Bikût, by way of Urichû, towns in the same country, met with the tribes of Bulgaji and Ilker; whom they defeated, after a bloody battle, which continued for twenty-four hours. Those who escaped, fell into the hands of Timûr; who, with his guards and household troops, having taken the road of Oluk Kâl (Q), met them at the hill of Sichkhân Daban (R), and cut them to pieces. A fifth body went as far as Ligh and Gheveyar, towns in Mogulestân.

SEVERAL Amîrs, who had been ordered to follow Timûr in this expedition, after many days journey, came to Urdaban, a mountain of Jetab, near Great Bukhâria: then crossed the river Abeile (S), and arrived at Sutgheul (T). At length they advanced to Chicheklik and Balaykhân, towns of Mogulestân, which they plundered. When they came to that of Molzûdû, they met with Kezra Kojâ Aglen, king of Mogulestân, at the head of a great army: as they were much inferior to the enemy in number, they dismounted; and, tying the bridles of their horses to their girdles, let fly their arrows: they fought back to back, turning on all sides, without stirring out of the place for forty-eight hours; at the end of which, they made a treaty with the enemy, and retired to Yulduz, the place of rendezvous.

c WHEN Timûr, who was then at Keytû (U), heard this news, he joined the Tomân of Mahmûd Khân; and, passing by Konghez (V), arrived at Yulduz; where, chusing out the bravest men of his army, he crossed the river at Ulakianawr (X), and followed the track of Kezra Kojâ Aglen. After passing the great desert, he arrived at Karabûlak (Y); from thence he went to Tabertâsh (Z); and, coming to Kûshon Key (A), discovered the enemy's army, who fled under cover of the night; and, as they took different routes, many fell into the hands of Timûr's troops, and were slain. The emperor, having passed the mountain Nayrin Keutel, pursued the enemy as far as Karatâsh, another mountain: and thus constrained the king of Jetab to abandon his kingdom, after suffering infinite fatigues, and seeing all his warriors either slain or taken prisoners, as well as his wives and children, together with the inhabitants of this country: which besides was intirely ruined, as far as Kûlan Keutel (B), and the cattle all carried away.

d AFTER this, Timûr began his march homewards; and, when he came to Jalish, a town near Bikût, he divided the immense booty among his soldiers. From thence, passing by the town of Kajirtû, and mountain Bilajîr, he arrived at Yulduz (C), that is, the morning star; so called from the beauty of its fountains and pastures: a most delightful place. The grass there is so nourishing, that it fattens the leanest horses in a week's time. From thence the Mîrza Omar Sheykh was sent home, by the way of the iron gate, named Koluga; beyond which he met the prince Kublik, one of the great Amîrs of the Getes, whom he defeated with great slaughter; and, being taken, his head was cut off, according to the laws of Jenghîz Khân. The Mîrza, having seized his effects, and exterminated his subjects, continued his route by Kûzân (D), Ucheferman (E) and the great city of Kâshgâr (F); from whence at length he arrived at Andekbân.

e TIMUR, having finished his expedition against the Getes, left Kechik Yulduz, or the Lesser Yulduz, in order to return, after a march of above 1000 leagues. When he came to markant.

* Hist. TIM. BEK. p. 328—338. c. 5, & seq.

(P) A town in Mogulestân, called also Aramuth. La Croix.—Aramuth is in Little Bukhâria, near Turfân.

(Q) The great stream of the river Irtish. La Croix.

(R) Daban signifies a mountain. La Croix.

(S) It runs into the Sibûn. La Croix.—We rather conjecture it to be the river Ili, on which the Khân of the Elûbs used to encamp, as we have observed before, p. 509, note (I).

(T) A town on the bank of the great lake of sweet water. La Croix.

(U) A town of Mogulestân, near the Irtish. La Croix.

(V) A town of Mogulestân, on the shore of the great lake Atrak Gheul. La Croix.—It signifies the lake of the Turks. Perhaps the same called above Artak Gheul.

(X) A passage over the river Ankora, in Mogulestân. La Croix.

(Y) A famous fountain at the foot of the mountain Benghiar. La Croix.

(Z) A village dependent on Karakorum. La Croix.

(A) A village in Mogulestân, frontier of Kalmâk. La Croix.—This author places Kalmâk to the north of the river Amûr or Saghalian.

(B) A mountain at the extremity of Mogulestân, towards China. La Croix.

(C) Distant from Samarkant two months journey of the karawân, or 480 leagues, at the rate of eight leagues per day. It is called Cyais, in the travels of Benedict Gots the Jesuit to Katay; and is in the road from Russia to China. La Croix. This is called the Greater Yulduz.

(D) A town of Tchet, or Tibet. La Croix.—His route could not, in our opinion, lie near that country.

(E) A town of Turkestan. La Croix.—That is, of Kâshgâr.

(F) Capital of Turkestan. La Croix.—Properly capital of the country of the same name: but the Khâns of the Turks having resided there for some time before the reign of Jenghîz Khân, it has been called the capital of Turkestan, of which it made a part.

Oluk Yulduz, or the Greater Yulduz (G), he made a magnificent entertainment for the generals and officers of his army; on whom he bestowed robes of honour, and belts adorned with precious stones. Then setting forward the sixteenth of Sbaabân, he arrived at Samarkant the seventh of Ramazân, that is, in twenty-two days, though reckoned two months journey by karawân. In winter he went to Bokbâra; and passed the season at Gbeul-ferketi, near that city, where he took the diversion of fowling; the ponds being stocked with an incredible number of swans, and other kinds of birds. Here he gave the princess Soltân Bakt Begüm, widow of Mireke, to the Amîr Soleymân Shâb; and married the young Mîrza Abûbekr to the daughter of the Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn: but the joy on these occasions was allayed by the death of Kudak Khûtân, his father's widow.

Political regulation.
Hej. 792.
A. D. 1390.

WHEN the winter was over, Timûr went to encamp at Akiar, in the meadow of Kash, on the bank of the river Koshka (H). As the officers were become very rich by the spoil they had gotten in the wars, he thought it advisable to augment the regiments; that, by increasing the expences of the commanders, he might diminish their wealth, which might seduce them from their obedience. For this purpose, he assembled the Kûrûltay in 792: which being over, he gave the grandees another magnificent feast; and, on this occasion, married his grandson, the Mîrza Omar Sheykh, to the princess Sevinj Kotluk Aga, daughter of Sheyrin Bey Aga, who was very handsome. After this, he dismissed the assembly, and returned to Samarkant: but, in a few days, came down to the meadow of Ilgazigaj, without that city.

Kamro'ddîn pursued.

AT the beginning of the same year, the emperor sent an army into the country of the Getes, under the command of the Amîrs Soleymân Shâb, Kodadad Hussayn, Shams'o'ddîn Abbâs, and his brother Ozmân. Having crossed the Sibûn (or Sir) at Tâshkunt, they marched to Iffigbeul (I), and from thence to Gbeuktopa (a hill mentioned before); from thence they took the road of the mountain Arjakû (K), destroying the country, slaying or enslaving the people, and carrying away their effects. Thus they went thro' all the provinces of the Getes, and advanced as far as Al Mâlegb; where, having swam over the river Abeile (L), they arrived at Karatâl, a hord belonging to Ankatûra. There being informed that 400 men, detached before to get intelligence, had met with Kamro'ddîn; that most of the soldiers on each side were slain, and that the said prince had marched towards Ichna Buchna (M), they departed in search of him; and, having passed thro' that town, arrived at Uker Kaptaji, another; where they left their baggage, and rode post towards the Irtish. When they came to that river, they learned that Kamro'ddîn had crossed it, and was gone towards Tawlas (N), into the woods, where fables and ermins are found. The Amîrs passed the Irtish in the rafts and boats which the enemy had left behind; and marked the pine-trees with the fire of their arms, as an evidence to succeeding ages of their conquests beyond that river. After they had been absent six months, they returned by Altûn Kawrke, a town on the great lake of Atrak Gbeul (O), where there is a great road made along its banks.

Timûr invades Kipjâk.

Hej. 793.
A.D. 1391.

IN autumn Timûr got ready his troops to make war in Kipjâk. Having visited the tomb of Sheykh Maflabet, where many miracles are said to be wrought, he crossed the Sibûn at Kojend; and went to Tâshkunt, between Barsin and Chinas, with design to pass the winter in that city, where he lay dangerously sick for forty days. On his recovery, the Mîrza Mirân Shâb arrived with the troops of Khorassân; and, on the twelfth of Safar 793, Timûr began his march, conducted by Timûr Kotluk Aglen, son of Timûr Mâlek, Khân of Kipjâk; Konje Aglen, another prince of that country; and Aydekû Uzbek. He left the Mîrzas Pîr Mehemed and Shâb Rukh to govern the empire of Jagatay in his absence; and sent away all the ladies, excepting his favourite Soltâna Chulpan Mulk Aga, daughter of Haji Bey, of Jetab.

Refuses to withdraw.

WHEN they arrived at Kara Suman (a town of Kipjâk), ambassadors arrived from Toktamîsh Khân, with a letter; and presented him with a shonkar (P), and nine very fleet horses. Altho' Timûr took the bird in his hand, he shewed the ambassadors no marks of a good reception. In answer to their master's letter, which begged pardon for what was passed, and promised submission for the future; after reproaching his ingratitude, and breach of oath, he said, Toktamîsh was not to be trusted: however, that, if he sincerely desired peace, he should send

^c Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 338—347. c. 7—9.

(G) That mentioned before.

(H) It runs into the Tûm, which falls into the Jikûn.
La Croix

(I) A lake near Berket, in Jetab.

(K) In Jetab, near Al Mâleg. La Croix.

(L) Which discharges itself into the Sibûn. La Croix.
—But Al Mâleg is at a great distance from that river: which circumstance seems to confirm what we have said in a former note, concerning the river Abeile.

(M) A town of Turkestan. La Croix. This is Turkestan in the large sense before-mentioned.

(N) A town of Tartary. La Croix.—Frier William de Rubruquis, mentions a town, in his journey thro' Tartary, called Talas; but whether the same with this, we cannot determine.

(O) In Turkestan, on the borders of Mogulistan. La Croix.

(P) A bird of prey, described, p. 249.

a Ali Bey, his first minister, to treat with his great Amîrs. He then regaled them, and gave them vests of gold brocade. They were ordered to follow the army; which, March the fifth, set forward to conquer the empire of Tusbi. They passed by Tassi, Karachob (Q), and Sabrân: but, in three weeks, for want of water, the horses were reduced to extremity. At length, on the twenty-sixth, they arrived at Sarek Uzan, where, the river being high, their want was supplied. Having swam over the stream, they continued their march in the great desert; and encamped in places where there were wells, to avoid the like inconvenience. Here two servants fled to the enemy.

ON the ninth of April they came to a mountain called Kuchek Tâk; and, in two nights and one day, to Ulûk Tâk (K); from whence he viewed the vast desert of Kipjâk, which, for its extent and verdure, looked like the sea. There he ordered a stone obelisk to be erected, with the date of his expedition cut thereon. From thence they hunted to the river Ilanjûk (*), which they crossed; and, in eight days, arrived at Anakargû (a tribe in Kipjâk). In all this six or seven months march from Tâshkunt, they had not met with a single man, or any cultivated land. Victuals were now extremely scarce: and a pound of bread sold for sixty-seven dinârs Kopeghi; so that they were forced to hunt for their food. Among other game, they found a sort of stags, larger than buffalos, called Kandagay by the Mungls, and Buken by the Kipjâks. After this hunting, Timûr reviewed his army: on which occasion the custom is, for every commander to pray for the emperor on his knees, and speak an elogium in his presence. Among the rest, we are told, that having advanced towards the regiment of Mahmûd Khân, this general (S) spoke as usual, and gave presents to the emperor; who, in his turn, caressed and praised him for the good order of his troop.

WHEN the review was over, Timûr resolving to send a general to command the mangalay, or van-guard, the young Mîrza Mehemed Soltân fell on his knees, and besought his father to honour him with that post. The emperor, much pleased with his resolution at so tender an age, granted his request; letting him, at the same time, know: "That he had need of great presence of mind, a strong constitution, and perfect activity, to acquit himself of an employ which was the principal part of war, and on which the security of the army intirely depended." On the twenty-fourth of April, the hour being fixed by the astrologers, the Mîrza put himself at the head of the scouts, to go in quest of the enemy. They found a beaten road, and fires in many places: then passed the river Tûpal (T); but no signs of an enemy. At length they met with ten troopers in a wood, who gave them tidings of Tokatmîsh Khân. After passing several lakes and rivers, May the eleventh they arrived at the river Tîk (U); which the army were two days in swimming over, because Timûr suspected ambuscades at the three passages. Six days after, coming to the river Semmûr (W), the scouts heard the cries of the enemy; and one of them, being taken, declared that many of the ordas had encamped there, but had returned as soon as sensible of Timûr's approach.

THE emperor, on this advice, advanced in order; and, May the seventeenth, arrived at the river Ayik (X), (or Jaik), which the army crossed partly over a bridge, and partly by swimming. Three of the enemy, who were taken, related, that the two fugitive servants above-mentioned first informed Tokatmîsh Khân of Timûr's invasion: that the Khân, enraged at this news, said, he would raise two armies; and sent to assemble troops from his camp, then at Kerk Gheul (Y): that, expecting Timûr would cross the Tîk at the ordinary passages, he lay there in ambuscade to surprise him. After receiving this account, the emperor marched with great precaution, and had lines drawn round the camp every night. The army was greatly fatigued with passing the sloughs and marshes they met with in this country. At length three regiments of the enemy came in view, but soon disappeared: however, the scouts found a troop of horse in a wood; who making resistance, many were killed, and forty taken. They had repaired to Kerk Gheul, according to proclamation; but, to their surprise, finding no troops assembled at the place of rendezvous, they wandered in the woods: after making this discovery, they were all put to death. At length they brought the son of the prince of Memak (Z), who had been wounded. He said, he was on the road to Saray (capital of Kipjâk), to meet the Khân; but did not find him at the rendezvous, nor could give any account of him^f.

^f Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 347 - 366. c. 9—12.

(Q) A town of Kipjâk, between Yenghikunt and Sabrân. La Croix.

(R) (That is, the little and the great mountain). They are in Kipjâk, between the rivers Arch and Ilân-juk. La Croix.

(*) Which runs into the river Tîk. La Croix. — This seems to be the Yem.

(S) So that the Khân was one of Timûr's generals, and behaved as a subject.

(T) Which falls into the Tîk. La Croix.

(U) A river of Kapshâk, or Kipjâk, which falls into the Caspian sea. La Croix.

(W) It falls into the Tîk. La Croix.

(X) Or Jaik, a river which falls into the Caspian sea. La Croix.

(Y) A lake in the country of Nagaya in Kipjâk, between the Volga and the Jaik. La Croix.

(Z) A province bordering on that of Saray in Kipjâk. La Croix.

Meet the scouts.

MEAN time the scouts, ascending a hill, discovered thirty companies of horse in armour, watching to surprise the invaders; and then retired without noise: while Aykutmûr staid behind with some horse, farther to view the enemy; who, observing what had passed, fell upon him full-speed. The valiant Amîr made a brave resistance: but, having two horses shot under him, he was surrounded on foot, and cut in pieces by the Kipjâks, who did not know him. His death was followed by that of Heri Mulk, son of Yadghiar Berlûs; the famous Ramazân Kojâ; and the celebrated Mehemed Erlât; who were the greatest captains Timûr had: but their death was soon revenged; for the army, advancing, attacked, and put them to flight, with great slaughter. After this, the scouts of the enemy appeared, and skirmished every day with Timûr's soldiers. At length the two armies coming in sight, on the fifth of July, that monarch ranged his army with great care, dividing it into seven bodies: and, as this was never practised before among his troops, 'twas believed to be done by special inspiration.

Order of battle.

THE emperor gave the command of the first body, which served for the van-guard, to Soltân Mahmûd Khân; and the Amîr Soleymân Shâh was his lieutenant-general. He placed the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân at the head of the second division, which passed for the main body. The third, which served as the rear, or body of reserve, consisting of the regiment of guards, and twenty companies of select veterans, was conducted by Timûr himself; and posted behind the second body, to reinforce the other divisions, in case of need. At the head of the fourth, which served for a right wing, was the Mîrza Mirân Shâh; whose lieutenant-general was the prince Mehemed Soltân Shâh. The fifth body, designed as a van-guard to the said right wing, was led by the Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn, who usually engaged in the most dangerous enterprises. The sixth, consisting of the troops of Andekhân, composed the left wing, and had for its leader Mîrza Omar Sheykh. Lastly, the seventh body served for a van-guard to the left wing, and was commanded by Birdi Bey, son of Sâr Buga, and by Kodadad Hussayn, Amîrs of undaunted bravery, and approved conduct. The army of Tokatmîsh Khân, which exceeded that of Timûr's by some companies, was divided into three bodies, as usual. His officers were all princes of the blood of Tusbi, and his soldiers completely armed. The battle began at the sound of the great trumpet Kerrenay (*). Timûr prayed to God devoutly for success, and Seyd Bereke promised him victory.

The fight begins.

THE Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn was the first who rushed on the enemy's left wing, and overthrew it. A party of Kipjâks advanced, to attack his rear; but were forced to return, by Jebân Shâh Babâdr, who marched against them with his regiment, out of the body of reserve. Mean time, the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, with the right wing, put their cavalry into confusion, and overthrew their left wing; while Mehemed Soltân, with the main body, broke through that of the enemy. Omar Sheykh, with the left wing, did great execution; and Birdi Bey, with Kodadad Hussayn, put their right wing to flight. The other generals had no less success. Tokatmîsh Khân observing how his troops diminished; and finding he could not withstand the squadrons which Timûr commanded in person, attacked the Mîrza Omar Sheykh: but though to no purpose, yet he after fell on the Orda of Seldûz, with such fury, that, for all Sheykh Timûr Babâdr's brave resistance, the Kipjâks had nearly defeated him, rushing into the middle of the squadrons; and were about to post themselves behind the imperial army, with a resolution to keep their ground, and gain the victory.

Tokatmîsh
Khân defeated.

TIMUR, who was in pursuit of the enemy's main body, being informed of this, turned his troops on that side: but as soon as Tokatmîsh Khân, whom Omar Sheykh had already engaged, perceived the imperial standard moving towards him, he lost courage, and fled. The other generals following his example, the Mungl army was intirely routed; while the victors pursuing, made a dreadful slaughter of them, for forty leagues together. The emperor, having returned the Deity thanks for this great victory, and received the compliments of his generals, detached two thirds of his cavalry, to destroy the remainder of the enemy; whose flight being obstructed by the river Wolga, very few of them escaped the swords of their pursuers; who carried away their women, children, baggage, and other effects. After this, Konje Aglen, Timûr Kotluk Aglen, and Aydekû, three princes of the blood of Tûsbi, who bore an antient hatred to Tokatmîsh, from whom they had fled, obtained leave of Timûr to go in quest of the tribes which they formerly commanded, promising to bring them over to his service: but Konje only, who was very familiar with the emperor, returned with part of his subjects whom he found: the other two, aspiring to the crown of Kipjâk, fled, with their clans, into the desert.

Great rejoicings.

MEAN while, Timûr, following the troops which he had sent in pursuit of the enemy, arrived at the Wolga, and incamped in the plain of Urtûpa; which, for its verdure and pure air, surpasses all others. Here he gave a magnificent feast to his Amîrs, at which was sung and played a piece of music, called the triumph of Kipjâk. This plain was the seat of Tûsbi Khân, and his successors. All the army had a share in the diversions; and the twenty-six days spent in pleasure, made the soldiers forget all their past fatigues. As, after this victory, there remained no more enemies in the deserts, or the isles of Wolga, Timûr set forward on his return, followed by a great a train of captives. All the poor men in the service of the army, who before could scarce find sustenance, were now in possession of so many horses and sheep, that, not able to carry all away with them, they were obliged to leave part behind. However, they carried off the tents of Kipjâk; which are fixed with very little trouble, and need not be taken to pieces at decamping, being made portable, so as to be carried by dromedaries from place to place.

^a Hist. TIM. BÈK. p. 366—379, c. xii—xiv.

(*) Of a monstrous size, very deep sound, and heard several miles off,

WHEN the army arrived at the Tik, Konje Aglen, who but a little while before had returned, Timûr re- with his subjects, to the camp, now fled with them into the desert. Some days after the army turns. had crossed that river, Timûr, leaving the Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn, with other commanders, to conduct the body of the army, and baggage, went before, through the rest of the desert, to Sabrân and Otrâr; then, crossing the Sibân, arrived at Samarkant; where he was received b with the usual solemnity. After this, he began his journey for Tashkunt, and repassing the river, encamped in the great plain of Barsin, near that city; where, in the beginning of the year 794, the Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn arrived, with the troops: so that this important campaign Hej. 794. continued eleven months. Towards spring, the emperor returned to Samarkant, by way of A. D. 1332. Kojend; where he entertained the court with a general hunting; and appointed the Mîrza Pir Mehemed, son of Jebân Ghîr, governor of the kingdom which formerly belonged to the Great Soltân Mahmûd; that is, all the country from Gâzna and Kâbûl as far as Hindûstân; and from Kandabar to the river Indus (A), called in Persian, Ab Send.

As many princes and great lords begged leave of him to marry their children, he not only con- Marriages ce- fented, but, to let them see he shared in their joy, would also be present himself at their feasts. lebrated. c A royal banquet was prepared for this purpose, in the meadow of Kanigheul; where the tables were ranged like an army in order of battle, Timûr being placed at the head of them, on a throne of gold. The bridegrooms were on one side, and the brides on the other. To honour the occasion, the Mîrzas Pir Mehemed, and his brother Rustem, married the daughters of Kayâzo'ddîn Terkhân; and the Mîrza Abû Bekr, son of Mirân Shâh, espoused the daughter of the Amîr *Haji Sayfo'ddîn*¹.

WHILE Timûr was on his return from Kipjâk, he resolved to make an expedition into Irân Expedition (or Persia at large), to suppress the disorders which, during his absence, had gotten footing i into Irân. there. With this view, he sent into all the provinces, to assemble the troops, for a campaign of five years. When he was near Bokhâra, May 25th, he was seized with a distemper, which d held him till June 10th. The 6th of Ramazân (July 2) he departed, at the head of his troops, having sent the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân before, with the van-guard. He crossed the Jihûn (or Amû), at Amîya, and, by way of Makhân and Abiverd, arrived at Yaffi Daban; where, on the appearance of the new moon, he read the prayers of Bayrâm, which is the grand feast of the Musulmans. At Ilgazigaj Kabûshân (B), he joined the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, who commanded the body of scouts; and, at length, arriving in the territory of Astarabâd, encamped on the river of Jorjân (C); where Piri Pashâ, son of Lokmân Pashâ, paid his devoirs to his majesty.

THE army, after three days march from Astarabâd, came to a very thick wood, through Affairs of which they opened three passages, and insensibly arrived at Sâri (D); whence Seyd Kamâlo'd- Mazânderân. dîn, lord thereof, had fled to Seyd Râzio'ddîn, at Mahanasar. These are three towns, situated four leagues from Amol, on the shore of the Caspian sea: where they had built a fort on an adjacent hill, which joined the sea on one side; and, instead of ditches, was surrounded with precipices, washed for the space of a mile by the sea, which, in turbulent weather, flowed within the rocks. Round the wall, they had fixed great trees, so close together, that they served instead of a second wall. Hither the princes of Amol and Sâri, the rich inhabitants, and foreign merchants, retired, with their families and effects, confiding in the strength and inaccessibleness of the place. Timûr, informed of these particulars, passing the lakes and marshes, arrived, in three days, at Amol; where he ordered the Seyd Kayâzo'ddîn to go and advise his father to come to him.

f TIMUR, after ordering all the water in the cisterns of Amol to be spilt, followed with his army; which could march no more than three miles a day, because obliged to cut down trees, Mahanasar besieged, to render the marshes and sloughs passable. September 21, the scouts on both sides met, and fought. Three days after, the Seyd Kamâlo'ddîn Derâz, and Mûlâna Amâdo'ddîn, came, and implored pardon; which Timûr granted, on condition, that the Sharîfs, who commanded in all those quarters, should send him part of the goods of the inhabitants, and one of their children in hostage. The Sharîfs not liking these conditions, Timûr sent some officers, with the

¹ Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 379—386, c. 14—16.

(A) Otherwise called Ab-send (that is, river Send), and Mebrân. It springs from the lake of Behre, near Lâhor, in Hindûstân. La Croix.

(B) A village between Asiwerd and Astarabâd. La Croix.

(C) It passes by a city of the same name, and falls into the Caspian sea (at Astarabâd). La Croix.

(D) A city of Ghilân. La Croix.—Rather of Mazân-derân.

masters of the barks of the Jibûn, to seize the enemy's vessels; which they did; and carrying a the soldiers, by squadrons, to the foot of the walls, they besieged Mabanasar in form. Those who defended the out-works being soon obliged to fly into the place for safety, the soldiers at the same time scaled the walls.

and surrendered.

Cruel majsacres.

Irâk invaded.
Hej. 795.
A. D. 1393.

ON the 25th of November, the enemy observing Timûr to approach the place on horseback, through fear, came out in companies, and implored his protection; which appeased his wrath. After this, he made them presents, and exhorted them to embrace the orthodox sect of the Sunni, in whose maxims he instructed them, and to renounce the errors of the Shiay, which they followed. Timûr staid some days at Mabanasar, to dispose of the great riches, which were lodged there, amog his soldiers; and then ordered the place to be reduced to a heap of rub- bish. After this, he commanded all the Fedais (E), who were very numerous in this coun- b try, to be put to the sword; which was accordingly done. Thus the province was freed from the disorders which those assassins caused there: for, if they found a man who had a paper or book in his possession, no matter whether a lawyer, philosopher, or man of letters, they held it lawful to put him to death. Eskânder Sheyki, to revenge the death of his father, and other relations, slain by the Darvîshes, disciples of Seyd Kawâmo'ddîn, invested Amol, that no man might escape his wrath; and made the most terrible massacre in that city ever mentioned in history. Seyd Kamâlo'ddîn, and his son, were sent in a vessel to Karazm; the Seyds Mûr- tâza and Abdallah, with their sons, and several others, were carried to Tâshkunt ^k.

THE province of Mazânderan being intirely brought under subjection; Timûr, in the begin- c ning of the year 795, caused a fine palace to be built at Shasman, in the neighbourhood of Jorjân, and lodged there. At the end of winter, he prepared to continue his conquests; and fixed the campaign of that year for the kingdoms of Pars and Irâk. He departed from Mazânderân the 20th of January: having sent the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, at the head of the van-guard, accom- panied by his brother Pîr Mehemed, the Sheykh Ali Babâdr, and other Amîrs. He gave the command of another van-guard to the Mîrza Shâb Rukh; and went himself to Yilâk Veli (F). The Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, and his brother, on their arrival at Kazvîn, defeated, and took prisoner, the governor Shâb Souar. On their approach, the governor of Soltâniya fled. They garrisoned the place, and marched towards Bâghdâd. In the way, a courier brought an order for them to reduce all the inhabitants of Kurdestân, and free the country from those robbers. Hereupon the Sheykh Ali Babâdr was sent with a body of troops upon that expedition, accom- d panied by one of the chief men of the country, who offered to be his guide.

IBRAHIM SHAH, prince of those places, received Sheykh Ali very friendly, and sent his son Soltân Shâb with presents to the princes; who, content with this submission, ordered Sheykh Ali to return. He accordingly began his march: but, on the road, his guide, frustrated of his hopes, by his peace with Ibrahim Shâb, treacherously slew him with a knife, as he was eating. The assassin was immediately seized by Sheykh Ali's men, who put him to death, with the most cruel torments, and afterwards burnt his body to ashes.

Khûzestân
reduced.

MEAN time, Timûr, having proceeded from Yilâk Veli, by Damgân and Semnân, cities of Kîmes, to Ray Shûbriar, in Persian Irâk, there took a select body of men, and marched to Urûdjerd (G). He arrived there the 26th of February, and was joined by the Mîrza Omar e Sheykh, who had taken the road of Ava, the fortress of Kiow, Marvân, and Kerberûdh; all towns of Kûbestân, which submitted, excepting Kiow, but it was easily reduced. Timûr left a governor for Nahawend (H); and, three days after, arrived at Korramabâd (I), whose governor had fled. Then leaving troops to besiege the place, he sent parties of horse into all quarters of Lorestân, to root out the robbers; and departed for Toftar (K). In eleven days, he came to the bridge of the river Abzâl (L); and, when Mîrûn Shâb returned from Kashân (M), which submitted, sent Omar Sheykh to Havîza (N), which made no resistance, its gover- nor, for Mansûr, king of Fârs, being fled. The bridge over the Abzâl, which is built of stone and brick, with great beauty and strength, has twenty-eight lofty magnificent arches, each of which has a lesser. At the foot of it is a town, called Dezfûl, whose governor presented Timûr f

^k Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 386—396. c. 16—19.

(E) The same whom Europeans call assassins. La Croix.—They are called Ismaelians, Batani, and by other names, in the oriental historians. They seem to have been the reliques of those whom Hûlakû had extirpated about 100 years before.

(F) A town on a mountain, where the Amîr Veli used to pass the summer. La Croix.

(G) A city of Kûbestân, in Irâk, eighteen leagues from Hamadân. La Croix.

(H) Otherwise called Nûhâwend, a town of Kûbestân: built by Nûh, or Noah, on a mountain, fourteen leagues south from Hamadân, near Urûdjerd. Here Yazdegerd, the last king of Persia, was vanquished, in A. D. 638. La Croix.

(I) A fortress of Lorestân, near the town of Lor, and residence of the prince of Lorestân. La Croix.

(K) Capital of Kûzestân (a mistake for Khûzestân), between Fârs and Irâk Arabi. La Croix.

(L) A river which runs through Khûzestân, by Toftar; and falls into the Persian gulf at Hejn Mâbdi. 'Tis famous for an aqueduct a mile long, built by Shâbûr (or Sapores) king of Persia. La Croix.

(M) A town of Kûbestân, three days journey from Is- pâbân; where porcelain is dug, with which the walls and houses of the Persians are covered. La Croix.

(N) Corruptly so called, from Abwâz (which is the true name), a city of Khûzestân, on the river Abzâl. La Croix.

with

We have already mentioned, that, on Timûr's march to Fârs, in 1390, Soltân Zayn Alabo'd-Shâh Mansûr dîn, king of that country, retired to Shâh Mansûr, governor of Toftâr, who seized, and imprisoned him in the castle of Kerikerd, four leagues from that city: but at length escaping, by the assistance of friends, to Alek Azzo'ddîn Kerit, at Urûdjerd, this latter conducted him to Ispihân; of which he possessed himself, by means of the officers, who were in his interest; while Soltân Mehemed retired to the fortress, and, a month after, withdrew by consent. Then Shâh Mansûr marched with an army to Shîrâz; and, being let in by the Sharîfs, Shâh Yabîa retired to Tâzd. Soltân Zayn Alabo'ddîn, imagining that the Amîrs of Shâh Mansûr would come over to him, because most of them had raised themselves in his father's court, marched with a small army towards Shîrâz: but, being met near the fortress of Astakar (O) by Shâh Mansûr, was obliged to fly back to Ispâhân.

IN the following spring, this prince marched again to Ispâhân; and, as soon as he arrived, The city be- sent for one whom, 'twas presumed, he kept there to carry on his intrigues; for, the moment trayed.
he was gone, the inhabitants delivered up the city. The Soltân fled; but, being taken between Veramin and Shabriar, Shâh Mansûr ordered his eyes to be put out with a hot iron. After d this, he marched twice to Yazd: but, by the persuasions of his mother, left it in possession of Yabîa his elder brother. When Timûr encamped without Tostâr, this was the condition of the kingdom of Fârs (or Persia), to which there were no fewer than ten pretenders, all of the house of Muzaffer; who naturally delighting to make war upon one another, put the empire of Irân into great disorder: for which reason, Timûr resolved to subdue those turbulent princes, and restore peace.

HOWEVER, Timâr ascended the mountain; with his officers, to the gate of the fortress, followed by several troops. The two wings encamped on another mountain, which joined the place. Orders being given for a general assault, the army attacked the citadel on all sides. Next day, the attack was renewed; and the soldiers broke the rock with pickaxes, to clear the way. At length, Akbûga, an officer, mounting a steep rock, the enemy were so surprised to see themselves attacked in a place which they thought none dared to ascend, that they gave over fighting: so that the soldiers advancing on all sides, the fortress was taken, and the garrison precipitated from the top of the mountain. The governor Sadet was put to death; but he

he honoured the blind Soltân Zayn Alabeddin, who was kept here, and promised to avenge him on the cruel Mansûr. As for Akbûga, who first mounted the rock, and had but one horse before, he gave him so much silver, women, slaves, goods, horses, and other cattle, that, to his great surprise, he became a rich man at once.

Mansûr attacked.

THE 3d of May, Timûr set forward, in quest of Shâh Mansûr; and coming to Shîrâz, perceived, in the fields without the city, 3 or 4000 horse, armed with coats of mail, helmets, and breast-plates of leather, lined with iron; their horses covered with a kind of cuirasses made of thick silk, and their ensigns displayed. At the head of these men, inured to war, and expert archers, Mansûr advanced like a furious lion; and attacked Timûr's main body, composed of 30,000 Turks (T), the most dextrous men of their time: yet he overthrew their squadrons, broke their ranks, made way into the midst, and gained posts behind the army, posts of the utmost consequence. Then returning, furious as a dragon, to the fight, he ran directly up to Timûr, who had stopp'd, with fourteen or fifteen persons, to consider the extreme vigour of this prince; and, though he had not his lance at hand to oppose him, yet the emperor stood till Mansûr came up, and struck him twice with his simitar on the helmet, which warded off the blows. Then Adel Aktasbi held a buckler over Timûr's head, and Komari Yesaïl advanced before him: he did several great actions, and was wounded in his hand with a sword.

Killed by Shâh Rûkh.

SHAH Mansûr, having been repulsed from before the emperor, fell upon the infantry of the main body; while the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân so briskly attacked the right wing of the Persians, that it gave way, and being pursued, a terrible slaughter was made. The Mîrza Pîr Mehemed bravely defeated their left wing. Several regiments which were in the main body, having been routed by Shâh Mansûr, rallied, of their own accord; and the Mîrza Shâh Rûkh, who fought near Timûr like a lion, re-assembled a whole battalion of soldiers who fled. In short, this young prince, although but seventeen years old, behaved with so much valour and conduct, that he hemmed in the Shâh, cut off his head, and cast it at the feet of the emperor his father. This lucky accident so discouraged the Persian troops, who, till then had fought well, that they fled. But while Timûr, after returning God thanks for the victory, and embracing his sons, was presented, by the Amîrs, with the gold cup, according to the custom of the Mungls, they, on a sudden, saw a body of the enemy advancing behind to attack them: however, they were quickly repulsed, and cut to pieces in their flight^m.

Muzafferian princes slain.

AFTER this victory, Timûr made his triumphal entry into Shîrâz, and lodged in the gate of Sâlm, which alone of nine was left open. The treasures of Shâh Mansûr were then distributed among his Amîrs, and a ransom levied on the inhabitants. The like was done at Ispâhân. The princes of the family of Muzaffer, having no place to retire to, resolved, in good earnest, to submit, and made rich presents to the emperor; but the Sheykh, Doctors, and Imâms, with the chief inhabitants, of Fârs and Irâk, having presented him petitions, (in which they set forth the disorders brought in by the Muzafferian princes, and requested that his majesty would no longer trust the command of two kingdoms in the hands of those tyrants), he, in the middle of June, ordered those princes to be seized, loaded with chains, and their houses pillaged. He appointed governors in their room; placing over the kingdom of Fârs, which is the most full of cities, towns, and villages, of any country in Asia, his son the Mîrza Omar Shbeykb; and restored Pîr Ahmed to the government of the little kingdom of Lorestân, or Malamîr, of which Shâh Mansûr had deprived him. In fine, towards the end of June, being arrived at the village Kûmsba, near Ispâhân, he issued out that famous order, so remarkable in history, and much desired by the people, that the princes of the house of Muzaffer should be put to death (U); which was rigorously executed, according to the laws of Jenghîz Khân.

Yezidi destroyed.

TIMUR, after five days stay, left Ispâhân, and came, in two days, to Jerbâdekhân. Next night he arrived at Ankûan, whose inhabitants being atheists, had fortified themselves in caverns and rocks: but the army drowned them, by forming rivulets along the mountains, and then breaking down the banks, let the water descend in torrents into their lurking places. In July 10, he hunted in the plain of Parakan. The 13th, he decamped, and came to the meadow of Fûl Karkara. The 16th, took horse. And the 18th, encamped in the plain of Hamâdan; where, to divert the court, he gave a magnificent feast. After this, to recompense the services of the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, he invested him in the kingdom of Hûlâkû, giving him

^m Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 409—419. cap. 23—25.

(T) Turks, Moguls, and Tartars, are, by the author Sharifo'ddin Ali, used synonymously, as hath been already observed.

(U) These were Shâh Yabia, who reigned at Yazd; Soltân Ahmed, at Kermân; Soltân Mehdi, son of Shâh Shuja, and Soltân Gadanfer, who were at Shîrâz; Soltân Abu Is-hâk, who reigned at Kermân. In short, all the princes of that house were put to death, who could be found, excepting Prince Shah li, whose eyes had been put out by his father Shâh Shuja; and Zayn Alabo'ddin, blinded by Shâh Mansûr: these two were sent to Samer-kant, and had some of the best ground of that city assigned them for their maintenance.

- a the sovereignty of Azerbijân, Kûbestân (X), Shîrwân, and Ghilân; with their dependencies, and the adjacent countries, as far as Rûm, or Anatolia, subject to the Otmâns; on which occasion, the Mîrza gave his father a magnificent entertainment at Hamadân.

TIMUR departed from Hamadân the 3d of August; and being arrived at Kûlâghî, a town ^{Ghebrs mas-} of Kûrdestân, he led his troops against the robber Sarek Mehemed, the Turkmân; who had for-^{sacred.} tified himself in the mountains, where he had a citadel, called Habâshî. The soldiers got up

- b to the top of the mountain Aurmân, and fought so resolutely, that, in the night, the Turkmâns retired to other mountains: but were pursued, and numbers of them killed; their baggage likewise, and cattle, were seized. As there was another place in those parts, in which a great number of Ghebrs (Y) were gotten together, Timûr ordered it to be subdued. The siege lasted for some time: but, being at length taken, it was reduced to rubbish, and the people put to the sword. After this, the Mîrza Mirân Shâh took, and ruined, the castles of Kûrgan and Karûtû, in Kûrdestân. The court being arrived at Ak Bulâk (Z), spent the Ramazân there. When it was over, the great Mufti Nûro'ddîn Abdarâhmân, famous for his learning, came as ambassador from Soltân Ahmed Jalayr, of Bâghdâd, with offers of submission, and presents: which the emperor did not receive after his usual kind manner; because he suspected Ahmed's sincerity, in regard the prayers were not read, nor money coined, at Bâghdâd, in his name.

- HOWEVER, Timûr honoured the Mufti for his merit: but dismissed him, without any posi-^{Timûr} tive answer; because he resolved to besiege Bâghdâd: towards which city, he began his march ^{marches} October 3d. He marched day and night, to encamp at Yan Bulak (A). Thence he went to Kûra Kurgan (B); and, next morning, met Mehemed, prince of the Turkmâns, whom he routed, at the head of 100 horse. At Shâbrzûr (C), he marched in a litter, conducted by choice men, through narrow passages, between steep mountains. When he got to Ibrakîm Lîk (D), he inquired of the inhabitants, whether they had sent pigeons to Bâghdâd, to give notice of the approach of his army? and, on their answering in the affirmative, made them write another billet, importing; that the dust, which they had perceived at a distance, was caused by the Turkmâns, who fled to avoid Timûr. This letter was tied under the wing of a pigeon, which immediately fled to its house at Bâghdâd. But although this advice gave Soltân Ahmed fresh courage, yet he did not intirely confide in it; having, on the receipt of the first, ordered

- d his furniture to be carried over the Tigris ⁿ.
THE 10th of October, when Timûr arrived at Bâghdâd, the Soltân had already crossed the ^{to Bâghdâd} river, broken the bridge, and sunk the boats, flying by the way of Hilleb (E). The Tatar troops, who covered near two leagues of ground, cast themselves into the water, with a great cry, and passed the Tigris, notwithstanding its rapidity. Timûr went ten leagues in pursuit of the Soltân, and then returned to Bâghdâd, at the intreaty of the Amîrs, who continued their route. Observing, when they arrived at the Euphrates, that the Soltân had broken the bridge, and sunk the boats, they marched along the shore, till they found four boats, and then crossed it, with the army: but the horses of the soldiers being fatigued, the Amîrs were obliged to pursue the Soltân themselves. They first came up with his baggage, and at length overtook

- e him, in the plain of Kerbela, with near 2000 horse, 200 of whom turned on the Amîrs; who, getting off their horses, shot their arrows, and thus repulsed them twice. The third time they returned to the charge, with great vigour: many were killed on both sides; and the Amîrs pursued them no longer.
THAT day being extremely hot, and the plain of Kerbela (F) affording no water, the soldiers ^{Soltân Ahmed} expected to perish for want of drink. On this occasion, Aybaje Aglen and Jalâl Hamid sent ^{flies.} men to seek for water, who could get no more than two pots full; and as Aybaje drank one without quenching his thirst, he told Jalâl, that, unless he gave him his pot also, he should certainly die with drought: hereupon the Amîr generously yielded him the water, yet escaped death himself; which action, when told to Timûr by Aybaje, at their return, greatly pleased

- f him. They then departed, and came to Mashbâd, where Hussayn, son of Ali, was slain: every one kissed the place of the holy gate, and paid his devotion. After this, they returned,

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 419—472, c. 25.—30.

(X) Instead of Ray, Derbend, and Bakû, as in the original, we have inserted Kûbestân; which signifies the mountain country, and answers to Jebûl of the Arabs; being the same with Persian Irâk: or, in a more limited sense, the north-eastern part, of which Ray was the capital.

(Y) Adorers of fire, professing the antient religion of the Persians.

(Z) (Or the white fountain), a town near Erbel, or Arbela, in Kûrdestân. La Croix.

(A) A village near the same place. La Croix.

(B) A town of Kûrdestân, near the Shâbrzûr. La Croix;

(C) A city of Kûbestân, frontier of Kûrdestân. La Croix.—It at present belongs to Kûrdestân.

(D) A place of devotion (on the Tigris), twenty-seven leagues north of Bâghdâd. La Croix.

(E) Or Hellab, and Hellab Bani Mazid: a city of Irâk Arabi (on the east side of the Euphrates), between Bâghdâd and Kûfa. La Croix.

(F) A plain on the || (west side of) Euphrates, where Imâm Hussayn, son of Ali, was slain by Moawwîya, first Khalifah of the house of Ommîyah. La Croix. Hussayn's tomb is in the plain, a place of pilgrimage with the Persians.

having taken prisoner Alao'ddawlet, son of Soltân Abmed, who fled towards Syria, and some other of his children; besides his wives and domestics, slaves and spoil.

The Kûrds suppressed.

ABOUT the same time the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân returned from his expedition against the Kûrd robbers; whom he so effectually reduced to obedience, or exterminated, that one or two men might travel safely thro' their country: whereas, before, large Karawâns, guarded by 100 archers, were obliged to take by-roads. Soon after, he was sent governor to Wâset (G), and the Mîrza Mirân Shâh to Bafrab. The Soltân's wives and children, with all the learned men of Bâghdâd, and masters of arts, were conveyed to Samarkant. After Timûr had sent ambassadors to invite Mâlek Azzaher (H) Barkok, Soltân of Egypt and Syria, to a treaty of amity; he set out, November 11th, for Takrit, a place on the Tigris, esteemed impregnable, to destroy the robbers who were harboured there: for, the delivering of the countries from such pests, was one chiefend of his expedition. He got thither, by the way of Annab (I), on the 20th. The town was built on a high rock near the river: the passages were closed up with stones laid in mortar; and it was so well fortified, that it could never be taken by force^o.

Hej. 796.
A. D. 1393.

Takrit attacked,

THE Amîr Hassan, who commanded there, sent several times to offer submission; but still feared to come out. Mean while the soldiers, having advanced to the foot of the wall, fell to fapping; the whole army, consisting of 72,000 men, being employed in the work. At length part of the walls fell down; but the besieged repaired this great breach, and fought desperately. December the sixth, fire being set to the wooden props, most part of the walls fell on a sudden, with a great tower. Yet still the robbers, armed with planks, and great bucklers, continued to defend themselves against the soldiers; who advanced to the very middle of the place, where there was a most bloody battle. Hereupon Timûr ordered the rest of the walls to be undermined, which bringing down a considerable bastion, Hassan was terrified, and retired with his soldiers to the edge of the mountain. Some of the besieged, seeing this, came out, beseeching the Amîrs to intercede for their lives: but Timûr answered, Let him come, or not; no quarter shall now be given. The soldiers, animated by these words of the emperor, at length got to the top of the rock; and, seizing the Amîr Hassan, and those about him, brought them bound neck and heels to Timûr: who ordered the soldiers to be separated from the inhabitants, and put to death. He likewise ordered part of the walls to be left standing, for posterity to wonder at his performance; while towers were built with the heads of those robbers, for a terror to others.

and taken.

Marches to Koha.

AFTER this, Timûr returned, December 17, to Harbi, a town between Annab and Takrit, which was the rendezvous of all the troops; and, when all those had joined who were out on other expeditions, he departed for Diyârbekr. At crossing the Tigris, he caused a report to be spread, as if he was on his return home, that the enemy might be less on their guard. He marched to Tûk, and then to Karkûk (K), where the princes in all those parts came and submitted to him, especially he of Altûn Kûpruk. The 20th, he arrived at Erbel (or Arbela), and from thence marched to Mûssel (or Muzol). There he visited the tombs of the prophets Jonas and Georges, giving 20,000 dinârs Kapeji for raising domes over them, with much alms to the poor. Then taking Yar-ali, prince of that place, for his guide, departed. He passed by Mardîn; and, at Râs al Ayn (L), sent to pillage the lands, subject to Hussayn, called the Black Sheep, and other princes. On his approach to Roba (M), its prince, named Gbûzel, fled with some inhabitants to a high mountain; but they were pursued and taken. Timûr entered the city said to be built by Nimrod; and, with his court, bathed in the fountain, which (as the Mohammedans believe) sprang up in the place of a furnace wherein Abraham had been cast, and quenched the fire.

A. D. 1394.

Omar Sheykh
slain.

THE emperor spent nineteen days at Roba in plays and entertainments, while several princes came and submitted; among the rest, the prince of Hesn Keyfa (N). But Soltân Aysa, prince of Mardîn, refusing to come as he had promised, Timûr marched back to reduce him; as he did. In his way, the princes of Arzîna, Batmân, and Al Jazîreb (O). On his approach, Aysa came out, and begged pardon; which was granted him. While the army lay before Mardîn, ^o Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 432—443. c. 30—33.

(G) A city of Irâk Arabi, on the Tigris, half-way between Bâghdâd and Bafrab; commonly called Bafsora and Balsora, near the mouth of that river, and the Persian gulph.

(H) This is the Persian pronunciation; Al Dbaber, or Addhaber, the Arabian; the Db being sounded like the English Th in the, this, &c.

(I) The capital of Desart Arabia, situate on both sides of the Euphrates. Timûr arrived there on the sixteenth.

(K) Towns of Mesopotamia. La Croix.—Rather of Kûrdestân.

(L) That is, the head of the fountain. Here are several springs, from whence the river Al Khabûr has its rise.

(M) Otherwise called Orfa, the ancient Edessa.

(N) A city on the Tigris, in Mesopotamia. La Croix. It was a very strong place; the castle built on a rock.

(O) The two first of these cities are in Kûrdestân; the last in an island of the Tigris, and ascribed to Diyârbekr; 'tis called Jazirat sbn Omar.

- a news arrived of the death of the Mîrza Omar Shейkh. This prince, who was the head general under his father when in Pârs, had reduced all that province, and then went to besiege Sirjîn in Nirmân: but, being sent for to court, left his troops before that city, and hastened to Shirâz. In his way through the country of the Kîrds, he stopped at Kormatûl, a little fort inhabited by a few people; and, getting on an eminence to view the place, was shot with an arrow in the vena cava, which killed him on the spot, in February 1394, when he was forty years old. The soldiers, to revenge his death, destroyed all who were in the place, and razed it to the ground. The corpse was carried to Shirâz; and afterwards to Kasb, where it was interred. The kingdom of Pârs (or Proper Persia), was given by Timûr to the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, son of the deceased, although but sixteen years old.
- b ALTHOUGH Soltân Aysa came out of Mardin, yet his brother and the inhabitants refused to deliver up the place; which being found to be the effect of Aysa's orders, he was put in fetters: ^{Al Jazireh ravaged.} and there not being grass enough for the cavalry, Timûr deferred the siege for this time. In his way to Aspenj, such a terrible tempest of lightning and rain fell, that the horses were in water up to their ears; and the army were forced to remove their quarters, leaving all their baggage behind, for fear of being drowned themselves. This time Mâlek Azzo'ddîn, prince of Jazîreh, who had before submitted, refusing to deliver up an Amîr, who had stolen certain curiosities which Timûr was sending to his sons at Soltâniya; the emperor set out hastily with his troops, and, next day, coming on the enemy by surprise, took two or three fortresses, with a great booty. In the confusion, Mâlek fell into the hands of a soldier; who took from him many
- c valuable things, and, not knowing who he was, let him escape. Being thus driven out of Jazîreh, and that city, with his country, ravaged, the emperor returned to Mardin: and, investing it next day, assaulted and took the city, while the besieged fled into the fortress named Mardin Kûb, situated on the ridge of a mountain. The soldiers followed to the foot of the wall; ^{submit.} and, next day, getting on the mountain, which was level with the top of the wall, the besieged, finding themselves distressed thereby, came out with rich presents, and offered to pay a yearly tribute; which was the more readily accepted, as news arrived just then of the birth of a son, on April 9, to the heir of the crown, Mîrza Shâh Rukh, who was called Oluk Bey (P).
- d TIMUR gave Mardin to Soltân Saleb, brother of Aysa; and then set forwards, the army marching in several bodies, by different roads. The emperor took that of Sawr, accompanied by Mîrza Shâh Rukh; and, on his arrival at the Tigris, near that place, staid three days, with design to return to Alatâk (in Armenia): but receiving advice, from the Mîrzas Mehemed ^{Amid, or} Soltân and Mirân Shâh, that the inhabitants of Karâche Kôja (Q), commonly called Hamed, ^{Diyarbekr} refused to submit, he marched thither in two days and one night; the Tigris being so shallow, that the troops passed it on foot. The strength of this city consists in the height of its walls, which are built of free-stone; and in their thickness, which is such, that two horses may pass abreast on them. On the top of this wall, there is built another, the height of a man; and on both there is a terrace, on the outside of which there is another stone wall with battlements. Thus, as there are two storeys in this great wall, so, when it rains, or is either exceeding hot, or cold, the soldiers may fight in the lower storey. Besides, there are high towers fifteen cubits asunder; and, in the middle of the town, two fountains of rock water, with many fine gardens. These walls are said to have been built 4300 years; and that the place was never taken by force of arms: indeed the Khalîfah Kaled, son of Walid, after besieging it a long time, entered it, with some troops, by a common sewer, and made himself master of it.
- As soon as Timûr was encamped without the city, he ordered the assault to be given next ^{besieged and} day. The soldiers advanced, covered with their bucklers, and discharged a shower of arrows ^{taken.} into the place; while the besieged cast down abundance of stones on them. Mean time the miners carried on the sap; and, breaches being made in several places, the walls were scaled in different parts; so that the city was carried in less than three days, in the beginning of May. The soldiers, entering the place, pillaged it, and set fire to the houses; while most part of the garrison were killed in the breaches. The officers began to pull down the walls with axes, and other instruments: but, as they found it would be a tedious work to demolish any considerable part, they only beat down the tops. Timûr, the ninth of May, took the road to Alatâk: and, three days after, Yâik Sîfî, the greatest Amîr in the left wing of the army, next the princes of the blood, being accused by an Uzbek soldier with fomenting a rebellion, and designing to fly in the night, confessed his crime, and discovered his accomplices. As he had been often pardoned before for the like offences, and yet promoted by the emperor, his judges ordered him and his son to be laid in irons, and all his accomplices to be put to death.

P Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 443—457, c. 33—37.

(P) Some write Olug and Ulugh for Oluk; and Beg, Bek, or Buygh, for Bey. He reigned after his father, and was a great encourager of learning.

(Q) Hamed, or Amed, is called also Kara Amid, or Karâmid, 2nd Diyârbekr. La Croix. Hence Santon, in his maps, makes three cities of it.

Alenjik
besieged.

AFTER he had passed by Miyafarkîn, Batmân, Astima, and Sivâffer, he arrived, the nineteenth, at Sabra Mûfhi (R); and, passing some high mountains deep with snow, came to Betlis (S): whose prince, Haji Sharîf, the most courteous of all those in Kûrdestân, came to salute him, and make a present of fine horses. Timûr confirmed him in his possessions, honoured him with a vest, belt, and sword; and left Taîk Sûfi to be kept prisoner in his castle. Then, ordering the roads to be set down in writing, he sent a detachment to besiege Alenjik; at whose approach Kara Yûsef, with the Turkmâns, fled. Being come to Aklât (T), he gave Kakhân, prince of Adeliaws (U), the lordship of Aklât, with its dependencies, for ever. Then parting from the army, to meet the young princes and empresses coming from Soltânîyah, he passed by Alisgherd (W); and encamped the same evening at Uch Kiliffa, that is, the three churches of Alatâk (X), where he found them. On the twenty-fourth of June, he set out for Aydîn (or Bayezîd), whose inhabitants, presenting him with all their effects, begged quarter; which he granted, after blaming them for their remissness, and restored them all their goods. After this, he returned in one night to Uch Kiliffa; where Tabârten, governor of Arzenjân, came to pay his respects to him, and was honourably received^a.

Avenik, or Vân invested.

THE second of July, Timûr, resolving to make himself master of Avenik (or Vân), whose prince, Messer, son of Kara Mehemed (Y), refused to come to court, departed from Uch Kiliffa, and came to Alisgherd (or Malazjerd); from whence, passing by Kiosatak, in two days he arrived at Avenik. The soldiers immediately took the town, and razed the walls: hereupon Messer retired, with his Turkmâns, into the fortress, situated on a steep and craggy mountain, all the passages of which were blocked up and fortified; a wall being also built on one side, on the very edge of the mountain. The Amîrs, and bravest soldiers, alighted to attack the gate; while the horsemen, mounted as high as the walls, shot arrows on those who appeared on the breastwork. On the fifth, Messer sent his son and lieutenant, with considerable presents, to demand pardon; which Timûr granted: but, on their return, he renewed hostilities. After Tabârten had argued the case with him, he sent his son, and a near relation, with more presents, to ask pardon: but Timûr, perceiving he had no design to quit the place, caused the messengers to be arrested.

Timûr's
clemency.

HOWEVER, next morning, the emperor ordering Messer's son, who was but six years old, to be brought before him; he was so moved with the supplications of this young prince, that he said, "Go, my child; I will give your father his life, on condition that he appears before me." Then he gave the child a vest, and fixed a collar of gold about his neck; sending him back to Messer with a very obliging letter. When the besieged saw the young prince in this condition, they applauded the emperor; and murmured against Messer, who still would not resolve upon going out. However, the battering engines having beaten down several houses, Messer's mother came to beg quarter for her son; alledging his fears as the only cause of his opposition. Altho' Timûr promised to spare him, in case he left the place immediately, yet the Turkmân continued obstinate. At length a Meljûr, or hill made of earth and trees, being raised higher than the walls of the fortress, the place lay quite exposed to the engines. These poured in heaps of huge stones, which ruined the houses apace, and beat down the arches upon the soldiers heads. They were also reduced to such extremity for want of water, that, July the thirtieth, they turned out all the inhabitants who did not fight. Messer, therefore, in despair, sent his lieutenant once more to beg quarter; which was granted, provided he would repair to the camp: yet still that prince continued stubborn, or irresolute.

Messer
submits.

MEAN time Koja Shabin, and seven other brave soldiers, mounting one of the arches in the night, got to the foot of the walls of the place; and there lighting fires, to give notice, two Amîrs ascended the mountain in the same place, and came to a very narrow arch; where the besieged attacked them, tho' in the dark. Amânshâb Kazâneji, being dangerously wounded, returned to the camp: but Argûnshâb, and the rest, getting on another arch, above 300 cubits wide, arrived at the foot of the walls, which they began to sap. The officers and garrison seeing themselves thus hard pressed, some flung themselves off the mountain: while others exclaimed against Messer, flung down their arms, and begged leave to depart. Messer, to

^a Hist. TIM. BEK, P. 457—470. C. 37—43.

(R) A little town, with a fine meadow, two days journey in length; the same distance from Miyafarkîn, and three from Aklât (or Kelât). La Croix.

(S) A city near the lake of Vân. La Croix.

(T) Capital of Lower Armenia, or Kûrdestân, near the lake of Vân. La Croix.

(U) A town on the lake of Vân, between Arjish and Aklât. La Croix.

(W) Or Malazjard, a town of Kûrdestân (or Lower Armenia). La Croix.

(X) A town of Kûrdestân (or Armenia), where are the three churches of Achmiadzin, the seat of the patriarch of Armenia, near Nakshivân. La Croix.—Rather near Erîvân, from which it is distant three leagues to the south-west.

(Y) The Turkmân, founder of the dynasty of the Kara Kuyonlu, or Black Sheep, whose history will be given hereafter.

a appease them, sent his mother once more to beg his life. Timûr, touched with her affliction, said, that, for her sake, he would spare him, provided he came himself to ask pardon: yet Messer did not go out that day; and would have continued to defend himself, if his domestics had not quitted him, and leaped off the walls. Then, tying a handkerchief about his neck; and with a sword in his hand, he came out of the fortress; and, applying himself to the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, by his means obtained mercy. He was sent to Sâmârkant; and his treasures distributed among those who had behaved well in the siege. Timûr also conferred the principality of Arzerjân on Tabârten; presenting him, on that occasion, with a crown, and belt of gold enriched with precious stones.

b DURING these transactions, the army, which besieged Aydin, gave such considerable assaults, Bayezid that the Amir Bayezid (Z), prince thereof, demanded a truce; promising to depart as soon ^{surrenders.} as the forces should decamp from before the walls. The general Zirek Yakû consenting to the proposal, Bayezid went out in the night, without his knowledge; and, arriving at Timûr's camp, fell at the emperor's feet: who, pleased with his conduct, confirmed him in the principality, with a power to establish a governor in the town of Aydin^r.

c TIMUR, in pursuance of Mohammed's advice to his followers, to make war on those who ^{Georgia} profess a different religion from their own, set out to make war in Gurjestân, or Georgia, against ^{invaded.} Aksîka, prince of that country; and, having passed by the forests of Alatâk with a very numerous army, arrived at Kârs; where news was brought of the birth of prince Ibrahim Soltân, son of the Mîrza Shâh Rukb, on September the ninth. Next day Timûr decamped from the fine meadow of the Kârs, for the plain of Minék Gbeul (A). Shortly after, the Amîrs, whom he had sent into Georgia, having gained several battles, conquered great part of the country; and taken many strong places, returned with the spoils, and congratulated the emperor on the birth of his grandson.

d ON this occasion, a splendid banquet was prepared. The tents took up two leagues of ^{Splendid feast.} ground. Timûr's was under a canopy sustained by forty pillars, and as spacious as a palace. When every thing was ready, his majesty came, with the crown on his head, and sceptre in his hand, and sat on the throne, which was erected in the middle of the tent, adorned with precious stones; and a great number of the most beautiful ladies of Asia placed on each side, with veils of rich brocade, bedecked with jewels. The music was ranged in two rows; the voices on the right, and instruments on the left. Nine Chaus, or stewards, with golden wands in their hands, marched before the dishes which were served up: they were followed by cup-bearers, having in their hands crystal bottles and golden cups, with red wine of Shîrwân, white of Mazânderân, grey-coloured of Kosrwân, and water exceeding clear. Nor did the conversation of charming women, whose hair hung in tresses to the very ground, add a small lustre to this grand assembly; at which were present many foreign lords and princes from India and Greece. After this, the Mîrza Shâh Rukb set out for Sâmârkant, of which his father conferred on him the government.

e TIMUR's zeal for religion prompting him to make the war himself in Georgia, he entered Tokatmîsh the mountains, destroying all before him. The Kara Kalkânlik (that is, The Black Bucklers) Khân having fortified themselves in castles situate on very steep mountains, he marched into their lands, vanquished and put them all to the sword, seizing their effects. After reposing his army for some time, he marched to Téflis, capital of Georgia; and from thence to Sheki (B), from whence troops were detached to pillage the lands of prince Bertâz. A second body entered other mountains, called the Kûbestân of Georgia, governed by Sedi Ali, of Sheki, prince of the house of Erlât; who fled, and left his houses and effects to be destroyed by the enemy. But, while Timûr was harassing the Christians in this manner, news was brought, that the troops of Tokatmîsh, Khân of Kipjâk, had passed by Dârbend, and ravaged some parts of Shîrwân. Hereupon he immediately departed from Sheki, and arrived at the Ab Kûr (or river Kûr): but, on advice of his march, the enemy shamefully fled. When Timûr came to the plain of Mahmûd abâd, he encamped in that of Kalîn Gonbed, near the town of Fakîr abâd (in Georgia). There he sent for the empresses and princes from Soltânîya; and the Mîrza Mirân Shâh quitted the siege of Alenjîk to come to court; being informed, on the road, of the birth of a son, whom the emperor named Ayjel^r.

f WHEN winter drew towards an end, Timûr departed, March 10th, for Kipjâk, at the head ^{invades} of a powerful army, to make war on Tokatmîsh (or Toktamîsh) Khân; who, having re-established ^{Shîrwân.} himself in his kingdom, was daily making irruptions into the emperor's dominions, to repair the loss of his last defeat. Timûr, before this, had sent that prince a letter, to know his resolution, and reason for invading his territories; which, with the arguments of the embassador,

^r Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 470—478. c. 43—45.

^s Ibid. p. 478—487, c. 45—50.

(Z) Perhaps, from him the city took the name of Bayezid, which it at present bears.

(B) A city between Téflis and the river Cyrus (now Kûr). La Croix.

(A) A village near the mountain Jûli, in Georgia.

Shâmso'ddîn Almâlegbi, so wrought upon him, that he would have concluded a treaty, if his courtiers and generals, whose interest it was to make war, had not persuaded him against it. Shâmso'ddîn, at his return, found Timûr on the river Samnûr, which runs at the foot of mount Albûrz (C), reviewing his army; which extended from thence to the sea, five leagues distant, and was the greatest that had been since the time of Jenghîz Khân. Timûr, who was enraged at the rudeness of the answer, and impertinent reasons alleged by the Khân, marched in order of battle; and when the army had passed Dârbend, they surprised and cut to pieces the Orda of Kaytâg, which encamped at the foot of mount Albûrz.

Timûr meets
him.

HERE an ambassador from Tokatmîsh was coming to the camp; but, on sight of the army, he returned through fear. At Terki (D) word being brought, that the scouts of the enemy were encamped on the Koy (E), Timûr, with choice men, hastened in the night; and, surprising them in the morning, cut most of them off. Thence he continued his road to the Savenj (F), where he encamped; at the same time that the Khân, with a formidable army, encamped on the banks of the Terk (G), surrounded with waggons: but, on Timûr's approach, he returned back, either through fear, or to gain a more advantageous ground. While Tokatmîsh arrived at the Kûra (H), the emperor crossed the Terk, and marched towards the country of Kûlat (I), in quest of provisions. The scouts having brought advice, that the Khân had rallied his troops, and was marching by the lower part of the river, Timûr ranged his army in order; and, always preserving the rising ground, wheeled about to face the enemy.

Famous battle.

NEXT morning the two armies began to move. Timûr divided his into seven bodies, placing at the head of them those who had the title of Babâdr (or courageous); and the infantry before the cavalry, covered with their bucklers. The Mîrza Mehemed Soltân commanded the main body, strengthened with the bravest men of the army; while Timûr placed himself at the head of twenty-seven chosen companies, who composed the body of reserve. The battle began with showers of arrows, accompanied with the cries, Give and slay, Hold and take. After this, a great detachment from the enemy's right wing attacked the left wing of Timûr's; who, upon notice thereof, marched with his reserve, and forced them to fly: but, one of the companies pursuing them to their main body, they rallied, and made them retreat, in their turn, upon the other companies, who, by this means, were broken, and began to fly. The Kipjâks, willing to make their advantage of this disorder, advanced upon the others as far as where Timûr was posted, whom they boldly attacked; and, notwithstanding his vigorous resistance, in which he discharged all his arrows, and broke his half-pike to shivers, had hemmed him in, if the Amîr Shейkh Nûro'ddîn had not dismounted by him, with fifty others, and kept off the enemy with their arrows.

Timûr in danger.

THE emperor's danger brought more to his assistance: Mehemed Azâd, his brother Ali-shâh, and Tuzel Bawrshî, took three of the enemy's waggons, and joined them just before Timûr, to embarrass the enemy, and try to break the ranks. Allabdâd came with his faithful company; and, dismounting, placed himself near the Sheykh Nûro'ddîn. Hussayn Mâlek Kûchin and Zirek Yâkû arrived with their clubmen. The regiments of guards came also, with the horse-tail erected; and Ustoni, with his company, posted himself behind the guards. All these soldiers having dismounted, opposed the enemy; who made continual attacks on them, and performed actions of the utmost vigour. Kodâdâd Hussayn, who conducted the van-guard of Timûr's left wing, advanced between Konje Aglen, who commanded the enemy's right, and planted himself behind Aktâo, who boldly faced the emperor. Mean time the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân marched to the left of his father, with his recruits: who bravely rushed on the enemy, and, with their simetars and lances, routed their right wing, and constrained Aktâo to fly.

Bravely supported.

THE Amîr Haji Sayfo'ddîn, who commanded the van-guard of the right wing, found himself more pressed than the others: for he was inclosed by the enemy's left; so that, despairing of his life, he dismounted with his Tomân. But although the Kipjâks continually increased, and fell on with their lances and swords, yet Sayfo'ddîn's soldiers, holding their bucklers before them, did not cease repulsing them with their arrows; till Jehân Shâh Babâdr, coming to their assistance from another part of the field, fell impetuously with his Tomân on the enemy. Hereupon an obstinate fight began, and a horrible slaughter was made: but at length the van-

^t Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 487—495. c. 50—53.

(C) Or Albûrz Kûb; by which is to be understood the ridge of mountains called by Europeans Caucasus; some call it Albrûz and Brûz.

(D) A town of Dârbend, La Croix—It is the capital of Dâghestân, or Tâghestân, that is, the mountain country, on the shore of the Caspian sea, above 100 miles north of Dârbend.

(E) A river of Dârbend, near Terki [rather Daghestân], which falls into the Caspian sea. La Croix.

(F) A river between the Terk and the Koy, which falls into the Caspian. La Croix.

(G) The same as the Timenki, rising on mount Albûrz, and falling into the Caspian. La Croix.

(H) A river in Kipjâk, between the Kayfû and the Terk; it rises in mount Albûrz, and falls into the Caspian. La Croix.

(I) A fortress in Georgia, near Taûs, on the Terk. La Croix.

a guard of the Kipjâks left wing gave way. Mean time the Mîrza Rustem, son of Omâr Shейkh, tho' very young, rushed impetuously on the main body, and put them to flight.

THINGS being in this situation, Yâghlibi Babrin, a favourite and relation of Tokatmîsh, advanced with a Tomân of brave men, and called out to Ozmân Babâdr to meet him. Ozmân ^{Gains the victory.} advanced at the head of his Tomân, and attacked him: after they had broken their sabres, they seized on their war-clubs and poignards; then grappled like two enraged lions. The soldiers of their Tomâns imitated their chiefs, and fought hand to hand with great fury. At length Ozmân Babâdr overthrew his antagonist; and then fell on his troops with such vigour, that he intirely defeated them. All the other generals performed their duty so well, that, after a long and obstinate battle, they put the enemy into disorder; yet they were not certain of the defeat, till Tokatmîsh Khân shamefully turned his back, followed by the princes, and generals of his troops. On this, Timûr's soldiers rallied; and, joining together, fell upon the enemy, crying Victory! They slew a vast number, and afterwards hung up many of those whom they took alive.

TIMUR, finding himself sure of the victory, gave God thanks on his knees; received the congratulations of his officers; and, getting an exact information of all who had served well on this occasion, distributed his treasures liberally. Particularly, on the Amîr Shейkh Nûro'd-dîn, who had so signally exposed his life to save his prince, he conferred a higher post; presented him with a horse of great price, a vest of gold brocade, a belt set with precious stones, and 100,000 dinârs Kopeghî. Besides this, he made a general promotion of officers. Being come to the Koray (K), he left the baggage and booty; then marched, at the head of his best troops, in pursuit of Tokatmîsh: but, when he arrived at the Wolga, the Khân having crossed it, he staid at a passage called Tûratû. There he crowned Koyrichak Aglen, son of Urûs Khân, ^{Makes Koyrichak Khân.} who was an officer of his court, emperor of Kipjâk; and sent him, with the squadron of Uzbeks, over the Wolga, to gather the troops of his nation, and govern his new subjects. Mean time the Jagatayans pursued the fugitives as far as Ukek (L), slaying and taking captives a great number; while others crossed the Wolga on floats: and Tokatmîsh, seeing himself closely pressed, fled into the impenetrable forests of Bûlâr (M). The army advanced on the west side of the river, till they came opposite to the place where they had been in the first campaign, which is near the dark ocean, or Icy sea; and, in their return, ravaged the country, bringing away an immense booty of gold, silver, precious stones, and furs, with boys and girls of great beauty.

WHILE Timûr was on this expedition, Kara Yûsef assembled a troop of Turkmâns about Alatûk (or Uch Kilissa), with design to attack Koy: but the emperor, after the late battle, ^{Kara Yûsef flies.} having sent troops into Irân and Great Bukhâria, to prevent disorders, the Mîrza Pir Mehemmed, who commanded the former, marched to Koy; and from thence, by the defile of Kara Derra (N), to Bend Mâhi (O), where Kara Yûsef lay encamped: but, on his approach, that robber fled, and was pursued as far as Avenik (or Vân).

MEAN time Timûr, resolving to conquer the rest of Asia, on the side of Kipjâk, entered the great desert, which leads into Europe, at the great river Uzi, or Boristhenes. Here, at a town called Mankirmen, on that river, he found Bik-yarok Aglen, with other Uzbek Tatars; most of whom were cut to pieces, and their effects pillaged. Bâsh-Temûr Aglen and Aktao crossed the Uzi, and fled into the country of Hermeday (P); whose inhabitants, being their enemies, so harassed them, that the Tomân of Aktao fled to Isra Yaka in Rûm, or Anatolia, and there settled.

TIMUR then, changing his route, marched towards Muscovy; and Great Russia. At the Tanais (or Don) the army again overtook Bik Yarok, and pursued him as far as Kara Su (Q), ^{and ravages Russia.} a town of Great Russia, which they pillaged. His wives and children, who fell into their hands, were kindly treated by the emperor. This prince went in person to Moskow, which was pillaged; while parties were sent to ravage all the provinces of Great Muscovy, and Urûsjik, or Little Russia; who returned with prodigious droves of cattle, and beautiful captives, besides immense riches of all kinds. Timûr, after this, departed towards Balchimkin (or the

(K) A river in the Khûbestân of Georgia, which falls into the Caspian, to the north of Terki. La Croix.

(L) Ozekk, or Okak. The last town dependent on Saray, on the Wolga, between Bulgâr and Jebây, fifteen leagues from each. La Croix. Elsewhere he says, near Isigâr and Samera.

(M) Bûlâr is Bulgâr (or Bulgâria), reaching as far as Siberia, along the river Kamâl (or Kama), to the Icy sea. La Croix.

(N) A defile of mountains, at present the bounds between Persia and Turky: the French translator had passed them. La Croix.

(O) A little river, where they shut up the fish of the lake of Vân by a kind of sluice. La Croix had crossed it.

(P) A country between the Boristhenes and Danubej. La Croix.

(Q) Otherwise called Karsh; on the frontiers of Poland. La Croix.

Palus Mæotis) ; and, being arrived at Azák (R), ordered that the Mohammedans should be set at liberty, and the other inhabitants put to the sword. From hence he marched his troops to Kubân (S) ; but, as the Cherkas had destroyed all the pasture grounds between those two towns, a great number of horses died, and they suffered much for eight days. From Kubân the Mîrzas Mehemed Soltân and Mirân Shâb were sent to conquer Cherkassia ; which they effected, bringing away infinite spoil "

Returns to Georgia.

AFTER this, Timûr returned towards mount Albûrz. On the way, some sorry fellows, who are never wanting in the courts of princes, accused Ozmân Abbâs of crimes which had no foundation : but, as Timûr had before suspected Ozmân's fidelity, he ordered that illustrious Amîr, who, on so many occasions, had given proofs of his courage and conduct, to be put to death. The emperor, having a design to destroy the infidels, marched towards Bîrdaberdi, to attack Buraken, prince of the nation of As. He ascended mount Albûrz ; several times attacked the Georgians, put a great number of them to the sword, and ruined their fortresses, which they had deemed inaccessible. On his return, he made a splendid feast, for joy of his success ; after which, he again left the body of the army, to attack the fortresses of Kûla and Taws in Georgia, situate on mountains inhabited by the same people as those of mount Albûrz ; and so steep, that one is dazzled to look at them. That, on whose ridge Taws stands, is so high, that no archer can hit it with his arrow.

Fortress of Taws.

TIMUR ordered the Tomân of Mekrits, the most dexterous in the world at climbing mountains, to ascend the rock : but, after going round it, they could not find one single passage to the castle. The emperor, concerned at this, at length caused a great number of ladders to be made, which might be joined together. Being gotten, by these helps, to the top of the first ridge of the mountain, a troop of the forlorn hope bound themselves with cords ; and, having fastened the ends of the cords to the ridge of the mountain, came down even with the place, where the besieged overwhelmed them with stones, and slew them in heaps. But, as the whole army were continually mounting the ladders, and descending before the places, the besieged lost courage ; so that they could not hinder the castle from being taken by the Jagatays, who put to the sword all the men of the nation of Irkawn who had retired thither : the governors of the place, and he of Kûla, were also put to death.

and Pulâd
taken ;

FROM thence the army marched towards the fortress of Pulâd, by the way of Balakbân ; where they were all furnished with honey, the quantity was so great. The governor, named Pulâd also, refusing to deliver up Utarkû, one of the great Amîrs of Kipjâk, who was retired thither, Timûr ordered a passage three leagues long to be cut through a thick wood, in order to come at the castle, which is situated on a very steep defile of mountains. The enemy began the attack first ; but, being quickly defeated, the Jagatays entered the place, and put to the sword all who were capable of bearing arms. However, three companies of Georgians, and Utarkû, fled : the companies were pursued to the top of a mountain ; and, after their defeat, were all cast into the fire : while Timûr followed Utarkû to the middle of mount Albûrz, in a place called Abâsa ; where he was at length seized, after an obstinate defence, and loaded with chains.

with other places.

THE army, having pillaged all the inhabitants of this great and famous mountain, marched against the country of Semsem : whose lord, Mehemed, son of Gayûr Khân, came to offer it, with his subjects ; and was enrolled among the officers of Timûr's court. They then ascended the mountain, whither some of the inhabitants had fled ; who being taken, the emperor ordered them to be bound, and precipitated from the rocks. There were several places in Georgia, out of which neither horse nor foot could get, without gently sliding down the steep hills : yet no difficulties diverted Timûr's zeal, who at length cleared this country of the infidels, destroying their images and churches, as well as their houses. Thence he marched, by mount Awbâr, to Bishkunt (T) ; whose inhabitants he rewarded with largesses and lands, because they had long before offered him their service. He then proceeded, and ravaged the countries of the Kosjâks of Futûr (in Georgia), putting all those robbers to the sword. From thence he went to Bogâz Kom, a defile of mountains, where the inhabitants of Maimkatû and Kazi Komûk came to make their submissions. There now remained unconquered in Georgia only the isles ; whose inhabitants, called Balekcbian, that is, fishermen, confided in their fluid rampier : but, as it was winter, and the waters were frozen two cubits in thickness, the soldiers passed over ; and, having pillaged their houses, brought them away prisoners to the camp.

Kosjâk robbers.

Haji Terkhân named.

AT this time Timûr receiving advice from his lieutenant in Haji Terkhân (or Astrakhân), of some treasonable practices in Mahmûdi, the Kelonter (or governor) began his march thither, altho' the winter was extremely severe. The walls of this city are close to the Volga, which

" Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 495—505. c. 53—56.

(R) The same with Asof (as the Europeans call it) at the mouth of the Don.

(S) Capital of Cherkassie. La Croix.
(T) A town of Georgia.

- a runs round them by means of the ditches, and so serves for a rampier: but, as the river is frozen in winter, they usually build a wall of ice, as strong as one of brick, on which they fling water in the night, that the whole may congeal, and become one piece; wherein they make a gate. Timûr, being come near Haji Terkbân, approached the city with only a few men: and as Mahmudi was obliged to go out to meet the emperor, he was arrested, and sent towards Sarray, under the conduct of the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed; who, in his way, having passed the Volga, which was frozen, pursuant to the orders given him, thrust his prisoner under the ice. When he came to Sarray, capital of Kipjâk (U), he made the inhabitants go forth, and then reduced it to ashes; to revenge the burning of Zenjîr Sarray, the palace of Soltân Kbazân Khân (in 1387), when it was without a governor, and there was no king in Great Bukhâria.
- b After this, Timûr returned to the winter quarters at Bugâz Kom; and, as his army had been extremely weakened by the severe weather, which had killed most of the horses, and rendered provisions excessively scarce (W), he ordered the spoils of Sarray and Haji Terkbân to be divided among the soldiers^w.

ALL the countries of Kipjâk and Kefer (X), with the west and north parts of the Caspian Georgia farther ravaged. Hej. 798. A. D. 1396. sea, were now reduced under Timûr's dominion: the towns and provinces of those climates had likewise all been plundered, as Ukek, Majâr (or Hungary), Little Russia, Cherkassia, Bishgorod (Y), Mekes or Moskow, Azâk, Kûbân, and Alân (Z). All the princes of those countries had, moreover, given assurances of their obedience; and the enemy scattered. At the beginning, therefore, of the year 798, Timûr began his march back to Azerbejân. When he came to Terki, he went to besiege Ushenj (A): on advice of which, Shûkel, tho' a Mohammedan, and before at war with the inhabitants, came, from Kâzi Komûk and Awsher, to their assistance with 3000 men: but, in their approach, Timûr surprised them, when their horses were feeding; and, with 500 chosen horse, defeated them. Most of them were slain; and Shûkel, flying on foot, was killed with an arrow by Mobasher Bahâdr, who cut off his head. As soon as Timûr returned to the camp, his soldiers took Ushenj, and put the garrison to the sword: but he not only pardoned the governors, Kâzis, and other great men of the country, but confirmed them in their sovereignties, and made them great presents; exhorting them, at the same time, to make war on the Christians, according to their antient custom.

- FROM thence Timûr marched to Norghes (*); which he took at the first assault, and put all the inhabitants to the sword: he likewise took and razed the towns of Mika, Balû, and Derkalû, at the foot of mount Albûrz. He left Georgia, laden with spoils and beautiful captives. The inhabitants of Zenegherân, the most skilful workmen in coats of mail, came to meet the emperor, with presents of curious armour; and those of the mountain Kaytâg submitted also. Then he marched to Dârbend Bakû, that is, the Caspian gates (B), and caused the walls of the fortrefs to be built. Here Sheykh Ibrâhîm, prince of Shîrwân, who had followed the court in this expedition, setting out before, prepared a great banquet at Sabran (C). At Shamâkhi Feasts his court. he entertained the court a second time. Then Timûr, having confirmed the Sheykh in his principality, crossed the Kûr, and encamped at Aktam. There he ordered the Mîrza Mirân Shâb to govern the kingdom, which he had before given to him, by himself, and to besiege Alenjîk. He fixed the countries of Karabâgh and Nakshivân, as far as Avenik (or Vân), for lodging the ordas of the troops of his right wing; and the ordas of his left wing were quartered in the lands between Soltâniya and Hamadân.

SIRJAN, or Seyrjân, in Kermân, which had suffered a siege of three years, was so pressed by Shâh Shâbân, and the troops of Sîstân employed therein, that all the inhabitants, as well as garrison, were slain in the assaults, excepting Guderz the governor, and six others; who, being at length obliged to surrender the place, was put to death for his obstinacy. After this, while Temûk Kûchin, governor of Yazd, was gone to the imperial camp, the Soltân Mehemed, son of Abûsaïd Tebesî, with some troops, formerly in the service of the princes of Muzaffer, slew Temûk's lieutenant, with several of the great officers of that city; and, seizing the public treasure, with several loads of stuff, designed for the empress, assembled an infinite number

^w Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 505—514. c. 56—60.

(U) Where resided the Tartarkings of Dasht Barka, which is the Arab name of Kapshâk [rather Kapchâk, Kajjâk, or Kipjâk], situated on the Volga. La Croix.

(W) A pound of millet sold for seventy dinârs Kopeghî; the head of an ox for 100; and that of a sheep for 250.

(X) The province between Khorassân and the Caspian sea. La Croix.

(Y) A town of Kipjâk. La Croix.

(Z) A town and country between Georgia and the Black Sea. La Croix.

(A) A country (and town) of Georgia, N. E. of Tefîs. La Croix.

(*) A town of Georgia, in Mingrelia? La Croix.

(B) This seems to be the explanation of La Croix, who sometimes inserts names and explanations of his own in the text. The Arabs call Dârbend, Bâb al Abwâb, that is, the gate of gates. Dârbend Bakû seems to be made by confounding two different towns of Shîrwân together.

(C) A town of Shîrwân, between Dârbend and Shamâkhi; which last is the capital.

of profligate fellows, whom he cloathed, and gave money to. On advice of this sedition, Pir Mehemed, son of Omar Sheykh, marched from Shîrâz with the army of Pârs: and, being joined by those of the neighbouring provinces, went and besieged Tazd. Timûr also sent thither the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, son of Jebân Gbîr, with considerable troops; who gave two assaults each day, yet could not reduce the place by force: but, after a long siege, in which 30,000 died of famine, the enemy dug their way out under the ditch. However, being pursued, their leader Mehemed was killed near Mehrijerd (*); while some of his followers were slain, and the rest burnt alive. Timûr, pitying the poor inhabitants, forgave the arrears of taxes; and put their city which had been ruined by the rebels, in a flourishing condition again^a.

* Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 514—524. c. 60—64.

(*) A city of Khorassân, otherwise called Mehrejân and Esferayn. La Croix.

CHAPTER IV.

Timûr invades and conquers Hindustân.

Timûr returns.

TIMUR, being arrived at Soliâniya, released Soltân Aysa, prince of Mardin, and restored him to his territories. He next marched to Hamadân, and then sent troops to Nabawend (in Persîân Irâk), against Beblûl, who had slain the generous Amîr Meziâd Berlâs, governor of that city, and revolted. Those forces, having, with abundance of fatigue, taken the place, cut in pieces all the rebels who defended it, and burnt their ringleader alive; the Amîrs, who commanded at the siege, were afterwards ordered to exterminate the robbers of Lorestân; and then march to the Persian gulf, and bring under his obedience all the maritime places, as far as the borders of Harmûz, or Ormûz; which they at length effected. Timûr, after hunting in the plain of Hamadân, disbanded his army; and, July the 30th, set out for Samarkant, marching in one day as far as others would in three or four. Having passed through Verami (*) and Bestam (†), he entered Khorassân, of which he made the Amîr Allah-dâd inspector-general. Then crossing the Jibûn in boats, at Amûya, he went to his palace of Ak-saray, in Kash; where, after receiving the compliments of all the great lords of divers provinces, who came to congratulate his return, he made a solemn feast; and then went to Samarkant, where he was joyfully received, and made another feast. After this, he gave the Sharîfs, and men of letters, part of the spoil he had brought home; punished bad governors, against whom complaints were made, putting some to death; and exempted all the subjects of his empire from taxes for three years.

Fine palace built.
Hej. 799.
A. D. 1397.

Shâh Rûkh made king.

In spring 799, Timûr ordered the palace of Bâghi-shemâl to be built, in a garden to the north (A) of Samarkant, by the most skilful architects of Pârs and Baghdâd. It had a pavilion at each of the four corners; and the walls were painted in fresco, with such art, as surpassed the works of Artenk Mânî (B), several of whose pieces Timûr was possessed of. The court was paved with marble; and the bottom of the walls, both within and without, were covered with porcelain. When the whole was finished, Timûr ordered a royal feast, with sumptuous banquets, plays, and diversions; at which he invested his fourth son, the Mîrza Shâb Rûkh Bahâdr, sovereign and absolute prince of the kingdoms of Khorassân, Sîstân, and Mazânderân, as far as Firûzkûh, and the city of Ray: deeming Khorassân, by its situation, fittest for the seat of his kingdom, as lying between the two empires of Irân and Tûrân (of which he was master). Then, having appointed Amîrs and generals to command under him, he tenderly embraced, and, having kissed his eyes and forehead, dismissed him. The new king crossed the Jibûn in June; and, arriving at Herât, chose for his residence the palace of Bâgh-zaghân, that is, the Garden of Crows; where, the 25th of September, he had a son born, whom the emperor, his father, named Bayfankar^a.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 524—534, c. 64—68.

(*) A town of Kâhestân (in Irâk), in the territory of Reja. La Croix.—By Reva (or Reja) he seems to mean Rey, or Ray. It is mentioned in the journal of the Persian merchant taken from Ramusio, by Hakluyt, Vol. i. p. 337. and placed six days journey from Kashân, in the road to Herât, fifteen days distant.

(†) Or Basâm, a town of Kermân, south of Mazânderân.

(A) Bâghi-shemâl signifies the Garden of the North.

(B) The most eminent painter of China and Persia. La Croix.

- a MEAN time the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, marching by Darabjerd (C) and Taroin (D), went Ha mûz con- to Harmûz (or Ormûz), where he was met by troops which had taken different routes. At the first onset, they reduced the seven fortresses, which are the bulwarks of that kingdom; whose sovereign, Mehemed Shâb (E), was obliged to retire to Jerom, where he was constrained to make peace, swearing to pay an annual tribute of 600,000 dinârs. When the Mîrza was on his return to Shîrâz, a person named Jumâlo'ddîn, a native of the mountain of Firuzkûh, who rode at the side of his horse, struck him with a knife, but only wounded him slightly. The villain, thinking to escape, got up to the ridge of the mountain; but, stumbling as he ran, fell into a precipice and was killed. This prince, having finished the campaign, returned to the court at Samarkant: where Timûr, at this time, made several rich presents to Shâma b Jebân, son of Kezer Kojâ Aglen (king of Jetab); and sent him to his father, accompanied by Kayâso'adin Terkhân, to demand his sister, Tukel Khânûm, in marriage.

At the same time he built a magnificent palace in the midst of the garden, called Bagh-e Diler-sha (F), just then finished, in the plain of Khâni Gheul, without Samarkant, and gave it the name of his new mistress (G). This palace was square; each side 1500 cubits long; and, in the middle of each, a very high gate. The edifice was three storeys high, and the rooms exceeding lofty. The ceilings were adorned with flowers in Mosaic work, and the walls covered with porcelain of Kashân. It was adorned with all the beauties that could be devised; built exceeding strong; and surrounded with a colonade of marble, which gave it a majestic aspect. The garden was most elegantly laid out in parterres, wildernesses, and allées, bordered c with sycamores, and delicious fruit-trees. At each of the four corners stood a very lofty pavilion, covered with porcelain tinged with very delicate shadowings, and ranged with admirable skill.

AFTER this, the emperor departed for Tâshkunt, visiting, in his way, the tomb of Sheykh Timûr mar- Abmed; and, when winter was over, hearing that the princess was on the road, all the ladies ie: and Amîrs of the court were sent on horseback, sixteen days journey, to meet her. Having Hij. 800. met her, they sprinkled gold and precious stones on her head; did her all the honour due to A. D. 1398. a great queen; and, making magnificent feasts at every orda they arrived at, brought her at length to Timûr. Then he gave orders for a grand feast; and, commanding the chief Mufti, the Kâzis, and doctors of the law, to come before him, they married him according to the d Mohammedan rites.

ABOUT this time ambassadors arrived from Tamgûz Khân, emperor of Katay (H), with very curious presents, and were soon dismissed. Timûr then appointed the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, Embassy from governor of the frontiers of Mogulestân, with orders to build a fortress there, at the town of Ashira, and 40,000 horse under his command. After this, in the beginning of spring, he left Chinas, and came to Samarkant: from thence he went to Kash. On the road, five leagues from the first city, there is a mountain, out of which springs a river; and, this being an agreeable place, the emperor ordered a great garden to be made there; and, on the top of a rock, in the middle of it, a pleasure-house to be built, to which he gave the name of Tâkt Karâche, that is, the Black Throne b.

c AFTER the death of Fîrûz Shâb (I), emperor of India, Mellû Khân and Sarenk, two brothers, who had been his generals, placed his grandson Soltân Mahmûd on the throne; but, at the same time, usurping the sovereign power themselves, Mellû resided at Deli (K), near Mahmûd, and Sarenk at Mûltân (L). On this occasion, Timûr, being persuaded by Timûr Kojâ, son of Akbûga, to invade India, ordered the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, son of Jebân Ghîr, who had been established in the provinces of Îrân bordering thereon, to march into that country with his forces, and make conquests there. They began with plundering the Ugâns (or Aug-wâns) who inhabited the mountain of Soleymân Kûb. Then, passing the Indus, invetted Uchâb (*), and also laid siege to Mûltân; which last place they attacked without intermission, with two assaults every day. Timûr received this news with joy; and, as he resolved to carry

b Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 534—542. c. 64—70.

(C) A city of Fârs, or Pârs, where they find salt of all colours: in the midst of the town is a hill of freestone. La Croix.

(D) A city of Fârs, near Seyrjân (or Sirjân). La Croix.

(E) This prince is not mentioned among the kings of Harmûz, or Ormûz, whose history, from Teixeira, will be given hereafter. Jerom, or Jerân, is the island of Ormûz; but the fortresses were on the continent of Persia.

(F) That is, the garden which rejoices the heart.

(G) It was the custom to dedicate palaces to ladies.

(H) Or Kitay; by which is to be understood China in general: altho' Kitay properly included only the provinces to the north of the Whang-lo. The emperor designed by Tamgûz was Hong-wu, founder of the family of the Ming, Ta-ming, or Tay-ming, who died the year after.

(I) He was probably of the family of Gauri, or Gowar, who reigned in Gâzua of Khorâsân, and in Hindûstân, and succeeded that of the Gâzvi in the year 1155.

(K) Called also Delli, or, more properly, Dehli. It was then, as it is now, the capital of Hindûstân, or the Mogol's empire; and consisted of three towns, Sari, Jebân-pena and Old Dehli.

(L) A city situated on the river Ravi.

(*) A city to the north of Mûltân. La Croix.

his arms as far as China, in order to root out infidels, he determined, to merit the glory of the Gâzi (M), to march into India in person: for, altho' Mohammedism was professed in Debli, and many other cities of that empire, yet the greater part of the provinces was inhabited by idolaters. With this view, therefore, in March he set forward with his army, composed of many nations, but mostly Tatars; and, having passed the Jibûn at Termed, took the road of Aznik and Semenkân; then crossed the mountains of Barkalân, and encamped at Anderâb.

Attacks Ketûer,

THE inhabitants of this place having complained that the idolaters of mount Ketûer, and the Siapûshes (N), exacted excessive sums of the Mohammedans, under the denomination of tribute; and that, on failure of payment, they slew the men, and made slaves of the women and children, Timûr marched against them. Being arrived at Perjân (O), he sent the Mîrza Rûstem to be left, with 100,000 men, against the Siapûshes; and, following his road, came to Kaïk (P), where he found a demolished citadel, which he caused to be rebuilt. The Amîrs began to ascend the mountain Ketûer, with great fatigue; and, as the infidels dwelt in narrow passages and precipices, and the roads to them were covered with snow, when they got to the top, some of them, as well as the soldiers, descended by ropes, while others slid down the snow. They made a sort of raft for Timûr, and let it down by ropes 150 cubits long, fastened to rings; and, when he got so far, they dug a place in the snow for him to stand on. They let him down five times in this manner, before he reached the foot of the mountain. Some of his horses were let down by swathes; but only two got safe; the rest, for want of care, fell headlong, and perished. Then he took a staff in his hand, and walked a good way; after which, mounting his horse, the army followed on foot^c.

with great difficulty, and the Siapûshes.

THE infidels of this country, who all go naked, are strong men, and large as giants. Their kings are named Oda and Odashûb: they have a peculiar language, which is neither Persian, Turkish, nor Indian; so that, but for their neighbours, who serve for interpreters, they could neither understand, nor be understood. They had a citadel, at whose foot a great river passes, with a bridge over it; and beyond the river was a high mountain: but, on Timûr's approach, they fled, with their effects, to the top of this mountain, imagining it to be inaccessible: but the Jagatays soon got up, with the loss of fourteen, who fell from the top headlong; and attacked the enemy on all sides. The fight lasted three nights with unheard-of obstinacy: but at length the infidels, after the loss of great numbers of men, begged quarter. It was granted, on condition that they submitted, and turned Mohammedans; which they did on the fourth day: but, at night, having put to the sword an intire regiment, except a very few, the whole army got upon the mountain; and, following Mohammed's precept to spare the women, cut to pieces all the old and young men; then raised towers of their heads, and left a marble engraved with the history of this action.

Destroys them.

MEAN time the Siapûshes, on the approach of the Mîrza Rûstem and Burbân Aglen, left their fortresses, and retired to the mountains; where they lay in ambuscade, in a very narrow passage. These, when the Jagatays passed by, issued forth; and, falling suddenly on them, Burbân Aglen, thro' great cowardice, threw off his coat of mail, and fled without fighting; which caused the defeat of his troops, and slaughter of many men. It happened that, at this instant, Mehemed Azâd, sent as a reinforcement by Timûr, met the Siapûshes on their return; and, after a sharp fight, intirely defeated them. He then went to join Burbân Aglen with the horse which had fled; but could not prevail on him to remain there all night: for he got to the top of the mountain, whither he was followed by his troops. Burbân was the only prince of the family of Kayât (Q), who, since Jenghîz Khân, had committed the like infamous action. This general had indeed done the same in the war of the Uzbeks: but Timûr had not only pardoned, but continued to honour him; and had sent him on this expedition to retrieve his credit.

Punishes cowardice.

WHEN these two generals had rejoined the imperial army at Kaïk, Timûr would not admit Burbân Aglen into his presence. He treated him with scorn, as he met him by chance; and, to shew his infamy, said: "The korân assures us, that twenty zealous Mussulmâns are able to conquer 200 infidels; and yet Burbân, at the head of 10,000 men, fled from a handful of unbelievers. He then declared him criminal; and, as a mark of disgrace, banished him the court. On the other hand, he gave rich presents, and the command of a regiment, to Meke-med Azâd; who, with only 400 men, had, on foot, stood his ground against the vanquishers

^c Hist. Tim. Bek, l. iv. c. 1—3. p. 1—10.

(M) That is, a religious war, like the crusade of the Romanists; or it signifies one who conquers in such wars.

(N) Ketûer, or Ketover, is a mountain in the kingdom of Badâghshân, in the east part of Great Bukhâria. The Siapûshes are an idolatrous nation, cloathed in black, inhabiting the mountains south of Badâghshân. La Croix.

(O) A town of Badâghshân, two days journey from Anderâb, near the Siapûshes. La Croix.

(P) Or Kaïk; a town at the foot of mountain Ketûer. La Croix.

(Q) Jenghîz Khân was himself of this stock.

a of Burhân, flushed with victory, and slain a great number of them. After this, the Mîrza Shâh Rukh departed from Kaûk for Herât; and Timûr marched to Tulle (R): then crossed the mountain Hendû Kesb; passed by Penjebîr (S), and encamped in the country of Barân, five leagues from Kâbul: where he caused a great canal, called Mabighâr, to be made, five leagues in length, on which afterwards were built many large villages^d.

MEAN time there arrived in the camp ambassadors from several princes, particularly Kezzer Embassies from Koja Aglen, king of Jetab, to assure Timûr of their obedience. Tayzi Aglen (*), who, for princes some difference between him and the Khân, at Olug-yûrt (T), fled from the kingdom of Kalmûk (U), came also hither for protection, and was received with great honour. Nor was the Amîr Sheykh Nûro'ddîn less welcome; who brought with him an immense treasure, the revenues of Persia, and presents of an inestimable value. At this time Mâlek Mehemed, brother to Lesbker Shâh, an Ugân (or Augwân), complained to Timûr, that Mûssa, prince of the Kerkes, had killed his brother, who was an officer of the emperor, had ruined Irjâb (W), pillaged his tenants, and robbed on the great roads. Timûr ordered Mâlek to conceal himself, while he sent for Mûssa to court; who was received with marks of honour by his majesty, and ordered to rebuild Irjâb. Mûssa went back to obey the order; and, when the work was finished, the emperor marched thither.

As he designed to put to death Mûssa and his accomplices, he commanded the guards not to suffer any of them to re-enter the town, after once they went out. Nor was this order given without good reason: for, September 16th, Timûr having taken horse, to view the place, accompanied by many princes and generals on foot, he was perceived by seven of Mûssa's labourers, from an upper window of a house behind one of the gates: who let fly at him, with design to kill him: but the whiz of the arrow only startled his horse. Timûr, upon this, went into the city at another gate; and immediately caused Mûssa and his partisans to be seized: 200 of whom, with their chief, he delivered to Mâlek Mehemed; who, assisted by three of his servants, cut off their heads, to revenge his brother's death, and made a tower of them. His subjects were plundered; and the women, children, and goods, of those tyrants, given to indemnify the people of Irjâb; which principality was bestowed on Mâlek.

SEPTEMBER 17th, Timûr marched toward Shenuzân, where he encamped, after passing several forests and mountains. The 20th, he arrived at the fortress of Nagaz, which had been newly rebuilt by his order. Here being informed, that the nation of Pervians, a kind of Ugâns (or Augwâns), infested the roads, he entered the mountains; and, in three days, came up with, and cut them to pieces, burnt their dwellings, and carried off their children and effects. Mean time the Amîr Soleymân Shâh treated the Kelatians, another nation of the Ugâns, very strong and numerous, in the same manner: but the Ubel, a third branch of the same people, came; and, submitting, were loaded with favours. The first day of the year 801 Hej. 801. (September 30), Timûr departed for Banû; then marching from thence, October 7th arrived at the Indûs, in the very place where Soltân Jalâlo'ddîn, king of Karazm, swam over that river, in sight of Jenghîz Khân. The emperor crossed it on a bridge of boats. At this place he dismissed the ambassadors of the foreign princes: among the rest, was one from the Sharifs of Mekka and Medina, who courted a visit from them, and desired his protection (X). Likewise the ambassador of Eskânder Shâh, prince of Kashmîr (Y), who offered obedience; and was ordered to meet the emperor at Dipalpûr, a town of India^e.

TIMUR, having passed the Indus with his army, encamped at the entrance of the great desert of Jerû, which is called Chol Jalâli, from Jalâlo'ddîn's taking shelter in it. Here the Râjas of the mountain Kûb Jûd (south-east of Kashmîr) came to submit themselves; and, as they had been kind to his troops some months before, they were very well received. When he arrived at the river Jamâd (Z), October 13th, he ordered Sheykh Nûro'ddîn to attack an island therein, fortified with a ditch and walls, belonging to prince Shahâbo'ddîn Mobârek; who, after submitting to the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed Jebân Ghîr, in his way to Mûltân, had revolted.

^d Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 10—19. c. 3—5.

^e Ibid. p. 19—28. c. 5—9.

(R) A little town of Badâghân. La Croix.

(S) Commonly called Penjîr (or Benghîr), at the foot of the mountains of Kashmîr, to the west. Abû'l-feda says, there are two silver mines here. La Croix.

(*) Called Eichi Timûr Khân, p. 434. This happened twenty years after the Mungl Khân, being driven out of Chîng, re-settled at Karakorum.

(T) That is, the Great Orda; it stands near Karakorum, capital of Kalmûk, and is the residence of the kings of Kalmûk, or rather of the Mogul Khâns. La Croix.

(U) A kingdom, formerly called Karakitay, in Mogulstân, north of the kingdom of Gerge, or Lyau-tong. La Croix.—This is a very confused account: yet seems to intimate that the Moguls, or Mungls, in the east of Tartary, went then by the nickname of Kalmûks, or Kalmûks; given them, doubtless, by the Mohammedan Tatars or Mungls.

(W) A city four days journey distant, towards India. La Croix.

(X) They offered to declare Timûr Khalifah, altho' Bayezid was invested with that high dignity. La Croix.

(Y) A province of India, whose capital is Nagar. La Croix.

(Z) A river near the Indus; it is the continuation of the Dendana, which comes from Kashmîr. La Croix.

The Amîr, with his Tomân, entering the river, a most furious battle was fought. Then Shir-bâbo'ddin came with 10,000 men to attack the Jagatays in the rear, during the night; but, after several vigorous onsets, were defeated by Sheykh Nûro'ddin. On this, prince Mobârrek fled, with his domestics, in 200 flat-bottomed boats, down the Jamâd, to Ucha. Passing on from thence towards Mûltân, the passage was obstructed by Soleyman Shâh, at the head of the scouts of Pîr Mehemed and the Mîrza Shâh Râkb; who, seizing the boats, cut them to pieces, while the unfortunate prince, casting his wife and children into the river, half-dead, gained the bank; and fled, with many of his subjects, into the woods; where, being pursued, great numbers were slain, and their goods pillaged.

and other princes.

AFTER this success, the army marched five or six days along the Jamâd, and encamped at a fortress where that river and the Jenave (A) join, with waves resembling the troubled ocean: however, Timûr ordered a bridge to be built over it; which is the first to be met with in history, made across this river: for Tumeshîrîn Khân (B), who formerly passed it, was obliged to swim over. The emperor, having crossed the united stream, went to encamp over-against the town of Tûlonba, thirty-five gûrûh (C), or miles, from Mûltân: then passing the river of that town, taxed it at two millions of crowns, part of which was paid; but, the inhabitants making a difficulty of paying the rest, the soldiers, in the night, sacked the place, burnt the houses, and made slaves of the people, the Sharîfs and doctors only excepted. November the 5th he left Tûlonba; and, next day, encamped by a deep lake, situate on the side of the river Biab (D), within sight of Shanawaz, a great and populous city. He then marched against Nûfrit, brother of Sheykh Kukeri, who had surrounded the lake with a wall, and lay behind it with 2000 men: but they were soon defeated, and cut to pieces.

Mûltân taken.

AT Shanawaz the soldiers supplied themselves with corn: then setting fire to the granaries, November 10 went down the Biab, and crossed it over-against the town of Jenjân. Next day, the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed came from Mûltân, forty miles distant, to the imperial camp. That city having been reduced to eat dead bodies, after a six months siege, Sarenk the governor was obliged to fly; so that the prince quickly took it: but, having lost most of his horses by a mortality caused by an inundation, the Rajâhs of the country revolted, and advanced in the night to the very walls of Mûltân; till, on advice of Timûr's approach, they withdrew. The army left Jenjân the 15th, for Shûâl; the 18th came to Aswân (E), and at length to Jebawl (F). The 21st he arrived at Ajûdân; and next day, crossing the Dena, encamped on the hill of Kaleskuteli, ten miles from Ajûdân, and fifty from Batnîr; at which place he arrived the 23d, after crossing the great desert. Batnîr is a city, with a fortress, the strongest and most noted in all India, situate in a desert out of the common road. The inhabitants have no water, excepting from a great lake near the gate of the town, which is never filled but in times of inundations. Hither the inhabitants of Dipalpûr, Ajûdân, and other places, fled for refuge in such numbers, that, the place not being large enough to contain all their cattle and effects, great part of both were left without the town^f.

Batnîr fortress.

Batnîr surrenders.

THESE the soldiers, on their arrival, seized, and immediately marched up to Batnîr; where Rawdûljîn the governor reigned as sovereign, and resolved to resist, having had a great many soldiers and domestics about him. The out-parts and suburbs were taken, at the first attack, with great slaughter of the Indians: they took also the counterscarp, and then assaulted the town. Rawdûljîn posted himself at the gate, with the bravest of his soldiers: but, being vigorously attacked several times by the Jagatays, when they were on the point of gaining the place, he demanded quarter, promising to repair next day to the camp. However, not keeping his word, they began to sap the walls with such resolution, that the Indian prince submitted, and was honourably received. Five hundred of the inhabitants of Dipalpûr were put to the sword, for having treacherously slain Messafer Kâbuli, and 1000 horsemen: part likewise of the people of Ajûdân, who had abandoned Timûr, were slain; and the rest made prisoners, after being plundered. These executions so frightened Kemâlo'ddin, brother of Rawdûljîn, that he shut the gate of the town: but soon opened it again, on the approach of the Jagatays.

Great slaughter
there.

HOWEVER, as among the Râjas, and other chiefs, disputes arose, about the tax for saving the people's lives, which could not be terminated without commotions, Timûr, in a passion, ordered that this rabble should be put to the sword, and the houses of the infidels razed.

^f Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 28—40. c. 9—14.

(A) Jenave, or Chenave, which falls into the Ravi, above Mûltân.

(B) Descended from Jenghîz Khân: he conquered India in 1240. La Croix.—This must be some mistake. Tumeshîrîn Khân, Khân of Jagatay, who seems to be the prince here meant, died in 1336.

(C) Gûrûh, as the Indians call the measure of three miles, makes a farseng, parseng, or Persian league. Sharîfo'd. Hist. Tim. Bek. l. iv. c. 14. p. 40.

(D) Or Biyah, near Lahor; it falls into the Ravi. La Croix.

(E) Towns south of the Biab. La Croix.

(F) A town between Lahor and Dipalpûr, south of the Biab. La Croix.

a The soldiers having scaled the walls, and entered the place sword in hand, the ghebrs and idolaters set fire to their own houses, casting their wives, children, and goods into the flames; and the Mohammedans cut the throats of theirs. This done, the men, uniting, who were exceeding strong and courageous, fought in a most cruel and obstinate manner, slaying many of the Jagatays. The Amîr Sheykh Nûro'ddîn also, rushing into the midst of the enemy, was with difficulty rescued out of their hands. At length, victory declaring for the besiegers, they slew 10,000 Indians, burnt their houses, and ruined the walls of the town^s.

AFTER the ruin of Batnîr, Timûr departed November 30 for Dehli, capital of India. Hav- Comes to Je-ing passed by the castle of Firûz, with the towns of Serefti, Fâtabâd, Rejebowr, and Abrûni; hân Nûmay.
on the 5th of December he came to the village of Tûbene, in a country inhabited by Getes, b who robbed and murdered on the highway. At his approach, they fled; but, being pursued, 2000 of them were cut off. Next day, having passed the castle of Munek, he entered the deserts and woods where the Getes had retired, and slew 2000 more. Then, passing by the town of Semâne, he came to the river Kekker, which he crossed, over the bridge of Fâlkubl; where he was joined by the soldiers of the left wing, commanded by Soltân Mahmud Khân, who had taken another road. From thence he marched to Kuteyl, seventeen miles from Semâne; then to Affendi, seventeen farther; and, five more, to Toklukpûr: the inhabitants of which city, called Sûlûn, held two principles; one the author of good, the other of evil. They fled on the approach of the army; who burnt their houses, and then marched twelve miles to Panipar. At length, December 24, they arrived at Jebân Numay (G), a palace built by Soltân Firûz Shâh, on the top of a mountain, two leagues from Dehli, at the foot of which runs the great river Jawn (H).

TIMUR went then to the town of Lûni, situated between the two rivers of Jawn and Hilen; Most cruel which latter Firûz Shâh cut from the river of Kalini, which unites with the Jawn near the city Lutchery.
of Firûzabâd. Lûni was taken in one day; and all the ghebr inhabitants put to the sword, but the Mohammedans were spared. Next morning the emperor went to Jebân Numay, to see that palace, and from thence pitch on a place for battle: after which, he encamped to the east of Lûni; where the Shâh Zâde, or emperor's children, and the Amîrs who had been making incursions, joined him. Here he harangued them upon the art of fighting battles; of breaking the enemy's ranks; and rallying one's own troops after a defeat. The army, since d they passed the Indus, having made a vast number of Indians captives, mostly ghebrs and idolaters, it was feared, that, in any obstinate battle, they would join with the people of Dehli; Timûr, therefore, ordered, that they, who had any Indian slaves, should put them to death: in consequence of which, in less than one hour, more than 100,000 were put to death^h.

TIMUR set out for Dehli, December 30th: and, when the astrologers disputed about the His forces ap-aspects of the planets, he told them, that fortune did not depend on the stars, but on the proach Creator of them; and that, when he had once formed his designs with proper care, he would not delay the execution of them one moment, to wait for a lucky time. Yet he consulted the Korân, and met with a favourable answer (I); which ensured him of victory, and encouraged the whole army. January the first (1399) he crossed the Jawn, and encamped on the other e side. The 3d he drew up his army in order of battle; giving the command of the right wing to the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed Jebân Ghîr: the left wing was led by the Mîrzas Soltân Hussayn and Kalîl Soltân: the rear was put under the conduct of the Mîrza Rûstem: and the main body was commanded by Timûr himself.

THE enemy marched likewise in order of battle. Their right wing was brought up by the Indian Taji Khân, Mîr Ali Kojâ, and other Indian princes: the left had for its leaders Mâlek Moy- army.
noddîn, and others: and the main body was commanded by Soltân Mahmûd Khân, emperor of India; who had Mellû Khân for his lieutenant-general. This army consisted of 10,000 horse, well equipped; and 40,000 foot, armed to advantage. Besides several elephants of war, armed with cuirasses, having between their long teeth great poisoned daggers; and on their backs f wooden towers, in form of bastions, filled with cross-bow-men and archers; on the side of the elephants marched those who flung fire and melted pitch, with rockets armed at the end with iron, which gave several blows one after another, where-ever they fell.

THE Jagatays were not much disturbed about the Indian army: but they had conceived Fear the elestrange notions of the elephants, which they had never seen before. They imagined that the phants.
arrow and sword could not pierce their bodies: that they were so strong as to overthrow trees,

^s Hist. Tim. Bek, Vol. II. p. 40—44.

^h Ibid. p. 44—54. c. 15—19.

(G) That is, the mirror of the world, because of its fine prospect.

(H) Or Juengo.

(I) If Timûr was free from one superstition, like many others, he was guilty of another; nay, could flatter himself with having the favour of God, just after destroying, in cold blood, 100,000 of his creatures at once.

by only shaking the earth, as they passed along: that they could shove down the firmest buildings: and that, in battle, they would toss both man and horse to a vast height in the air. This dispirited many in the camp; so that, when the posts were fixed for the officers and lords of the court, Timûr, who always shewed respect to men of learning, asked those near his person, what posts they would chuse. Several of these doctors, frightened at what they had read and heard of elephants, answered immediately, "If it please your majesty, we chuse to be near the ladies."

The battle begins.

TIMUR, to guard against this panic, ordered a rampart of bucklers to be made before the ranks, with a ditch before that: he likewise caused buffaloes to be tied neck and heels, then placed close together; with bushes between and on their heads. There were, besides, stakes prepared, with three-pronged forks at the ends: so that, when the elephants advanced, they were to be planted in their way; and the brambles to be set on fire, to put those animals in disorder. When the two armies were in view, Timûr got upon an eminence, near the hill of Pûshṭey Bṭhâli, from thence to observe their motions; and as soon as the fight began, he fell on the ground, often bowing, to beg for victory. While he was at prayers, there happened, says our author, a strange accident: for the Amîrs of the rear imagined, that, if the emperor should send recruits from the main body, either to the right wing or the rear, it would be a certain token of victory. Now this the emperor actually did: which so encouraged the Jagatays, that the Indians were constrained to give ground, and the elephants suffered themselves to be driven like oxen.

The Indians defeated.

So hot a battle never was seen, nor so frightful a noise of warlike instruments heard, before. At length, Timûr's van-guard, perceiving that of the enemy advance, retired behind the right wing, to lie in ambush till they had passed by, and then fell on them with fury, killing in an instant four or five hundred men. The Mîrza Pîr Mehmed, at the head of the van-guard of the right wing, assisted by the Amîr Soleymân Shâb, attacked the left of the Indians with so much conduct, that he drove them beyond the basin of Havîskas (K); then, falling on the elephants, forced them to enter the ranks of the same wing, and cause a farther disorder. Mean time the left wing of the Jagatays repulsed the right of the enemy, with great slaughter, as far as the city-gate. Then the main body of the latter, sustained by the elephants, advanced in good order against the rear of the former, and began a most bloody battle; in which Sheykh Mûro'ddîn, and the other Amîrs, behaved with great valour, overthrowing the castles on the backs of the elephants, and cutting off the trunks of those animals, with great slaughter of the Indians, so that at length they turned their backs; and Soltân Mahmûd, with his head general Mellû (or Mellow) Kbân, fled into the city.

The city invested.

THEN Timûr, spurring his horse towards the gate of Dehli, carefully examined the fortifications. On his return, the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân, who commanded the left wing, though but fifteen years of age, brought him one of the elephants bound with ropes, whose guards he had overthrown, after mauling the animal with his sword. Timûr, on this sight, burst into tears of joy. Was it not surprising, says our author, that this great prince should at this time have so tender a heart, who, on some occasions, could exercise extraordinary severities? Mean time Soltân Mahmûd and his general, not thinking themselves safe in Dehli, left it at midnight, and retired into the deserts. Several Amîrs being sent in pursuit of them, they brought back the prince Sayf Kbân, surnamed Mâlek Sharîfo'ddîn, and the prince Kodadâd, son of Mellû Kbân. The Amîr Alabdâd seized the gates by which the princes fled, and guarded the others, that no one might escape.

and surrendered.

JANUARY the fourth, Timûr erected his standard on the walls of Dehli; and, going to the city-gate, sat on the avjâb, or throne, whereon the Indian emperors sit in their royal robes, on the great feast-day. This gate is in the quarter of Jebân Penâb, over-against the basin of Havîskas, where the army was then encamped. There Fadhlallah Bâkshi, Mellû Kbân's lieutenant, at the head of the whole divân of Dehli, the Sharîfs, Kadis, and principal inhabitants, came to make their submission, and begged for mercy. The elephants and rhinoceros's themselves came and fell down before the emperor in an humble posture; and made a great cry, as if they demanded quarter. These war-elephants, 120 in number, were, at his return, sent to Samarkant, and to the provinces where his sons resided. Two were carried chained to Tauris, one to Shîràz, five to Herât, one to Sheykh Ibrâhîm, prince of Shîrwân, and one to the lord Tabârten at Arzenjân. After this, at the request of the court-lords, Timûr made a great feast; at which he distributed presents to the princes, and great officers.

Dehli described.

DEHLI at this time consisted of three cities (L), Seyri, Old Dehli, and Jebân Penâb. Seyri was surrounded with a wall, in form of a circle. Old Dehli was the same, but much larger,

(K) It is round, and above an arrow-shot in diameter. As, in any inundation, it is filled with water, it furnishes Dehli with water for a whole year: on its bank is the tomb of Soltân Firûz Shâb, who made it. Sharîfo'ddîn.

(L) This is as it was in the author's time: the present Dehli is a new city, built in a different place by Jahâno'ddîn Akbar, father of Humâюн, and called, from him, Akbarâbâd. La Croix.

- a lying south-west of the other : these two parts were joined on each side by a wall ; and the third, lying between them, was called Jebân Penâb, which was larger than Old Dehli : this last had ten gates : Seyri had seven ; three of which looked towards Jebân Penâb, which had thirteen gates, six to the north-west, and seven to the south-east. Every thing seemed to be in a quiet posture, when, January 12, the soldiers of Timûr, being assembled at the gate of Dehli, insulted the inhabitants of the suburbs. The great Amîrs were ordered to put a stop to these disorders : but their endeavours were not effectual. The Soltânas having a curiosity to see the rarities of Dehli, and particularly the famous palace adorned with 1000 pillars, built by Mâlek Juna, that antient king of India, they went in with all the court ; and the gate being left open, on that occasion, for every body, above 15,000 soldiers got in unperceived.
- b But there was a far greater number of troops in a large place between Dehli, Seyri, and Jebân Penâb, who committed great disorders in the two last places. This made the ghebrs, in despair, to fall on them ; and several of them, setting fire to their houses, burnt their wives and children. The Jagatays, seeing this confusion among the ghebrs, did nothing but pillage and burn their houses ; while the disorder was increased, by more troops let in, to seize the inhabitants of the neighbouring places, who had fled thither for shelter.

THE Amîrs, to put a stop to this mischief, caused the gates to be shut, to prevent more troops from entering : but the soldiers within opened them again, and rose in arms against their officers. So that the whole army being entered by the 13th, in the morning, this great and proud city was destroyed. Some soldiers carried out 150 slaves, men, women, and children : nay some of their boys had twenty slaves a piece to their share. The other spoils, in precious stones, jewels, plate, and manufactures, were innumerable : for the Indian women and girls were adorned with precious stones, and had bracelets and rings on their hands, feet, and even toes ; so that the soldiers were loaded with them. The 15th, in Old Dehli the Indians retired into the great mosk, to defend themselves : but the Amîr Shâh Mâlek, and Ali Soltân, entering it with 500 men, sent to the abyss of hell, says our good Musulman author, the souls of those infidels, of whose heads they erected towers. Never was such a terrible slaughter and devastation heard of. Several days were employed to make the inhabitants quit the city, which was plundered ; and as they went, the Amîrs took a number of them for their service. The artizans were also distributed amongst the princes and commanders : but the masons were all reserved for the emperor, in order to build him a spacious stone mosk at Samarkant.*

JANUARY 18th, Timûr decamped from Dehli, and marched down to Firûzabâd, three Mirtha be- miles distant from the Jawn. He stayed there to say a prayer in a stone mosk, and then went on to the other side of Jebân Numay, near Wazîrabâd, where he was presented with two white parrots, from Babâdr Nebâr, prince of Kûtele, who had submitted to his envoys. These birds lived ever since the reign of Togluk Shâh, and had been kept many years in the antechambers of the Indian emperors. From thence the army passing through Mudâla, beyond the Jawn, Kete, and Bâghbûr, a delightful garden, came to Asâr, situate between the rivers. These places are six miles asunder. Timûr, resolving to take the city of Mirtha, one of the most noted places of the empire, twenty miles from Asâr, marched thither, at the head of 10,000 men, in two days and one night. As the ghebrs refused to submit, he ordered the walls to be undermined ; and the workmen having, by the time it was night, advanced ten or fifteen cubits breadth towards each bastion and courtine, the besieged were so greatly surprised, that they desisted to defend themselves.

NEXT day, being the 26th, the Amîr Allahdâd, with his regiment of the Kûchins, named the faithful, having attacked the gate, Sarray, a young lad, one of his domestics, cast a net upon the battlement, and boldly mounted the walls. He was followed by Rûstem Berlâs, and a great many others, who rushed into the town. They bound Elias Ugani, and the son of Mulâna Ahmed Tobânesâri, governors of the place, whom they seized ; but the ghebr Sefi, one of its princes, was slain in the assault. They slay'd alive all the ghebrs, and made slaves of their wives and children. Every thing was burned, and the walls razed. All this was quickly done, although Turmeshîrîn Khân, a great emperor in Asia, could not make himself master of this town. On this occasion, Timûr gave a singular instance of his modesty : for when, in a kind letter, which he had ordered to be written to the inhabitants, he found these words, Why do you compare us to Turmeshîrîn Khân ? he reprimanded his secretary ; saying, Turmeshîrîn was a greater lord than I, of stricter virtue, and better conduct : and would not suffer the letter to be concluded.

THE same day, he marched six miles to Mansûra : and the 27th, eight farther to Pirûz-nâr, on the Ganges (M). He encamped five miles lower, not able to find a safe passage ;

* Hist. Tim. Bek, Vol. II. p. 54—62. c. 19—20.

* Ibid. p. 62—67.

(M) Which is called, in Perfan, Darîya Konk, or the sea of Konk.

though Pir Mehemed, several Amírs, and part of the army, swam over the river, yet not without great danger. From thence he went twenty miles farther to Tokluk Púr, on the Ganges, having, by the way, sent 50,000 horse against the ghebrs, who were gathered on its banks. Here he was seized with a very troublesome swelling in his arm; but it did not long continue. Mean time, a vast number of ghebrs, in forty-eight great flat-bottomed boats, having advanced towards the camp, he set out to meet them, with 1000 of his officers; several of whom spurred their horses into the water, and advancing, in spite of their arrows, entered their boats, and cut them in pieces. With these boats they attacked ten others, fastened together for better defence; but the Jagatays boarded them, and cut those who manned them in pieces.

by water and land.

ON the 29th, Timúr left Tokluk Púr, and, a little after, crossed the Ganges, at an easy passage. He then advanced against Mobârek Khân, who, not far off, expected the Jagatays, with 10,000 horse. As the Indians were far more numerous, the two wings of the army being at a great distance, Timúr was in no small perplexity; but, just at that instant, 500 horse, who had crossed the river to make inroads, arrived, as if sent by heaven, says our author, to succour the emperor; who, after returning God thanks, sent the Amírs Shâb Málek and Allâbdâd, with 1000 horse, to attack the enemy. These thinking them to be only the van-guard of a great army just behind them, suddenly grew afraid, and fled into the woods; where they were pursued, and a great number put to the sword. The booty taken, with their wives and children, was considerable. At the same time, Timúr having received advice, that a great number of ghebrs were assembled in the defiles of Kúpele, to the east of the Ganges, he departed, with 500 horse. On his arrival at the mountains, he met a body of them, whom his Amírs soon routed: but, being left with only 100 of his guards, a ghebr, named Mâlek Shейka, fell briskly upon him, with the same number of men. However, Timúr shot him in the belly with an arrow, and then unhorsed him by a cut of his sword on the head, of which he presently died¹.

Defile of Ku-pele.

Head of the Ganges.

SOME time after, advice was brought, that a great many ghebrs were gathered in the defile of Kupele, two miles distant: and, though Timúr was in want of sleep, he marched thither, with some officers of his van-guard, through almost impassable woods; and, being joined by his son Pir Mehemed, they made a great slaughter of the enemy, from whom they took a considerable booty. Thus Timúr was in three battles the same day; which never happened to any prince before him. The defile of Kupele is situated at the foot of the mountain near the river springs (N). For this reason, the Indians adore that stone; and all the inhabitants within one day's journey turn towards it when they pray. As there yet remained a prodigious number of ghebrs in the mountains of Kupele, who possessed a great quantity of riches, cattle, and other effects, January 30, Timúr marched towards the defile, where the infidels were gathered: but, on his approach, they lost courage, and dispersed themselves through the mountains; whither being pursued, many of them were slain, and their goods carried away.

Mountain
Swâlek.

AFTER this, Timúr returned, and, crossing the Ganges, encamped five miles lower on that river. Then, being satisfied with having marched to the eastern borders of the empire of India in one campaign, and acquired the merit of the Gâzi, he resolved to return to his own dominions. With this view, the 31st of January, he left the Ganges. Next day, advice being brought, that a great number of Indians were assembled in Swâlek, one of the most considerable mountains of India, stretching over two thirds of that vast empire, February 4th, he departed for that mountain; where a Râjah, named Behrûz, had posted himself, with a great number of ghebrs, in a narrow passage: but the Jagatays falling suddenly upon them, they made but a weak defence: so that those who escaped the sword were taken prisoners, with their effects; which so loaded the army with spoil, that they could not march above four miles a day. The 5th, they came to Bebre, near Bekeri, commonly called Meliapúr.

cleared of hebrs.

THE 8th, they crossed the Jawn, and encamped in another part of the mountain of Swâlek; where an infinite number of Indians being assembled, under one Râjah Ratan, Timúr marched all night, and next morning came up with them, between the mountains Swâlek and Kúke: but they fled, on his approach, into the woods, where a great many were slain. He continued his progress in the mountains for several days, slaying the Indians, and seizing their effects. In short, there were twenty battles fought in thirty days; during which time, seven of the most important places in all India for strength were conquered. They were one or two leagues asunder; and the inhabitants were always at variance among themselves. One of them,

¹ Hist. TIM. BEK, p 67—76, c. 21—24.

(N) This relation is contrary to late accounts, which place the head of the Ganga, or Ganges, a great way distant in Tibet: and it is observable, that our author does not say that either Timúr, or any of his troops, were at the place to view it: so that what he delivers must be only from uncertain reports.

a by persuasion of the Mohammedans who lived there, submitted to Timûr: but when the tax for saving their lives was imposed on them, they made use of tricks, to avoid paying it. To enable them to do it with less reluctance, an Amîr proposed buying their old bows, which they sold at a good price. Then it was ordered, that forty ghebrs should be lifted in the service: but they would not consent; and slew several Musulmans. Upon this, the Jagatays treating them as enemies, besieged the place in form; which they took, and put 2000 ghebrs to the sword^m.

THE Gâzis on the mountains of Swâlek being finished, Timûr departed from Manfar, the Reines Châ-Châmû, whose inhabitants were valiant men, and their forests of difficult access; yet, on the army's approach, they abandoned the town, to be entered and pillaged by the soldiers. Mean time Shâh Eskînder, prince of Kashmîr, being arrived at Jebbân, in his way to the camp, and there informed, that the Amîrs of the Diwân had taxed him at 30,000 horses, and 100,000 Darefts of gold, each weighing two Medikals and one half, he returned, to collect the same. Timûr, on advice of this, disapproved of the order, which had laid on Eskînder a tax more than his little kingdom was worth; and sent to him to return in ten days to the bank of the Indus. The 15th, they encamped over-against Châmû, capital of the province of that name. Next day, Timûr entered the defile, from whence springs the river of Châmû, which the army had crossed several times. It is situated at the foot of a mountain, on the left side of the city Châmû, having on its right the town of Menû. It was inhabited by strong and tall Indians, who had intrenched themselves in almost inaccessible woods, upon a craggy mountain, with their king at their head, resolved to defend their lives.

Timûr judged it better to insnare them by artifice, than attack them in so dangerous a place. His king taken. He therefore ordered his troops to leave them, and go pillage Menû: they likewise entered Châmû, and brought away abundance of spoil. Then posting some regiments in the woods, departed with the cavalry. The 17th, he crossed the river Châmû, and encamped four miles from thence, on the side of the Jenâve, or Jenaw, in a plain four leagues long, full of pasturage. As soon as the army had quitted the defiles, the Indians came out of their mountain, to re-enter their houses; but were soon attacked by the ambuscade, who cut them in pieces, without giving any quarter, excepting the king, and fifty officers of consideration. On this success, Timûr blessed the Almighty, who had delivered the enemies of the faithful into their hands. Great care was taken of the king of Châmû, who had been wounded in the fight, in order to get more easily the money due for saving the lives of him and his people. This, joined to the discourses of those about him, concerning the Mohammedan religion, prevailed on him, when cured, to embrace that faith, and eat the flesh of oxen. Upon this, Timûr made a treaty with him, and received him under his protection.

MEAN time news arrived that the forces sent to Labor, or Labâr, had made themselves Labor pil- masters of that city, had actually received the ransom tax, and made Shikay Kuker, prince thereof, prisoner. This prince, at the beginning of the war, accompanied Timûr every-where, laged. and was in great favour: but, at length, leave being granted him to return to Labor, he shewed a disregard for the Jagatays; which drew on him Timûr's resentment, who ordered his country to be pillaged, and his person seized. March 20th, the emperor crossed the Jenaw, and encamped five miles from thence. Next day, the army crossed the river. The 22d, they passed the Dandîna. And the day following, Timûr ordered, that all the Amîrs of both wings, The army dis- the colonels of regiments, and the captains of companies, should return home, by the different banded. routes marked out for them. He then made presents to them, according to their rank and merit. He did the like to the lords of India, Amîrs, and Shaiîfs, who had accompanied him, and permitted them to return; assigning the government of the city and province of Multân to Keder Khân, who, imprisoned by Sûrenk, in the citadel, escaped, and fled first to Abûdan, a Mohammedan, king of Biâna, dependent on Debli; and then to Timûr, on his arrival in the countryⁿ.

THE 24th, the army encamped at Jebbân, a delightful residence, on the borders of Kash-Kashmîr de- mîr. This country is a principality, near Hâk, of an oval form, and surrounded on all sides scribed. by high mountains. To the south, it has the country of Debli; to the north, Badâkshân and Khorassân; to the west, the Ugân tribes; and to the east, Tobbot, or Tibet. According to the natives themselves, there are in this province 10,000 flourishing villages: but 'tis the common opinion, that, both in the mountains and plains, there are not fewer than 100,000. The flat country between the mountains is twenty leagues in breadth. The women are beautiful to a proverb among the Persians: the air and water very wholesome. They have vast quantities of good fruits: but the winter is hurtful, because of the abundance of snow. The summer fruits, as dates, oranges, and citrons, never come to maturity; but are brought from warmer countries. The prince resides at Nagaz (O), which is the centre, and capital of the whole. Through the middle of the city runs a river, as large as the Tigris at Baghdád, and is exceeding rapid, though formed from a single fountain in the same country, called the fountain of Vir. The inhabitants have crossed it by more than thirty bridges of boats, besides chains at the chief passages; seven of which bridges are in Nagaz. a River and mountains.

^m Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 76—86. c. 24—28.ⁿ Ibid. p. 86—94. c. 28—30.

WHEN this river has passed out of Kashmír, it takes different names, from the countries it washes, as Dindana and Jamad. Above Multán, it joins the Jenave, or Jenaw; and, having passed that city, falls into the Rávi, which runs by the other Multán. At length the river Biab joins them; and, near the town of Ucha, they all rush into the Ab-send, or Indus, which is lost in the sea of Omman, or Arabia, at the end of the country of Tatta. The mountains which surround Kashmír, serve as a fortification against enemies; and over them are three roads into it: that from Khorassán is so very difficult, that the inhabitants are obliged to carry the merchandizes, and other burdens, on their backs, with beasts of carriage: the road of India is equally difficult: that of Tobbot, Tobt, or Tibbet, is easiest, but, for several days, travellers meet with venomous herbs, which poison their horses. Thus God has given the country natural defences; so that the inhabitants have no occasion for arms or armies. b

Timúr returns

MARCH 25th, Timúr, leaving Jebbán, marched to the Dandána, four miles distant, and crossed it over a bridge, which he caused to be made. Next day, he departed for Samarkant, before the army; and having marched twenty miles along that river, encamped at Sanbaste, a town in the mountain of Indis. The 27th, he came to the castle of Beruj; then entering the desert of Jaláli, or Jerú, got out of it, and came to a cavern, three miles from Beruj, where he encamped. Next day, at ten in the morning, he arrived at the Indus, which he crossed, over a bridge of boats. The 29th, he stopped at Banú. April 2d, he set out; and next day came to Nagaz, a castle built by the Amír Soleymán Sháh, to curb the Ugans. April 6th, he arrived at Kábul; the 7th, at Garbán. The 8th, having crossed the mountain and defile of Shebertú, being struck, says our author, by some evil eye, or malign influence, he fell sick, and had on his feet and hands painful ulcers: so that he was forced to be carried in a litter. Thus he passed a very narrow defile of the mountain Siapúch; in which space, they crossed the river of the defile forty-eight times: twenty-six from the beginning of the defile to the mountain, and twenty-two from the mountain to the end of the defile. The 12th, Timúr recovered. The 13th, he reached Bakalán; from whence passing through Semenkán and Kulm, he arrived at the Jibún on the 14th, and crossed over to Termed. From this place, by the way of Kolúga, or the iron gate, he came to Kash; and, having made some days stay in this city, departed for Samarkant the 9th of May, and arrived there on the 16th. Soon after, he distributed the curiosities and riches which he had brought from India, among the princes of the blood, the Sharífs, and principal men of the kingdom. To crown this Indian expedition, Timúr erected a magnificent mosk in his capital, large enough to contain all the faithful in that great city.^o c to Samarkant.

Affairs of Irán

TIMUR had not been returned above four months, when he found himself obliged to undertake a new expedition into Irán, or Persia at large, to put a stop to the disorders which had crept in there, during his absence in India; chiefly owing to the misconduct of the Mírza Mirán Sháh, viceroy of Azerbeján, whose understanding had been impaired by an accident. This prince, while hunting near Tauris, in autumn 801, saw a roebuck, which he was desirous to take with his hands: but, in stooping, he fell off his horse, though one of the best horsemen in all Asia; and the violence of the fall cast him into a swoon, in which he lay a long time. He continued in fits for three days; and his physician being an ignorant fellow, or rather a knave, the Mírza was seized with a vertigo, which impaired his senses: so that, on a bare suspicion, he slew a man, squandered away the public treasures, and destroyed the most noted buildings. He marched with his troops to besiege Baghdád, at an improper season of the year: but, two days after he had invested it, was obliged to raise the siege, on account of the revolt of Tauris; where, on his arrival, he put to the sword all who were accused of being in the conspiracy. d in great disorder;

AFTER this, taking it in his head, that the Sharíf Ali, prince of Sheki, intended to revolt, he, without farther examination, set forward with an army, to ravage his country. The Christian Georgians, before this, had revolted, when they understood how little the Mírza applied himself to public affairs; and, to revenge this invasion, in conjunction with the Sharíf Ali, went with a great army, to relieve Soltán Táber, son of Abmed, Soltán of Baghdád, who had been besieged a long time in Alenjík, by Soltán Sanjer, son of Haji Sayfo'ddin, e

^o Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 94—105, c. 30—35.

(O) Doubtless the same now called Kashmír and Srinagar. Nagaz is perhaps a mistake for Nagar, the Arabic r and z differing only by a point over the latter.

a they entered Azerbejân, and plundered the country. On which advice, Sanjer raised the siege; and, being returned to Tauris, Mirân Shâb sent his son the Mîrza Abubekr to repulse the Georgians. These latter having sent away Tâber, and placed Haji Sâleb, with three Oznawrs, or chief lords, of Georgia, in Alenjîk, in their return met the army of Tauris; which, being far less numerous, would have avoided fighting: but, as they were obliged to engage, the Georgians broke through both their wings, at the first onset; and the Sharîf Ali perceiving old, shot him dead with an arrow, which stuck in his neck: however, the Georgians defeated his troops ^p.

THE Mîrza Mirân Shâb's lunacy appeared still more in his debauches; for he spent almost all his time in drinking and gaming. One day he reproached his wife, the princess Khânîng, ^{to what owe-} Zâdeh, with a fact which wounded her honour. She endeavoured to discover the grounds of it; in which inquiry, several persons of both sexes were sacrificed. The aversion between the Mîrza and her still increasing, she retired to Samarkant; where arriving, just at the time when Timûr was returned thither for India, she assured him, that, if he did not march forth-into Irân, her husband, who, through his distemper, already slighted his mandates, would certainly revolt. The emperor, who had been before informed of the misconduct of his son, resolved to follow this advice; and immediately issued orders to assemble the troops, for a campaign of seven years. The Mîrza Shâb Rûkb, on the first notice, got ready the troops of Khorassân; and sent his Wazîr Soleymân Shâb towards Tauris, with his van-guard, following with the rest of his army. Timûr set out from Samarkant October 11th, 1399; and, crossing the Jibûn, or Amû, at Termed, came to Bâlk. From thence, after several days march, he arrived at Sarek Kâmisîh Jâm; where he visited the tomb of the celebrated Mutîrî Ahmed Jâm. From thence he sent the Mîrza Rustem to his eldest brother Pîr Mehemed, at Shîrâz, with orders for them to march to Bâghdâd. Then continuing his road by Nishâbûr and Bestâm, Ray and Khowar, to Ayvanik, he was there joined by the Mîrza Shâb Rûkb, who had marched by Shasuman, Astarabâd, and Sûri.

MEAN time, the Amîr Soleymân Shâb, being arrived at Ray, in his way from Herât to Tauris, heard of Mirân Shâb's lunacy; and not thinking it safe to go thither, resolved to ^{The authors} march to Hamadân. But, at the invitation of the Mîrza Abubekr, the Amîr went thither; and even persuaded Mirân Shâb to set out, two days after, to meet the emperor; which he did, at Shâbriar; but was not received with any tokens of kindness. Then Timûr sent commissaries to Tauris, to inquire into that prince's deportment; and it appearing, that his excesses were chiefly owing to the instigation of certain profligate musicians, and others, the emperor ordered that they should all be hanged, without exception, for a warning to others. Among the men of parts, who suffered on this occasion, was the incomparable Mûlâna Mehemed Kûbestâni, so famous for all sciences, and so celebrated a poet, whose conversation and agreeable wit had rendered him the wonder of his age.

TIMUR, leaving Shâbriar, proceeded by Soltâniya and Karaderra to Ardebîl; and, having hunted in the plains of Mukân and Aktâm (towns of Azerbejân), crossed the river Arâna, ^{Timûr ar-} ^{rives.} to Karabâgh Arrân. Here Sharîf Sidi Ahmed, son of Sharîf Ali, king of Sheki, by the mediation of Sheykh Ibrâhîm, king of Shîrwân, was pardoned, and confirmed in his principality, by Timûr; merely on account of Ibrâhîm, whom he loved, for his sincerity, and distinguished among his greatest officers. The Sheykh, to welcome his majesty's arrival in his country, made a sumptuous banquet for the court, and afterwards offered his presents, which were very considerable. Mean time, the court received advice of the death of several great princes; as Timûr Kotluk Aglen, who having been raised by the emperor to the throne of Kipjâk, after the defeat of Toktamîsh Khân, had afterwards made war on his benefactor; likewise of Barkok, king of Egypt and Syria; Tamgûz Khân, emperor of China; and Kezra Kojâ Aglen, king of Jetâb, upon whose decease dissensions arose among his four sons, Shama Jebân, Mehemed Aglen, Shîr Ali, and Shâb Jebân ^q.

f NEWS arrived also of the Mîrza Eskânder's successes in Mogulestân. This prince, though but fifteen years old, taking advantage of the dissensions which arose among the Gètes after the death of Kezra Kojâ Aglen, left Andekbân, at the head of his troops, and entered into the lands of the Moguls, or Mungls. Being come to Kashgâr, they pillaged the city of Tûrkent (P) (or Tûrkian), and then proceeding forward, plundered Sârek Kâmisîh, Kelapine, Ali Gheul, Tûr Kurgân, Chartâk, and Keyûk Bâgh (Q). They at length arrived at the province of Awj, most of whose tribes submitted: the rest they carried prisoners towards the citadel of Akshî, consisting of three castles, which have a communication with each other; and is esteemed

^p Hist. TIM. BEK, vol. ii. l. v. c. i. p. 108—112.

^q Ibid. p. 112—121. c. i—4.

(P) The present capital of Kâshgâr.

(Q) All towns of Mogulestân. La Croix.

so strong, that the inhabitants of all the neighbouring provinces consider it as a safe retreat in time of war. But the Mîrza having caused assaults to be given, one after another, for near forty days, the besieged were forced to surrender. After this, he sent troops to pillage the towns of Bay, Kusân, and Târem.

Of Mîrza Eskander;

THESE conquests finished, the Mîrza Eskânder marched from Aksû to Kotan (R). This place is thirty-five days journey from Kara Kôja, or Aramuth, and fifteen from Kâshgar, which is twenty-five from Samarkant. In Kotan are two rivers, Orakkash and Karakash, the stones of which, being jasper, are carried to other countries. The Mîrza behaved with so much prudence, that all the towns and castles of this frontier province were reduced. From Kotan he went to Karângû Tâg, a steep and rugged mountain, in which the rivers of Kotan have their springs, and to which the inhabitants of that and the neighbouring places fly for refuge in time of war: but, finding it inaccessible, returned, to winter at Kâshgar. From hence he sent presents to the emperor, and the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, of three beautiful women of Kotan: but the latter refused his present, being greatly incensed against Eskânder; because, having entered Turkestân with an army, in order to join him against the Getes, the young Mîrza, that he might not serve under Mehemed Soltân, instead of waiting for him, as he ought, marched before into Mogulestân, while his cousin, in disgust, returned to Samarkant.

and his disgrace.

WHEN spring was come, Eskânder returned to Andekbân, and thence set forward to visit Mehemed Soltân. But, learning on the road that the latter intended to seize him, he returned, and entered the castle of Andekbân. There, being taxed by two Amîrs with a design to revolt, they assembled the militia, and besieged him. Upon this, Eskânder came out, and having talked to them with much good nature, went to lodge in a garden made by his father Omar Sheykh. Then having seized his domestics, they, by Mehemed Soltân's order, carried them, with the Mîrza, to Samarkant; and having bound him, put to death his Atabek (or governor), with twenty-six of his household.

Timûr attacks
Komsha.

To return to Timûr. This prince, having chosen three men out of every ten, to serve as scouts, set out from Karabâgh Arrân; and crossing the Kûr, over a bridge of boats, was joined by Sheykh Ibrâhim, of Shirwân, and Sidi Ahmed, prince of Sheki (S), by which city the army passed, and took the road to the defile of Komsha (belonging to a prince of that name), where the infidels dwelt. As this defile was full of impassable woods, the soldiers, with their axes and saws, made a road, ten days journey in length, and broad enough for six companies to march in front. Although it snowed very hard, for twenty days together, yet the army entered Georgia, and fell upon the infidels in the mountain, giving quarter to none. Komsha, the chief of them, fled, leaving his family and effects. They destroyed his villages, with the churches, and plucked up the vine-trees, which the inhabitants, who were very fond of wine, had carefully planted. After a month's stay in this defile, the roads being impassable, through the severity of the weather, Timûr returned to Karabâgh; where an inquiry being made into the behaviour of the officers, who fought the Georgians in their return from Alenjik, some were punished with the bastinado, and all the principal officers of the Mîrza Mirân Shâh fined. The prince Burbân Aglen, who had been restored to favour, was put to death, for his misdoings in several skirmishes; and his son treated in the same manner: but the Mîrza Abubekr was much honoured, for his valour shewn in that action.

Pîr Mehemed
deposed.

Hej 802.
A. D. 1400.

THE Mîrza Rûstem, sent from Jâm to Shîrâz, as before-mentioned, being arrived at that city, was handsomely received by the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed; and set out for Bâghdâd soon after, according to his orders, leaving Pîr Mehemed behind to follow him. He passed by Toftâr and Râmhermes, to Mendeli (T); where he arrived in March 1400; and, defeating Amîr Ali Kalânder the governor, pillaged the town. Mean while, the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, after a long delay, set out for Bâghdâd: but, after some days march, turned back again, on pretence of sickness; and, by the instigation of certain persons, undertook to compose poisons and fascinations. The Amîr Saïd Berlâs, governor of Shîrâz, being informed hereof, imprisoned the Mîrza in the castle, and gave advice to Timûr; who immediately sent Allahdâd, to prosecute the offenders, and place Rûstem on the throne of Pârs, in the room of his elder brother, whom he was to bring bound to court. This Amîr put to death some men of quality, concerned in corrupting the prince; while Rûstem, coming from Mendeli, on notice given him, was, by letters patents, established in his place.

* Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 121—130. c. 4—6.

(R) This city is 157 days journey from Kambâlek, or Pe king; for, from Kotan to Kara Kôja, are thirty-five stages; thence to Tetkaw, in the borders of China, thirty-one, where there is a wall between two mountains, with a great gate, and several inns; from hence to Gben-jan Fû, a city of China, fifty-one days; and forty thence to Kambâlek; 'tis also forty from Ghen-jan Fû to Nem-nay. Sharifo'dâin.

(S) A town on the south borders of Georgia, near the Caspian sea. La Croix.

(T) A town of Arabia [rather Irak Arabi], dependent on Bâghdad. La Croix.

a WHEN Mir Ali Kalander arrived at Bâghdâd, with an account of what had passed at Aien-Plot at Bâgh- deli, Soltân Ahmed, in great perplexity, ordered the gates to be shut, and the bridge destroyed. deli.
 He was still more alarmed at the conspiracy formed against him by Sherwân. This lord had been made governor of Khâzeftân by Timûr; but, having committed several irregularities, in extorting money, and even putting to death governors of cities, he revolted, with 1000 horse, to the Soltân. He had not been long at Bâghdâd, before he began to conspire against his protector, by bribing his principal officers with vast sums of money. The plot was discovered by an officer, who finding the memorandum of the monies paid, which Sherwân's secretary had lost, carried it to his master, at such time as he had ordered the gates to be shut.
 The Soltân, more affrighted at this treason than before, sent orders to the Amîrs, who were on b an incursion with Sherwân, to cut off his head; and, in less than eight days, put to death above 2000 of his own officers in Bâghdâd; he slew, with his own hand, most of the ladies and officers of his (Sherwân's) household.

AFTER this, Soltân Ahmed shut himself up in his Saray, not suffering any one to come Soltân Ah- near him: even when the stewards brought him his dinner, they delivered it at the door, med's flight.
 without entering. He spent several days in this manner; and then crossing the Tigris, in the night, by boat, with six persons only, rode to the country of Kara Yusuf. Mean time, the stewards, as usual, delivered the king's dinner at the palace-gate; so that he returned, with Kara Yusuf and his troops, before the people knew any thing of his absence. In July Ahmed hearing that Timûr was on his march to Siwâs, in Anatolia, set out, with Kara Yusuf, his c family, and treasures, that he might get thither before the roads were stopped up by the emperor's troops. At Hâlep, he was opposed by Temûrtâsh, who commanded there; but having defeated his troops, he continued his road.

To return to Timûr. When winter was over, this prince called a dyet, wherein the war Timûr in- of Georgia being considered as preferable to all others, both on account of religion, and wades Geor- increase of power, he departed from Karabâgh for Georgia; the roads and provinces of which, gia.
 he ordered to be described in writing. In ten days he arrived in the plain of Berdaa; where he gave audience to Tabârten, prince of Arzenjân, on the Euphrates. The emperor honoured him with the marks of sovereignty, and then dismissed him, with orders to watch the motions of the Othmâns. After several days march from Berdaa, he arrived on the borders of Geor-
 d gia; from whence he sent to Mâlek Ghûrghin, king of that country, to demand Tâber, son of Soltân Ahmed: but, instead of complying, Ghûrghin returned a very uncivil answer. Upon this, the Jagatays entered his dominions, and destroyed every thing they met with, even the vines. The affrighted inhabitants, who escaped the sword, fled, with their effects and provisions, to the high mountains; where they had fortified caverns and houses, built on craggy rocks; so that no power had ever yet conquered them.

FOR all this, Timûr's soldiers, without considering the dangers, ascended the mountains; Makes great and then, laying themselves in boxes, were let down by cords to the caverns of the infidels; harack.
 which they entered, making a terrible slaughter. Some of these craggy places were so well defended, that, as well to disperse the enemy, as to burn their houses and intrenchments, the e army were obliged to make use of combustible matter. Thus they took fifteen noted places, giving quarter only to such as turned Mohammedans. Timûr left a strong garrison in Tafîs, or Tefîs, capital of Georgia, and then went to encamp in the plain of Mokrân. King Ghûrghin fled into the deserts; but the greater part of the Oznawrs came to the camp, and sued for pardon. When the country was reduced, the temples and monasteries were razed, and chapels and mosks erected in their room *.

AFTER this conquest, Timûr resolved to attack the other provinces of Georgia, and marched Takes the next towards the defile of prince Jâni Bek, whose country being pillaged, and people slain, he fortresses.
 soon came to submit himself. Among other fortresses, there was one named Bâl, at the entrance of the defile, which, though standing very high, and of difficult access, was presently taken, f and razed. The army, having ravaged other parts of the country, went to encamp in the true antient Georgia; from whence at length removing, they crossed the Kûr, laden with spoils.
 During these transactions, a great number of Oznawrs retired into the castle of Zerit, situated on the ridge of a narrow mountain, and never before taken: but Timûr having besieged it, after several attacks, on the seventh day a general assault was given, and the fort being taken sword in hand, it was demolished, and all the Georgians slain. After this, on advice that king Ghûrghin was in the town of Swânit, the emperor marched thither with one half of his army:
 but the king, not daring to wait his coming, fled towards Abkhâz (U). The troops carried

* Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 130—139. c. 7, 8.

(U) A town of Georgia, on the frontiers of Cherkassia. La Croix.—Perhaps rather the country of the Abkhâz, to the west of Mingrelia.

Swānit at the first assault; and then went in pursuit of Ghūrghin: but that prince, crossing the rivers Aygar and Korlan (X), had the good fortune to escape.

The king submits.

THE king of Georgia seeing himself reduced to the last extremity, by protecting prince Tāber, he obliged him to retire to his father, in the Othmán dominions; and then sent an ambassador to beg Timūr's pardon, with a promise, on oath, to pay the annual tribute, and send any number of forces into his service. The emperor, on those conditions, withdrew out of his country, and marched towards the territories subject to Ayvāni, one of the most powerful sovereigns of Georgia. As there was no army to oppose them, the soldiers dispersed themselves, ruining the towns and castles, and destroying every thing with fire and sword. They did the like by the country and people of Kara Kalkānlik, who were armed with black bucklers, and good mountain horsemen. After this, Timūr set forward on his return: but, receiving advice, when at Ilāk or Yeylāk Menkūl, that the enemy had assembled again in Faraşgherd, in Georgia, he marched thither; and, in five days, made himself master of seven fortresses, which he razed, after slaying an infinite number of the infidels; and then returned to Menkūl. Here ambassadors arrived from an European prince, to make an alliance with him. They brought with them the son of Amīr Morād (or Amurath), the Othmán emperor, whom they had taken prisoner. Timūr received them with great civility, granted them what they desired, and, having given them rich vests, dismissed them, to return by way of Trabizond ¹.

¹ Hist. Tim. Bek. p. 139—145. c. 9—12.

(X) Rivers of Kaşbāk, or Kipjāk. La Croix.

C H A P. V.

Timūr overthrows Bayezîd, and reduces Georgia. Dies on his march to conquer China.

Timūr offended,

DURING the two months that Timūr encamped in Menkūl, he prepared to march against Bayezîd, surnamed Ildrim, or the thunderer. This prince, who had extended his dominions considerably on every side, had not only taken Siwās and Malatîya, from princes in friendship with Timūr; but had summoned Tabārten, though he knew him to be under the emperor's protection, to come to his court, and to send the tributes of Arzenjân, Arzerûm, and their dependencies, to his treasury. Of this Tabārten sent advice to Timūr; who thereupon wrote a letter, to advise Bayezîd to keep within his own bounds, and not offer to go beyond those limits. But, as that letter contained many reproachful expressions, the Othmán made answer to the envoys, that he had long desired to have a war with their master; and that, if Timūr did not advance against him, he would go seek Timūr, and drive him beyond Tauris.

marches against Bayezîd.

THE emperor, on the return of his envoys, immediately marched towards Anatolia. Being arrived at Avenik, or Vân, he was met by the Amīr Allabdâd, who brought with him, from Shirâz, the Mīrza Pīr Mehemed, bound like a criminal. Timūr ordered that the Mīrza should be examined, in a council of war, and punished according to his deserts. He was sentenced to receive the bastinado, according to the Yasa (or laws of Jenghiz Khân); and having undergone that punishment, his chains were taken off, and he was set at liberty. By the same laws, the Sheykh Râde Ferîd, and Mobârek Kojâ, were put to death, for having corrupted the Mīrza, and taught him magic. After this, the emperor marched forward, at the head of his army; and, at his arrival at Arzerûm, was saluted by Tabārten, prince of Arzenjân. September 1, he entered the country of the Othmāns, and attacked Siwās; but, as we intend to give a pretty circumstantial account of this war, in our history of the Othmāns, we shall only slightly touch on those transactions in this place ^a.

Takes Siwās.

SIWAS, or Sebastê, a fine as well as strong city, submitted, after eighteen days leaguer, to Timūr; who ordered 4000 Armenian cavalry to be buried alive, and the walls to be razed, for an example to other places. He then sent troops in pursuit of Soltân Ahmed, who had entered Anatolia, and others, under the Mīrza Shâh Rûkb, to destroy the Turkmân robbers a of Abulghân, in Zulkâderia, who had carried off some horses. The Soltân and Kara Yusef escaped, with the loss of their baggage, and a Soltâna; but the robbers were cut to pieces. After this, he marched against Malatîyah, which he took in one day, the governor and his party flying at his approach. Then he sent out troops, on all sides, to ruin the country of Malatîyah; which they did, and returned with abundance of spoil. Thus the frontiers of Anatolia and Syria were, in a short time, brought in subjection; and as the Soltân of Egypt had offended Timûr no less than the Othmân emperor, he resolved to invade his dominions, before he proceeded any farther against Bayezîd, who had no army yet in the field.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek. p. 145—152. c. 13—15.

TIMUR, in the year 795 (1393), after he had reduced Baghdâd, having sent an ambas- Invades Syria.
sador to Soltân Bârkok, then reigning in Egypt, as hath been before-mentioned, this ambas-b sador, on his arrival at Rahaba, on the Euphrates, was seized, according to custom, and sent to Egypt; where, by the persuasions of Soltân Abmed, he was put to death. After this, Kara Yusef having, in battle, taken prisoner Atîlmîsh Kâchin, Timûr's governor of Avanîk, while that monarch was in Kipjak, sent him to Bârkok, who confined him in prison, and continued his hostilities against the Jagatays. The emperor being now on the borders of Malatîya, sent a letter to Farrûj, who had succeeded Bârkok, to demand Atîlmîsh: but Farrûj, after his father's example, ordered the ambassador to be imprisoned at Hâlep, where he had been already stopped, as usual, till notice was given to the Soltân of his arrival. Timûr, enraged at this insult, resolved to be revenged; and although, at first, the Amîrs besought him to disband his troops, who wanted repose, after so many late fatigues, yet, perceiving c him to be firm, they applauded his resolution. They marched on to Bebesna, and encamped on an eminence near the castle, which is in a defile where several torrents flow, built with very high and strong walls, on the ridge of a steep mountain ^b.

WHILE Timûr was viewing the place, a great stone, shot at him from an engine, fell near Takes Antâp, his tent, and rolled into it. Enraged at this, he immediately ordered his troops, who had taken the lower town, to besiege the fortress, in whose wall they soon made breaches with their engines, fapping them, at the same time, in other places. The governor Mokbel, seeing himself in this distress, sent to beg quarter. Timûr promised him his liberty: but said, he would take the place first, to shew, that though reckoned impregnable, it was not so to him. The 7th of October, fire being put to the props, the towers began to fall: after d which, the emperor not only spared Mokbel, but the whole garrison. The army then marched to Antâpa, or Antâp (A), a city, whose walls were built of stone, exceedingly strong, surrounded by a ditch thirty cubits deep, and near seventy wide, with a draw-bridge. The counterscarp, which was of stone, had a covered way, broad enough for a man on horseback to pass along it; which post was assigned the archers. When the Tatars arrived, they found the principal persons all gone out (B); and only a few poor inhabitants left, who immediately opened the gates to Timûr, and put him in possession of abundance of goods, as well as ammunition.

MEAN time Temûrtâsh, governor of Hâlep, having sent advice to Kâbera, or Kayro, of the Proceeds to enemy's proceedings, the Soltân sent orders for all the troops of Syria to march to that city. Hâlep.
e When they were arrived, Temûrtâsh assembled the chief commanders, to consult whether it was best to submit to a powerful prince, whose successes and conquests he set forth to advantage, or oppose him. The most experienced officers approved of the motion: but the majority, and especially Shadîn, governor of Damaskus, taxed him with cowardice (C); vaunting, that the towns of Syria were not built of mud and brick, like those of the countries conquered by Timûr, but with solid stone; and that taking but a few men out of every village, which the registers reckoned to be 60,000, an army might be raised sufficient to withstand any force.
While, therefore, it was resolved to defend Hâlep, Timûr advanced towards it. The two first days he marched six or seven leagues each; but afterwards ordered the army to move no more than half a league per day: so that, in a whole week, they proceeded but one day's f journey, and that with great precaution. The Syrians, imputing the slowness of the enemy's march to fear, abandoned their first resolution of keeping in the town, and drew out in the open field.

THE 8th of November the army of Timûr arrived near Hâlep; and, the third day after, Defeats the marched to attack the enemy in order of battle: every one had on a coat of mail, a cuirass, enemy.

^b Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 152—162. c. 15—19.

(A) Arabsbâb says, that Timûr left Kalâto'rrûm, or the castle of the Romans, without daring to attack it, on account of its strength, although the commander made several sallies upon him: yet he owns, that, by the computation of Karozem, Timûr's comptroller, his army amounted to 800,000 men. Timûr did what was necessary; and Arabsbâb hated him.

(B) According to Arabsbâb, Afsemâr the governor sallied out; and, being abandoned and wounded, fled to Hâlep, but was not pursued.

(C) Arabsbâb says, that Temûrtâsh had agreed with Timûr to betray the Soltân of Egypt.

and helmet. The right wing was commanded by the Mîrzas Mirân Shâh and Shâh Rûb; and the van-guard of it by the Mîrza Abûbekr. Soltân Mahmûd led the left wing, whose van-guard was conducted by Soltân Hussayn. The main body was commanded by Timûr himself; who had before him a rank of bulky elephants, which served as a rampart, with towers on their backs, filled with archers, and flingers of wild-fire. The battle began by the skirmishers; who rushed into the midst of the enemy's battalions, and either killed, or brought off some noted person prisoner. The right wing then fell on the Syrians left wing, which was routed by the valour of the Mîrza Abûbekr. Their left wing likewise defeated the enemy's right, while the main body performed the like service. Hereupon Shadûn and Temûrtâsh fled into the city, followed by their troops, who dispersed. The major part took the road to Damaskus: but, being pursued, only one horseman of all that great army escaped to carry the news to that city^c.

Takes the city. As for those who retreated into Hâlep, the disorder was so great in the chief street of the city, and the gates so crowded, that one could hardly pass. Here was the greatest slaughter ever mentioned: for, to avoid the fury of the sword, they flung themselves upon one another into the ditches. On the other hand, the Jagatays, with a single pike, often ran three or four of the enemy through at a time, in the throng of the gate: so that the dead bodies were piled upon one another, to the very plinth of the walls; and at length a passage was made over the ditch, upon those bodies, level with the draw-bridge. There one might see the horses and their riders mixed promiscuously, and covered with blood and dirt; some pierced with arrows, and others with their brains dashed out; one with a coat of mail, his head bending beneath the blow of a war-club; another falling without his head, his sword fast clasped in his hand. Mean time other troops were employed in pillaging the enemy's camp, where they met with abundance of spoil. At length the whole army marched to the general assault the same day, and entered the city; which they plundered of its great wealth, carrying away the women and children, horses and cattle.

The castle surrendered. SHADUN and Temûrtâsh had retired to the fortress, which was built on the ridge of a high steep rock (D), surrounded with a ditch thirty cubits wide; and so deep with water, as to carry a boat (E). From the surface of the water to the castle-wall, it is about 100 cubits; and the shelving so smooth and steep, that it is impossible to ascend it on foot, because it is covered with free-stone, and polished bricks. As soon as the Jagatays had surrounded the ditch, they shot arrows so incessantly, that the besieged dared not appear on the walls; while the sappers, crossing the water in floats, began to work at the bottom of the mountain, and shake the stones. This being perceived by the besieged, five of the bravest men, going down with a rope tied to their waist, the ends of which were held by others on the wall, ran sword in hand upon the sappers; but the Tatars, who had orders to support them, sallied out of their tents, and slew them with their arrows. After the dead bodies were drawn up, no soldier would venture to shew his head. Upon this, Timûr wrote a letter to the two generals, exhorting them to save their lives, and surrender. This they did, upon a reflection on their circumstances; and, being put in irons, with other chiefs, and 1000 soldiers, Timûr sent one of them to acquaint the king of Egypt with their condition; and that he must forthwith send Atîlmîsh to him, if he would preserve their lives.

Hama reduced. THERE were in this city treasures of an infinite value, consisting of that laid up by several kings; and the riches carried in by the citizens, in hopes of saving them. Part was distributed among the soldiers; and the rest left in charge with eight Amîrs, who were appointed to govern this strong place. Then, after fifteen days stay, he marched, to continue his conquests in Syria. He had sent before the Mîrzas Pîr Mehemed and Abûbekr as scouts towards Hama (F); the town of which they took, but could not reduce the castle: yet, on the appearance of the innumerable troops which Timûr brought, the garrison begged quarter; which was granted, but the spoil was given to the scouts. The emperor staid here twenty-two days: during which time the Amîrs made another attempt to induce him to stop here; representing, that, for two years, they had been continually on the march, or in battle; and that the enemy's troops were in much better condition than theirs. They therefore desired that they might go and repose themselves at Tripoli, on the sea-coast; so that, at the beginning of spring, they might march with vigour against the Syrians.

Hems surrendered. BUT Timûr would not hearken to their reasons; alleging, that they ought not to give the enemy any time to recover themselves. Hereupon he ordered them to march towards Hems

^c Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 162—172. c. 19—21.

(D) The castle of Alippo is not built on a rock, but a mountain of earth, covered with free-stone. La Croix.

(E) The author seems not to have seen the ditch, any more than the castle; for if the ditch was full of water, a ship might sail in it. La Croix.

(F) A city of Syria, of which the geographer, or historian, Abû'lfeida was prince. La Croix. It is the ancient Epiphania.

- a (or Emessa): and, as a great Amîr was sent before for a scout, he prevailed upon the inhabitants to submit, on promise both of their lives and effects. Accordingly, the principal men went out, loaden with presents, to meet Timûr; and received his protection. The emperor then continued his road towards Baalbek; and, in the way, detached troops to pillage the coast of Saïd (or Sidon), and Barût. When the army came before Baalbek, they admired the beauty of its walls. Among the stones, which are of a prodigious size, there is one at the corner of the castle, facing the gardens, which is twenty-eight cubits long, sixteen broad, and seven high. Its buildings are very lofty; and it is believed to have been raised by dæmons and genii, at the command of Solomon, who had an absolute power over them. For all this, it was quickly reduced by the Jagatays, who found abundance of provisions. After which, they marched toward Damaskus, which is seventy leagues distant from Hâlep, through snow and rain, it being the third of January; and, having made one day's journey, Timûr halted to visit the tomb of the prophet Noah^d.

MEAN time Farrûj, Soltân of Egypt, to whom Syria belonged, raised a great army, chiefly of cavalry, which were the best in the world; and came to Damaskus, which he put in a good posture of defence. But, relying more on policy than strength, he sent to Timûr an eloquent villain, in quality of ambassador; who, the better to cover his intentions, put on a religious habit. He was accompanied by two assassins, who had orders to murder the emperor during the ambassador's audience. When Timûr drew near Damaskus, those villains joined the court, and were admitted to pay their compliments. They had thus several favourable opportunities: but the emperor being protected by Heaven, they could not execute their designs. However, Koja Massâid Semnâni, one of the great secretaries of the council, suspected, by their behaviour, that they had some evil intention. This being related, by a third person, to Timûr, he ordered them to be searched; and poisoned daggers were found in their boots. The chief of the villains perceiving their plot discovered, confessed the truth; and was, by the emperor's order, slain with the same dagger which was found about him, and his body burnt. The two assassins had their noses and ears cut off, with design to send them, in that condition, with a letter to the Soltân of Egypt. Attempt of assassins.

Timur, being arrived at Kobbey Seyâr, ordered Shadûn, and the other prisoners, brought from Hâlep, to be put to death, farther to be revenged on Farrûj. The same night there happened an affair as ridiculous as extraordinary: The Mîrza Soltân Hussayn, after a debauch, was excited by some seditious persons to revolt against his grandfather (G). Accordingly he went to Damaskus, and lifted himself in the Syrian service. This adventure gave the enemy much joy; and Farrûj, in policy, treated him with all possible respect. Next day the army went and encamped towards the south side of the city; building a wall, the height of a man, about the camp, and digging a trench round the wall. Two days after, Timûr sent a letter to the Soltân, to demand Atîlmîsh; and offer peace, on condition that he caused money to be coined in the emperor's name, and his name to be read in the public prayers. The ambassador was received with great honour; and, being dismissed, was followed by several lords, who, from Farrûj, promised obedience to Timûr, and to send Atîlmîsh to his court within five days. Farrûj feigns submission.

Timur, believing these lords to be sincere, received them kindly, and presented them with vests; but he was soon undeceived: for, some days after, having ordered his army to remove their camp to Gauta (H), that the horses might feed in that delicious place: they had no sooner began to move, than the whole army of Syria sallied out of Damaskus, imagining that this march eastward proceeded from weakness, and an intention to fly. They thought likewise, that so numerous an army could not decamp without falling into some disorder; and that, if they took the opportunity to attack their rear, they could not fail of defeating them. With these hopes, the soldiers, issuing forth, and joined by prodigious numbers of the populace, armed with swords, sticks, or stones, fell on the rear of the Tatars; who thereupon facing about, secured their front with the bales of baggage. When the whole army were come together, and ranged in order, Timûr sent to the Mîrzas Mirân Shâb, Shâb Rûkh, and Abâbekr, who commanded the right wing, to attack the enemy on one side, while the Amîrs of the left wing pressed them on the other. As the two wings, backed by the main body, fell furiously on the Syrians, they were defeated, after an obstinate battle, and repulsed to the gates of Damaskus; after having above half their soldiers slain, and a great part dispersed: who, being pursued, were for the most part cut off^e. Attacks the Jagatays.

^d Hist. TIM. BEK, p. 172—181. c. 21—24.

^e Ibid. p. 181—189. c. 24—25.

(G) According to Arabshâh, he quitted Timûr, being ashamed to see him with his army in so miserable a condition.

(H) A great plain to the east of Damaskus, where there is a very large lake; into which the rivers watering that city fall in an united stream.

Defeated, and flies.

THIS signal victory was gained January 19th, 1400. During the heat of the battle, one of Shâb Rukb's officers fell in with the Mirza Soltân Hussayn, who commanded the Syrians left wing; and, having seized his horse's bridle, brought him to his master, who gave advice of it to Timûr. This prince ordered him to be put in prison, and loaded with chains: but he was soon after delivered, through the intercession of Shâb Rukb; yet not till he had received the bastonado, according to the Yasa; and, besides the reproaches he met with, was never after suffered to enter the emperor's hall. Next day Timûr ordered the army to march towards the city in order of battle, with the elephants at their head, to strike farther terror into the inhabitants: and it is remarkable, that, from the end of the right wing to the extremity of the left, it took up between three and four leagues of ground. The Soltân, on this, held a council; wherein it being agreed for him to return to Egypt, and leave the soldiers to defend the city, with the inhabitants, he sent an ambassador to excuse what happened the day before, as a popular sedition; and promised, that, if his highness would grant a cessation of arms for the present day only, he would next morning execute whatever he should command.

Damaskus besieged,

with great vigour.

THE emperor, on this message, ordered his army to return, and encamp a second time: but, when night came, Farrûj, accompanied by the principal lords of his court, departed from Damaskus. This flight being discovered by a Tatar deserter, Timûr sent after him a great body of horse; who overtook the Soltân, slew several of his men, and obliged the rest to abandon their equipage to fly the swifter. Next day he ordered the city to be invested by his whole army. This so terrified the inhabitants, that the Sharîfs, Kâdis, and other men of the law, opened the gates; and, going to the camp, agreed to pay a tax to save their lives. The city being thus yielded, they invested the castle, which was one of the most noted fortresses in the world. Its walls, consisting of great pieces of rock, very high, and regularly built, were encompassed with a ditch about twenty cubits wide. The soldiers having raised three platforms high enough to command the city; the battering-rams, and engines to cast stones and wild-fire, began to play; while the sappers, after the ditch was drained, fell to undermining the walls on every side, notwithstanding the great stones and wild-fire showered down on them by the besieged. They heated great pieces of the rock, by putting fire underneath, and casting vinegar thereon: and then, with their hammers, broke them out, placing wooden props, to keep the rest from falling on them. When they had done sapping the bastion of Tarma, which was the largest of all, fire was set to the shorings; when presently this high and famous tower fell, and made a vast breach by its fall: but, as the soldiers ran to enter this breach, on a sudden another part of the wall fell; which, crushing fourscore of them to pieces, so damped the ardour of the rest, that they would advance no farther.

and surrendered.

THE besieged, taking advantage of this respite, closed up the breach, and fortified themselves behind it; but, great part of the castle falling soon after, they lost all hopes: so that Yezdâr the governor caused the gate to be opened, and carried the keys himself to Timûr; who ordered him to be put to death, for having deferred surrendering too long. They found in the castle abundance of riches. The garrison, consisting mostly of Cberkassians, Hababans, Zenji, and Mamlûks, were all made slaves; so were the citizens. Timûr, observing with indignation, that, while Damascus abounded with fine edifices, the tombs of Omma Selma and Omma Habîba were neglected, ordered two magnificent marble domes to be built over them, adorned with works in sculpture. He likewise caused gold and silver to be coined in place of the Syrian money, which was coarse; and sent troops to ravage the sea-coast about the city of Akkia (or Akka).

Dreadful massacre.

Hej. 803.
A. D. 1401.

DURING these transactions, Timûr was attacked with an imposthume in his back, which was very grievous for the time, but soon went off. After this, assembling his privy-council, he told them, "He had heard that the Syrians encouraged the Ommîyan Khalîfahs in all the "cruelties they exercised against Ali, in the wars which they carried on against him; and "could not conceive how a nation should be thought to be of the sect of a prophet, which "united with the most cruel enemies of his family. He added, that so rigorous a punishment, as had then fallen on them, was a proof that the said tradition was true." This reflection of Timûr, being communicated to others, so wrought on the minds of the soldiery, that, March 28th, 1401, they broke into the city without orders, and made a terrible slaughter; enslaved the rest of the inhabitants, and seized their effects (1). The riches were so great, that the beasts they had taken between Siwâs and Damaskus not being sufficient to carry them off, they were obliged to fling away great part, such as gold and silver brocades, curious belts of Egypt, Cyprus, and the like.

As the two upper storeys of the houses of Damaskus are of wood, the lowest being of stone; and most of the ceilings, as well as walls, are varnished, next day the city took fire by acci-

¹ Hist. TIM. BES. p. 189—198. c. 25—27.

(1) Arabshâh inveighs against Timûr for the havoc made at Damaskus: and from this account, he seems to have been the cause of it.

- a dent, and burnt down : nor was it possible to quench it. Besides the wooden roof of the famous Ommîyan mosk, covered with lead, the eastern minâret, built of stone, was reduced to ashes : yet that of Arûs, named also Munar Beyza, on which the Musulmâns believe Isa; or Jesus, will descend to judge the world, though made of wood, remained intire. After this, Timûr, resolving to return out of Syria, ordered all the slaves taken in that country, as well as Damaskus, to be set at liberty. He then set forward, the 31st of March; and sent for the Mîrza Mebemed Soltân from the frontiers of Mogulestân, to invest him with the empire of Hulâkû, which he deserved for his merit. When he arrived at Hems, he sent the Mîrzas Rûstem and Abûbekr, with 10,000 horse; to the city of Tadmîr (or Tadmor), built by Solomon, the houses of which are free-stone, to pillage the subjects of Zulkâder, who were in its neighbourhood. The Mîrza Soltân Hussayn, at the head of 5000 horse, marched to Antiokh; and the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân, with 15,000 horse, was detached against the Turkmâns of Kubek, who were encamped on the Euphrates. The city burns

- THE first party, having made the Zulkâderians fly into Arabia, and brought away 200,000 Turkmâns sheep, went on to the Euphrates. The second party pillaged the city and country of Antiokh; spoiled. and then, joining the third at Hâlep, marched towards Kalâto'rrûm, and the Euphrates. Here, meeting the Turkmâns, they were vigorously attacked : but the Sheykh Hussayn, son of Kubek, their leader, being slain, his brothers fled with the rest of those people, who left a great prey of cattle : so that, with what the other soldiers had gotten, they reckoned 800,000 sheep, which sold for a dinâr apiece, and were obliged to leave the other animals behind. Mean while Hamah Timûr proceeded on his way. When he came to Hamah, he ordered the town to be pillaged; pillaged. the houses plundered, and the inhabitants made slaves; to punish them for destroying the edifices which the Jagatays had built at their first arrival. The walls likewise of the castle of Halep were razed, and the houses burnt, by the Amîrs, who then joined the imperial army, which in four days marched to the Euphrates, where the other detachments met them. As the Mîrza Soltân Hussayn performed several brave actions in his expedition, he obtained pardon for his former fault, and was received into favour.

- THE army crossed the river, by swimming, over-against the city of Bîr; from whence two Bîr and Roha boats were sent to carry over the baggage of the emperor, who confirmed the governor in his yield. post. Here Kara Ozmân, governor of Malatiya, arrived also, and was handsomely received. d After Timûr's departure from hence, he had a mind to hunt in Mesopotamia: hereupon a circle was made by the two wings, five days journey in circuit, of which the fountain of Râso'l Ayn (K) was the centre: where they found such abundance of game, that they took them with their hands. The hunt concluded with a feast; in which they ate of antelopes and roebucks, whose flesh is very tender, and the best of all the animals of the desert. In their passage, the inhabitants of Roba, or Orfa, came out with presents, and were kindly treated: but a castle beyond it was razed; and the Armenian robbers, who held it, cut to pieces. The army then advanced to Mardîn; whither the Soltâns of Husni Keyfa (L) and Arzina, and other lords in those quarters, came to salute the emperor: only the Soltân of Mardîn, who had been set at liberty Mardîn and restored by Timûr, not having followed the army into Syria with his troops, or sent any of revolts. his brothers on that duty, dared not come to meet his highness. Timûr, however, kindly e asked after him, and sent for him in very obliging terms: but he refused, confiding in the strength of the place. And, as the emperor was sensible it would require a long siege to reduce it (M), he was contented to ruin and burn all the houses of the lower town; at the same time ordering Kara Ozmân to block up the fortress so closely, that not a man might escape.

- Timûr*, having sent the Amîr Allâhdâd to take care of the frontiers of Jetab, departed from Alenjîk Mardîn. After which, he detached the Mîrzas Soltân Hussayn, Pîr Mebemed, Omar Sheykh, reduced. and Abûbekr, with a great body of the army, to Alenjîk; with orders, after taking that fortress, to march into Georgia: but as they had heard at Vân, that Alenjîk, after two years siege, had been Georgia forced by famine to surrender, they turned off towards the right for Georgia; and made such invaded. haste, that they surprised the inhabitants, and ravaged their country. Hereupon Mâlek Gûrghîn sent to acquaint the Mîrzas, that he was surprised at this invasion, seeing he was one of the emperor's most faithful servants; and that, as soon as his highness should come into those parts, he would not fail to pay obedience to him. Upon this, the Mîrzas ceased ravaging his country; and sent to know if Timûr would grant that king quarter, waiting at Menkûl the return of the courier.

z Hist. Tim. Bek, p. 198—203, c. 27.—30.

(K) From hence springs the river Al Khabâr, which falls into the Euphrates at Karkisia.

(L) Corruptly called Hasan Keif; a city on the Tigris, between Amed and Mûssel. La Croix.—'Tis also, by travellers, written Atan Keif and Chief: it should be Hasn or Hesu Keyf, that is, the castle of Keif.

(M) Arabshâh says, that Timûr could not take the castle of Mardîn, because situated on an inaccessible rock, large enough to contain much plowed lands, with several springs of water.

Bâghdâd
besieged.

At the same time the Soltân Mahmûd Khân and the Mirza Rûstem, with several Amîrs at the head of their Tomâns, according to orders, set out for Bâghdâd. Where, as soon as they arrived, Farrûj, of the Jalayr tribe of Mungls, who was governor, supported by vast multitudes of Turks and Arabs, sallied out, being joined by several princes and Amîrs of Irâk Arabi: from the east, came the Amîrs Ali Kalânder, of Mendeli, and Jân Ahmed Bakû; from the west, Farrukshâh, of Hilleb, or Hella, and Mikâil, of Sîb, with 3000 men. The Mirza Rûstem immediately took horse, with his troops: and, surrounding the enemy, repulsed them as far as the Tigris, where a bloody battle ensued. Jân Ahmed was slain, with many of the bravest soldiers; and others drowned in the river. For all this defeat, Farrûj would not surrender; pretending that Soltân Ahmed ordered him to deliver up the city to Timûr, if he came in person, but not else. Of this the Amîr sent advice to the emperor; who, after the submission of Nisibîn, having passed the Tigris at Musel, in his way to Tauris, immediately set out for Bâghdâd, accompanied by the bravest men in his army, by way of Altûn Kupruk (N). As soon as he arrived at that city, he encamped at the lower part of the river, opposite to the gate called Kariet Ulakab; and his troops, surrounding the walls, though two leagues in compass, began to sap them.

Its vigorous defence.

MEAN time Farrûj, desirous to know if Timûr was come, sent to him, as an ambassador, one who knew him; who was admitted to audience, and honoured with a vest: but although this person was a confidant of the governor, yet, at his return, he imprisoned him, under pretence that he told what was not fact. On the other hand, Timûr caused a bridge of boats to be laid across the Tigris, below Kariet Ulakab; and took all necessary precautions to block up all the passages with his troops: in short, it was so inclosed on all sides, that although the river ran through the middle of it, and was covered with boats, yet it was impossible for any body to get out. In the interim, Farrûj, and the inhabitants, thro' despair, rather than bravery, performed actions which almost exceeded human power: for, as soon as the Tatars made a breach by sapping, the besieged immediately repaired it with mortar and brick, and entrenched themselves behind. The heat was now so violent, that the birds fell down dead, and the soldiers melted like wax under their cuirasses: for all this, they raised a platform which commanded the city, from whence they incessantly cast stones with their engines.

Taken by assault.

THE Amîrs had often begged to make a general assault; but Timûr would not give leave, in hopes the enemy would submit: but, at the end of forty days, on the 23d of July, when the inhabitants were forced, by the heat of the sun, to quit the walls, and retire to their houses, leaving their helmets reared on sticks in their places, the army advanced furiously to the walls; and, having fixed their scaling ladders, the Amîr Sheykh Nûro'ddîn mounted first: then, sounding the drums and trumpets, all the commanders followed, and the troops entered sword in hand. The inhabitants, endeavouring in vain to fly from the place to avoid the sword, cast themselves into the Tigris. Several got into boats; and others swam, to descend the river: but were no sooner come to the bridge, than they were shot by soldiers placed in ambush. However, Farrûj found means to escape by water, with his daughter: but, being closely pursued, and not able either to defend himself, or get off, cast himself with his daughter into the river, where they were both drowned, and the boat sunk. Afterwards his body was taken up, and thrown on the bank^b.

Barbarous
massacre.

As several Tatars had been slain in the assault, each soldier was ordered to bring one (O) head of the men of Bâghdâd; in executing which command, they spared neither old men of fourscore, nor children of eight years old; the number of the dead was so great, that the officers could not count them; and of their heads they made towers. Although no quarter was given to either rich or poor, yet some learned men found means to get access to Timûr; who pardoned them, gave them vests, and a convoy to places of safety. After this, the markets, karawânsarays, monasteries, palaces, and all other buildings were razed, excepting mosks, colleges, and hospitals. The air becoming infected with the stench of the dead bodies, the camp was removed to the upper part of the river, near the tomb of the great Imâm Abû Hanîfab, chief of the four orthodox sects among the Mohammedans, whose intercession Timûr implored. From this place he ordered Soltân Mahmûd Khân and the Mirza Kalil Soltân to make inroads in the neighbouring places. They accordingly passed by Hilleb, as far as Mashhâd Nejes (P); and thence to Wâset (on the Tigris). They ravaged the two cities: but paid their devotions at the holy place of Mashhâd, instead of attacking it.

Bâghdâd
destroyed.

^b Hist. Tim. Bck. p. 208—215, c. 30—32.

(N) A bridge on the river Altûn Sû (or water of gold), near Mûssel. La Croix.

(O) Arabshâh says, two; and that 90,000 were slain in cold blood. They flung away the bodies; and made trophies of their heads, piled up together in towers, to the number of 120.

(P) The same as Mashhâd Hussayn, in the plain of Kerbela, near the Euphrates, often mentioned before.

- a TIMUR took the road to Shebrezâr and Kâlgbi, leaving the main body to come after with the baggage. As, in this march, the Kûrds attacked all who separated themselves, tho' at ever so small distance, from the army, the emperor placed soldiers in ambush round the roads; who, falling out as soon as those robbers appeared, seized, and hanged them on the chestnut-trees which grew in the highways (Q). At the river Jagatû, the empress Saray Mulk Kham, and other wives of the Mîrzâs, with their children, met his highness; and at Akziaret the sharîfs, doctors, and principal lords, of Irân, came to wait on him. During his stay at this place, he invited the learned to dispute on points of religion. When he had passed by Ujûn (R), and was encamped at Hesht Rûd, or the eight rivers, he received advice that Bâyezîd, who, during his stay in Syria, had taken Arzenjân from Tabârten, was marching towards the east. Hereupon Timûr ordered the troops who were at Menkûl in Georgia to join the Mîrza Shâb Rûkb at Avenîk (or Vân), and oppose the Othmâns. But a messenger arriving from Tabârten, with advice that Bâyezîd desired peace, and would make him satisfaction; the Mîrza sent notice to court, and staid for an answer.

- MEAN time Timûr, being arrived at Tauris, a few days after marched towards Georgia: and, when he came to Kom-tûpa, ordered the Koja Ismael Kavâsi to be hanged before the market-place of the camp, for the tyrannies he had exercised over the people. He afterwards crossed the Arâs, and encamped at Nakhshivân; from whence he went to see the castle of Alenjîk, which is near that city. About this time Tabârten arrived at court with a letter from Bâyezîd; and, by his intercession, obtained pardon for the Othmân. Here being joined by Shâb Rûkb, and the other Mîrzâs, with their troops, the army marched to the defile of Shâhbûz, and entered the mountains. From thence they passed by Gheukbey Tonkez to Shemkûr, a town of Georgia: whither the commissary, sent to Mâlek Ghûrgîn, returned with that prince's brother, who brought the tribute, and rich presents; promising, in the king's name, due obedience, and to keep troops always ready for the emperor's service. The prince being dismissed with orders for Mâlek to send an army forthwith to join the imperial troops, Timûr removed his camp to Karawl Topa; from whence, marching by Ghenjeb and Berdâa, he came, the 12th of December, to Karabâgh Arrân, where he wintered. Here ambassadors arriving from Kipjâk, to assure the emperor of the Khân's obedience, diverted him from his intended expedition into that country in the following spring. Here also the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân came from Samarkant, and was received with great honour, his father placing a crown of gold upon his head. He brought with him bound the Mîrza Eskânder; who, having been convicted, before the Divân, of a fault committedⁱ, received the bastinado; but at length his chains were taken off, and he was set at liberty^k.

- As soon as Soltân Ahmed heard that Timûr had left Bâghdâd, he returned thither with a design to rebuild that city: but Timûr, being informed of this, sent four bodies of troops, under the Mîrzâs, by different roads, to ravage the country, and prevent his intention. One party, passing through the country of the Kûrds (who, during the winter, were encamped in the plains), put an infinite number to the sword. The Mîrza Abûbekr, who took the road to Bâghdâd, arrived there so suddenly, that the Soltân, with his son Taber, and some domestic officers, crossing the Tigris in a boat, fled to Hilleh, whither he was hotly pursued; but, by breaking the bridge behind him, escaped into the isles of Kbâled and Mâlek in the Euphrates. Another detachment pillaged Mendeli, and defeated the governor Ali Kalânder: while a fourth advanced to Wâset (on the Tigris), and plundered the Arabs of Abbâdân (S), from whom they took a considerable spoil in horses and camels. When winter was over, all the troops joined about twelve leagues from Bâghdâd, and marched together to the imperial camp.

- BÂYEZID having given protection to Kara Yûsef, who had begun afresh to rob passengers; and even insulted the Karawân of Mekba, Timûr resolved to make war on him: but, as the inhabitants of Anatolia, who had already experienced this monarch's power, represented the destruction which would attend the arms of so formidable an enemy; the Soltân sent ambassadors to Karabâgh, with a letter, asking pardon for what was passed, and promising obedience for the time to come. Timûr, unwilling to hurt a prince who was at war with the infidels of Europe, told them that he would forbear hostilities, provided their master would either put Kara Yûsef to death, send him to the Tatar camp, or expel him out of his dominions. After this, he did them particular honours, and dismissed them, accompanied with an ambassador of his own; telling them, that he would march in spring to the borders of Anatolia, where he would wait for an answer, which would determine whether their master desired peace or war.

ⁱ See before, p. 552.^k Hist. Tim. Bek, l. v. c. 32—37. p. 215—226.

(Q) The author was informed by credible persons, that these trees one year produce chestnuts, and the next gall nuts: but La Croix believes he mistook the oaks, which have that property, for chestnut trees; which, he says, are very uncommon in Syria.

(R) A town of Azerbejân, near Tauris. La Croix.—Herbert calls it Ojont.

(S) A town of Arabia, on the borders of Irâk Arabi, on the Persian gulf, near Basrah, or Bassora. La Croix.

Timûr irresolute.

Hej. 804.
A. D. 1402.

Consults the astrologers.

Marches towards Anatolia.

Takes Kamek fortress.

WHILE Timûr was hunting in the plain of Aktâm (south of Arrâs), to which the Othmân ambassadors were invited, he perceived an old canal ruined by time, which he resolved to restore by means of his soldiers; who carried on the work with so much vigour, that, in a month, two leagues of it, deep enough for a boat, were dug. The spring-head is at a place called Surkapil; and it falls into the Arrâs, at another named Kiesbk Chengbîski. The emperor gave it the name of Nâbri Berlâs, or River of Berlâs; and, on its banks the inhabitants have since built several towns, villages and pleasure-houses, with gardens and vineyards. When spring came, Timûr was still in suspense whether he should march against Bâyezîd, though he knew him to be his enemy; in consideration, partly, that he so zealously maintained a religious war against infidels; and partly because the Ottomân empire abounded with valiant as well as martial troops. On the other hand, the Jagatays being greatly fatigued with a long continual service, the Amîrs endeavoured to dissuade Timûr from the expedition; alleging, among other reasons, that, in the campaign against the Othmâns, there appeared in the heavens, according to the astrologers, an inevitable misfortune attending the Jagatayan army.

THE emperor, upon this, sent for Mûlâna Abdo'llah Lesân, one of the most famous court-astrologers; and, to remove the apprehensions of the Amîrs, ordered him to declare what the different aspects of the heavens portended. Abdo'llah hereupon said, "It appears, by the ephemerides of the present year, that the ascendant of this empire is in the highest degree of strength, and that of the enemy in the lowest degree of weakness. A comet will appear in Aries; and an army, which comes from the east, will make an intire conquest of Anatolia, the prince of which will be taken prisoner (T)." All objections being thus removed, Timûr, in the end of April, departed from Karabâgh; and, by way of Berdâa and Ghenjeh, arrived at Shemkûr; from whence he marched towards Âlatâk (U). Having passed by Tabadâr, on the borders of Georgia, he came to the plains of Menkûl; from which place he sent a second ambassador, with a letter, to Bâyezîd, importing: that, in case the Soltân consented to what he had desired, and would deliver up the fortress of Kemak (W), which had been always subject to the countries under the obedience of Timûr, he would not interrupt his wars against the infidels, but even succour him with his troops¹.

THERE being a strong castle, named Tartûm, in the neighbourhood, whose garrison refused to pay tribute, and insulted passengers, Timûr sent troops to take it; which they did on the sixth day of the siege, and put all the Georgians to the sword. He staid at Avenik (or Vân) for the return of his ambassadors sent to Bâyezîd: but, when two months were passed beyond the time agreed on, finding all his endeavours to preserve Anatolia were frustrated, he continued his march towards that country. When he came to Arzerûm, the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân begged leave to go and conquer the castle of Kemak, which his father granted; and when he arrived at Arzenjân, he sent the Mîrzas Abûbekr, Kalil Soltân, Soltân Hussayn, and Eskânder, with more troops, to his assistance in the siege. The castle of Kemak (X) is one of the most noted in all Asia: it is situated on a high steep rock, and surrounded with a defile in form of a labyrinth. At the bottom of its walls are gardens, and parterres of flowers, on the bank of the Euphrates; and no prince had ever taken it by force. Several poets have compared it to the terrestrial paradise, because every year, for three days together, little birds as big as sparrows, and unfledged, fall out of the air; which the inhabitants gather up, and preserve salted in pots. If they do not take them in three days, their wings grow large enough to fly away.

THE troops no sooner came before Kemak, than they besieged it in form. They made their approaches for ten days; during which time they cut off the water which supplied the place. Next day they made rope-ladders; and, in the night, the Mekrit soldiers, who ran up the steepest mountains like roe-bucks, got to the top of the rock; from whence they let down cords, by which a great number of brave men mounted, armed with cuirasses, during the darkness. When the besieged perceived them, they cast down great stones; and several, missing the steps, fell down. Next morning the soldiers mounted to the assault; while wild-fire flew from the engines on both sides. The officers of the Mîrza Abûbekr, who himself did wonders, first scaled the walls, and erected the horse-tail: at the same time others mounted on all sides, and became masters of the place. When Timûr received advice that Kemak was taken, he came before it; and gave the government to Tabârten, because it was no more than seven leagues from Arzenjân^m.

¹ Hist. Tim. Bek, l. v. p. 228—238. c. 37—41.

^m Ibid. l. v. p. 238—242, c. 42, & seqq.

(T) La Croix, in the margin, puts, Admirable prediction of an astrologer; as if he believed in that idle science, or rather imposing art; and took it for granted, that the prediction was made according to its rules: whereas it might have been framed to encourage the army; or only added by the historian from report, which always magnifies or changes facts.

(U) Perhaps it should be Avanik, or Vân.

(W) On the Euphrates, twenty-one miles south of Arzenjân.

(X) Kamek, Kamak, or Kamkê, as in the Nabian geography.

a AFTER this, Timûr marched forward; and at Siwâs, or Sebaste, was met by his ambassador, with two others from Bâyezîd; whose answer was so unsatisfactory, that the emperor refused their presents, and bid them tell their master, they must prepare for war. Having reviewed his army, he departed from Siwâs; and, sending troops to take the castle of Harûk, marched towards Kaysariya, or Cæsarea, in Kappadocia; to whose inhabitants he gave quarter; and then set out for Akkhara (Y), to meet Bâyezîd, who was advancing on that side. The Amîr Shâb Mûlek, who was sent before to get intelligence, with a thousand horse, lay in ambuscade, to surprise the Othmân scouts; and defeated them. Bâyezîd's son, on the other hand, formed an ambuscade near the camp of Timûr, but to no effect. The emperor, being come to Ankora, laid siege to it: but, on advice that Bâyezîd was approaching, he ordered it to be raised, and the army to march toward the enemy. Next day, being the first of July, the two armies met, and came to an engagement, the particulars of which we shall relate elsewhere^a; and therefore shall only mention here, that Timûr gained the victory; and Bâyezîd was taken prisoner, with his son Mûssa, who were treated with great humanity and honour^b.

Defeats and takes Bâyezîd.

Upon this great defeat, Ankora submitted; and Timûr sent the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân towards Prusa, to seize the treasures of Bâyezîd, and other riches of that city. While the Mîrza Eskûnder was detached to Konîya (Kogni, or Ikonium), Akshâbr, Karabissar, Satalia, and other places, the Mîrza Shâb Rûkk was sent to Gbulbissar, and Timûr himself marched to Khyutakia; from whence he sent out parties towards other cities, to ravage all the country of Anatolia, while he recreated his court and great officers with feasts and rejoicings. Although the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân made the greatest haste to Prusa; yet Mussulman Chelebi had gotten thither before, and fled with the treasures: the principal inhabitants also fled different ways; but were pursued and brought back. Bâyezîd's wife and two daughters were taken at Yenishabr (Z); as was likewise the daughter of Soltân Abmed, king of Bâghdâd, whom Bâyezîd had demanded in marriage for his son Mestafa. The Mîrza seized on what treasure had been left at Prusa, consisting in abundance of plate and rich furniture: after which, the pillage was given to the soldiers; who, when they had done plundering, set the houses on fire.

Ankuria surrenders.

Prusa taken.

From thence the Mîrza Abûbekr, being sent to Isnik, or Nice, took and pillaged it: he also reduced the whole country. Then marching with the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân to Yenishabr, married Bâyezîd's eldest daughter. Mean time Mîrza Soltân Hussayn, detached to make inroads in the southern parts, took Akshâbr and Karayser (or Karabissar), plundering the towns as far as Koniyab; while others ravaged the province of Aydin, and the sea-coast. Timûr generously sent to Bâyezîd his wife Destina (A); and restored the Amîr Mehemed, son of Karamân, who had been twelve years kept in chains by Bâyezîd, to the government of all Karamânia. After this, he left Kyûtakiya, where he had staid a month, and marched towards Tangûzlik. In the way, he issued out a severe order, that the brave Sainte Maure and his brother Morâd should be put to death, for several crimes he had committed; with his son, and other brothers: Koja Firûz, prince of Isra Yaka (B), was treated in the same manner. At the same time feasts were prepared; to which Bâyezîd was invited, and treated with great honour: further to comfort him, Timûr conferred on him, by patents, the kingdom of Anatolia, and had the crown placed on his head^c.

Isnik pillaged.

THE feasting being over, Timûr, October 25th, sent an ambassador to Farrîj, Soltân of Egypt, with a letter, threatening to march to Kâberah, or Kayro, unless he ordered money to be coined with his (the emperor's) impress; the Kotbah to be made in his name; and Atilmîsh to be sent without delay. Two other ambassadors were sent to the Tekkâr, or Greek emperor, to summon him to pay tribute, and the customs; likewise messengers to Mussulman Chelebi, who had fled to Isra Yaka, and resided at Ghuzelbissar, which his father had built above Constantinople, threatening to send over the army, if he did not forthwith repair to court, or at least lend Timûr money. Some time after, the ambassadors, sent to the Greek emperor, returned with two others, to make his submission, and agree to pay the imposed tribute. At Bûlûk he was overtaken by the messengers sent to Mussulman Chelebi, and an ambassador, with a letter from that prince, promising to come and throw himself at Timûr's feet. After this, advice was brought, that Soltân Mohammed Khân, titular emperor of Jagatay, who, by Timûr's order, was gone to make inroads, had died of a violent distemper, with which he had been seized at Kechik Bûrlûgh (in Ghermian-îli); at which news Timûr was very much afflicted.

Egypt and Turkey threatened.

^a See, in a subsequent volume, the History of the Othmân Turks.
c. 43—49.

^b Ibid. l. v. p. 258—267. c. 50—53.

^c Hist Tim. Bek, l. v. p. 242—257.

(Y) The same as Ankuria, Anguri, or Enguri, as 'tis variously written, the ancient Ancyra; a city towards the north part of Anatolia, and about the middle from east to west.

(Z) Four leagues from Prusa, and six days journey from Constantinople; the same as Teniche. La Croix.—

It seems rather to be ten leagues from Prusa, or Purfa. It is called also Shabrno.

(A) The European romances call her Roxana; and say, Timûr kept her for his own use. La Croix.

(B) That is, Turky in Europe. La Croix.

Anatolia ravaged.

MEAN time Kechil Búrlúgh, Akyaka, and Satala, situated on the sea-coast, were ravaged. ^a Afterwards the provinces of Mentesha and Teke-ili were ruined, by the Amírs sent for that purpose, who returned to court laden with booty. During autumn, the emperor lay encamped at Tangúzlik: where, the air being infected by the violent heat, several soldiers died, as well as by drinking the water of a spring at this place, which petrifies when it stagnates. Timúr, having settled the winter-quarters for his troops, sent the Mírza Mehemed Soltán to Magnasiab, in the province of Serban-ili (or Sarúkbán), and Shâh Rúkb, to quarter in the province of Ghermian-ili, between Olúg Búrlúgh and Kechik Búrlúgh. After this, the emperor marched to Dúgúrlík; and, having crossed the Menduras, came to Ghuzelbissar (C); from thence he passed on to Ayázlik (D); then to Tira, one of the most noted cities of Anatolia, whose inhabitants, like those of other places, were obliged to pay the ransom for ^b their lives.

Smyrna taken,

BEING informed at this place, that, on the sea-coast, there were two exceeding strong fortresses, named Ezmír (or Smyrna), one possessed by Christians, the other by Mohammedans, who were incessantly at war on account of religion; he thought it his duty to deliver the Mussulmans, by extirpating their enemies. Hereupon he sent the Mírza Pír Mehemed, son of Omar Sheykh, to summon the Christian Ezmír to embrace the faith: but, on the news of his approach, Mahmús the governor, craving aid of all the European princes, soon assembled a considerable force. Timúr, being informed of this, marched in person to attack the place; and, having been joined by all his troops, laid siege to the same in form; whereof we shall give an account in the Turkish history ¹. The place being taken, the inhabitants were put to the sword, excepting a few, who swam to the ships in the road; and all the houses demolished. ^c As all this was done in fourteen days, the people of the country were astonished, who were acquainted with the strength of the place, and knew that it had never been taken before by any Mohammedan prince: besides Morád, father of Báyezíd, had several times attempted it, with a formidable army, to no purpose; and Báyezíd himself had laid siege to it for seven years in vain ².

and ruined.

Foja and Khio yield.

H. 805.
A. D. 1403.

DURING these transactions, ambassadors arrived again from Mussulman Cbelebi, and from Isa Cbelebi, another of Báyezíd's sons, promising the utmost obedience; with whose misfortunes the emperor was touched. Foja, another Christian castle, a day's journey distant from Ezmír, submitted on sight of the troops of Timúr; who afterwards having furnished the Mussulmans, who inhabited the other castle of Ezmír, with arms to repulse the enemy, went to encamp at Ayázlik. There ^d Soba, an European prince of the island of Khio, in which grows mastick, sent an ambassador to Timúr, offering submission, and to pay the tribute; upon which he was taken into the emperor's protection. From Tangúzlik the army marched to Soltán Hissar (*); where Timúr gave the cities of Khyútabia, Tangúzlik, and Karashár, with the province of Ghermian-ili, to Takúb Cbelebi, who fled from Báyezíd to the emperor, and was the rightful heir. Being come to Ulug Búrlúgh, which had not yet surrendered, he gave orders to attack it. It was soon taken; and as the Amír Jalálo'l Islám was slain before it, the men were all put to the sword, the women carried away captive, and the place demolished. Here Timúr ordered the Mírza Mehemed Soltán to march by the road of Ankora, and rejoin the camp at Kaysariya.

Other places taken.

AFTER this, leaving Ulug Búrlúgh, in two days and nights he reached Egridur, a city ^e built with free-stone, in the province of Hamid-ili. It stands on the bank of a fresh-water lake, called by some Falak abád, five leagues long, and four broad. Three of its sides are surrounded by the lake, and the fourth by a mountain. In the midst of the lake are two isles, Ghúlistán and Nasibín; in which last is built a fortress, whither the neighbouring people had retired for safety with their effects. As Timúr thought himself obliged in honour to take this place, he ordered it to be attacked by his troops: who, soon entering it, put the inhabitants to the sword, excepting a few, who escaped in boats to Nisibín; which island they resolved to attack next. To this purpose, the Mírzas and Amírs having crossed over on floats made of the skins of oxen and horses, the governor immediately went out and submitted. Thence the court marched to Akshábr, where the Amír Mehemed Karamán came from Koníya, ^f and, under the name of ransom, among other things, presented such vast sums of silver, that it was thought he did more than he was able, considering the small extent of his country; which made Timúr honour him the more.

Death of Báyezíd.

ABOUT this time Báyezíd fell sick, and soon after died at this place; whose death Timúr bewailed with tears, having intended, after the conquest of Anatolia, to re-establish him on the throne. He bestowed several largesses on that prince's officers; and presented his son Mússa Cbelebi with a royal vest, a load of gold, and other rich things, and then dismissed

¹ See a subsequent volume.

² Hist. Tim. Bek, l. v. c. 54--57. p. 267--278.

(C) This is the same with Magnesia, on the Meander; the same as Menduras in the text, by others called Mandre.

(D) Or Ayúzaluk, the same as Ephesus.
(*) Or Tralles.

a him; telling him, that his father should be buried with the greatest pomp. Mean time advice came, that the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân was likewise fallen ill; and that, through the unskillfulness of his physician, he was become delirious. Upon this, Timûr immediately departed from Akshâbr, for the place where his grandson lay sick; and, having harassed the lands of the Dârgot tribe of Turkmâns in the way, March 25th arrived thither, and found the Mîrza speechless. He ordered him to be put in a litter, and departed: but, coming to Kara Hissar three days after, the prince died there, aged eighteen years, extremely regretted ^{and Mehemed Soltân.} by Timûr, on account of the great actions he had performed, and what might have been expected from him. His corpse was sent under a convoy to Avenik (or Vân); whence, being put in a new coffin, it was sent to be interred at Soltânîya, in the prophet Kayder's tomb; b from whence it was translated afterwards to Samarkant ³.

WHEN Timûr's ambassadors were arrived at Kayro, they found a handsome reception from Egypt ^{sub-} Farruj, surnamed Alimâleko'n-nâfir; who, having heard of Bâyezîd's overthrow, thought it ^{mits.} would be ruinous to refuse obedience to the conqueror: he therefore, by advice of his council, caused money to be coined, and prayers read, in Timûr's name; and, after honouring Atîlmîsh with an audience, sent him back, with two ambassadors, and presents, to intercede for him. Timûr, being pleased with this submission, dismissed the ambassadors with a crown, mantle, and belt enriched with precious stones, for the Soltân. Being then in the country of the Kara Tatars, he resolved to remove those people into Tartary. They are a nation of Turks, whom Hûlâkî brought with him into Irân (in 1256); and, having experienced their malice, obliged them to reside on the borders of Anatolia and Syria: but, in the confusion c which arose in Irân on the death of Abûsaïd Khân (in 1320), they revolted; and, dividing themselves into fifty-two tribes, resolved to live independent. When Bâyezîd, after the death of Kâdhi Burhânoddîn, prince of Siwâs, was become master of this kingdom, he enrolled them in the Othmân army, and gave them a residence in his empire, where they became exceeding rich and powerful.

As Timûr's design of removing them was to re-people Jetab, he treated their chiefs with Kara Tatars great honour, and likewise made them presents, when they came to salute them: but, as ^{transplanted.} there were between thirty and forty families of them, he ordered his army to surround the plains of Amasia and Kaysariya (E), where they dwelt, that none might get away, and then d sent for their chiefs; who, after being told his resolution to carry them back into Tartary, seemed readily to submit to his will; and, being distributed among his troops, began their march with them out of Anatolia. When Timûr arrived at Kaysariya, the inhabitants, thro' fear, defended themselves against his troops; but, being overpowered, were all cut to pieces. From thence he went to Siwâs, where he conferred several honours on Kara Osmân, and sent him back to his principality. At Arzenjân he was complimented by the faithful Tabârten, on whom he bestowed a royal vest. From thence he passed on to Arzerûm; and at length Timûr comes e came to Avenik (or Vân), where the empresses met him, clothed in black, for the death of ^{to Vân.} the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân; which being now made known to the princess Khân-zâdeb, she swooned away, and tore herself like one distracted.

AFTER this excess of mourning, Timûr, for the good of the deceased prince's soul, gave f alms to the poor; and provided a funeral banquet, where the Sharîfs, doctors, grandees, and nobles, of all Asia, assembled on this occasion. They sat down, according to their rank, at the emperor's table: the korân was read over several times. The banquet was served up by his majesty's stewards: the Mîrza's brass drum was beaten; whereat the ladies, Amîrs, and soldiers, made a great cry, and wept bitterly; after which, it was broken to pieces, according to the custom of the Mungls ⁴.

MEAN time Mâlek Ghûrghîn, king of Georgia, having failed to come, at the time appointed, ^{Enters Geor-} to cast himself at Timûr's feet, and beg pardon, that monarch marched into his country; and, ^{gia.} being arrived at Menkûl, received the submission of Mâlek Iffa (or Aysa), prince of Mardîn, f who, with his head uncovered, begged pardon on his knees. The emperor, after reprimanding, forgave him. As this prince brought with him the tribute for several years past, and made abundance of handsome presents, Timûr gave him a crown, a royal vest, and a belt set with precious stones. As an addition to those favours, his daughter was betrothed to the Mîrza Abûbekr; and thus had the honour to be allied to the emperor. At the same time Yowâni, grandson of Akbûga, a Georgian prince, and Kustandil, brother to Mâlek Ghûrghîn, besides the lords and princes of all the neighbouring places, came with presents to pay their homage. Timûr received them with great civility; and, presenting them with vests, dismissed them.

³ Hist. Tim. Bek, l. v. p. 279—289. c. 57—62.

⁴ Ibid. p. 285—299. c. 62—65.

(E) I believe it should rather be Aksara. La Croix:

Mirza Abûbekr sent

IN the neighbourhood of Menkûl, the emperor again invested the Mirza Pîr Mehemed, son of Omar Sbeykh, in the government of Shîrâz, capital of Pârs, or Perfia, then sent him away : and at the same time dispatched orders to the Mirza Rûstem, at Shîrâz, to repair to court. At Kansar, a place dependent on Jerbâdkbân, he received a packet from court, signifying that the emperor had given him the government of Ispâbân, capital of Persian Irâk; and with orders to rebuild the fortress of Ormiyân, at Urûjerd; which he did, after parting with his brother Pîr Mehemed, who came to Kansar, in his way to Shîraz. When the court was come to Kârs, he invested the Mirza Abûbekr with the government of the province of Irâk Arabi, as far as Wâset, Basrab, Kûrdestân, Mardin, Diyârbekr, and Oyrat. He gave him orders to restore Bâghdâd, which had been destroyed : also to exterminate all disturbers of the public peace ; and begin with Kara Yûsef the Turkmân, who had made himself master of Irâk Arabi.

against Kara Yûsef ;

THIS prince, having fled from that province to avoid the troops of Timûr, as hath been before-mentioned, got into Rûm, or Anatolia : but, when the Tatar army arrived at Kaysariya (in its march against Bâyezîd), he fled back again to Irâk ; where having assembled all the Turkmân tribes, he stopped at Payan Hît. Soltân Abmed at the same time retired from Bâghdâd to his son Soltân Tâber : but being excited by his father's Amîrs, who feared Abmed, to revolt, he passed the bridge during the night, and encamped on this side of the river. When the Soltân was informed of it, he broke down the bridge ; and, marching along the river, stopped in presence of the rebels. From thence he sent an express for Kara Yûsef ; who having joined him, they passed the river together ; and, coming to a battle, Tâber was vanquished, and fled : but, endeavouring, with his armour on, to leap his horse over a brook, both fell in, and he was drowned.

who takes Bâghdâd.

AFTER this defeat, Tâber's troops dispersed ; and Soltân Abmed, growing jealous of Kara Yûsef, returned to Bâghdâd ; but this latter, coming soon after from Hilleb, with his army, took that city. The Soltân hid himself : but was perceived by one Kara Hassan, who helped him to escape during the night, carrying him on his shoulders to a place near five leagues distant ; where, meeting a man with an ox, Abmed mounted, and came with his deliverer to Takrît. Being here joined by several of his officers, he went to Damaskus ; while Kara Yusef became peaceable possessor of Irâk Arabi. When the Mirza Abûbekr came to Erbîl (or Arbela), he seized Abd'allah the governor, and other chiefs of the rebels ; then, marching to Bâghdâd, he went in pursuit of Kara Yûsef ; and, being joined by the Mirza Rûstem, from Urûjerd, with other Amîrs, and their troops, near Hilleb, they passed the Euphrates together ; and met the Turkmân prince opposite the town of Sib, more to the south, on the other side of Nâbro'lgânam ; where, altho' he was entrenched with a numerous army, and the Mirza had but three thousand men, they resolved to attack him.

Is defeated, and flies.

ON this occasion, they divided their troops into two bodies, that they might assault him on both sides at once : then Rûstem crossed the water, and fell on the enemy with great resolution ; while the Mirza Abûbekr did the like on his part. Nor did the enemy yield in bravery to the Jagatays ; but at length they were defeated. Kara Yûsef fled into Syria, with some of his domestics : but his subjects, who consisted of between 10 and 15,000 families, his oxen, sheep, and camels, were plundered. His brother Yar Ali was shot off his horse in the battle, and had his head cut off : but his wife, the queen of the Turkmâns, with the ladies of her court, were taken prisoners. The Mirzas also vanquished Noayr, absolute sovereign of all the Arab tribes of the desert ; with several other princes in those parts, who, till that time, had never submitted to any conqueror. After this, Abûbekr employed himself to render the country as flourishing as ever : he encouraged the people, obliged them to cultivate the lands ; and caused the city of Bâghdâd, which was almost ruined, to be rebuilt.

Georgia invaded,

MEAN time Timûr, having decamped from the neighbourhood of Kârs, entered Georgia ; whither Sheykh Ibrâbîm, prince of Shîrwân, passing through Armenia, had gone before, and seized some defiles. Mâlek Gbûrgbîn, surprised at the news of this march, sent ambassadors to court, with presents, signifying “ his obedience ; and that he was ready, on the first order, to send either money or troops : that his fear had hindered him to repair to court ; but that, as soon as it was over, he would run to kiss his majesty's feet, as the prince of Mardin, and other governors, had done ; would prostrate himself before the throne, and receive his orders, as his slave.” Timûr would not hearken to what the ambassadors said, nor receive their presents. He told them, “ That the case of their master, who was a Christian, differed from that of the other princes (he mentioned), who were Mohammedans ; and therefore, on the score of religion, more intitled to favour : that, if he desired life, he must immediately repair to court ; and, if God should not give him grace to turn Mohammedan, the tribute of Karaj would be imposed upon him ; after which, he would leave him once more the ^u Hist. Tim. Bek, l. vi. c. 1, 2. 11. p. 299—305, 307 & seq.

^v government

- a " government of his country, and suffer his subjects to live in peace : that the emperor of Constantinople, as a Christian, was on the same footing with him : in short, that if he came to court, he should be well received ; but that, if he made the least difficulty of coming, none of his excuses should be accepted of."

b THE ambassadors being dismissed, and the corn-harvest of the Georgians approaching, to prevent their reaping it, Timûr sent troops into their country, who drove out the inhabitants ; and, carrying off all the corn and pulse, destroyed every thing else. There is a very steep hill in Georgia, 150 cubits high, situated between two very deep defiles ; on the south of it is a rock, which surpasses it in height, and is ascended by ladders and cords. There is but one way leading to this hill, and that very narrow as well as crooked ; besides, the precipices which surround it, hinder an army from encamping, and besieging it. The Georgians had fortified this mountain on all sides ; built houses on it, and a gate at the very extremity, with cisterns to preserve rain-water. This fortress, called Kortene, was commanded by Trâl, a Georgian prince, who had under him thirty great Oznawrs ; and a strong garrison, secured against want, their cisterns being filled with water, their cellars with delicious wines, and the place stored with swine and sheep.

c TIMUR, apprised of the importance of this place, resolved to take it, notwithstanding the difficulties which might attend the siege ; as it was in the midst of the enemy's country, and neither victuals nor water enough was to be found for the troops required to carry it on : so that every one was surprised at this undertaking, and believed it impossible to take the place. As soon as the imperial standard arrived before the castle, August 13th, the inhabitants sent to offer Timûr presents and submission : but, finding they could not divert the storm, they declared war by a discharge of arrows and stones. The Amîrs having taken the quarters assigned them, Shâh Mâlek, who was posted on the side of the gate, was ordered to build a sconce opposite to it ; which, to the admiration of all, he finished in three days, though capable of containing 3000 men. Two other Amîrs were likewise ordered to build two sconces in different places : this was done, that, in case the siege lasted too long, garrisons might be put in them, to incommode the besieged.

l TIMUR encamped in a place behind the fortress, proper for making battering and other engines ; where he commanded a meljûr, or platform, of stone and wood, to be built high enough to command the place. This work being finished in a week, on the 20th Bikîjek, a Mekrît, skilful in marching over mountains, found means, during night, to get upon the rock south of the castle ; to the top of which he carried a goat, which he took in his way up ; and, having killed it, placed it for a signal, and then descended unseen by the Georgians. Next day he told this adventure to the emperor ; who immediately ordered strong cords to be made of raw silk and thread, for making ladders. When these were finished, four other Mekrîts ascended the rock, and drew up the ladders with long cords. Then mounting by an arch, which a goat could scarcely pass, and fastening the ladders to a tree which grew out of the very ridge of the rock, fifty of the bravest Turks of Khorassân immediately ascended. At day-break one of them cried aloud, Allah Akber, and blessed Mohammed : at the same time Mahmûd, an officer, sounded his trumpet.

f THE watch, alarmed by this noise, roused the sleeping garrison ; while the scalers began to advance towards the place by a way very narrow and dangerous, no more than three persons being able to march in front. One of them went first, followed by two others, holding his buckler before him : but, being shot in the mouth with an arrow ; he fell backwards, and the enemy seized on his buckler. Abd'allah Sebzawâri advanced sword in hand, and slew some Georgians ; till, being mortally wounded in ten or twelve places, he fell through weakness. The Turk Mahmûd fell on the enemy with a heavy club, with which he broke the leg of a very considerable Oznawr. In short, of the fifty men who had mounted to the assault, several arrived at the castle-gate ; where a bloody battle ensued : some also continued to attack the place from the meljûr, or platform ; so that at length the gate was broken, and the troops entered the castle on the 22d of August. The besieged begged for quarter on their knees : but most of the Oznawrs, or officers, were cast headlong from the walls. The governor Trâl was bound, and carried to the camp, with the whole garrison ; who were all beheaded by Timûr's order, and their wives and children enslaved : but he made a present of Trâl's wife to Sheykh Ibrâhîm, prince of Shîrwân.

THE emperor heaped honours and riches on Bikîjek, and the other brave men who had first mounted the rock. He made Mehemed Turân, surnamed king of Bawrân, one of the principal lords of Khorassân, governor of the place ; with orders not to suffer the Georgians to gain any more footing in the neighbouring conquered countries. He was likewise to convert the church into a mosk, to build a niche in place of the altar, and, instead of bells and crosses, a to provide Muezîms, and readers of the Korân.

* Hist. Tim. Bek ; l. vi. p. 306—310. c. 3—5.

Georgians wasted.

DURING these transactions, all the great officers, and governors of the several provinces and cities of Khorassân and Irâk, came to court, to pay their homage. After the taking of Kortene, Timûr marched for Abkbâz, which is the northern frontier of Georgia; and the vanguard having opened a road through the thick woods, he entered into the middle of the kingdom: where he plundered 700 towns and villages, laying waste the cultivated lands, razing the Christian monasteries and churches, which were built of marble and free-stone.

Peace granted.

THE Georgians, to avoid the enemy, retired into caverns, among rocks and mountains, by means of ladders, which they drew up after them: but the soldiers being let down in boxes, great ropes, from the top of the mountain, to the caverns, as in former expeditions, entered b them, though some contained near 100 Georgians, and put them to the sword. When Mâlek Ghûrgbîn was informed of this desolation, and progress quite through his country, by the lords who were slaves in Timûr's army, he sent ambassadors, offering to send all his riches to court, the annual tribute, and the troops which should be required. The Amîrs, on their knees, intreated him to accept of these submissions: but, not being able to abate his zeal for the continuation of the Gâzi (or religious war), they proposed the affair to the doctors of the law, and to the Muftis; who, unanimously declared, in the imperial council, That, since the Georgians consented to pay the tribute, and not to injure the Mussulmans, they were obliged, by their law, to grant them quarter, without doing them any farther harm, either by slaughter or pillage. Upon this conclusion of the doctors, Timûr nodded to Sheykh Ibrâhîm (king of Shîr- c wân), one of the intercessors, in token, that, in respect to him, he condescended to the request of king Ghûrgbîn. The ambassadors, who were dismissed, between hope and fear, soon returned, and brought 1000 gold medals, struck in the name of Timûr, 1000 horses, gold and silver plate, with a balaf ruby, of a beautiful colour, weighing eighteen medikals, there being few which weigh so much; they likewise obliged themselves, by oath, to pay the tribute*.

Baylakân rebuilt.

THEN Timûr decamped, in order to return; and, after some days march, arrived at Teflis, having ruined all the churches and monasteries in the neighbouring parts. When he had gone two days journey beyond the river Kûr, he resolved to march to Karabâgh, and rebuild the city of Baylakân (F); near which last he encamped. From hence removing, to winter at Karabâgh, d although the season was very cold and rainy, yet he set the work forward, in which the soldiers, under the inspection of the Shâhzâdehs (or Mîrzâs), and the Amîrs wrought with such diligence, that the buildings, which were of brick, were finished in a month. The circuit of the walls was 2400 cubits, of large measure, the thickness eleven, and height fifteen; the ditch was thirty cubits wide, and twenty deep. At each angle of the place was a great bastion; and in the middle of each curtain, a gallery, with battlements, and an engine to cast stones. Timûr gave the government of this new city to Babrâm Shâh; and invested the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân with that of Baylakân, Berdaa, Gbenjeh, the country of Arrân, Armenia, Georgia, and Trebizond. He likewise ordered a canal to be cut, six leagues in length, and fifteen cubits in breadth, to convey the water of the Arrâs into Baylakân: and this is one of the most magnifi- e cent monuments of his grandeur and power.

Timûr's vigilance

DURING Timûr's stay at this place, the principal lords of Irân and Turân came to court, where an assembly of the most learned men was held; the emperor being very curious in hearing the chief questions of the law explained; with the distinction between positive commands, and those which contain only matter of advice. One day the conversation happening to fall upon the words of Mohammed, That God orders princes to practise justice and beneficence; Timûr asked the doctors, How they come to neglect to tell him what he ought to do, and what he ought not to do? they answered, That his highness did not stand in need of their counsels; but, on the contrary, they might profit by imitating him. The emperor told them, he did not like that sort of compliments, which looked like flattery: adding, his meaning was, that, as they could f not but be acquainted with the affairs of the provinces they came from, and conduct of the several officers in authority, he expected they should inform him, whether they distributed justice or not, that he might remedy evils, and deliver the weak from oppression. Hereupon the doctors having represented the condition of their respective provinces, Timûr chose the most experienced among them, and sent with each an intendant, to whom he gave a full power to make, or dispense with, laws, for the better administration of justice. He likewise permitted them to restore, out of the treasury, what sums had been extorted from poor people, and to punish the oppressors, in an exemplary manner. Then Timûr made this memorable speech, which was taken down by a lord, who was present at the assembly:

over governments.

* Hist. Tim. Bek, vol. ii. p. 311—319. c. 5—8.

(F) Called also Bilkân, and Pilkân.

- a " My heart hath hitherto been set upon enlarging the limits of my vast empire : but now, I take up a resolution to use all my care in procuring quiet and security to my subjects, and to render my kingdoms flourishing. It is my will, that private persons address their petitions and complaints immediately to myself : that they give me their advice, for the good of the Remarkable Speech.
 " Mussulmans, the glory of the faith, and the extirpation of the wicked disturbers of the public quiet. I am unwilling, at the day of judgment, that my poor oppressed subjects should cry out for vengeance against me. I am not desirous, that any of my brave soldiers, who have so often exposed their lives in my service, should complain against either me, or fortune; for their afflictions touch me more than they do themselves. Let none of my subjects fear to come before me with their complaints; for my design is, that the world should become a b " paradise under my reign; knowing, that when a prince is just and merciful, his kingdom is crowned with blessings and honours. In fine, I desire to lay up a treasure of justice, that my soul may be happy after my death."

TOWARDS the end of November, a Cherkassian officer came to the camp before Baylakân, with the head of Mâlek Azzo'ddin, king of Lor Kuchek, who had revolted. His skin had been flay'd off, and hung up, stuffed with straw, for an example to others. About this time, Timûr likewise performed an act of justice on the person of the famous doctor, Mûlâna Kothbo'ddin Kermi, who was come to court, with the other officers of the diwân of Sbirâz: because, at his departure, he had taxed the inhabitants of Pârs (or Proper Persia) at the sum of 300,000 dinârs kopeghi, under pretence of a present to the emperor. His majesty, being highly offended at this tyranny, which he was informed off privately, by Mûlâna Saed, a doctor of the same country, immediately ordered the Sheykh Darwîsh Allâbi to bind his hands, and, placing the forked branch about his neck, sent him, in that figure, to Sbirâz, with the sum he had extorted from the inhabitants, to be restored to those who had paid it. Argbûn, Kothbo'ddin's intendant, was condemned to be hanged, on account of the troubles which he had brought on the people, by his master's order: and sentence was executed on him, as soon as Mûlâna Saed returned to Sbirâz. punished with infamy.

THE Friday following, the inhabitants of the city and neighbouring villages, being assembled in the old mosk, Mûlâna Kothbo'ddin was exposed, at the foot of the preaching-chair, which was of free-stone; from whence Mûlâna Saed having told the people what Timûr had ordered him to say on the occasion, the mosk echoed with their acclamations. After this piece of justice had been done on the person of one of the greatest lords of the kingdom, the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, son of Omar Sheykh, took off his fetters and forked branch, and sent him back to Samarkant, the intendency of the finances of Sbirâz being given to another.

WHEN Balakân was intirely built, Timûr marched to pass the winter at Karabâgh, in Koria's, or thatched houses, built for the purpose. Here advice being brought, that Eskânder Sheykhbi, prince of Damâwend and Firûzkûb, had revolted, the Amîr Soleymân Shâh had orders to go to Ray, to observe Eskânder's motions; and the Mîrza Râstem was sent to assist him. They were directed to give him a handsome reception, in case he returned forthwith to his obedience: but to prosecute him to the utmost, if he continued obstinate. About this time, Ibrahim, king of Shirwân, regaled the whole court with a banquet; and Nûr Alwerd, son of Soltân Ahmed, of Bâghdâd, eighteen years old, was brought from Irâk Arabi. The venerable Sheykh Bereke (G) then also arrived at court; and the pious Timûr went out of his tent to meet him. The Sheykh Bereke arrives. The Santon, having perceived the emperor, flung off his turbân, and paid his compliments of condolence on the death of the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân. Timûr embraced, and wept a long time with him. The learned of Great Bukhâria came to court on the same occasion of condolence; and every evening, after the emperor had done with the affairs of state, he heard them dispute on some questions of learning and religion.

As the princes of Ghilân had only sent a few small presents, instead of coming to court, Timûr sent the Karawl, or van-guard, and the Mîrza Shâh Rûkb, with his troops, to Kzeligâj (or Kezeligâj). Affairs of Ghilân. The princes, alarmed at these motions, consented to pay a great sum, under the name of Karaj, and sent the Seyd Râzi Kiya, one of the princes of Dilem, of Mohammed's race, with another prince, to give assurances of their obedience. The emperor honoured the Seyd Râzi in a particular manner, made him vast presents, and gave him the government of the castle of Kemâk, on the borders of Anatolia, which Shâms, a relation of the Amîr Abbâs, formerly possessed (H), with troops to go thither. Soon after, the Sharîf Seyd Bereke fell sick at Karabâgh, and died. The Sheykh dies. Timûr wept bitterly for the loss of his best friend; and caused his coffin to be buried at Audekûd. Then he gave to the Mîrza Eskânder the government of Hamadân, Nebawend, Urujerd, Lor-kûcbek, and their dependencies.

y Hist. Tim. Bek, vol. ii. p. 319—328. c. 9—13.

(G) He is mentioned before, as prophesying victory to Timûr. P. 566.

(H) Timûr gave it, not long before, to Tabârten, prince of Arzenjân. See before, p. 562.

Hej. 806.

A. D. 1404.

Politie regulation.

WHEN winter was over, Mâlek Iffâ (I), prince of Mardin, came to court, with his daughter, betrothed to the Mîrza Abûbekr. Mâlek Azzo'daîn Shîr came also from Vasân, with a present of numerous horses. About the same time, the emperor issued out a general order to all the greater and lesser officers of the kingdom of Hülakû Khân, residing in Azerbeijân and Irâk Arabi, to send each a brother, or some relation, to reside at Samarkant: and, to prevent delay, dispatched officers to the respective places, to bring them away forthwith. In the month of Ramazân, Timûr made a funeral banquet for the prince Mehemed Soltân, in which the poor chiefly were regaled. The Shevkhs, doctors, and Imâms, from all parts, were present at this feast; where the intire Korân was read over; and which concluded with prayers for the repose of the Mîrza's soul. Afterwards the princess Khân Zâdeb went to Soltâniya, and conveyed from thence the Mîrza's coffin to Samarkant.

Mîrza Omar promoted.

TIMUR, after this, took the diversion of a grand hunting, in the plains of Aktâm, beyond the Arrâs; in which, besides dogs, were employed leopards, with gold chains; swift greyhounds of Greece, and uncommon beagles. But, what were most remarkable, huge European mastiffs, as strong as African lions, terrible as enraged tygers, and swift as arrows. When the chace was over, the emperor distributed among the learned of Great Bukhâria an infinite number of curiosities, brought from Anatolia. And finding there was nothing in Asia which he was not master of, excepting China, he left Karabâgh on the 8th of April, with a resolution to go upon the conquest of it; and, crossing the Arrâs, encamped near the town of Nimet-abâd, on the canal of Berlâs. Here, at a great feast, he invested the Mîrza Omar, son of Mîrân Shâh, with the government of the empire of Hülakû, containing the countries of Azerbeijân, Rûm, or Anatolia, and Syria, as far as Egypt. He likewise obliged the princes who governed Pârs, and both the Irâks, to be subject to his jurisdiction².

Eskânder pursued.

MEAN time, the Mîrza Rûstem and Soleymân Shâh, who were gone to Ray, to inquire into the conduct of Eskânder Sheykbi, found that he had revolted; and, having placed his family in the fortrefs of Firûzkûb, was fled to the mountains in the forests of Chelawn and Rûstemdâr. The generals hereupon drew 2000 men out of the garrisons, and, entering the forest, took and razed the fortrefs of Nûr. Here Mâlek Kayûmarrez, an enemy of Eskânder, coming to meet them, they sent him to Eskânder, thinking to oblige him with a kind invitation to a treaty in his favour: but, not daring to trust them, he accommodated matters with Kayûmarrez, and began hostilities. On advice of this, Timûr sent several troops before; and following himself, with the rest of the army, by Ardebîl and Soltâniya, arrived May 15, at Kashîn; where, at Mîrza Abûbekr's request, he permitted Mîrân Shâh, his father, to go to Bâghdâd, to reside there with him; and then sent him to join Rûstem at Kujûr, where they kept entrenched till the arrival of the army: after which, they cut roads through the forests, and marched to seek the enemy.

Firûzkûh
taken.

THE 22d, Timûr came to Ray; then passing by the castle of Gbulkendân, at the foot of mount Damâwend, and afterwards by Damâwend, arrived at Firûzkûb; a citadel, famous in history, situated on the ridge of a mountain, and walled with the utmost strength. The 31st of May, the siege was formed, and the throwers of wild-fire began the attack. As one of the towers of the place was built on the bank of the river, and reached as high as the level of the mountain, at whose foot it stood, the enemy made use of it, to draw up water from the river: but the besiegers turned the course of the stream, and spoiled the water which was left, in spite of a vigorous opposition. During night, Mehemed Azâd, Akbuga, and other brave men, got up to the foot of the walls; who, being perceived by the garrison, were resolutely attacked, and several wounded: but, after sun-rise, all the soldiers ascended, by different places, and gave a general assault. The son of Eskânder Sheykbi, governor of the castle, and those with him, being seized with fear, though the garrison consisted of 300 strong men, surrendered the place, after a two days siege.

Kâra Tatars
revolt.

NEXT day, advice came, that the Kâra Tatars had revolted near Damgân, and wounded almost to death their Deroga. The other bands, hearing this, resolved to fly: but the Amîr Shâmso'ddîn, and other captains, who had the conduct of them, falling on the mutineers, slew above 3000 on the spot. Some were brought away, and the rest fled to the forests of Astara-bâd; but, being pursued by way of Bestâm, were overtaken at Karatugan, on the Caspian sea, and defeated, though far more numerous. Above 1000 were slain, and more than 10,000 families were taken prisoners. After this, Timûr marched in person against Eskânder Sheykbi, over high mountains and deep valleys, to Chelawn, where he arrived June 11; but, not being able to find the rebel, returned the same day. In this road there is a very deep defile, full of woods, always covered with mists; and in the middle runs an exceeding rapid torrent, which one can neither ford nor swim over. The great difficulty there is in passing a this streight, has given it the name of the defile of bell; and as Eskânder had broken the bridge over the torrent, his pursuers were obliged to build another of wood, which Timûr crossed, and encamped on the top of a mountain beyond it^a.

² Hist. Tim. Bek, Vol. II. p. 328—338. c. 13—17.

(I) Called elsewhere Soltân Asya.

PARTIES being sent out every way, in search of the fugitive, one of them met with Eskânder ^{him}, on the 17th of June, in the middle of a wood, near the Caspian sea, at the head of ^{200 foot}, and thirty horse, with which he sallied out of his little camp, and prepared to attack his pursuers; who, though but twenty in number, fearing Timûr's reproaches, resolved to die rather than fly. Eskânder, followed by his horsemen, attacked them several times with their pikes: but the Jagatays so plied him, that he at length shamefully turned his back, though famed for intrepidity, and fled, with his soldiers, farther into the forest. They pillaged his camp; and, next morning, met with his son, the Amîr Ali, and daughter, his wives, and domestics, who were all made slaves. The scouts, being joined by the Mîrza Soltân Hussayn, and seventy men, continued the pursuit of Eskânder, and meeting him, about noon, in the midst of the forest, with 200 foot, and fifty horse, fell furiously upon him; then retreated, as if he would have fled. The enemy, upon this, boldly sallied out to attack his men: but they turned on them suddenly, in good order, and made a cruel slaughter of the foot. Two of the horsemen were taken prisoners; and Eskânder, re-entering the forest, went out by the side towards Ghilân; nor was ever heard of more: although some say, he took the habit of a monk: others, that he died for grief in the woods.

THE Amîrs being all returned to the camp, Timûr reproved them for not continuing the pursuit, and sent them back again on the same errand: but, on advice that they could not encamp in the woods, which the rains had made exceeding miry, he sent orders for them to return, after they had sufficiently fatigued themselves. Then Timûr marched to the castle of Harfi, towards Ghilân, and from thence to the meadow of Kelare Dâsh. After he had sent the Mîrzas to their respective governments, he departed for Samarkant. In a few days, he came to the kioshk, or pavilion, of Argûn Khân, at the foot of mount Damâwend, in the country of Lâr; and July 10th, encamped at Firûzkâb, the government of which, and Ray, with their dependencies, he left with the Amîr Soleymân Shâh. The 14th, he arrived at Bestâm. The 20th, left Nisâbûr; and passing Jâm, came to the river Jûkûjerân. From hence, by Kerlân, he went to the river Morgâb; where Apaktâlpa, governor of Shishektu, was, for oppressing the inhabitants, hanged, with his head downwards, after having had his feet bored through.

THEN continuing his route by Andekûd, the defile of Gbez, and Aliabâd, he at length crossed ^{to Samarkant} the Jibûn (or Amû) at Termed, and came to Kash. From whence he made such haste to Samarkant, that the principal persons had not an opportunity to proceed far to meet him. He arrived there in Mobârram 807. Soon after, Massâid Dawd, and Mehemed Jilde, who had been the principal secretaries, and, during Timûr's absence, performed the function of Wazîrs, were condemned, for doing injustice; and both hanged, by his order, at Khâni Gheul, during the banquet there. Afterwards, Timûr went to the garden of planes, where he gave audience to an ambassador of Idekû, emperor of Kipjâk, who presented him with a shonkar. He next visited the garden of Dilen Shâh, where he received an ambassador from one of the greatest sovereigns of Europe (K), who made him several curious and magnificent presents; particularly, some pieces of tapestry, wrought with so much art, that, were the great performances of the painter Mani, on the cloth of Artene, to be compared with them, Mani would blush, and his works appear deformed^b (L).

AFTER this, Timûr ordered a palace to be built by the Syrian architects, in the garden south of Bâghi Shamâl, more large and magnificent than any he had founded before. It was a square, each side being 1500 cubits in length. The chief ornaments were of marble, in sculpture, and inlaid work of various colours. The outside of the walls was covered with porcelain of Kashân, and the fountains were beautified with infinite jet d'eaux of several forms. The emperor solemnized the finishing of it with a splendid banquet, to which the European ambassadors were invited: for the kasses, says our author, have also their place in the sea (M).

^a Hist. TIM. BEK, Vol. II. p. 338—347. c. 17—21.

^b Ibid. p. 347—357. c. 21—24.

(K) This, doubtless, was Ruy Gonzales de Clavijo, sent by Henry III. king of Castile. He set out 21 May 1403, and returned to Spain 24 March 1406. He mentions the feast made by Timûr, on the marriage of his children, and to which he was invited: but not a word of his audience of leave, and the rich presents he received. On the contrary, he assures us, he never had one; because Timûr died about that time, at Samarkant. But this appears to be false in fact; and also shews the ambassador had left Samarkant, and obtained his audience. For had he been at Samarkant (as he intimates) when Timûr died, he must have known that conqueror did not die in that city. See La Croix, pref. to Timûr Bek, for an account of this embassy.

(L) This is doing great honour to European manufactures.

(M) This seems to be spoken with great contempt of the ambassadors: for the kass is a little animal, the size of a barley-corn, which is seen on the surface of the sea. La Croix.

Kind of jubilee.

TIMUR resolving, before he made his intended expedition to China, to marry his grandchildren, ordered a grand feast to be made, in the plain of Kbāni Gheul (N), whither he went to lodge, on the 17th of October. The governors of provinces, generals, and great lords of the empire, assembled in this place, and pitched their tents in order. People from all parts of Asia repaired, to behold this solemn rejoicing; where all sorts of diversions were exhibited, and the richest curiosities sold, in magnificent shops. There was built a chartak, or amphitheatre, covered with brocade and Persian carpets, furnished with seats for the music, and places for the buffoons and jesters, to shew their skill. There was another chartak for all sorts of tradesmen, and 100 of a different manner, filled with those who sold fruit, each of whom had a kind of garden, of pistachios, pomegranates, almonds, pears, and apples. The butchers dressed up skins of animals in very ludicrous figures. Women imitated speaking goats, with horns of gold, and ran after one another. Some were dressed like fairies and angels, with wings; whilst others assumed the appearance of elephants and sheep.

Feast, and diversions.

THE skimmers also appeared in masquerades, like leopards, lions, tygers, foxes, with whose skins they were covered. The upholders made a camel of wood, reeds, cords, and painted linen, which walked about, as if alive; and the man within it, drawing a curtain, discovered the workman in his own piece. The manufacturers of cotton made birds of cotton, and a high mināreh, or tower, of the same material, with the help of reeds, which every body imagined to be built with brick and mortar. It was covered with brocades and embroidered work, carried itself about, and on its top was placed a stork. The saddlers shewed their skill in two litters, open at top, carried on a camel, with a beautiful woman in each, who diverted the spectators by actions with their hands and feet. The mat-makers gave a proof of their dexterity, by two lines of writing, in Kufik, and other large characters, worked with reeds.

Princes married.

THUS every one contributed to celebrate the marriage of the young princes, who were the Mīrzas Olūk Bek and Ibrāhīm Soltān, sons of Shāh Rūkb; Ayjel, son of Mīrān Shāh; Abmed, Seydi Abmed, and Biera, all three sons of the Mīrza Omar Sheykh. The astrologers having chosen a happy moment, the first officer of the household drew the curtain of the imperial gate. The Kadis, Sharifs, Imāms, and doctors, of the empire, met the emperor; and having agreed on the articles of marriage, the great doctor Sheykh Shamsō'ddīn Mehemed al Fazarī ho'ddīn, received the mutual consent of the parties, which he registered; and then, according to the Hanafyan rites, joined the princes and princesses together in marriage; on whom every one sprinkled gold and precious stones.

Great magnificence

THE emperor being seated on his throne, the banquet was served up to the brides, and other ladies of the court, by the most beautiful young women of his saray, who had on crowns composed of flowers. The princes of the blood, Amīrs, Neviāns (or Noyāns), Sharifs and foreign ambassadors, were seated under a canopy, supported by twelve columns, and distant about a horse's course from the nuptial-hall. Here were ranged earthen urns, with strings of precious stones about them, filled with gold, and silver pilastres, on the tops whereof were cups of gold, agate, and crystal, adorned with pearls and jewels: all which vessels were presented on salvers of gold and silver, to those who drank; the liquors being Kammez (O), oxymel, hippocras, brandy, wines, firma, and the like. It is reported, that the wood of several large forests was cut down, to dress victuals for this banquet. There were tables furnished in different places throughout the whole plain, and flaggons of wine set near them, with infinite baskets of fruit. Besides these preparations for the court, there were jars full of liquors, ranged all through the plain, for the people's drinking: and, that their joy might be complete, they were allowed to pursue whatever pleasures they thought fit, without any restraint, by proclamation, in these terms; "This is the time of feasting, pleasure, and rejoicing. Let no person reprimand, or complain of, another: let not the rich insult the poor; nor the strong the weak: let no one ask another, Why have you done this?"

in the feast, and equipage,

the married princes.

THE elephants, with thrones on their backs, were drawn out on this occasion. When the feast was over, a vast quantity of curious moveable goods was, according to custom, laid upon mules and camels, for the new-married princes; among which were all sorts of rich habits, crowns, and belts, set with precious stones. The mules had coverings of satin, embroidered with gold: and their little bells, as well as those of the camels, were of gold. This pompous equipage passed before the admiring people. The bridegrooms, with their brides, were clothed nine times in different habits, set off with crowns and belts. Each time they changed their dress, they paid their respects, as usual, to the emperor; while the ground was covered with the gold, pearls, and precious stones, which were sprinkled on them, and became the perquisite of their domestics. At night, illuminations were made, with lanthorns, ^c Hist. Tim. Bek. Vol. II. p. 357—364. c. 24—26.

(N) That is, a mine of flowers.

(O) Or kemis, made of mares milk. See before, p. 255.

torches,

a torches, and lamps; and the new-married princes entered the nuptial-chamber. Next day, Timûr honoured them with a visit at their respective apartments, accompanied by the empresses, great Amîrs, and Sharîfs of the court. Nor were the rejoicings confined to Khâni Gheul: for there was not one place in the whole empire, from thence to Tûs (or Mashbâd), in Khorassân, where the sound of drums and trumpets was not heard.

THE marriage-feasts lasted two months; after which, the assembly was dissolved, and the licence which had been granted during the feast recalled: so that, for the future, no person was allowed to drink wine, or commit any thing unlawful. After this, Timûr retired to his closet; where “ he thanked God for his favours, in raising him, from a petty prince, to be “ the most mighty monarch in the world: in giving him so many victories and conquests; b “ maintaining him in sovereign authority, and making him his chosen servant.”

TIMUR, having taken a short repose, resolved to put in execution his design against China. The war of China
To this end, he summoned the Mîrzas and great Amîrs of his council to court; and made a speech, wherein he told them, his dear companions, as he called them, “ That as the vast “ conquests he had made were not obtained without some violence, which had occasioned the “ destruction of a great number of God’s creatures, he was resolved, by way of atonement for “ his past crimes, to perform some good action; namely, to make war on the infidels, and “ exterminate the idolaters of China (P): that it was fitting those very troops, which had been “ the instruments whereby those faults were committed, should also be the instruments of “ repentance; he therefore required, that they should march into China, to acquire the merit c “ of that holy war, by demolishing the temples of the idols of fire, and erecting mosks in “ their places.”

THE council having approved of this pious expedition, orders were immediately issued for assembling the forces of the empire at Tâshkunt, which was to be the general rendezvous of the army. Timûr then went from Khâni Gheul to Samarkant; where having done particular honours to the ambassador of Egypt, he gave him leave to depart; sending with him an ambassador of his own, with a letter to Soltân Farruj, seventy cubits long, and three in breadth, written in letters of gold, in answer to what that Soltân had written, relating to Soltân Abmed and Kara Jûsef. He likewise granted particular honours and favours to the ambassadors of Europe (Q), Dâshî Kipjâk, Jetâb, and other parts, and permitted them to return home. He d gave the Mîrza Omar Bek the government of the towns of Tâshkunt, Sayrâm, Yenghi, Ashira, and all the kingdom of Jetâb, as far as China: likewise to the Mîrza Ibrâhim Soltân, that of Andekhân, Aksiket, Tarâz, and Kâshgar, as far as Kotan^d.

WHEN the troops were assembled, the Amîr Berendâk reviewed them, by Timûr’s order; Timûr sets and brought account, that there were in the army, which he designed to carry into China, ent. 200,000 men complete; consisting of the forces of Great Bukhâria, Turkestân, Bâlk, Badakshân, Khorassân, Sîstân, Mazânderân, the Kara Tatars, with the colonies from Pârs, Azerbejân, and Irâk. The emperor was pleased with the good condition they were in; and, having distributed his treasure among them, commanded them to begin their march. The Mîrzas Kalîl Soltân and Abmed Omar Shейkh, with the troops of the right wing, were ordered to pass the winter, at Tâshkunt, Shâbrukhiyah (R), and Sayrâm; while the Mîrza Soltayn Hussayn was to remain, with some troops of the left wing, at Yâssi and Sabrân. At length Timûr set out from Samarkant, the 23d of Jomazio’lawel, in 807, in a happy moment fixed by the astrologers (*); and although the rains, snows, wind, and cold, were extremely violent, yet he continued his march to Aksûlat, where cottages and houses had been built to lodge in. Here the emperor being informed, that the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân had, a second time, concealed, in his apartment, Shâdi Mulk, one of the concubines of the Amîr Sayfo’ddîn, whom he had married for love, he ordered her to be put to death; but, by means of the great empress, it being pretended she was with child, the order was countermanded, and the lady committed to the care of the black eunuchs (S).

f TIMUR took such care with regard to provision and arms, that every horseman had enough of both to serve ten men. Besides this, several thousand loads of corn were carried in wag- Arrives at Otrâr.

^d Hist. TIM. BEK, Vol. II. p. 364—372, c. 26, & seq.

(P) He intended to atone for the destruction of God’s creatures, by a farther destruction of his creatures: to atone for one crime, by committing another. Not only the Chinese idolaters were to be rooted out, but also those who were not idolaters, under the name of infidels.

(Q) The Spanish ambassadors, whom we have mentioned in the preface, were dismissed at the same time as those of Egypt, without obtaining an audience of leave of Timûr, who was reported to have been very sick; whence, in the Spanish relation, he is said, through mistake, to have been dead. La Croix.—This seems to be a palliation: Timûr died at Otrâr; and it does not appear that he was sick at Samarkant.

(R) This place, formerly called Feshkent, was entirely ruined by Jenghîz Khân’s army; but, in the year 794 of the Hejrah, and of Christ 1392, Timûr ordered it to be rebuilt, and repeopled: and, as he then gave it to the Mîrza Shâh Rûkh, it was called after him Shâh-rûkhîya. Shârîfo’ddîn.

(*) Who could not foresee his death.

(S) To prevent the Mîrza’s having a future commerce with her.

gons, to sow the fields on their road, to supply them in their return. Several thousands of camels also were in the train, that, on pressing occasions, their milk might serve for nourishment to the soldiers. These precautions were necessary in an army so numerous, as not to be matched in antiquity (T). Although the cold was so extreme, that several men and horses perished on the road, some losing their hands and feet, others their ears and noses, yet Timûr set forward from Aksûlat, and crossing the Sibûn (or Sîr), over the ice, at Zarnûk, February 27th, arrived at Otrâr. This river was frozen so hard, that they were obliged to dig two or three cubits to get water: and, during the months of January and February, waggons, men, and beasts, could pass either the Jibûn, or Sibûn, in any part of them. The same day, one corner of the roof of the palace where the emperor lodged, took fire by means of a chimney; which accident was considered by the courtiers, who before had been scared with frightful dreams, as a prognostic of some misfortune to his majesty.

A bad omen.

Appoints an heir;

At this time, an ambassador arrived from Tokâtmişh Khân, formerly emperor of Kipjâk, who had, for a long time, wandered as a vagabond in the deserts of that country, confessing his master's ingratitude, and imploring forgiveness. Timûr not only gave Kara Kojâ a magnificent audience, but assured him he would, at his return from China, again conquer the empire of Tushî Khân, and give it to Tokâtmişh. The 25th of March, his majesty was attacked with a burning fever, and believed he heard the hûris say, Repent! for you must appear before God. On this, he became sincerely penitent for his crimes, and resolved to make satisfaction for them, by good works. Although his sickness daily increased, yet he was continually inquiring after the condition of his army. When he found death approaching, he sent for the empresses, and principal Amîrs. "He bid them not weep, but pray, for him. Said, he had hopes God would pardon his sins, though numberless; and had this consolation, that he had never suffered the strong to injure the weak. He exhorted them to procure ease and safety to the people, as an account would be required of all in power, at the day of judgment." He then declared his son Pîr Mehemed Jêbân Ghîr his universal heir, and lawful successor; commanding them all to obey him, and sacrifice their lives to maintain his authority. After this, he ordered all the Amîrs, great lords of the court, and generals, to come before him, and made them swear to see his will executed, and to suffer none to oppose it. He commanded that all those who were absent should take the same oath.

and dies.

The lords burst in tears, and promised to fulfil his testament. They proposed sending for the Mîrza Soltân and Amîrs at Tâshkunt, that they might hear his majesty's will from his own mouth; alleged, that their declaration could not have the same force with them. But Timûr forbade it, as they could not come time enough to find him alive; and said, he had no other desire than to see the Mîrza Shâh Rûkb once more; but that it was impossible. After recommending the observance of his will, and the avoiding of discord, to the princes his children, he ordered one of the doctors to read the Korân at his bed's-head, and often repeat the unity of God. At night (about eight o'clock), he several times made profession of his belief, That there is no other god than God; and then gave up his soul to the angel Esfrafiel (or Israel), on the 17th of Shaabân 807 (U), after he had lived seventy-one years, and reigned thirty-six.

His character.

TIMUR was remarkable for his sincere piety, great veneration for religion, strict justice, and unbounded liberality; which have been sufficiently exemplified in the foregoing history. As to his birth, his ninth grandfather was Tumena Khân, of the race of Buzenjer Khân, chief of a branch of the tribe of Kayât (X), descended from Turk the son of Japhet. However, the Amîr Trâgay, his father, as well as his grandfather the Amîr Berkulk, had abdicated the kingdom, and left the government of the principality of Kâsh, which they had preserved, with the Toman of 10,000 men annexed thereto, to the children of their uncles, of the family of Berlâs: so that Timûr Bek may be said to have brought the crown into this august family, he being the first emperor of it. At the age of twenty-five, he attained the highest dignities, with surprising courage, and an ambition admired by all the world. Endeavouring to perfect the great talents which he had received from nature, he spent nine years in different countries: where his good sense, and great genius, appeared in councils and assemblies; while his intrepidity and valour, whether in personal combats or pitched battles, drew upon him the admiration of every body.

^e Hist. Tim. Bek, Vol. II. p. 372—380. c. 27—29.

^f Ibid. p. 380—387. c. 29—31.

(T) Then it must have consisted of more than 200,000 men. Nay, Timûr himself had more numerous armies at other times.

(U) Which answers to Wednesday the 1st of April 1405.
(X) Jenghîz Khân was descended from the same tribe. See before, p. 266.

a He made himself master of the three empires of Jagatay Khân, Tusbi Khân, and Hillâkî Power and conduct. Khân (Y); so that his power, riches, and magnificence, were greater than what we read of other monarchs (Z), or even than can be well imagined. But the chief proof of his power was, whatever kingdom he made war upon, he soon conquered it, and gave the government to some of his children and officers (A); not acting like the antient conquerors, who were contented with those tokens of submission which vanquished princes might make by the payment of a tribute. One thing farther remarkable in this monarch's conduct was, that, although he observed the wholesome maxim of holding dyets, yet he never solely confided in them; but constantly did what his own genius inspired in him. He could not be shaken in his resolutions; and had the policy to be present at the execution of his most important enterprizes, whether they concerned the state, or religion: but, in peace and war, he would put forward every thing himself.

There remain infinite monuments of his grandeur in the cities, towns, castles, and walls, Public works. which he built; in rivers and canals which he dug; as well as bridges, gardens, palaces, hospitals, mosks, and monasteries, which he erected in divers parts of Asia in so great a number, that a king might be accounted very powerful and magnificent, who should have employed thirty-six years only in building the great edifices which Timûr caused to be founded. Are not all the karawanfarays in the great roads of Asia, for the accommodation of travellers; the magnificent monasteries and hospitals, from which the poor, the sick, and passengers, reap so great an advantage by the alms distributed there; the good works of this pious emperor?

This character of Timûr, given by his historian Sharîfo' ddîn Ali, is confirmed by his enemy His person. Arabshâh, with circumstances which give us a much greater idea of that prince, than what his professed friend and flatterer has said of him. Timûr, according to that author, was, as to his person, very corpulent, tall, and exceeding fat, but very well-shaped. He had a large forehead, and big head. His countenance was good; and his complexion fair, very ruddy, and not at all swarthy. He wore a large beard (B); was very strong, and well-limbed: had broad shoulders, thick fingers, and long legs. His constitution was perfectly hale: but he was maimed in one hand, and lame of the right side. His eyes appeared full of fire, but were not very brisk. His voice was loud and piercing. He feared nothing; and, altho' near four-score years of age, his understanding was sound and perfect, his body vigorous and robust; his mind constant, and unshaken like a rock.

He did not like raillery, and could not bear a lye. There was no joking or fooling before Prudence and sagacity. him; for he loved the naked truth, even altho' it was to his own disadvantage. He neither grieved, if he miscarried in any attempt; nor appeared overjoyed on any good success. The device of his seal was, I am sincere and plain. He never admitted of any lewd discourse in his presence; nor ever talked of slaying, plundering, ravages, making slaves, or the like violences: yet was bold, courageous, feared, and respected. He had a clear and subtle understanding: was surprisingly sure in his conjectures; extremely happy in his guesses; vigilant and active where requisite; and unshaken in his resolutions. He could see into the most hidden intrigues, and discover the most subtle artifices: could distinguish the truth from sophistry; and, by the strength of his reason, saw things in their causes, as others see objects present to their eyes.

Timûr took great delight in reading history, or hearing it related. He was so well versed Knowledge of countries. in the state of countries, provinces, and cities, that the natives were astonished to find him as knowing as themselves; and, when he arrived at any city, would ask those who came first to wait on him, What news of such and such persons? What was it that happened to such a one, at such a time, and in such an affair? How did such an undertaking succeed? What end did such persons make of the difference that was between them? and would often tell them of the Great penetration. disputes and conversations they had with others. This made them think he had been among them in disguise; and some affirmed they had seen him: but this intelligence he gained by spies and correspondents, which he had in all places. His stratagems, inventions, and their effects, looked like enchantment. His conjectures came surprisingly to pass: among the rest, when he arrived before Siwâs, which had a very strong garrison, he said to his men, Mark what I tell you; we shall have this place in eighteen days: which actually happened. It is most cer-

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, l. v. p. 424, & seq. c. 48.

^b His portrait by AHMED EBN ARABSH. p. 2, & seq.

(Y) That is, three parts of the empire of Jenghîz Khân; which all descended to Oktay, who reigned in the eastern part of Tartary, and whose successors conquered China; of whom, for a time, those of the other three parts held their dominions. Timûr did much; for he carried his conquests to the river Ganges in the east, and the Archipelago in the west.

(Z) This seems to be aimed at Jenghîz Khân: but Timûr was not equal to that conqueror in those respects, or perhaps any other.

(A) In this he did but imitate Jenghîz Khân.

(B) This description does not tally with the print of his head, given by Kampfer in his Amoenitates exoticæ, p. 36.

tain, says Arabsháh, that this limper was either directed by heaven; or doomed to eternal torments, by the ill use which he should make of temporal felicities¹.

Cleft and subtle.

He was a great dissembler, and studied ways to deceive every-body. He would pretend that the things, which above all others he hated, or desired to avoid, were most agreeable to him; and seemed not to like those which he was passionately fond of. He would assemble his officers, to consult which way they should march next; and, when they had come to a resolution, would issue orders accordingly: and at the same time assign the reasons for taking such a route: but, as soon as every thing was ready, and the army began to move forward, he on a sudden countermanded his orders, and obliged them to march a quite contrary course. He was so artful, that, when an enemy advanced to meet him, he would often, as in Syria, spread a report, that his soldiers were fatigued and dispirited: he would even retreat, under pretence that his troops wanted provisions or forage: all this was done in order to animate the enemy, and make them keep their post, that he might the more easily surround them with his forces.

Great firmness of mind.

When he resolved on any siege, or other enterprise, though ever so difficult and hazardous, he was not to be diverted from his purpose, and it was dangerous for any body to advise him to desist. Mohammed Kawjín, the greatest of all his favourites, having undertaken, at the solicitation of the chief commanders, to give over the siege of a castle in India, built on a very high rock; Timúr stripped him of all his wealth, which he gave to a Black, and turned him adrift².

This prince, when he undertook any thing, never ceased labouring, both with his hands and head, to bring it about. One time, that he besieged a castle, he contracted a fever by too much fatigue; yet, not being able to rest, without seeing how things went on, he ordered himself to be carried to the door of his tent, which stood on an eminence, from whence he beheld the attack. He was supported under the arms by two persons: but, being very weak, soon ordered them to lay him gently on the ground; which they did. Then, sending one of them away, said to the other, named Mahmúd, of Karazm, "Consider my feebleness, and how destitute I am of strength. I have neither a hand to do any thing, nor a foot to walk: if I should be attacked, I cannot defend myself. Should I be abandoned in the condition I am in, I should remain as in a trap; without being able in any-wise to help myself, or avoid the evils that must befall me: yet, see, the Almighty has subjected nations to my obedience, gives me entrance into the most inaccessible places, fills the earth with the terror of my name, and makes kings and princes fall down before me. Can such works come from any but God? What am I but a poor miserable wretch, without either power or application equal to such great exploits." At these words, said Mahmúd to our author, the tears fell from his eyes, nor could I refrain myself from weeping³.

His sons,

TIMUR left behind him fifty-three descendants; thirty-six males and seventeen females:

I. THE Mírza Jeshán Ghír, his eldest son, died before him, as hath been mentioned in his reign: but left two princes; (1) Mehemed Soltán (who also died before his grandfather). This prince had three sons; Mehemed Jeshán Ghír, nine years old at the death of Timúr; Sadvakkas, six; and Yabia, five. (2) The Mírza Pír Mehemed Jeshán Ghír, twenty-nine years of age. He had seven sons: Kaydu, nine years old; Kaled, seven; Buzenjer, Sadvakkas, Tenjer, Kayser, and Jeshán Ghír: in all, eleven princes.

and grandsons;

II. THE Mírza Omar Sheykh, deceased, left six sons: (1) Pír Mehemed, twenty-six years old; who had one son, of seven years, named Omar Sheykh. (2) Rústem, aged twenty-four; who had two sons, Ozmán, six years old; and Soltán Ali, one year. (3) Eskänder, twenty-one years of age. (4) Abmed, eighteen years. (5) Sidi Ahmed, fifteen. And (6) Bayera Hassan: in all, nine princes.

III. THE Mírza Mirán Sháh, thirty-eight years of age, had five sons: (1) Abúbekr, twenty-three years old: who had two sons, Alengber, nine years of age; and Ozmán Chelebi, four. (2) Omar, twenty-two years old. (3) Kalil Soltán, twenty-one years. (4) Ayjel, ten. And, (5) Siorgatmish, six: in all, seven princes.

IV. THE Mírza Sháh Rúkh, twenty-eight years of age, had seven sons: (1) Olúk Bek, eleven years old. (2) Ibráhim Soltán, of the same age. (3) Bayfánkar, eight years. (4) Siorgatmish, six. (5) Mehemed Juki, three years. (6) Ján Aglen, two years. And, (7) Turwi, one year: in all, eight princes.

daughters, and grand-daughters.

BESIDES these princes, Timúr had one daughter, named Soltánâ Bákbé Begüm; and sixteen grand-daughters. Omar Sheykh had three daughters. Mehemed Soltán, three. Mirán Sháh, four: and Sháh Rúkh, one. Pír Mehemed Jeshán Ghír, three. Abúbekr one: and Kalil Soltán, one.

THE Mírza Soltán Hussayn, twenty-five years of age, was the son of Timúr's daughter, named Akia Beghi, or Taji Khân; and his father was the Amír Mehemed Bey, son of the Amír Mússa^m.

¹ His portrait by AHMED EBN ARABSH. p. 4—12. TIM. BEK, l. vi. c. 48. p. 427, & seq.

² Ibid. p. 12—21.

³ Ibid. p. 39.

^m Hist.

C H A P. VI.

Distractions which arose on the death of Timûr, and the usurpation of Kalîl Soltân.

^a AS soon as Timûr's death was known in the court, the empresses tore their faces and hair; ^{State of af-} the court-lords rent their clothes, and, flinging themselves on the ground, passed the ^{fairs.} night in grief: while the heavens, says our author, seemed to share in their affliction; since rains and thunder, storms and tempest, ceased not all the night. Next morning the body was washed, and embalmed with camphire, musk, and rose-water; then wrapped in linen, and laid in a coffin of ebony. As the design of the war in China was not yet abandoned, they kept his death concealed, by avoiding all signs of grief; and sent advice to the Mîrzas, particularly Pîr Mehemed Jeshân Ghîr, to repair forthwith to court. Next day the Mîrzas, empresses, and Amîrs, who were at Otrâr, set out, with the corpse, for Samarkant; and, having crossed the Sibûn, two parasangs distant, on the ice, entered a wood; where it was agreed in council, that they should march to Tâshkunt, under the command of the Mîrza Ibrâhîm Soltân; who, on his arrival, should deliver up the command to his elder brother Kalîl Soltân: that this latter should bear the title of emperor the whole campaign; and proceed with the whole army to conquer China: lastly, that, at their return to Samarkant, they should hold a general dyet, to execute Timûr's last will and testament.

^b AFTER this, several lords were sent with Timûr's coffin to Samarkant; where they arrived ^{Mîrza Huf-} the 6th of April, and buried it with the usual solemnity. The empresses, and other ladies, ^{fayn rebels.} followed, with the Mîrza Olûk Bek, and others; while the Mîrza Ibrâhîm Soltân took horse, at the head of the army, to march into China. When they were come to the bridge of Kal-dorma, on the river Arj, east of Otrâr, and one league from it, expresses were sent to the Mîrzas Kalîl Soltân and Soltân Hussayn to join them at Jûklek, a town five leagues east of the same city, in order to proceed in the expedition. But this great design was frustrated by the Mîrza Soltân Hussayn, in whose breast the death of Timûr rekindled the inclination of revolt-^c ing, which he had discovered in the war of Damaskus: for, as soon as he received that advice, he disbanded part of the troops of the left wing; and, taking from them their horses, passed the Sibûn (or Sîr) at Kojend, with one thousand men, each having two horses, and took the road of Samarkant: his design was, to have amused the inhabitants, and entered the city by stratagem^a.

^d THIS news being brought to the Amîrs Sheykh Nuro'ddîn and Shâh Mâlek, who sent him ^{Kalîl Soltân} the express, they immediately gave notice to Argûn Shâh, whom Timûr had left governor at ^{elected.} Samarkant; and ordered him to secure that ambitious prince, if he approached the city. They wrote also to the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân, and his great Amîrs, who were at Tâshkunt, six days journey of the karawân from Otrâr, to acquaint them with the evil design of Soltân Hussayn; and that it was proper to return with their troops to Akar, there to concert measures with them for the public good. After this, they marched for Samarkant; and, having crossed the Sibûn on the ice, next morning joined the empresses. Mean time affairs took a cross turn; for the Amîrs, with Soltân Kalîl, having had advice, before the express from Otrâr arrived, of the proceedings of Soltân Hussayn, their fear caused by Timûr's death was much increased; and, thinking the best way to prevent the evil, was, to create an emperor, the Mîrza Ahmed Omar ^{Sbeysk}, and the Great Amîrs Kodadâd Hussayni, Yadghiar Shâh Erlat, Shâmso'ddîn Abbâs, ^e Berendâk, and other principal officers, advanced the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân to the throne at Tâshkunt, and swore obedience to him.

As soon as the empresses, with the Mîrzas and Amîrs, received this advice, they wrote to ^{Secures Sa-} the Mîrzas of Kalîl Soltân, reproaching them with their breach of oath to Timûr, and acting ^{markant.} contrary to his last dispositions. The Amîrs, having read the letter, sent Berendak to Aksu-lat, where the empresses were encamped, to acquaint the Amîrs, "That what they did was "with a good intention, and to prevent troubles: but, since they found what they had done
"was agreeable neither to their sentiments, nor the late emperor's will, they were ready to "join with them in such measures as they should judge proper for carrying his majesty's tes-

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, l. vi. c. 31—35. p. 387—397.

“ tament into execution.” Upon this, the Amîrs Sheykh Nûro’ddîn and Shâh Mâlek wrote a second letter to those at Tâshkunt, exhorting them to annul the oath they had wrongfully taken thro’ inadvertency; and, by a written instrument, signed by Kalîl Soltân as well as themselves, submit to the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed. When Berendak was dismissed, the empresses and Mîrzas, with their troops, continued their road. When they came to Ali Abâd, the Mîrza Omâr Sbeykh and Shâh Mâlek, went before: but, on their arrival at Samarkant, Argûn Shâb, who had been gained by the promises of Kalîl Soltân, shut the gates against them: he even refused to let in either Shâh Mâlek or Sheykh Nûro’ddîn, to confer with the Amîrs there; pretending it would be contrary to the orders he had received from Timûr. He said, however, “ That he believed his majesty had ordained the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed his successor; “ and that he would deliver up the government of the city, as soon as the Mîrzas and Amîrs should, in an assembly, agree upon it ^b.”

Renounces the
empire.

THOSE Amîrs, who looked on all that Argûn Shâb had said to be grimace, returned to the empresses at Ali Abâd. Mean while, Berendek being returned to Tâshkunt, the Amîrs drew up a manifesto, which every one signed and sealed, and the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân himself was obliged to subscribe. The Mîrza ordered Atîlmîsh to carry this paper to the Amîrs Nûro’ddîn and Shâh Mâlek, and from them to Pîr Mehemed; directing him “ to assure the Mîrza, that “ he was his sincere friend; and would acknowledge him for his father’s successor, pursuant “ to his last will.” But, in this, Kalîl Soltân acted the hypocrite; his sole desire being to reign; in which he was instigated by some Amîrs who were about him. He seized all the horses, mules, and camels, belonging to Timûr, as well as the Mîrzas and Amîrs of his attendants, which he had left to graze at Tâshkunt and Sayrâm, and distributed them among those of his own party: he gave them likewise abundance of money, stuffs, and arms, which belonged to the soldiers who were in those quarters; and then departed, at their head, for Samarkant.

Assumes it again,

WHEN he came to the Sibûn, he ordered the Amîr Berendâk, with the troops of the right wing, to cross the river, on a bridge of boats, above Shâb Rûkhîya. As soon as he was gotten over, he broke the bridge, and went to join the empresses, who were then on their way to Samarkant. The Amîrs Kodadâd and Shâmso’ddîn Abbâs, with the same view, marched to Acbik Ferkint, pursuant to a secret agreement made before with Berendâk, to abandon Kalîl Soltân, and do nothing contrary to Timûr’s will. The Mîrza, on this advice, passed the Sibûn with his troops. Mean time Berendâk, being informed, on the road, how Argûn Shâb had refused the Amîr Shâh Mâlek admittance into Samarkant, he was surprised, and, moved as well by his ambition as his cowardice, without regarding his oath, immediately returned to join the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân, to whom he swore fidelity a second time. Hereupon the Mîrza, with those of his party, declared the instrument void, wherein they had promised obedience to Pîr Mehemed; and at the same time continued his road to Samarkant, with design to usurp the empire.

without reserve.

WHEN the Amîrs Sheykh Nûro’ddîn and Shâh Mâlek received this advice, after a speech wherein they lamented the confusion which the empire was fallen into; and the little regard paid to the will of a great monarch, when dead, by those very persons who had tasted most of his favours, they advised the empresses to proceed to Samarkant, while they attended the Mîrzas to Bokbâra; from whence they proposed to go meet the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, Timûr’s heir. When the empresses came to Samarkant, the Amîrs of the city would not admit them on that day. Next morning they entered; and took up their abode at the kanika of the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, where Timûr’s coffin lay. There several grandees of the empire, assembling in mourning habits, made lamentation over the emperor’s corpse, and were joined in signs of grief by all the inhabitants ^c.

Comes to Sa-
markant.

MEAN while the Mîrzas Olûk Bek and Ibrâbîm Soltân, being arrived at Debbûs, a high fortress on the river of Samarkant, received a letter from Koja Yûsef and Argûn Shâb, importing, “ that their refusing to open the gates to them, was not thro’ any motive of treason, “ but to obey Timûr’s will: that they would use Kalîl Soltân in the same manner, should “ he come; and, in short, would resign the city to none but the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, the “ lawful successor, for whom they kept it.” This they swore to at the end of the letter: but, three days after, the princes received advice that they had gone out to meet Kalîl Soltân, and conduct him into Samarkant. Hereupon they went on to Bokbâra, which they put in a posture of defence. The Mîrza Kalîl Soltân entered Samarkant on the 27th of April, chosen by the astrologer Mâlâna Bâdro’ddîn; and took possession of the great imperial palace, where all the treasures of Asia were amassed. There, being seated on the throne, he received the submission of the Mîrzas, Amîrs, and principal men of the state.

^b Hist. TIM. BEK, l. vi. c. 36—38. p. 397. & seq.

^c Ibid. c. 39—43. p. 405, & seq.

a As soon as he was installed, to shew he had an outward regard to Timûr's will, he gave the title of Khân to the Mîrza Mehemed Jêhân Ghîr, son of the Mîrza Mehemed Soltân, and nephew of the Mîrza Pîr Mehemed, though that prince was but nine years of age : his name was also placed at the top of all the patents, and imperial orders, according to custom ; altho' the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân assumed the sole disposal of every thing, as if the lawful sovereign. Two days after, the new emperor went to the kanika, where Timûr's tomb was, to pay his devotions, and perform the public ceremonies of mourning ; at which the empresses, Mîrzas, Amîrs, and all the people, assisted in black habits. When the funeral banquet was over, the imperial drum was beaten in a doleful manner : after which, it was broken in pieces ; and the Seyd Bereke's body being brought from Andekûd, Timûr's was placed underneath it, b pursuant to his orders.

WHEN the Mîrza Kalîl Soltân was fixed on the throne, he distributed his immense treasures His profuseprofusely among the Amîrs, principal lords, and soldiers. This liberality, or rather prodigality, was the first cause of his ruin : the second was his violent passion for Shâdi Mulk, before-mentioned : for, when he found himself an absolute sovereign, he resigned every thing up to the will of this beauty, and took no pleasure but in her company ; while she shewed no regard to either princes or nobles, but thought every one below her. What made his lavish humour the more inexcusable, was, that he squandered away his wealth on men of no worth ; while persons of extraordinary merit could obtain nothing, or but a trifle. He likewise advanced several strangers of mean extraction to the first employments in the state ; which alienated from c him the hearts of the great Amîrs of his court, and generals of his armies. Besides, as Shâdi Mulk was inferior in rank to the deceased emperor's wives, and these latter became jealous of her growing greatness, she conceived a great aversion to them, and persuaded Kalîl to give them, as well as Timûr's concubines, in marriage to some considerable Amîrs ; in order, as she said, the more firmly to engage them in his interest. Accordingly he disposed of those great ladies, but in a manner condemned by all men of understanding ; for he forced them to marry those who were not worthy to be their porters. In effect, his actions drew on him the aversion not only of his soldiers, but all his subjects : and affairs falling into confusion by his ill management, all his grandeur came to nothing in less than four years d.

THIS is the substance of what Sharîfo'ddîn Ali has written concerning the reign of Kalîl Soltân : but here we must, with regret, take leave of that well-instructed historian, to follow others who lived at too great a distance to be well acquainted with the affairs of the descendants of Timûr, for want of authors who were upon the spot.

KALIL SOLTAN was of an amiable disposition ; and, being exceeding liberal, attained, without any difficulty, to the sovereignty which he aspired to. He had at his disposal the brave Arab and Persian troops, with their best commanders, who were charmed with his affability, mildness, and sincerity. He was finely shaped, and handsome ; dextrous in managing his arms, and valiant : bountiful to those who served him, and always did more than he promised. He began his reign with the consent of the army : but this consent was not to be depended on. His Amîrs and chief officers expected that he should be attacked on all sides as soon as e the severity of the season was over ; and only waited opportunities to serve their respective interests. We have already mentioned the desertion and return of Brendâk (or Berendâk), of whose perfidy at that time Kalîl Soltân took no notice : he even heaped favours on him ; but, when his affairs were settled, put to death the traitor when he least suspected, seized all his effects, and extirpated his whole family.

THE next who took off the mask was Khodadâd Hussayn, governor of the provinces beyond the Sibûn (or Sîr), and the frontiers of Turkestan. This person was the greatest enemy the new emperor had ; and had always set himself on an equality with Timûr himself, as being of the house of Soltân Hussayn : on which account he bore the rank as sovereign in those countries. But, as Kalîl's affairs were quite unsettled when he passed the Sibûn, he could do no f less than keep up a friendship with him, and leave him in possession of the government which he held before. On Khodadâd's revolt, those who sought an occasion to quit Kalîl Soltân, repaired to him. Now the winter was over, Sheykh Nûro'ddîn, who had been one of Timûr's chief adherents, went away openly, and joined the rebel. Shâh Mâlek, another of them, halted afterwards from Samarkant, with a great noise ; and, passing the Jibûn (or Amû), retired to Shâh Rûkh, who held the government of Herât and Khorassân. Kalîl Soltân, without giving himself any uneasiness about those who abandoned him, continued to oblige such as remained in his service g.

As soon as Allabdâd, governor of Esbara (or Ashpera, on the frontiers of Jetab, towards Allâhdâd Mogulestan), heard of these transactions, he consulted his friends ; who advised him to leave alarmed.

^a Hist. Tim. Bek, l. vi. c. 44—46. p. 413—423.

^c ARABESH. Continuat. Hist. Timûr, p. 72—82.

that fortress, and return to his own country. Next day the commanders of the troops under a his power repairing, according to custom, to pay him their respects, and receive his orders, he asked them privately, what was to be done in this conjuncture. As the officers left it wholly to him to direct the method, and promised to follow his orders, upon oath, he told them, his resolution was to wait on Kalil Soltân; and desired, in the mean time, that they would stay and watch the Mungls. Things being thus settled, Allâhdâd set forward the 17th of Ramazân 807 (*), followed by his wives, children, and all that belonged to him. Taking his route through frost and snow, he arrived at Kulatajuk, where he received a mandate from Kalil Soltân, ordering him not to take any step against his interest, but to remain in his post at Esbâra.

Joins the revölker.

THIS order disconcerted all his measures; but, while he debated with himself what was to b be done, a deputy arrived from Khodadâd, advising him to leave Esbâra, and come to him as soon as possible. Nothing could arrive more opportunely, to deliver him out of the perplexity which he was in: he therefore made haste to join Khodadâd, who was overjoyed to see him: then passing the Sibûn at Kojend, they marched towards Samarkant. When they came to Tisek, they began to ravage the country with fire and sword, which had remained in peace all the reign of Timûr: this happened in Shawal, the same year 807; nor could Kalil Soltân prevent this disorder. Mean time the troops which Allâhdâd had left at Esbâra, fearing the Mungls might fall on them, began to consult what course to take. Some were for waiting to perform their promise; others were for quitting that post. At length the dispute rose to such a height between the two parties, that from words they came to blows, in which one of c the captains was killed. At night part of the troops left the place; which obliged the rest to follow, with all their effects. When they arrived where Allâhdâd was, this Amîr, instead of treating them ill for disobeying his orders, began to excuse himself for not having performed his promise, on pretence of having been prevented by Khodadâd (†); and bid them stay near him till there was an opportunity of going to Samarkant‡.

Invited by Kalil.

THIS adventure persuading Khodadâd that the enmity between Allâhdâd and Kalil Soltân was irreconcilable, he began to put confidence in him, and ask his advice. As he had intercepted a troop of servants belonging to the army, he was inclined to put them to the sword: but Allâhdâd alleging, that it was most prudent to use lenity, especially at setting out; and that, by sending them away, he might gain the friendship of their masters; he took his d advice, and dismissed them courteously. After this, Kalil Soltân sent a deputy to dispose Allâhdâd to mediate the difference between him and Khodadâd, promising to satisfy both their expectations. The cause of their animosity is said to be this: Kalil Soltân having at first been posted in the provinces near Khodadâd, his grandfather ordered this latter to have an eye over him, and regulate his conduct. As Khodadâd was naturally rough, severe, and disagreeable, he treated the prince with rigour and harshness; which irritated him to such a pitch, that he procured poison to be given him: but, discovering it in time, he took remedies, and escaped; however, he felt the effect of the dose ever afterwards.

Goes to Sa-
markant.

FROM that time a thorough hatred subsisted between them, which at last became public, and was the occasion of great disorders in the state. Allâhdâd shewed Khodadâd the letter of e Kalil Soltân; after which, he took an oath on the Korân, backed with the most horrid imprecations, “never to quit his service, or change his party, for any other; adding, that if he “went to Samarkant, he would do his utmost to reconcile the difference between him and “Kalil Soltân; put his affairs on a good footing; and procure him Tumâna (C), one of the “wives of Timûr.” Having, by these and many other artifices, lulled Khodadâd asleep, he returned to his friends at Shâb Rûkkîya, two stages distant; where crossing the Sibûn, he made what haste he could for Samarkant; sending before to let Kalil Soltân know what had passed between him and Khodadâd; and desiring him to send an escort to meet and protect him, in case Khodadâd should suspect his design, and detach troops to stop him; as he actually did; but too late; for Allâhdâd never halted one moment on the road, excepting to refresh a little, f till he arrived at Samarkant.

Is made Wazîr.

KALIL SOLTAN was overjoyed to see him; and, as the post of prime Wazîr was vacant, (Sheykh Nûro'ddîn and Shâh Mâlek, with all the rest who were inclined to rebel, having quitted the country), he gave that important mark of his favour to Allâhdâd, in prejudice to all the other Wazîrs and grandees of the state. The new minister soon restored every thing to order, and detached troops to guard the frontiers. In the management of affairs, he was ‡ ARABSH. Continuat. Hist. Timûr, p. 83—88.

(*) A. D. 1404; which date must be wrong. Our author seems to have antedated facts a whole year.

(†) Rather Khodadâd.

(C) Tumân Âge, the second empress.

a afflicted by Berendîk, Argûn Shâh, and one Kajuk, through whose hands every thing passed, under his controul. Mean time Sheykh Nûro'ddin and Khodadâd continued their ravages; and became at length masters of the frontiers of Turkestan, with the territories of Sayrâm, Nâsikand, Andakân, Ibojend, Shâh Râkbiya, Otrâr (D), and Segnâk, besides other cities and provinces in those parts. Sometimes, crossing the Jibân, they wasted the country of Great Bukhâria: but could never get any footing there; for Kalîl Soltân, in his turn, passed that river, and always put them to the route^b.

When the Mungls first heard that Timûr was marching towards them with an army capable of forcing its way through all opposition, they immediately took flight, dispersed themselves over the country, and retired, some into castles, others to the tops of inaccessible mountains. The inhabitants of Djibî (E), and those to the north, withdrew likewise into deserts: but, as soon as they heard of Timûr's death, and the troubles which ensued in his dominions, they took heart; and, returning to their respective countries, resolved to take advantage of the present opportunity. The Mungls first took the field; and, falling upon Esbâra and Asikol (or Afîghul), over-ran the provinces, till they became neighbours to Khodadâd, whom they obliged to deliver up all the places taken from them by Timûr, and then made an alliance with him.

MEAN time Pîr Mehemed, cousin-german of Kalîl Soltân, to whom Timûr had bequeathed the succession, departing from Kandakâr, with a numerous army, towards Samarkant; sent to let Kalîl Soltân, and all the great lords, know, that, as his grandfather had appointed him for his successor, he thought it strange that any person should seize the capital of the empire, which belonged only to him, and oppose his accession to the throne. In answer to this message, Kalîl Soltân alleged, "that, in this conjuncture, the sovereignty was to be held either by inheritance or acquisition. If by the former, that his father Mirân Shâh, and uncle Shâh Rûkh, had a better right than either of them, and he might hold of them either by grant or deposition (F). If by the latter, that he (Pîr Mehemed) could have no pretensions, as being at a distance, while himself was in possession: that, as to his grandfather's will, it was of no signification; for that he became master of so many countries himself by force, and actually divided them, during his life-time, among his sons and grandchildren: that as Pîr Mehemed had Kandakâr for his share, it was fit that he (Kalîl Soltân) should hold what he had conquered; especially as the principal persons of the state had acknowledged him for their sovereign: that however, if his father and uncle allowed of his competitor's pretensions, he would no longer dispute the point with him."

THE lords, on their part, returned an answer to the message of Pîr Mehemed, without either allowing or contesting his demand; only Abdo'l-wâl, the chief doctor in all Great Bukhâria, declared in express terms, "that although Pîr Mehemed was the appointed successor of Timûr, yet Heaven had not favoured his cause; for that, if fortune had designed him for the empire, he would have been near the capital at Timûr's death: that therefore his best way would be, to rest content with what God had ordained him, and not put it to the hazard, by invading the property of another, lest he should lose the substance in following the shadow." These answers were sent: but Soltân Kalîl, judging his cause stood in need of stronger arguments, raised a powerful army, and sent it against Pîr Mehemed, under the command of his cousin Soltân Hussayn; accompanied by Kajuk, Argûn Shâh, Allâbdâd, and other principal Gete commanders. In the month of Zu'l-kadeh 807 they set forward; and, being arrived at Bilk, the general pretended to be sick, and sent for all the commanders, as if to consult about the war. When they were assembled at his house, he fell upon them furiously; ordering those, whom he had placed for the purpose, to spare none who resisted. On this occasion Yusef, an eminent commander, who had been lieutenant at Samarkant in Timûr's absence, was slainⁱ.

UPON this success, Soltân Hussayn, who was rash and violent, passionate and flashy, declared himself sovereign, and got the people to acknowledge him for such. As to the officers, they were at their wit's end, and knew not what to think on this occasion: however, Allâbdâd, recovering his senses, called out to let him know he had some good advice to give him. Then taking him aside, told him, "that he was absolutely devoted to his service: that Kalîl Soltân had no title to the sovereignty; and that if he (Soltân Hussayn) had but acquainted him with his intentions, he would have disposed matters intirely agreeable to his wishes." Hussayn, deluded by these and the like speeches, from thenceforth put confidence in him; and first advised with him, if he should put to death his companions. Allâbdâd made use of several

^b ARAESH. Continuat. Hist. Timûr, p. 88—94.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 94—103.

(D) Written Anzar in our copy, by some mistake in placing the diacritical points.
(E) Or Dajlî Kijjak.

(F) The Persian historians say, Shâh Rûkh confirmed him in the possession of the countries to the north of the Jibân.

plausible reasons, to shew that it was better not to do it; and knew so well how to ply him with flattery on the weak side, that he quite diverted him from that design; yet advised him, for his better security, to keep them in fetters.

Deferted, and flies.

SOLTAN Hussayn followed his counsel; and, having taken an oath of fidelity from them, turned back towards Samarkant. At the same time he sent to acquaint Kalil Soltân, that he was coming to claim a share of his uncle's dominions, as well as the rest, and challenged him into the field. Then taking a new oath of his commanders, set them at liberty, and restored them to their respective posts. Kalil Soltân, who, before this, had been informed by Allâhdâd of the condition they were in, immediately set forward to meet Hussayn; who, with his usual imprudence, gave the command of his right wing to Allâhdâd, and that of his left to his two companions. When the two armies met, and were ready to engage, all those commanders went over to Kalil Soltân: so that his competitor, finding himself abandoned, fled into Khorassân, to his cousin Shâb Rûkb, where he died soon after, whether a natural death, or by poison, is not known^{*}.

Pir Mehemed
defeated.
Hej. 808.
A. D. 1405.

MEAN time Pir Mehemed continued his march, and came at length to Nakshab (G), where, soon after, Kalil Soltân advanced against him with all his forces; and, after a bloody battle, fought on the second of Ramazân 808, put him to flight, and took all his family prisoners. This victory got him a great reputation, and seemed to establish him on the throne; while Jalâlo'ddawlet, son of Soltân Abmed, of Bâghdâd, who had been delivered out of prison by Kalil, laid hold of the juncture, and made his escape to Irâk, which, it was said, had thrown off the yoke of the Jagatays. On the other side, Pir Mehemed, being returned to Kandabâr, raised fresh forces; and, repassing the Jibûn, resolved once more to try the force of arms. But his troops turned their backs almost as soon as the signal was given for battle; and he fled himself for safety to a neighbouring castle called Shaduman (H). As the enemy immediately invested the place, and he had not men enough to defend it, he caused the common people to mount the walls; who, being accoutred with sham armour, made for the occasion, were taken for soldiers by the besiegers. This artifice was of service for some time: but, being at length discovered, he found there was no way left for him but to ask quarter; which was granted: and both parties came to an agreement, under oath, to relinquish all claim to each other's territories, and live together in amity for the future.

Gives up his claim.

His country
usurp'd.

PIR MEHEMED, upon this, returned to his own dominions: but had not been there long, before Pir Alitâza, his Wazîr, who had been with him in both his expeditions, rebelled against him, and took the field with those of his party. Pir Mehemed marched against him with his troops; but was defeated, and taken prisoner. After which, the rebel Wazîr, to sound the great men of the state, told them in ambiguous terms, "that, the affairs of the world being in great confusion, there appeared manifest signs that the last day was at hand: this," says he, is the time of antichrists; the deceivers and impostors bear the sway. Timûr is gone, who was the lame deceiver. This is the time of the bald impostor: after whom, the blind deceiver will come. If the bald must reign, I am he." As nobody returned an answer to his satisfaction, he summoned the governors of provinces, to see what he could do with them; but, although he applied to them in a very humble manner, they paid no regard to his suit; giving him to understand, that each of them thought himself as deserving of the sovereignty as he. The Wazîr, finding that he could not gain his point, without any more ado, repaired to the Soltân of Herât: but Shâb Rûkb, instead of giving him a kind reception, punished him for his perfidy; and afterwards marched to conquer the country of Kandabâr, which submitted to him without making any opposition¹.

Kara Tatars
revolt.

IT was in the same year that the Tatars of Rûm, who were put into the hands of Argûn Shâb (I), took the field, and attempted to break their captivity. They crossed the Jibûn over the ice; and left Karazm, in order to return to their own country: but the inhabitants every-where opposing their flight, and being no better united among themselves than the troops of Irâk were before, the same fate happened to them; that is, they remained dispersed through the country.

AFTERWARDS Idekas (*), descending from the north with an army as numerous as the sands, entered the provinces of Khowarazm (or Karazm), of which Mîsfika (K) was then governor. This man, affrighted at the approach of the Tatars, abandoned the country, and left it to the invader; who then advancing with his cavalry towards Bokhâra, ravaged the neighbouring territory, and returned, after having chased the Getes (L), and put them in great

* ARABSH. Cont. Hist. Tim. p. 103—108.

¹ Ibid. p. 109—119.

(G) Called also Nasf, and Kârshi.

(H) Khafr Shaduman, or the castle of Shaduman.

(I) These were the Kara Tatars, spoken of before, P 565.

(*) Or Idekû, made Khân of Kipjâk by Timûr. See P 449.

(K) He was appointed governor by Timûr in 1391.

(L) By Getes, or Jetab, here are to be understood the forces under Kalil Soltân.

fear. He gave the government of Karazm to one named Ankas; after which, these parts remained in peace.

WHILE Kalîl Soltân was employed with his forces against Pîr Mebemed, Khodadâd and Sheykh Nûro'ddîn, taking advantage of his absence, approached Samarkant: but, not daring to attack the city, which shut its gates against them, they ravaged the neighbouring lands, and then withdrew. Kalîl, at his return, gave his troops a little rest; and then set forward, with a numerous army, to ravage their territories in his turn. On his arrival at the Sibân (or Sîr), Shâh Rûkbîya and Kojend surrendered immediately. He then turned towards Tâshkunt; in pursuit of his two enemies, who still fled before him, waiting for an opportunity to surprise him, which at length had like to have happened: for, one night, at a place called Sar-bekbân, advancing alone before the baggage, they, on notice given by their spies, who were always in his army, sent out a troop to meet and take him: but, luckily, a party of his cavalry, who were separated from the rest, coming up at the same time, he escaped that imminent danger; after which, the enemy dispersing themselves through the deserts, he gave over the chase, and returned to his dominions ^m.

MEAN time, as the friendship between Khodadâd and Sheykh Nûro'ddîn was not very solid, they fell at variance, each aspiring to the sole command. At length the latter, retiring toward Sagnâk, made himself master of it; and soon after, sent to ask Kalîl Soltân's pardon for his past fault, desiring to be restored to his favour. Kalîl readily granted his demand; and, to assure him of his good-will, sent him Tumîna, one of Timûr's wives; after which, they continued in friendship during his reign. But, after Shâh Rûkb had established his power in Samarkant, Shâh Mâlek went to Sagnâk, under pretence of paying him a visit, and renewing their antient friendship. Mutual oaths of sincerity having been taken, Sheykh Nûro'ddîn, at the request of the other, came out of the castle on horseback to give him an interview. After they had embraced, and talked a while in an amicable manner, Shâh Mâlek retired to his troop; where he staid till his men went and paid their respects to Sheykh Nûro'ddîn. Among the rest, there was one Argudak, a very big and strong man, whom Shâh Mâlek had engaged to perpetrate his design. When this person came up, he kissed Nûro'ddîn's hand; but at the same time, seizing him by the neck, pulled him off his horse; and, throwing him on the ground, cut off his head in sight of all his people. When Shâh Rûkb heard of this treacherous action, he was greatly grieved; and cursed Shâh Mâlek, whom he reproached in bitter terms. As for Argudak, he ordered him to be bastonadoed severely in public; and was a long time before he would see either of them. ^{treacherously slain.}

IN the month of Safar 810, Kalîl Soltân sent a party of soldiers, under the command of Allâhdâd, and some other captains, to rebuild Termed, which had lain in ruins ever since the time of Jenghîz Khân. These commanders, dividing the work among them, not only raised the walls to a height not to be scaled; but also built houses, and other places, fit for inhabitants, within the space of fifteen days. After this, they gave notice to the descendants of the antient possessors, to come and dwell in the new city (M): but these people, having settled themselves in the gardens and plains of the old town, which was about a league distant, chose rather to continue where they were. Hereupon Allâhdâd caused proclamation to be made through the country, for peopling the city; granting the property of the houses to those who first should take possession of them: by which means, in a little time, New Termed was filled with inhabitants, and soon became a flourishing city. ^{Termed rebuilt. Hej. 810. A. D. 1407.}

As soon as Shâh Rûkb heard of this proceeding, he sent a troop also under Marzab, brother of Jebûn Shâh, with orders, in like manner, to rebuild the castle named the fort of the Indians, which stood in the extreme end of Khorassân, on the Jibûn, opposite to Termed. The fort was finished without any interruption from Allâhdâd, who always lived in peace and friendship with Marzab. ^{power.}

AFTER this, Soltân Abmed and Kara Yusef returned amicably to Irâk Arabi; and, while the former re-established himself at Bâghdâd, the latter made war upon the Getes (N): from whom he conquered the province of Azerbejân, after he had defeated their armies, and slain the Mîrza Mirân Shâh, as will be set forth hereafter. As for Persian Irâk, it was at peace under the sovereignty of Pîr Omar: but one of his near relations, named Eskânder, rebelled against him, and seized the throne, after defeating, and taking him prisoner. Hereupon

^m ARABSH. ubi sup. p. 96. and 120—122.

(M) The old city was built on an eminence, which commanded the neighbouring country, and the Jibûn ran at the foot of the rock on which its walls were built; but the new city stood on a flat, and at a distance from the river. Arabshâh.

(N) So Arabshâh terms those whom others call Jagatays, that is, the troops of Timûr, and his descendants.

Shâb Rûkb marched to attack the usurper; whom, having seized, he put to death, and took possession of his dominions. By this conquest all Ajem (O) fell under the power of Shâb Rûkb, who enjoyed the whole without a rival; his father having, in his life-time, cut off all the princes of note in that large country, who might have given him any disturbance^m.

Affairs of Irâk.

THERE seems to be some mistake in this account of Arabshâb, with relation to the affairs of Persian Irâk; at least, it does not agree with the memoirs or extracts which we meet with from other authors. It has been observed in the reign of Timûr Bek, that he had invested his third son Mirân Shâb with the government of Azerbeïjan, Râm (or Anatolia), with Syria, as far as Egypt: but, on that prince's losing his understanding by a fall, he, in 1404, transferred that grant to Omar Mirza, second son of Mirân Shâb; with this farther authority, that the governments of Persian Irâk and Pârs (or Proper Persia), then in the hands of Rustem, and his brother Pîr Mehemed, should be subject to him. On Timûr's death, while Kalîl Soltân and Pîr Mehemed were struggling for the succession, Omar attacked his elder brother Abûbekr, who, in 1403, had Bâghdâd and Irâk Arabi granted him; and, having surprised him at Soltânîya, in Persian Irâk, took him prisoner: but Abûbekr made his escape, and, gathering forces, obliged Omar Mirza to fly to Shâb Rûkb, in Khorassân. Shâb Rûkb, to make him amends for the loss of his dominions, gave him Astarabad and Mazanderân for his support: but, being of a restless temper, Shâb Rûkb was constrained to bring him to reason by force of arms. Omar fled, designing to get to Samarkant: but, being pursued by the Soltân's troops, he was overtaken at the river Morgâb, some leagues to the north of Herât, where he was slainⁿ. The Pîr Omar of Arabshâb is, doubtless, the Omar Mirza of the Persian historians. That author seems to have mistaken Ali Eskânder, son of Omar Sheykh (to whom, in 805, Timûr gave the government of Hamadân, and the adjacent territories^o), for Abûbekr, brother of Omar Mirza; and the death of Eskânder for that of Omar. Our extracts from the Persian historians do not say Shâb Rûkb seized Omar's dominions, either on the flight or death of that prince; yet, as we find him in possession of Persian Irâk, at the time he took possession of the countries beyond the Jibûn, it may be presumed that he became master of it one of those times.

Troubles at Samarkant.

ABOUT this time all the strangers, who had for many years past flocked to Samarkant, began to abandon it, on account of the scarcity and dearness of provisions. Some retired, with leave, to their respective countries: others went away by stealth. At length, plenty returning, the inhabitants enjoyed the sweets of peace: but this tranquility did not long subsist. Kalîl Soltân had married Shâdi Mulk, the relict of Amîr Sayfo'ddîn before-mentioned; and so deoted on her, that he let her do whatever she pleased, and transacted nothing without her advice. This princess had an ancient servant, named Bâbâ Termes, a person of mean descent, with squinting eyes, and a face full of pimples, rude and ill-bred. As, on her advancement, her domestics shared in her good fortune, Bâbâ Termes, who was the chief of them, became a great man. From the management of his mistress's affairs, he, by degrees, rose to the most important employments of the state; and at length disposed of all things at pleasure, without any regard either to Allâbdâd or Argûn Shâb, whose orders he often set aside.

Soltân Kalîl betrayed.

THESE two lords, enraged to be treated in such a manner by this upstart, on consulting how to remedy the evil, could think of no better expedient, than to make their case known to Khodadâd, and advise him to march his forces towards Samarkant; assuring him that he might do it, without the least danger. Khodadâd accordingly set forward, marching slowly till he came to Ourataba. As soon as Kalîl Soltân heard of this movement, he assembled a numerous army, and sent it against the enemy, under the command of Allâbdâd and Argûn Shâb. These generals took the field: but, instead of fighting the rebels, they sent for more forces; and at length intreated Kalîl Soltân to come himself in person, as the surest means to repulse the enemy. The deluded prince, suspecting no treachery, immediately set forward with his courtiers; of which Allâbdâd gave notice to Khodadâd: who thereupon marching in the night, came up with Kalîl Soltân's train, near Soltânîya, a little city built by Timûr; and surrounded them, before they were apprised of the danger^p.

Is taken prisoner.

THE prince and his attendants did not fail to make a valiant defence: but, as they were only a handful of men, they were soon defeated; and, after most of them had been slain, Kalîl Soltân fell into the hands of his enemy, who carried him to his camp. When he was arrived there, Khodadâd protested, with the most solemn oaths, that he had no design to hurt him in the least; and that he would soon give him an incontestable proof of his sincerity. In the mean time he desired Kalîl Soltân to send orders to Allâbdâd, and those he commanded

^m ARABSH. ubi sup. p. 122—128.
Mirza.

^o See before, p. 570.

ⁿ D'HERBEL. bibl. orient. p. 20 & 693. art. Abubekr & Omar

^p ARABSH. ubi sup. p. 129—135.

(O) That is, the country of the barbarians; so the Arabs call Irân, or Persia at large.

a to surrender, without making any resistance; which was accordingly done. Khodadâd, being by this means become master of all the forces of the country, began his march towards Samarkant, without taking notice of Allâbdâd, and those of his party; who now, too late, found that he was deceived in his hopes, and ruined beyond redress. This revolution happened in the year 812.

As soon as Khodadâd arrived at Samarkant, he turned every thing upside down, and let Khodadâd nothing remain which had been established. He made his son, named Allâbdâd, to assume the title of Soltân (P), before witnesses; and, in short, intirely changed the state of affairs. When this news was brought to Shâb Rûkb, he was greatly moved; and, resolving to revenge the affront done to his father's house, issued orders for assembling all his forces. Mean time b he detached Shâh Mâlek, with a powerful army, to stop the progress of the rebellion; and followed himself soon after, with the rest of his troops. Khodadâd, on advice of this formidable march, knowing himself not able to resist such a power, and fearing either to be deserted, or delivered up by his followers, thought it best to provide for his safety in time. Accordingly, after he had seized all the treasure he could find, and packed up as much rich furniture as he could conveniently carry off, he set out for Andekbân; leaving Allâbdâd, Argûn Shâb, and Bâba Termes, shut up in the castle of Samarkant, not caring to embarrass himself with their company.

BUT, although he took Kalil Soltân along with him, he left his dearly-beloved Shâdi Mulk Flies from Samarkant, behind, whom he had reduced from her state of grandeur to a very low condition. After his departure, the people, being left without a commander, took care of their own interests the best they could. Allâbdâd and Argûn Shâb were desirous to march out, and meet Shâb Rûkb, who now approached the city: but Abdo'lwâl, followed by the rabble, would not permit them. This doctor had great authority among the populace; and, during the short interregnum, disposed of things at pleasure. He continually incensed the people against Allâbdâd and his associates, till such time as Shâb Mâlek and Shâb Rûkb arrived. As soon as this prince drew near Samarkant, the citizens went out to meet him; and, with joyful acclamations, conducted him into the city, where he quickly set things in order. As to Allâbdâd and his colleagues, he caused them to be seized, and put to death, after they had undergone the most cruel torments: only Bâba Termes was respited for some time longer, that he d might receive the punishment in this life due to his crimes. But he eluded their design: for one day, pretending that he had hidden treasure in a certain place, when he came to a deep pond, which lay in the road, he on a sudden wrested himself out of the hands of his guards, and jumped into the water, where he was drowned in their sight^a.

WHEN things were a little settled, Shâb Rûkb went to visit the tomb of his father; where he caused all the funeral ceremonies to be performed as had been done before. After this, he ordered most part of the rich moveables, the arms, and other things of value, which were in the sepulchre, to be carried into the magazines; plundering the treasures, and searching the most secret places for hidden wealth. At length his officers seized on Shâdi Mulk, and made her suffer a thousand indignities: they tortured her, to discover her effects; and, when they e had gotten all from her, led her in chains through the streets, shouting after her as an infamous woman. Mean time Khodadâd, being come to Andekbân, entered into an agreement with Kalil Soltân, and promised never to do him any injury for the future; assuring him withal, that this disgrace had never happened to him, but through the perfidy of Allâbdâd and Argûn Shâb. He urged this discovery as a proof of his sincerity; and, though he put the prince in mind of his attempt to poison him, yet declared he was so far from revenging it, that he would do his utmost to re-establish him in his dominions.

AFTER this Khodadâd caused the Kotbah to be made in the name of Kalil Soltân, throughout Khodadâd Turkestan; and then, leaving him at Andekbân, departed, in order to demand succours of the Mungls (Q) in his behalf. The Mungls, as hath been observed before, had, on the death f of Timmûr, come to an agreement with Khodadâd: they likewise sent ambassadors, with rich presents, to Kalil Soltân; who received them with great civility, and dismissed them loaded with favours. As this amity was strictly cultivated afterwards with the Mungls, as soon as Khodadâd arrived among them, they seized his person, and sent advice thereof to Kalil Soltân; acquainting him, "that they were ready to obey his commands, either in putting Khodadâd " to death, as the author of his present misfortunes; or sending by him the succours which " he had desired in his name." Kalil Soltân, in answer to this message of the Mungls, set

^a ARAESH. ubi sup. p. 135—141.

(P) Perhaps it should be Khân; for Kalil had also made a Khân, to keep up the appearance of a succession of the line of Jenghîz Khân.

(Q) The Persian historians say, that Khodadâd called in Shamâ Jebân, king of the Mungls, to take possession of Kalil Soltân's dominions: but that the Mungl prince punished the traitor, and sent his head to Shâb Rûkb. D'Herbel. bibl. orient. p. 770. art. Schah Rokh.

forth the miserable condition to which that Amîr had reduced him; adding, “that he now a placed him (the prince) as a buckler before him, to ward off the strokes of his own bad fortune.” Then he told them, “that, as they knew better than he what designs Khodâdâd had in view; he therefore left it to them, to act in the affair as they should judge most expedient.”

Kalîl Soltân
resigns.

His death.

On the receipt of this answer, the Mungls immediately cut off that commander's head, and sent it to Kalîl Soltân; who thenceforward continued on the frontiers of Turkestan, amusing himself with composing elegies, in Persian, on the absence of his beloved Shâdi Mulk, in terms capable of moving the very rocks. At length, no longer able to support his uneasiness, he marched with his troops towards Samarkant, and put himself into the hands of his uncle. Shâh Rûkh received him with honour; and, without speaking of the evils that were past, delivered up to him the chief object of his affections. After this, leaving at Samarkant his son Olugh Bek, to govern that province, he returned to Khorassân; carrying with him Kalîl Soltân, to whom he afterwards gave the command of the country dependent on Ray (R): but he did not enjoy that settlement long; for he soon after died, by means of a dose which his uncle caused to be given to him privately; and, by his death, put an end to the troubles in which the country had been involved. Shâdi Mulk, unable to bear this new affliction, thrust a poignard through her throat; and was buried at Ray, in the same tomb with her unfortunate consort ^r.

^r ARABSH. ubi sup. p. 141—145.

(R) The Persian historians say, that he gave him the provinces of Persian Irâk and Azerbejân in exchange for the provinces to the north of the Jibûn, with which he invested Uluk Beg, or Oluk Bek. D'Herbelot, bibl. orient. p. 770. art. Schah Rokh.

C H A P. VII.

The reign of Shâh Rûkh.

2. Shâh
Rûkh.

A. D. 1402.

Omar takes Irâk.

BY this conquest, or rather voluntary submission, of Great Bukhâria, Shâh Rûkh became peaceable possessor of the greater part of the empire of his father Timûr: for, besides that large region, he was master of Karazm, Khorassân, Kandabûr, and part of Hindûstân, Forjân, Mazânderân, Persian Irâk, Pârs, Kermân, and, in short, all the country of Irân, or Persia at large, as far as the province of Azerbejân, which was then in subjection to Kara Yûsef, the Turkmân^a. Hence it appears that Shâh Rûkh, when Kalîl Soltân resigned the succession to him, was not possessed of much above half of his father's empire to the south of the Jibûn, or Amû: though it must be confessed, that the countries to the west of Persian Irâk were not intirely subject to that conqueror; who, in 805, divided them among the three eldest sons of Mirân Shâh; Abûbekr, Omar, and Kalîl Soltân, just now mentioned. To the first he gave Arabian Irâk; Omar was invested with Azerbejân, Rûm or Anatolia, and Syria, as set forth in the reign of Kalîl Soltân; who had for his share Armenia, Arrân, Georgia, and Trabizond. It may be proper, therefore, in this place, to inquire how the dominions granted to these three princes came to be lost.

WHEN Timûr made a grant of Arabian Irâk to Abûbekr, it was then in the hands of Kara Yûsef; who, on his return from Syria, whither he had fled from the arms of Timûr, had seized it, on some disgust against Soltân Abmed, whom he drove out of the province^b: but Abûbekr, advancing with a superior force, obliged the Turkmân to abandon Irâk; and rebuilt Bâghdâd, according to his grandfather's directions. After Timûr's death, Omar Mirza, coveting to join his brother Abûbekr's territories to his own, made war upon him; and, having surprised him in the city of Soltâniya (in Persian Irâk), took him prisoner. By this means Irâk fell into the hands of Omar, with the city of Bâghdâd, its capital^c. Soon after, Soltân Abmed, whom, with Kara Yûsef, the Soltân of Egypt had set at liberty, on receiving news of the death of Timûr, got privately into Bâghdâd, with some of his friends, in disguise; and, exciting a sedition against Omar's governor, the people drove out the latter, and proclaimed Abmed Soltân.

^a ARABSH. p. 146.
Aboubekr & Omar Mirza.

^b See hereafter.

^c D'HERB. bibl. orient. p. 20, & 693, art.

^a MEAN time Abûbekr, escaping out of prison, raised forces, and drove Omar out of his dominions, which he soon became master of; and, while he was employed at the siege of Ispâhân, towards the end of the year 803, the Amîr Ibrâhîm, coming out of Shîrwân (A), seized the city of Tauris: but was soon obliged to quit it on the approach of Soltân Abmed, who was thus re-established in all his dominions. However, Ibrâhîm having, in 809, reduced Ispâhân (B), soon obliged Abmed to quit Tauris, and retire to Bâghdâd; and, Omar being soon after slain in Khorassân, by the troops of Shâh Rûkh, Abûbekr, by his death, remained in peaceable possession of Tauris. But this prince, though brave, was unfortunate, and did not long enjoy either his own or his brother Omar's territories: for Kara Yûsef (who, as soon as he was freed from his Egyptian bondage, had, with his Turkmâns, seized great part of Arabian Irâk, and Al. Jazîreh, or Mesopotamia), taking advantage of the divisions which reigned among those princes, entered Azerbejân with fresh and warlike troops, in order to conquer it. Abûbekr hereupon advanced with his forces to repel the invader; and, 810, fought two battles A. D. 1407. with the Turkmâns, on the banks of the Euphrates (C): both which he lost; and, in the first, his father Mirân Shâh, who accompanied him in that expedition, was slain.

AFTER the last defeat, Abûbekr fled to the province of Kermân, and from thence to that of Sajestân, or Sistân; where having raised forces, he set out to return, with design to make head against the Turkmâns, and drive them out of Azerbejân: but, in his way back, he was killed (D). Mean time Kara Yûsef went on with his conquests; and, in two or three years, made himself master of that province. Then, leaving Tauris in a good posture of defence, he marched against Kara Ozman Bayandîrî (of the white sheep dynasty), who was then possessed of Diyârbekr: which, on the other's approach, he abandoned. During his absence, Soltân Abmed, not able to bear the loss of Azerbejân, which he considered as his patrimony, in 812 he set forwards; and, the next year, surprised Tauris, without meeting any resistance. Kara Yûsef no sooner received advice of this ill turn which the Soltân had done him, than he marched against him with a puissant army, and overthrew him two leagues from Tauris; in such a manner, that Abmed had scarce time to hide himself in a garden: where, being discovered, he was put to death, at the instigation of the lords of Irâk, who were incensed against him, in the same year 813.

AFTER this, in 815, Kara Yûsef, entering Georgia, slew Constantine the king; and brought Sheykh Ibrâhîm, king of Shîrwân, prisoner to Tauris. From what has been said, it appears, that this Turkmân made himself master of great part of the countries which Timûr had given to his grandchildren Omar Mîrza and Kalîl Soltân; who seems to have abandoned his, to secure the succession at Samarkant. And it may be presumed that the rest of them returned in subjection to their former lords; as Syria to the Soltân of Egypt, and Rûm (or Anatolia) to the Othmân emperors; or else were seized by the neighbouring princes. However that was, Kara Yûsef, extending his conquests eastward, took Soltâniya, Kasbîn, and other cities in Persian Irâk: while Shâh Rûkh, though desirous to resent this injury, as well as revenge the death of his brother Mirân Shâh; yet, being employed about other affairs, was not at leisure to oppose him till the year 821; when he set out with a powerful army, to attack his dominions. As soon as this news was brought to Kara Yûsef, who was then marched toward Antâb, a city of Syria, near Hâlep, he desisted from that enterprise, and turned back to meet the Soltân: but died on the way, at Ojân, or Ujân, near Tauris. Others say, that he defeated the Turkmân in three battles. After his death, in 824, Amîr Eskânder, son of Kara Yûsef, continued the war against Shâh Rûkh; by whom being overthrown in Diyârbekr, he retired towards the Euphrates, while the victor marched to Tauris: but, being denied entrance by the inhabitants, and thinking his stay would be to no purpose, returned to Khorassân; upon which Eskânder came back to his capital.

IN 828 this prince advanced to Soltâniya, and took it; of which Shâh Rûkh being informed, he marched again to Tauris, where he routed Eskânder, who retired towards Rumestân (or Ana-

^c MIRKOND & KONDAMIR ap. D'Herbel. p. 20, & 150, art. Aboubekr and Avis; also TEIXEIRA, p. 321. ^d Ibid. ^e D'HERBEL. p. 150, & seq. art. Avis. ^f TEIXEIRA, p. 321.

324.

(A) This seems to be Sheykh Ibrâhîm, king of Shîrwân, spoken of lower down: but indeed there is so great defectiveness and confusion either in the original authors, or those who have give us the abstracts, that 'tis scarce possible to make the history of any of these princes consistent either with that of the rest, or with itself.

(B) Perhaps Ibrâhîm is put here, by mistake, for Abûbekr; or was an assistant to the latter, who, we find, but a little before besieged the same city.

(C) Probably in the neighbourhood of Bâghdâd, or Hellâ: yet Teixeira (from Mirkond) p. 324, mentions a battle fought near Nakshirwân (near the river Arrâs), which Abûbekr lost; whereupon the city of Tauris fell into the hands of Kara Yûsef.

(D) This is according to Teixeira, who has given an abstract of Mirkond's history: but D'Herbelot, who quotes both Mirkond and Kondamir, in the article of Abûbekr, says, he died in Sajestân, after having raised forces to no purpose: yet, in that of Kara Yûsef, relates, that the Turkmân first slew Abûbekr near Nakshirwân, and afterwards his father Mirân Shâh. This disagreement must proceed from inadvertence in the extracter.

tolia). For all this, Shâb Rûkb could not make himself master of that city. Hereupon he returned to Khorassân, to recruit his army; and then marched back to Ray in Irâk, which he took. There Jebân Shâb, brother of Eskânder, coming to wait on, was reconciled to, him, and received the investiture of Azerbeijân, for which he became his tributary. On this grant, he armed against Eskânder, and defeated him; who, flying to Alexjâk, was there killed by his own son in 841. Although the reign of Shâb Rûkb has been written in great detail by the oriental historians (E), and is full of great events; but little more relating to that prince has yet come to our knowledge.

A. D. 1437. and other acts. NOTWITHSTANDING Pîr Mehemed Jebân Gîr was appointed Timûr's successor, and Kalîl Soltân actually possessed the capital of his empire, with the provinces north of the Jibân, for four years together; yet Shâh Rûkb is by historians reckoned the immediate successor of that conqueror, and the beginning of his reign put in 807. The year after, he rebuilt the famous fortress or castle of Herât, where he then reigned, named Ektiaro'ddîn, which his father had destroyed, and employed 7000 men about that work: he likewise re-edified the walls of the city itself, and those of Marû, which had lain in ruins ever since the time of Jenghîz Khân.

A. D. 1404. When named. THIS prince is called by historians Mîrza Shâb Rûkb, or Shâb Rûkb Mîrza; also Shâb Rûkb Bahâdr, or the valiant. He was named Shâb Rûkb by his father Timûr, because he received the news of the birth of this prince at the time when he was playing at chess; and had made the stroke which the Persians call Shâb Rûkb, that is, when the Rûkb, which we call the Tower, and some the Knight, has given Chec to the king.

His death, Hej. 850. A. D. 1446. and sons. SHAH RUKH died in the year 850, in the city of Ray, or Rey (in Persian Irâk), after he had lived seventy-one years, or thereabouts, and reigned forty. He had five sons; Ulug Beg, who succeeded him, Abû'l Fetah Ibrâhîm, Baysankar, Soyûrgatmîsh, and Mohammed Jûki. All these princes, excepting the eldest, died during the life-time of their father. Abû'l Fetah Ibrâhîm governed Pârs (or Proper Persia), for the space of twenty years, and died in 838. This prince left in Shîràz, the capital, several monuments, which have preserved his memory: among others, a famous Madrasah, or college, which bears the name of Dâr al Safû, that is, the house of joy and pleasure. There are extant several little poems, as well as inscriptions, of this prince's composing; and it was to him that Shârifo'ddîn Ali Yezdi, who is reckoned the most elegant of all the Persian historians, dedicated the history of Timûr, intitled, Dbâffer, or Zâffer Nâmeb, that is, the Book of Victories, which was written by his order, in the year 828, of which we have given the abstract.

MIRZA BAYSANKAR, or Baysangor, who died the year before his brother Ibrâhîm, left three sons; Mîrza Alâo'ddawlet, Soltân Mohammed Mîrza, father of Yadighiar, and Mîrza Babr Abû'l Kassim, Soyûrgatmîsh commanded in the country of Gâznab and the Indies. He died before his two elder brothers, in the year 830.

MIRZA MOHAMMED JUKI, the fifth and last sons of Shâb Rûkb mentioned by historians, died in 848, two years only before the death of his father ^a.

The reign of Ulug Beg, his son Abdo'llatîf, and Soltân Abdo'llah.

3 Ulug Beg. Hej. 851. A. D. 1447. UPON the death of Shâb Rûkb, in 851, the empire of Timûr fell again into division: for his three grandchildren, the sons of Baysankar, his third son, seized each a share. Alâo'ddawlet, the eldest, possessed himself of Khorassân: Mohammed, the second, kept Persian Irâk and Pârs, of which he was governor; and Abû'l Kassim Babr did the like by Jorjân and Mazînderân: so that nothing remained to Mîrza Mohammed Jûki, surnamed Ulug Beg, or the great lord, eldest son and successor of Shâb Rûkb, excepting the countries to the north of the river Jibân (or Amû) and Turkestân; which he had governed for near forty years before; that is, during the whole reign of his father in those countries.

As soon as Alâo'ddawlet heard of the death of his grandfather, he seized on Herât, the capital of Khorassân, under pretence of commanding there in behalf of his uncle Ulug Beg. He there found great treasures, which he plundered; and detained as prisoner the person of Abdo'llatîf, Ulug Beg's eldest son, who was yet very young. Hereupon Ulug Beg sent ambassadors to his nephew, to treat of peace, and get Abdo'llatîf out of his hands. But this peace lasted but a short space: for Ulug Beg, not being able to suffer Alâo'ddawlet to remain in possession of Khorassân, to which he had better pretensions himself, advanced the year following, with his two sons, Abdo'llatîf and Abdo'lazîz, at the head of a powerful army, to attack him; and meeting him at Morgâb, fourteen parasangs from Herât, gave him battle. Alâo'ddawlet, not a able to withstand the shock of his uncle's arms, was defeated, and retired to his brother Bâbr; while Ulug Beg entered triumphantly into Herât, and ascended the throne of his father Shâh Rûkb.

^a D'HERBEL. p. 770. art. Schah Rukh.

(E) His history was written at large by Shârifo'ddîn Ali, author of the history of Timûr Bek (see vol. ii. p. 428.); also by Abdo'lrazzak bin Jalâlo'ddîn Jûzi al Somarkandi; a translation of which was expected from the hands of the late M. Galland, but never appeared. See D'Herbel. bibl. orient. p. 770. art. Schah Rukh.

HOWEVER, he did not remain long in peace there: for the two brothers, Alâo'ddawlet and Bâbr, having assembled a considerable army, resolved, if possible, to drive him out of Khorassân. Ulug Beg, on this advice, marched from Herât against them, and forced them to abandon Astaraবাদ, which they had already mastered; and obliged them to take shelter with their other brother, Soltân Mohammed, who reigned in Persian Irâk. Ulug Beg, content with having put them to flight, returned also to Herât, where his presence was very necessary: for, in his absence, the inhabitants of the suburbs of that great city had revolted, and placed at their head Tar Ali, the Turkman, son of Eskânder, and grandson of Kara Yûsef, mentioned in the reign of Shâh Rûkb, with a design to make themselves masters of Herât: but the victorious prince returned time enough to chastise them for their rebellion, and gave the pillage of the suburbs to his troops. This was in the year 852; after which, he returned to his royal city of Samarkant. Hej. 852.
A. D. 1448.

THE absence of Ulug Beg soon gave Mîrza Bâbr an opportunity to come again to Astaraবাদ, and from thence to Herât; whose inhabitants, in resentment for the plundering of their suburbs, opened their gates to him. This misfortune was succeeded by a greater: for, not long after, Abdo'llatif rebelled against his father, and marched to reduce Bâlk. Ulug Beg, willing to bring his son to reason, advanced, with his troops, towards that city: but Abdo'llatif, instead of submitting himself, went, at the head of an army, to meet his father, and gave him battle. Ulug Beg was defeated; and, being taken prisoner, was put into the hands of Abbâs, who, after some formal proceedings against him, at length put him to death, in the year 857. Slain by his son.

THIS prince, whose end was so unhappy, was yet endowed with great qualities. For, besides being very courageous, he applied himself to study the sciences, and particularly astronomy. It is under his name and authority, that the tables, intituled Zij Ulug Beg, were composed, at Samarkant, by Ali Ebn Gayâtho'ddîn Mohammed Jamshîd, surnamed Al Kûshji, and by Salâho'ddîn Kâzi Zâdeh al Rûmî, the greatest astronomers of their time. This latter, who had been Ulug Beg's master, dying before the work was finished, the whole burden fell upon the former. The work, intituled, (A) Mârifat al Tawârîk, which makes a part of the astronomical tables, calls this prince Soltân al Hind wa al Sind, that is, king of the two Indies (B), and gives him forty-one years of reign; although he properly reigned no more than two years after the death of Shâh Rûkb. Kondamîr, Al Jannâbi, and Ebn Yûsef, qualify this prince with the surnames, or titles, of Al Mâlek al Saïd, Kurkhân, and Sâheb Kerân; all which Timûr bore, and left them as hereditary in his family.^a A learned prince.

ULUG BEG was succeeded by his unnatural son Abdo'llatif; who, to his parricide added fratricide; having also caused his brother Abdo'lazîz to be put to death, in order to secure himself on the throne; which yet he did not enjoy longer than six months; at the end whereof, his own soldiers shot him to death with their arrows.^b 4. Abdo'llatif.

AFTER the death of Abdo'llatif, Abdo'llah, son of Ibrâhîm (C), son of Shâh Rûkb, took possession of his dominions. This prince succeeded his father Ibrâhîm in the sovereignty of Pârs, or Proper Persia, in the year 1438, with the consent of his uncle Shâh Rûkb: but being, at length, driven out of his dominions, by his cousin-german Mohammed Mîrza, son of Bay Sangor, son of Shâh Rûkb, he fled to his uncle Ulug Beg, at Samarkant; who received him very well, and gave him his daughter in marriage. He seems to have continued in that city during the remainder of the lives both of Ulug Beg and Abdo'llatif; which gave him an opportunity, on the death of the latter, to seize the throne: but he possessed it no more than one year; for, being twice attacked by Abûsaïd Mîrza, he was the last time overthrown in battle, and slain, in the year 855; as will be more distinctly set forth in the following reign.^c 5. Abdo'llah.
A. D. 1451.

^a TEIXEIRA, p. 317. D'HERBEL. p. 83. 414. art. Alaeddin & Ulug Beg.
p. 318. D'HERBEL. p. 8. art. Abdallah.

^b Id. ibid; ^c TEIXEIRA.

(A) It has been published by Mr. John Greaves, with a Latin version, under the title of Epochæ Celebriores.

(B) Rather, literally, of Al Hind and Al Sind; which are two different parts of India.

(C) He is elsewhere said to be the son of Ulug Beg. See D'Herbelot, art. Abûsaïd Mîrza, p. 34; and Teixeira; hist. Pers. p. 318.

C H A P. VIII.

The reign of Abusaid Mîrza.

6. Soltân Abusâid Mîrza.

ABUSAID MIRZA, the son of Mohammed (A), the son of Mirân Shâh, son of Timûr, was in the army of Ulug Beg, when he made war on his son Abdo'llatîf, on the banks of the river Amû, and seemed to be in very good understanding with that prince. But, having an ambitious mind, and enterprising head, he took the occasion of that war, and the troubles which ensued in the city of Samarkant, to discover the design which he had for a long time nourished, of making himself the chief of a new party, and master of some provinces. With this view, he joined his forces to those of Il Argûn, one of the most powerful lords of the country, and marched with him to Samarkant; where Abdo'lazîz, another son of Soltân Ulug Beg, commanded for his father; but this latter, not thinking himself strong enough to oppose such considerable troops, abandoned the city, and retired to Jabar, or Chaar Divar, that is, the four walls; where he judged himself in more security.

Secures Bokhâra.

As soon as Ulug Beg received this advice, he immediately quitted the Amû, to go and relieve his capital; and, by that means, left the way open to his rebel son Abdo'llatîf, who did not fail to pass the river, and follow at his father's heels. That prince, having become master of Samarkant, after his parricide, in 854, Abusaid was no longer in a condition to undertake any thing: and therefore was obliged to retire to the camp of Il Argûn. But Abdo'llatîf, considering him as a thorn in his foot, found means to draw him out of that post, and take him prisoner. However, his confinement did not continue long: for he made a shift, soon after, to escape to Bokhâra; where, being informed that Abdo'llatîf was dead, and Abdo'llah had succeeded him, he managed matters so well, by his intrigues, that he made himself master of Bokhâra, and of the country belonging to it. After which, he began to declare war openly against Abdo'llah, and marched towards Samarkant: but, being met by the Soltân, he was defeated, and constrained to fly at a great distance into Turkestan. This happened in the year 854.

A. D. 1450.

Ascends the throne.

THE year following, Abûsâid, strengthened by the powerful assistance of Uzbek Khân (of Kipjâk), returned, to attack Abdo'llah, from whom he took several castles; and, at length, came to a bloody battle, in which the Soltân being slain, Abûsâid became the peaceable possessor of all the provinces to the north of the Amû, which belonged to Ulug Beg. However, this victory cost Samarkant very dear: for the Uzbeks, or soldiers of Uzbek Khân, having entered the city, treated the inhabitants very roughly, and behaved as masters. Hereupon Abûsâid made use of artifice to drive them out: for going alone, and in a plain dress, to the gate, he there discovered himself to the burghers (who guarded it), unknown to the Uzbeks; and entering the city, presently made himself master of the principal posts: which done, he obliged the unruly guests, partly by force, and partly by presents, to quit the place, and retire home with their leader.

A. D. 1456.
Enters Khorassân.

In the year 862, Soltân Bâbr, one of Timûr's grandsons, who reigned in Khorassân, being dead, and his son Mahmûd on the throne; Abûsâid, who had, for a long time, meditated the reduction not only of that province, but of all Irân, or Persia at large, without delay put himself in a condition to accomplish his design. He intrusted part of the execution to the care of Sheykh Mîr Haji, governor of Bâlk, and advanced with his army towards Herât. Abmed Yessawî, who commanded there in behalf of Soltân Ibrâhîm Mirza, having considered, for some time, whether he should defend the city, or retire into the citadel, called Ektiâro'ddîn, at length resolved on the latter. Abûsâid, having thus become master of the city, and in vain summoned Abmed to surrender, gave several assaults upon the castle; but was always repulsed, and made no progress in the siege.

Niretû fortress lost.

AT this juncture, some evil-minded persons having informed him, that Soltân Ibrâhîm Mirza had sent couriers to the Soltânâ Jaurshâd, his mother, and held a secret correspondence with her; he, in a transport of anger, hastily gave orders to put her to death. Immediately after this, Shîr (or Mîr) Haji arrived in the camp, having left one he confided in to guard the strong castle of Niretû. But there happened an accident in his absence, which made him

^a D'HERBEL. p. 34, & seq. art. Abousâid Mîrza.

(A) If he was the son of Mirân Shâh, he must have been born after the death of Timûr: for Mirân Shâh had no son named Mohammed at that juncture. But the oriental historians commit frequent mistakes in giving the genealogies of princes, as has been observed with regard to Abdo'llah, the predecessor of Abûsâid.

a repent the having quitted it : for a bold daring fellow coming one evening to the gate of this fortress with a flock of sheep, so far gained upon the guard, by his talk, that they permitted him to enter, and lie that night in the place. But the first watch was no sooner past, than the man, who was furnished with ropes and hooks, enabled several of his associates to mount the walls. These soldiers immediately ran to attack the governor, whom they wounded in several places ; and, having, at the same time, seized on the guard-house, became, at length, masters of the castle.

ABUSAID having received this ill piece of news, and apprehending withal that the children of Soltân Abdo'llatif were preparing for war, in order to recover their father's dominions, quitted, at length, the city of Herât, and took the road to Bâlk. He sent, however, one of his b generals before him, with the best part of his army, to disperse the troops which those young princes had assembled in the neighbourhood of that city. As these princes, named Abmed and Jûghi, were rash enough, with their new-raised troops, to hazard a battle against well disciplined forces, they suffered for their ill-conduct : for Abmed was killed in the action, and Jûghi had much ado to escape.

THIS expedition being finished, Abûsaïd went to pass the winter at Bâlk. But he was not long there in repose : for Alao'ddawlet, and Mîrza Ibrâhîm, his relations, cut out new work for him : and Jehân Shâh, the Turkmân, son of Kara Yûsef, advanced, from Azerbejdân, into Khorassân, committing horrible ravages all the way he went. Abûsaïd was obliged, in those c unlucky conjunctures, to quit Herât ; which most of the inhabitants, not thinking themselves secure against the fury of the Turkmâns, had already abandoned, on the news of their approach. They had now encamped six months about that city, when Abûsaïd, having assembled all the forces of his dominions, marched to fall upon them at the river Morgâb. Jehân Shâh, surprised at this motion, sent Pir Budak, the bravest of his sons, with a body of troops, to reconnoitre the Soltân's army ; but he was repulsed vigorously, to the very camp of his father. The Turkmân, having at the same time received news from Azerbejdân, which made him very uneasy, resolved to return to that province. Accordingly, he sent away his heavy baggage before, and then dispatched Sayd Ashûra to the Soltân, with proposals of peace ^b.

ABUSAID insisted, at first, that Jehân Shâh should rest content with Azerbejdân, and yield up to him all which he possessed in Persian Irâk and Khorassân : but, after several negotiations, d it was agreed, that the Turkmân should remain master of Irâk, and not enter into Khorassân, beyond the city of Semnân (in Komes), which was to serve as a frontier to both dominions. After the conclusion of this treaty, made in 863, the enemy took their route for Irâk : but committed such cruel ravages where-ever they passed, that they scarce left a house standing. Upon their retreat, Abûsaïd made his entrance into Herât ; where commerce was again restored, the want of which had caused a great scarcity in that city. To ease the inhabitants, therefore, both of that capital and the province, which had suffered extremely during the stay of the Turkmâns, he sent his army into Great Bukhâria, keeping with him no more than 2000 horse for his guard.

THE princes Alao'ddawlet, Mîrza Ibrâhîm, and Mîrza Sanjar, his relations, who had ter-e ritories bordering on his, the limits of which they were desirous to extend, seeing the Soltân in a disarmed state, entered into a confederacy among themselves, to attack him. However, unprovided with troops as he was, he made no difficulty to meet them, with the few men he had, between Saraks and Marû. But his courage was luckily seconded by fortune : for, when he was upon the point of engaging, two of his commanders arrived, with fresh forces ; and, by their assistance, the confederate princes were defeated, in so signal a manner, that some of the runaways never stopped till they got to Samarkant. Sanjar was taken prisoner, and put to death : the other two princes escaped : and Abûsaïd returned triumphantly to Herât : where having no weighty affair upon his hands, he resolved to re-take the strong castle of Niretû, which had been lost by surprise, as hath been before related ; and this he very easily accomplished, f by means of the intelligence which he had in the place.

ABOUT the same time Mîrza Ibrâhîm, who, after his defeat, had fled to Damegân, having gathered fresh troops, marched towards Tûs (or Mashhad), in hopes to repair the loss he had lately sustained, and take that city by stealth : but death, which surprised him on the road, rendered all his designs abortive, and delivered the Soltân from a competitor, who, for a long time, disputed with him the empire of Timûr Bek. In the same year, Abûsaïd had a son by his queen, the daughter of Alao'ddawlet, whom he named Shâh Rûkb ; and, towards the end of it, Shâh Mahmûd, son of Soltân Bâbr, whom the Turkmâns had obliged to fly into the province of Sejestân, was killed in a battle, which he fought in Hindûstân ^c.

IN 864, Abûsaïd, receiving advice, that Soltân Hussayn, son of Mansûr, son of Baykâra, g son of Omar Shейkh, son of Timûr Bek, was advanced as far as Sebzwar, pillaging and ravage-

^b D'HERBEL, p. 35. art. Aboufaïd Mîrza.

^c Ibid. p. 36.

Reouts Soltân Hussayn.
Hej. 869.
A. D. 1454.

ing all before him ; sent a body of forces, under the conduct of the Amîr Ali Pârî, and Hafsan Shейkh, towards Mazânderân, which belonged to Hussayn, and followed himself with the rest of his army. In fine, a cruel battle was fought between those two monarchs, in which Hussayn having been entirely defeated, Abûsaïd was received into Astarabâd, capital of the country, and proclaimed Soltân. This prince, after he had passed some time feasting in that city, gave the government to his son Mabmûd, and set out for his imperial residence of Herât : but, before he got thither, he met with a great alarm ; for Kalil Hendûgha, who commanded in Sajestân, in the time of Soltân Bâbr, took the occasion of the Soltân's absence to present himself before Herât, which he imagined would yield to him, without striking a stroke : but the inhabitants putting the city in a posture of defence, formed a body of troops, with which they vigorously repulsed Khalîl, and made him return to his own country. a

Khalil Hendûgha submits.

Hej. 865.
A. D. 1460.

ABUSAID, who was informed, while in Mazânderân, of Khalîl's enterprise, made great marches, in order to relieve his capital : but finding the city in as good condition at his arrival, as when he left it, rewarded the fidelity of the inhabitants ; and then marched towards the province of Sajestân, to punish the rashness of Khalîl : who not having forces sufficient to resist so powerful an army, had recourse to his clemency : and, having sworn obedience to him, the Soltân pardoned his offence, without taking him from his government : however, he made him dependent on Shâh Yabia, who was descended from the ancient kings of the country. In 865, Mîrza Alâ'oddawlet, who, after losing the battle before-mentioned, had retired towards the coast of the Caspian sea, to Mâlek Yansûn, died a natural death ; and his corpse was conveyed from thence to Herât, where it was interred in the college built by his mother the Soltâna Jawhershâd. b

Peace with Jûghi.

At the same time, Abûsaïd being informed, that Mîrza Mohammed Jûghi, son of Soltân Abdo'llatîf, ravaged the plains of Great Bukhâria, he marched with his army, and passed the Jibûn (or Amû), to reduce this young prince to his duty : but he was no sooner arrived at Samarkant, than Jûghi, unable to keep the field against him, went and shut himself up in the city of Shâh Rûkbîya (B), where Abûsaïd proposed to besiege him ; and must needs have forced him to surrender, if the war, which Soltân Hussayn had declared in Mazânderân, had not obliged him to abandon his enterprise, and make peace with Jûghi. Hussayn had taken the field a second time, and besieged Astarabâd, capital of Forjân (C), where Abûsaïd had left his son Mabmûd governor. This prince sallied out of the city, with all his forces, and gave the enemy battle ; which, although it cost Hussayn much blood, was not fortunate to him ; for he lost the victory, and was obliged to fly into Khorassân, from whence his father had already sent to his generals, to guard that frontier. Soltân Hussayn entered triumphing into the city of Astarabâd, where, for a time, he enjoyed the fruits of his conquest in repose : but, imagining that the wars of Great Bukhâria, in which Abûsaïd was engaged, would afford him time enough to make himself master of Khorassân, he marched with his army into that province, leaving Abdo'lrahmân Argûn to govern Mazânderân and Forjân, which then composed one state. c

*Hussayn
attacks Herât.*

THE generals of Abûsaïd, on advice of this motion of the enemy, judging that they were not able to withstand him in the field, resolved to fortify Herât, and defend that city. Soltân Hussayn did not fail to appear before it with his army ; but not with design to besiege it : for he did not believe that the inhabitants either would or could defend themselves. However, finding, after he had waited eleven days, encamped at Bâghzagun, that there was no likelihood of their surrendering, he laid siege to Herât in form. He then battered the walls, and attacked the place with his best troops, for twenty days : but was always repulsed, by the bravery of the garrison. Mean time, Abûsaïd being on his way to relieve the city, Hussayn was obliged to raise the siege, and marched to the river Morgâb, to dispute the Soltân's passage. Yet, his troops being dispersed for sake of spoil, and his officers divided in their opinions, he did not think fit to wait there, but turned back for Astarabâd, by the way of Sarkas, or Sarakhs. d

Expelled his kingdom.

THIS retreat, though made without any loss on the part of Hussayn, proved a great victory to Abûsaïd, who, driving his enemy continually before him, obliged him to quit Astarabâd, to avoid being besieged ; and, consequently, to abandon the provinces of Mazânderân and Forjân, whose inhabitants, already half revolted, went out to meet the victor. Abûsaïd, having thus a second time become master of these provinces, put to death Hendûgha, and his sons, whose disloyalty he had often experienced ; and committed the government of Astarabâd to his son Mabmûd, whom Hussayn had expelled. He returned afterwards to Herât, in 866 ; e

^a D'HERBEL. art. Aboufaïd.

(B) Our readers will find some farther account of this war, in the history of the Uzbek Khâns, inserted hereafter.

(C) 'Tis before said to be the capital of Mazânderân :

so that it must be considered as the chief city of Mazânderân in general, and of Forjân in particular, which may be supposed a part of Mazânderân at that time.

a where he punished with death Moezo'ddîn, president of the Diwân, or council of that city, who had not obeyed his orders during his absence.

AND now, having no enemy to divert him, he, in 867, set forward to reduce Mohammed Jûghî; who, during his absence, had fortified Shâbrûkbîya to such a degree, that it was looked on as impregnable. He passed the Jibûn, after some stay at Bâlk; and, being arrived at Samarkant, made great preparations for the siege of Shâbrûkbîya; which resisted a whole year, against all his forces. At length, Mohammed, unable to hold out any longer, sent a person of great authority to the Soltân's camp, to obtain honourable conditions for him: but Abûsaïd obliged him to surrender at discretion, and sent him prisoner to Ektiâro'ddîn, the castle of Herât, where he remained till his death. The Soltân entered Shâbrûkbîya in 868; and soon after returned to Herât, which suffered greatly by the plague that same year^e.

b HE had not been long in this city, before he received advice, that Soltân Hussayn had made a second irruption into Khorassân. Against this prince he sent a powerful army, under the conduct of his principal generals; but they were entirely defeated in battle; so that had not Hussayn been deserted by his best troops, and principal officers, who revolted from him, which obliged him to return to Karazm, he would have pursued his victory very far, and involved Abûsaïd in no small difficulties. But this unexpected retreat of his enemy restoring his affairs to a settled state, he, the next year, went to winter at Marû; and, finding himself in profound peace, in 870, he celebrated the circumcision of the princes his sons, with great magnificence, and diversions, which continued for five months. But the next year, while he passed the winter at Marû, he received advice of the death of Jebân Shâh, the Turkmân, which was the occasion of a new war: for this Soltân, who was of the family of the Black Sheep, having been slain in battle against Hassan Beg, or Uzun Hassan, Soltân of the dynasty of the White Sheep^c, his son Hassan Ali, who succeeded him, implored the assistance of Abûsaïd.

THIS prince, led by ambition no less than generosity, thought he ought not to lose so fair an opportunity of opening a way to the conquest of Irâk and Azerbejdân. However, being willing to consult Nâsro'ddîn Obeydo'llah, who was reckoned the ablest man of his time for advising in great affairs, he sent for him from Samarkant to Marû, where he then was in winter-quarters; and, after a conference with him, resolved to undertake the war against Hassan Beg. Pursuant to this resolution, he, in the year 872, decamped from before Marû, and marched to attack the provinces of Irâk and Azerbejdân. When he arrived on the frontiers of this last province, as he had a very great army, he detached several bodies, who penetrating into Irâk and Pârs, made themselves masters of all the places through which they passed. Mean time, Hassan Beg sent several ambassadors, to demand peace of him: but although Abûsaïd received them with great civility, and dismissed them with presents for their master; yet his answer always was, that Hassan Beg should come himself to his camp, and that he then would let him know his intentions. At length he entered the country, resolving to pass the summer at Karabâgh (D): but the Turkmân prince knew so well how to cut off his provisions and forage, that his army began to dwindle in a short time. So that, fearing to be besieged all at once, he fled back, with a very few men: for the greater part of his troops were already dispersed, and the rest had gone over to the enemy. When Hassan Beg, who watched the Soltân's motions, found he was gone, he sent two of his sons in pursuit of him, who took him prisoner, and brought him to their camp^e.

HASSAN BEG received Abûsaïd with a great deal of humanity, and was disposed to save his life: but, having deliberated in his council what was proper to be done with him, all his officers, particularly the Kâdhi, or Kâzi, of Shîrwân, were for putting him to death; and the rather, as Hassan Beg had already acknowledged the Mîrza Yadighiar, son of Mohammed, son of Baysankor, for the lawful emperor and successor of Timûr, in the provinces to the south of the Jibûn. Thus this powerful prince lost his life, in the year 873, through his own fault, and for refusing to make peace, so often sued for by the enemy. Hassan Beg, however, hindered his tent to be plundered, and preserved the honour of all the ladies of his Saray; after which, he commanded the officers of Khorassân to acknowledge Yadighiar for their sovereign (E).

ACCORDING to the Nigbiârîstan, and Al Jennâbi, this prince extended his dominions, which, at first, consisted of Khorassân, and the countries to the north of the river Jibûn (or Great Bukhâria), from Kâshgar in the east, to Tauris in the west; and from Kermân in Irân, and Multân in Hindustân, to Karazm on the east side of the Caspian sea. The same authors add, that he was surprised, and slain, in an ambuscade laid for him in the mountains of Kara-

^e D'HERBEL. p. 37. art. Aboufaïd.

^f See hereafter.

^g D'HERBEL. p. 37. art. Aboufaïd.

(D) Called also Karabâgh Arrân, a delightful place, on the river Aras, in the province of Arrân.

faïd's assisting Hassan Ali against Hassan Beg; and this is, probably, what made Abûsaïd refuse to make peace with the Turkmân.

bâgh, near Tauris, after he had lived forty-two years, and reigned twenty ^b. But according a to Mirkond, he was put to death by Tadigbiar, to whom he was delivered up ⁱ.

His sons.

SOLTAN Abûsaïd left behind him eleven sons; and, as the fall of the empire of Timûr is ascribed to the time of his death, it will be expedient for our readers to know what became of such a numerous posterity. The names of these eleven princes were, Soltân Abmed, Soltân Mahmûd, Mîrza Mohammed, Mîrza Shâb Rûkh, Mîrza Ulug Beg, Mîrza Omar Sheykh, Mîrza Abûbekr, Mîrza Morâd, Mîrza Khalîl, Mîrza Veled, Mîrza Omer. It must be observed, that all these princes bore the title of Soltân, although most of them did not reign as sovereigns.

Mohammed and Shâh Rûkh.

THE Mîrzas Mohammed and Shâb Rûkh fell into the hands of Hassan Beg, and remained a long time prisoners in Irâk; from whence at length escaping, they passed some years in the same province, in a miserable state. At the end of which, in 899 of the Hejrah, of Christ 1493, departing to go into Khorassân, Shâb Rûkh died, in the country of Sâri, and was interred at Herât: but his brother Mohammed was taken prisoner by Soltân Hussayn.

Soltân Ahmed.

SOLTAN Mahmûd, when the Turkmâns became masters of Abûsaïd's camp, made his escape to Herât. But could not stay there long: for Soltân Hussayn, son of Mansûr, having reduced Khorassân under his obedience, in a short space of time, Mahmûd was obliged to take refuge with his brother Abmed, who reigned at Samarkant, in Great Bukhâria. There he was very well received, and lived for a while in great harmony with his brother: till, by the solicitations of those he conversed with, he went out one day, under pretence of hunting, and made all the haste he could, with those of his party, towards the springs of the Jihûn (or Amû); where he seized the province of Badagshân, and the adjacent country.

Soltân Mahmûd: His sons.

AHMED dying in the year 899, Soltân Mahmûd joined the dominions of his brother to his own: but he did not enjoy them long: for he died the same year, and left four sons; viz. Massûd, Baysankor, Ali, and Veis.

Massûd.

SOLTAN Massûd succeeded his father: but his brothers, Baysankor (who was governor of Samarkant) and Ali, rebelled against him, he seized the latter, and caused a hot iron to be passed before his eyes: however, as the operation did not take away his sight, he fled to Bokhâra, and, having gathered some troops, retired for shelter to Soltân Hussayn, in Khorassân. On the other side, Baysankor, unable to hold out longer against Massûd, left Samarkant in disguise, and fled to Konduz, a city on the Jihûn, and belonging to Badagshân, accompanied by the Amîr Khostrû Shâb, who was one of Soltân Massûd's enemies. This prince, being thus delivered from his two brothers, enjoyed the sovereignty of Great Bukhâria peaceably, at Samarkant, till the year 905.

Hej. 905. A. D. 1499.

MEAN time, Soltân Ali continued at the court of Soltân Hussayn; who took so great an affection for him, that he gave him his daughter in marriage, with a very considerable portion. After this, he furnished him with an army, to dispute the patrimony of his ancestors with his brothers Massûd and Baysankor. Ali accordingly entered Great Bukhâria, and made considerable advances: but, when he was on the point of succeeding in his enterprise, he unhappily gave ear to the envoys of Khostrû Shâb: who pretending to obey him in every thing, deluded him so much with his fair speeches, that he fell into the snare, which frustrated all his designs: so that he was obliged to return to his father-in-law Soltân Hussayn.

Bayfankor.

WHEN Khostrû Shâb had ruined the affairs of Soltân Ali, by his artifices, he determined to get rid of Baysankor, who continued at Konduz, by the snares which he laid for him also; and having at length compassed his design, he, by that prince's death, became master, not only of Konduz, but also of Baklân, Hejjâr, and the whole country of Badagshân.

Veis.

As for Mîrza Veis, or Weis, fourth son of Mahmûd, he was all the while in Turkestan; whither, to avoid these troubles, he had, from the beginning, retired to his relations by his mother's side.

Ulug Beg.

ULUG BEG, the fifth son of Abûsaïd, obtained from his father the government of Kâbul and Gâzan, with the Indies; which provinces he was master of in Hejrah 899. A. D. 1493, finished his history.

Omar Sheykh.

OMAR SHEYKH, sixth son of Abûsaïd, became, by his father's death, sovereign of the country of Andekân; which he possessed till the year 899, when he broke his neck, by a fall from the top of a pigeon-house. He reigned with the reputation of a very good prince; and was succeeded by his son Babôr, or Bâbr, founder of the empire of the Mungls, who reign at present in Hindustân.

Abûbekr.

ABUBEKR, seventh son of Abûsaïd, had for his share, during his father's life, the country of Badagshân; which he possessed also after his decease: till, falling out with Soltân Hussayn, he was taken prisoner, in a battle fought between them, and put to death, in the year 884 of the Hejrah, of Christ 1479*.

^b D'HERBEL, p. 34—37.

ⁱ TEIX. p. 318.

* D'HERBEL. ubi supra, p. 38.

- ^a SOLTÂN Morâd, the eight son, for some time governed the provinces of Kermesîr and Kan-Soltân Morâd. dakîr; and, when his father Abûsaïd became master of Irâk, he advanced, by his order, to seize the province of Kermân: but, receiving advice on the road of his defeat, and death, he returned to his first government. After this, Yûsef Tarkhân revolting against him, he had recourse to the protection of Soltân Hussayn, who sent him, under a good escort, to his brother Abmed, at Samarkant. However, he did not stay long there: for, not meeting with a very favourable reception, he soon after returned to Soltân Hussayn's court, where he received all sorts of good treatment; but at length, in 880, he was accompanied by the officers of that A. D. 1475. prince to the castle of Niretû; and from that time we have no account of him.
- ^b MIRZA Soltân Kalîl, the ninth son of Abûsaïd Mirza, remained at Herât during his father's Soltân Kalîl. unfortunate expedition against Hassan Beg; so that Soltân Hussayn having, with a great army, subdued Khorassân, he was obliged to put himself into the hands of that conqueror, not being in a condition to defend the city against his forces. Hussayn sent him into Great Bukhâria, where his brother Abmed reigned: but, Kalîl taking upon him to act as master as soon as he entered the country, Abmed sent one of his generals, with some troops, to curb his insolence; so that he was soon after slain in an engagement on this occasion.
- SOLTÂN Veled, tenth son of Abûsaïd, passed his days in a private condition, among the Soltân Veled. oriental Turks of the tribe of Erlat; till he died at length of poison, infused by one of his domestics in his drink.
- ^c SOLTÂN Omar Mirza, youngest son of Abûsaïd, was at Samarkant at the time of his father's Omar Mirza. death: but, Abmed being obliged to banish him from his court, on account of some disturbances which he excited there, he retired to his brother Abûbekr, who was then encamped near Marû, at such time as Soltân Hussayn entered with his army into Khorassân. Abûbekr opposed the invader's progress: but having been defeated and slain, Omar retreated toward Abiurd or Bawerd, and Nessa; where being taken by some of Hussayn's officers, he was sent prisoner to Herât, and shut up in the castle of Ektiâro'ddîn; from whence, in 883, he was conveyed to the castle of Niretû; after which, we hear no more of him^k.

The reign of Soltân Ahmed.

- ^d AFTER the death of Abûsaïd, his eldest son Soltân Abmed, of whom some account has 7. Soltân been already given, succeeded him at Samarkant, in the country of Mâwara'nâbr, now Ahmed. called Great Bukhâria, and reigned twenty years: at the end of which he died, in the year 909ⁱ, of Christ 1493.

The reign of Soltân Bâbr.

- ^e THE Mirza Soltân Bâbor, or Bâbr, was the son of Omar Shейkh, sixth son of Abûsaïd 8. Soltân Mirza, according to Kondamîr; but to others, the fourth. By the death of his father, in Bâbr. 894, as has been already related, he became sovereign of the country of Andekhân; and, on the death of Soltân Abmed, in 899, ascended the throne of Great Bukhâria: but five years after, viz. in 904, Shay Beg Soltân, invading that region with an army of Uzbeks, from beyond the river Sibûn, or Sîr, drove him out of his kingdom, and took possession of it; so that afterwards no prince of the race of Timûr reigned there. Bâbr, after his expulsion, retired to Gaznen, or Gazna, and thence into Hindûstân, where he made considerable conquests; over which he reigned till the year 937 of the Hejrab, of Christ 1530^m. But as we shall have occasion to speak of his actions more at large, when we come to treat of the race of Timûr who reigned in India under the name of Jagatays and Great Mogols, we shall say no more of them at present.

^k D'HERBELOT, ubi supra, p. 39. Abûsaïd Mirza & Miran Shâh.

ⁱ TEIXEIRA, p. 319.

^m D'HERBELOT, p. 38. 163. art:

C H A P. IX.

Of the princes descended from Timûr, who reigned in Khorassân, and other parts of Irân, after the death of Shâh Rûkh.

AS the empire fell into division and confusion after the death of Timûr, the like happened State of Irân. on that of his son Shâb Rûkh: so that, excepting the twelve years during which Abûsaïd held Khorassân, that province, with some neighbouring countries, was possessed by other princes princes descended from Shâb Rûkb, and not by those who were his immediate successors in Great Bukhâria. a BAYSANKER, son of Shâb Rûkb, dying in 837, during his father's life-time, left three sons; Rokno'ddin, Alâo'ddawlet, Soltân Mohammed, and Abû'l Kâssef Bâbr; who all made a great noise in the world. Shâb Rûkb, on Baysanker's death, gave his father's employment to the eldest, and only pensions to the other two princes.

Alâo'ddawlet seizes Herât. As soon as Alâo'ddawlet heard of the death of his grandfather Shâb Rûkb, he seized on the city of Herât, capital of Khorassân; under pretence of commanding there in behalf of his uncle Ulug Beg, who reigned at Samarkant. He there found great treasures, which he plundered; and seized the person of Abdo'llatif, son of Ulug Beg, whom he kept prisoner for a considerable time: but Ulug Beg, having passed the Amû with a powerful army from Great Bukhâria, defeated, and obliged him to fly to his brother the Mîrza Babr. These two princes joined their forces, and marched to oppose their uncle; who, judging the match to be equal, left them in possession of Herât, and returned to Balk. b

Bâbr possessed of Jorjân. A. D. 1446. SHAH RUKH being dead in 850, Mîrza Bâbr, who then governed the province of Jorjân, entered that of Khorassân; where his brother Alâo'ddawlet had already seized Herât, and encamped with his forces near the city of Tûs (or Mashhad), near the sepulchre of the Imâm Ali Rîza. But, by the mediation of friends, hostilities were prevented between the two brothers; and the country of Kabushân appointed the boundary between their dominions, in 851: after which, Bâbr returned to Astarabad, the capital of Jorjân.

Opposes Ulug Beg. THE year following, Bâbr, having received advice that his uncle Ulug Beg was in arms on the borders of Bastâm and Damagân, and had already passed the bridge named Pul Ibrîshîm, or the bridge of silk, to attack his brother Alâo'ddawlet, sent Kalîl Hendûgha, one of his generals, to follow the Soltân; and marched himself, with his best troops, towards Herât, in order to intercept his passage to that city. As this march obliged Ulug Beg to quit Khorassân, Bâbr soon made himself master of Herât, which his brother Alâo'ddawlet had already abandoned; where he exercised great violences towards the inhabitants. But they were revenged on him some time after: for Yâr Ali, the Turkmân, having advanced to besiege him, the citizens delivered one of their gates to his enemy, and obliged him to fly to the castle of Ektiâro'ddin; which he pillaged, and abandoned not long after. Yâr Ali, seeing himself master of such a potent city, imagined the war was entirely over, and thought of nothing but diverting himself: when the troops of Bâbr, which still hovered near Herât, found an opportunity, about three weeks after, to seize a gate; and surprising Yâr Ali, in the midst of his debauch, brought him before Bâbr, who ordered his head to be struck off in the public market-place. c Imprisons Alâo'ddawlet. BABR, being thus become master of Khorassân, gave the city of Tûn to his brother Alâo'ddawlet, who had not appeared since his flight from Ulug Beg; but a while after, having conceived some jealousy of him, seized him, with his son Ibrâhîm, and then sent them prisoners to Herât. After this, giving himself up to pleasures, and neglecting affairs, his officers committed many disorders in the city: but the revolt of Shâh Hussayn, in the province of Sajestân (which depends on Khorassân, roused him out of his slothful humour; and, causing him to take arms, he marched against the rebel with such expedition, that, not being prepared to encounter him, he submitted to pay an annual tribute. Mean time the Amîr Hendûgha, dissatisfied with the hasty temper of Bâbr, went at the head of several malecontents, and seized the city of Astarabad. Bâbr immediately set forward with his forces, and gave him battle; which at first proved adverse, and fatal to Soltân Abûsaïd, who commanded his army; but at length Ali Behâdr his second general, slew Hindûgha, and obtained a complete victory. d

Flies to Mohammed. AT this time Alâo'ddawlet escaped from prison, and fled to Irâk, to his brother Mohammed; who, on the death of their uncle Shâb Rûkb, seized on that province, together with Pârs (or Proper Persia); and, still gaining ground every day, was advanced as far as the borders of Khorassân. Bâbr met him with a considerable army, but was intirely defeated by his two brothers, and obliged to take shelter in the castle of Omâd; while Mohammed entered into Herât, and delivered the Mîrza Ibrâhîm to his father Alâo'ddawlet. Bâbr some time after quitted Omâd; and, by the way of Abiurd, or Bawerd, marched towards Astarabad, knowing that the inhabitants were discontented with the Amîr Hâjî Janashirîn, whom Mohammed had made governor. The latter met him at Tûs, and fought an obstinate battle, but lost it; and, being taken prisoner, with several officers, all were put to the sword. Soltân Mohammed, who had advice of this march, hastened to support his general; but hearing, by the way, that he was defeated, made such expedition with three hundred horse only; that he surprised Bâbr in his camp, and obliged him to fly back to the castle of Omâd. e

Recovers Herât. THE victor, however, that the enemy might not perceive the fewness of his troops, retired also to his former camp; where he was astonished not to find one of his soldiers, who on a

^a D'HERBELOT, p. 83, art. Alaeddoulat.

^b Ibid. p. 160. art. Babor.

a false report of his defeat, had all dispersed themselves. At the same time he was informed, that his brother Alâo'ddawlet, whom he had sent to Kermasîr (in Kermân) before the battle, taking advantage of Bâbr's second retreat to Omâd, had repaired to Herât, and been admitted by the inhabitants. This news much surprised Mohammed; who, seeing that all the advantages he had gained by the war, served only to exalt Alâo'ddawlet, quitted Khorassân in disgust, and returned to Irâk. Bâbr no sooner heard of his brother Mohammed's retreat, than he left Omâd, and marched to attack Herât; which Alâo'ddawlet quitting on his approach, he for the second time entered that city: but, not content with this conquest, he marched to Balk, whither his brother had fled; and, driving him out of that city also, pursued him into the mountains of Badakshân, till he was able to proceed no farther for the snow. Thus he became master of Balk, Konduz, and Baklân; where having left governors, he returned to Herât: but was greatly surprised, at his arrival, to find that Avîs Beg, whom he intrusted to guard the castle of Ektiâro'ddîn, had revolted.^c

As this fortress is so situated, that there is no entering the city without passing through a corridor which communicates with it; the Soltân, instead of undertaking to force a place which was capable of making great resistance, thought of a stratagem, which succeeded to his wish. For he sent an order to the governor, forbidding him to stir out of the castle when he should make his entrance into the city: then sending forward his whole band of music in the evening, he mixed with them some of his bravest officers. These men, being arrived near the city, gave out that the Soltân was come. On this news, Avîs immediately sent his son into the corridor, to receive him, and followed close himself, having left his brother in the fortress, which he kept shut up: but Sheykh Mansûr, one of the pretended musicians, fell first upon the son of Avîs Beg, whom he stabbed, and his companions did the like by the father; after which, Bâbr found no difficulty to get the castle surrendered to him. At the same time being informed, that his brother Alâo'ddawlet lay concealed in the tent of Eskânder Beg, which was in the rear of his camp, he had him taken from thence, and put under a strong guard.

In 855 Soltân Bâbr went to pass the winter at Astarabâd, and made some stay afterwards at Bastâm; where being informed that his brother Mohammed prepared to make war upon him afresh, he sent an ambassador to obtain a peace at any rate. Soltân Mohammed seemed not inclined to grant it him: for he pretended that part of Khorassân belonged to Irâk: that the money which was coined there ought to bear his impress; and that his name should be mentioned in the public prayers. However, Bâbr consented to all these demands, rather than incur a war; and, quitting Bastâm, went into the country of Mazânderân. Mean time Mohammed, disregarding the treaty which he had made with his brother, marched with his army towards Khorassân, and advanced as far as the city of Esferayn. Bâbr was extremely troubled at this violation of the treaty; and, gathering what troops he could in haste, marched towards his brother; who met him at Kaburân, where was fought one of the most bloody battles that ever was recorded. The two Soltâns performed prodigies of valour; and victory for a long time seemed doubtful on which side to declare. But at length Mohammed, being carried too far by his courage, found himself on a sudden surrounded, and taken prisoner.^d

Bâbr, having by this means gained this important victory, caused Mohammed to be put to death without remorse; and having thus got rid of his youngest brother, he ordered the eyes of Alâo'ddawlet, the eldest, whom he kept prisoner, to be put out: but the persons who were appointed to do that work, in pity to this prince, moved the hot iron before his eyes in such a manner, as not to deprive him of sight. After this, Bâbr believed he should have no more disturbance from his brothers; and marched towards the province of Pârs, to take possession of it, as belonging to him by the death of Mohammed. The great lords of the country came to pay him homage; and he entered triumphantly into the city of Shîrâz. But he was scarce arrived, when he received advice that Jehân Shâh, the Turkmân, son of Kara Yûsef, had entered Persian Irâk with considerable forces, and already laid siege to the city of Kom. This news made him leave Shîrâz, the government of which he gave to Mîrza Sanjar (A), one of his relations, to discharge his fury on the Turkmân, when he was stopped by more unwelcome tidings from Herât; viz. that his brother Alâo'ddawlet, assisted by the Amîr Yadi-gbiar Shâh, and several of his near relations, was in the field in quest of him.

On this advice, judging it of more importance to preserve Khorassân than Irâk, he returned to Herât, by the way of Yezd, where he left the Mîrza Kalil, son of Jehân Ghîr, to command: o'ddawle..

^c D'HERBELOT, p. 161.

^d Ibid. p. 161.

(A) We are told by D'Herbelot, in the article of Sanjar Mîrza, that he was the son of Alâmâd, son of Bayera, son of Omar Shейkh: but as Bayera, or Baykera, was the grandson of Omar Shейkh, by Ali Esfânder, possibly Bayera may be a mistake of the press for Bayera, who was the seventh son of Omar Shейkh.

but, before he arrived, the Amîr Pîr Darwîsh, and his other generals in Khorassân, had pacified the troubles, by obliging Alâo'ddawlet to retire to Ray (in Kubestân, of Persian Irâk). Bâbr, having thus restored peace to his dominions, thought of nothing but taking his pleasure; when, in 857 (B), Sanjar, and the other lords whom he had left at Sbîrâz, being put to flight by Jebân Shâh, arrived at Herât. Hereupon he set out to carry the war into Irâk and Azerbejân, which the Turkmâns had made themselves masters of. Being come to Astar-abâd, he staid the time of Ramazân fast: but, when he was ready to march forward, he received advice from Bâlk, that Soltân Abûsaïd, who reigned in Great Bukhâria, had passed the Jibûn; and, having defeated and slain his generals, was encamped near that city.

Marches against Abûsaïd. BÂBR, reflecting on this occasion, as he did before, that it was of more importance to preserve Khorassân than subdue Irâk, left the Turkmâns at liberty to pursue their conquests, and marched back to Herât.

WHEN he arrived at Morgâb, news was brought that Abûsaïd had repassed the Jibûn: but this did not hinder him to proceed towards Great Bukhâria; which he entered, by fording that river at Kondûz and Baklân. Abûsaïd, finding himself thus pressed, sent ambassadors to him with proposals of peace: but, without hearing them, he continued his march till within a league of Samarkant; where several considerable persons waiting on him, to dispose him to an accommodation, he gave them no other answer, than that he had come too far to return so hastily. For all this, after losing a great number of officers as well as soldiers, without gaining any advantage in forty days siege, he hearkened to terms of peace: the chief conditions of which were, that the Jibûn (or Amû) should separate the two dominions, and prisoners be exchanged.

Pacifies Sajeistân. Hej. 859. A. D. 1454. AFTER this agreement, Bâbr returned to Herât, where he took his repose till 859; when finding that Shâh Hussayn, who had become his tributary, did not act well either by him, or the officers whom he sent into the province of Sajeistân, ordered the Amîr Kalîl Hindûgha to reduce that prince to reason. Kalîl ordered matters so well, that Hussayn was obliged to take flight, in which he lost his life by the snares which one of his own domestics laid for him; and thus Kalîl became master of all the country which bears the name of Nimrûz, that is, the south, as well as that of Rostâm, from the famous commander Rostâm (C), who was a native, and the governor thereof. At the same time Bâbr gave to the Mîrza Sanjar the government of Marû and Mokhân. Soon after, some lords of Mazânderân, whom he had imprisoned in the castle of Omûd, slew the governor, and took the field: but were quickly reduced to obedience by Jalâlo'ddin Mahmûd, governor of Tûs.

Bâbr dies. Hej. 860. A. D. 1455. IN 860 Bâbr, having recovered from a dangerous fit of sickness, retired to this last city for change of air; and went to visit the tomb of Imam Rîza, from whom Tûs has taken the name of Mashhad Mokâddes, that is, the holy sepulchre (D). Here he made presents worthy of a great prince; and, besides his devotion, spending whole days in the mosk, abstained from wine. But next year, 861, forgetting his resolution, he fell to drink wine as formerly; so that, falling in a passion with an officer one day, while taking the air in a chair after a debauch, his health changed all on a sudden, and he died next morning in the apartment of his women. This prince was much regretted by all his subjects; and interred under a dome by the side of Imam Rîza. The physicians, having examined his body, had some suspicion that poison had been given him: but good men judged that his death might have been caused by a particular miracle wrought by their Imâm. They ascribe to this prince ten years of reign, from his beginning to bear sway in Forjân: but properly he reigned no more than seven years in Khorassân, Mazânderân, and Tokbarestân.

Mahmûd Mîrza. HE was succeeded in his dominions by his son the Mîrza Shâh Mahmûd; who (in 862), being obliged by the Turkmâns to fly into Sajeistân, was the next year killed in a battle which he fought in Hindowestân, as hath been before related in the reign of Abûsaïd; who, by this means became master of Khorassân, which he held till his death.

Yadighiar Mîrza. THE race of Bâbr being thus extinct, as well as that of Alâo'ddawlet, there remained only the Mîrza Yadighiar, or Yadighar, son of their brother Mohammed, late Soltân of Persian Irâk and Pârs. It does not appear where this prince retired to immediately on the death

^c D'HERBELOT, p. 162.

(B) This same year, we are told that Sheykh Babao'l Haquo'ddin Omar died at the city of Hafara, in great reputation for sanctity; and that Bâbr immediately went to visit his children, gave orders for his funeral, and even carried the coffin on his shoulders part of the way.

(C) By the country of Nimrûz is to be understood the provinces of Sajeistân, or Sistân, and Makrân, which bear that name also; and, by the country of Rostâm, seems to be meant the province of Zablestân, where Rostâm was born, and of which he was governor. He is the great champion of the Persians, in the times which they reckon fabulous.

(D) Rather, the holy place of martyrdom; which Mashhad signifies, Rîza having been slain there.—We omit two or three superstitious passages related by the Mohammédans, who are no less visionaries than other people.

a of his father: but, in 873, we find him at the court of Hassan Beg, or Uzun Hassan, prince of the dynasty of the White Sheep, who had the year before put an end to that of the Black Sheep, by the death of Jebân Shâh. Hassan Ali, son of Jebân Shâh, having prevailed on Abû-saïd to make war in his favour against Hassan Beg, the Soltân, in the year above-mentioned, marched towards Karabâgh; where being overthrown by the joint forces of the Turkmân and Yadighiar Mîrza, Hassan Beg caused the officers of Khorassân, who were in Abû-saïd's army, to acknowledge Yadighiar for their lawful emperor, and successor of Timûr, as he had himself done before, probably in resentment of Abû-saïd's assisting his rival Hassan Ali. Hej. 873. A. D. 1468.

YADIGHIAR, after this, the same year, went and besieged Astarabâd: but he was opposed in his enterprise by Soltân Hussayn, already possessed of Khorassân, who relieved that city, and defeated his troops. Yadighiar, on this repulse, retreated to Hassan Beg at Tauris, who the next year assisted him the second time, and gave him troops, with which he routed Hussayn, obliging him to fly towards Fariâb and Bâlk. By this victory Yadighiar became master of Khorassân: but he gave himself up so intirely to his pleasures, that he quite neglected his affairs, and took no more precautions than if he had no competitor for his dominions. This insensibility furnished Hussayn with leisure to wait an opportunity to attack him unexpectedly; which he found soon after: for, surprizing him in the midst of his debauches, with only a thousand horse, he slew him in the year 875; and this prince was the last of the family of Shâh Râkb^f, who reigned in Khorassân. Râkb's Khâssân.

HUSSAYN MÎRZA was the son of Mansûr, or Almansûr, son of Baykarab, son of Omar Soltân Shaykh, second son of Timûr. He was surnamed Abû'lghâzi, on account of his victories: but we have little more to add concerning them, than what has been already related in the foregoing reigns. After the defeat and death of Yadighiar Mîrza, his near relation, in 875, he ascended the throne of Khorassân, in its capital Herât. But this conquest did not procure him a settled repose: for he was engaged in several wars with the Uzbek Tatars, who made frequent incursions upon his territories; and had already driven Mîrza Bâbr out of Great Bukhâria, of which they were become masters. Against these new-comers, he obtained some signal victories, and designed to have expelled them: but he died by the way at Wadekîs (D), in 911, after a reign of thirty-six years over all Khorassân. This prince, who was a lover of virtue and the sciences, left several children behind him^g. Hej. 875. A. D. 1470.

d BADIO'ZZAMAN (E) and Mozaffer, two of Hussayn's sons, reigned both together at Herât, after their father's death, but did not long enjoy his dominions: for, being invaded by Shaybeg, Khân of the Uzbeks, and not able to oppose him, they abandoned the country to their enemy. Bâdio'zzamân went first to Kandabâr, and thence to Trushîs; from whence he returned, with what forces he could gather, to attack the Uzbeks. But, being overthrown, he fled to Shâh Ismael Sofî, who then reigned in Persia; who gave him lands about Tauris for his support, besides ten Sharîfins in gold every day for his table. Bâdi continued in this situation for seven years, till 920; when Soltân Selîm, emperor of the Turks, having taken Tauris from the Shâh, he was carried to Constantinople, where he died, in 923^h. As for Mozaffer, he died in 915, in the mountains of Khorassân, whither he had fled for fear of *Shaybeg*ⁱ. Bâdio'zzamân.

c THERE still remained two of Timûr's posterity, Abû'l Mahân Mîrza and Ghîl Mîrza. These princes joined themselves with Dhu'l Nun Argûn, prince of Kandabâr; who, marching against the Uzbeks, in support of their right to the empire of Timûr, carried them along with him: but he was slain in battle; and the two princes being taken, and put to death, an end was thus given to the empire of Timûr's descendents in Khorassân, after they had reigned there for the space of fourscore years^k. Abû'l Mahân.

^f D'HERBELOT, p. 470. p. 321. D'HERE. p. 464.

^g TEIXEIRA, p. 320. D'HERBELOT, p. 464. ⁱ AL JANNABI ap. Poc. supp. ad hist. dynast. p. 57.

^h TEIXEIRA, ^k Ibid.

(D) A mistake, perhaps, for Badekîs.

(E) Badia al zamân, or, as it is pronounced, Badio'zzamân, signifies the wonder of the age.

BOOK XI.

The history of the Shâhs reigning in Persia.

INTRODUCTION.

Of the Sofian family, and origin of the Shâhs.

Family of Ismael.

THE founder of this dynasty in Persia was Ismael, surnamed Sûfi, or Sofi; of whose family, or descent, it will be proper to give some previous account. The father of this remarkable person was Sheykh Hayder, or Haydr, the son of Soltân Juneyd, the son of Sheykh Ibrâhîm, the son of Sheykh Ali (A), the son of Sheykh Mûssa, or Mûssa (B), the son of Sheykh Sefi (C), who was the thirteenth descendant in a right male line from Ali (D), the son-in-law of the prophet Mohammed; if the Persians may be believed, who have the greatest veneration for this family (E).

Sheykh Safi.

WHEN Timûr Beg, or Tamerlan, returned into Persia, after the victory obtained over Ilde-rim Bâyezîd, he carried with him a multitude of people out of Karamania, and other parts of Anatolia, all whom he intended to put to death on some remarkable occasion; and, with this resolution, he entered Ardevîl, or Ardebîl, a city of Azerbejân, about twenty-five miles to the east of Tabrîz, or Tauris, where he continued for some days. At this time there dwelt in that city a person named Sheykh Safi, or Sefi (F), reputed by the inhabitants a saint, and, as such, much revered by them. The fame of Safi's holy life and virtue moved Timûr to covet his friendship; and, with that design, he visited him often in person. When he was about to depart from Ardevîl, he went to take leave of the Sheykh; and, as a token of his esteem, offered to grant him whatever favour he should ask.

A glorious action.

SHEYKH SAFI, who had been informed of the conqueror's design to put the captives to death, laying hold of this occasion, made it his request that he would spare the lives of those unfortunate men. Timûr, desirous to oblige him, not only granted their lives, but delivered them up to him, to dispose of as he thought fit. The Sheykh, when he had them in his possession, made the best provision of clothes, and other necessaries, that he was able, and then dismissed them, to return into their respective countries. This great instance of universal benevolence so far gained the hearts of those people, and their compatriots, that, in token of gratitude, they repaired in great numbers to see Safi, bringing him presents; and this so frequently, that few days passed on which he was not visited by many^a.

Soltân Juneyd.

NOR did this respect cease with the life of those who had received it from him: but their posterity continued to pay the same acknowledgment to the race of Safi, till the days of Soltân Juneyd (G), his third grandson; who lived in the days of Jebân Shâh, the son of Kara Yûsef, third prince of the Kara Koyunlu dynasty. This prince, growing jealous of the great authority which Juneyd was arrived at, by the vast number of such attendants, both horse and foot, who continually waited on him, ordered him not to receive the visits of such multitudes of people. Juneyd resented this injunction heinously; and, to avoid a second more disagreeable

^a TEIXEIRA, c. 48. p. 337. D'HERBEL. p. 503. art. Ismail Schah.

(A) He is called also Khosrowajeh, or Khojeh Ali.

(B) Named also Shâdro'ddin.

(C) Also Safio'ddin.

(D) By the branch of Husfeyn, second son of Ali; which is that of the twelve Imâms, according to the Persians. D'Herb. art. Haider.

(E) See, on this occasion, Sir John Chardin's voyages to Persia, &c. tome ii. p. 227. We make use of the Paris quarto edition, in three volumes.

(F) Safi, or Sefi, signifies chaste; and hence Moslofa is derived. Some call it, from hence, the Safawi race, or family.

(G) Called also Abûl Kâsem al Kazzarini.

a message, went away with his devotees from Ardebîl to Diyârbekr: where Uzun Hassan Beg, who then reigned there, received him very kindly, and gave him to wife his sister Kadija Katûn, who bore him a son named Hayder, or Haydr.

JUNEYD was very serviceable to Uzun Hassan for several years, particularly in his incursions into Gurjestân, which he frequently made under pretence of religion, compelling those whom he made prisoners to embrace it. At length, entering the kingdom of Trabizond, and killing the king, he some years after placed his son Haydr on the throne, who held it after his father's death. Juneyd, having enriched himself with the plunder which he had taken, in his several expeditions, from the Georgians and Armenians, went and settled in the province of Shîrwân. But his great wealth, added to the number of his adherents, with whom he was fortified on all sides, gave the people of the country so great a distrust, that they formed a conspiracy against him, in which he perished, with most of his followers^b.

AFTER Uzun Hassan had slain Jebân Shâh, and possessed himself of his dominions, Haydr Sheykh Haydr (H) removed to Ardebîl; where he married Alemshâh (I), the daughter of Hassan, his own cousin-german, by whom he had Ali Pâtshâh and Ismael, who was born in the year 892. The Hej. 892. next year Hassan gave Haydr some forces to make war on Ferokzâd, or Farrokyâzar, king of A. D. 1486. Shîrwân, who had killed Juneyd in battle, by the assistance of Yakûb Beg, the Turkmân's general: but, in attempting to revenge his father's death, he lost his life; and occasioned the destruction of almost the whole Sofian family (K), which was very numerous. All his sons were killed, excepting Yar Ali and Ismael, who were taken. Ali was afterwards put to death by Rostam Beg, as elsewhere is related^c; and Ismael, being set at liberty, fled to Ghilân, or Khilân, where he continued six years under the protection of the king (L), who was a friend to his father Sheykh Haydr^d: after which, leaving that country and his benefactor, he began to appear in the world on the following occasion.

^b TEIXEIRA, p. 338. D'HERB. p. 406. art. Giuneid. p. 339. D'HERB. p. 421, art. Haidar; & Pocock Suppl. p. 63.

^c See hereafter.

^d TEIXEIRA,

(H) Hayder, or Haydr, is one of the Arab names for a lion, and one of the surnames or titles of Ali; who is also called Affad Allah, or the lion of God. Hence the name of Haydr is frequently found among his descendants.

(I) The Christian travellers and historians say her name was Martha; and that Uzun Hassan had her by Despina, daughter of Kâlo Jeannes, emperor of Trebizond, who gave her to him for a wife, as is hereafter related. Kæmpfer, among others, says, that her name was Martha; but mentions not his authority. Amœnitates exoticæ, p. 9.

(K) Haydr was called also Al Sûfi, and Sheykh Sûfiyat: hence his descendants, who assumed the name of Sûfi, were called Sûfiyat and Haydariyat, that is, Sûfian and Haydarian. The Persians say Haydar invented a new covering for the head, of a red colour, with twelve plaits round a cap, which he ordered his followers to wear. This is what is called in Persia the Tâj, or Haydarian crown; on which account the Persians are called Kezîlbâsh, or red-heads. See D'Herb. bibl. orient. art. Haydar, & Pocock suppl. hist. dynast. p. 63. However, Mirkond says, Ismael instituted the Tâj, after he had taken Tauris from Alwand in 907 of the Hejrah, according both to Teixeira and D'Herbelot, in the life of Ismael: by which may be understood, that he brought it more generally in use among all his subjects.

(L) Olearius calls him Pîr Khâlem, l. vi. p. 343.

C H A P. I.

The reign of Shâh Ismael Sofi.

d THERE was at this time, among the Mohammedans, an infinite number of people dispersed over Asia, who publicly professed the sect of Ali; and among these a particular party who followed that of Haydr, which Sheykh Safi, one of his ancestors, had brought into great reputation. Ismael, who had assumed the surname of Sofi (A), finding Persia was all in confusion, with the troubles occasioned by those of the Ak Koyunlû family; and hearing that there was a great number of the Hayderian sect in Karamania, a province of Anatolia,

(A) Sofi signifies properly, in Arabic, a man clothed in woollen, from Sof, or Sûf, which signifies wool. But there is more reason to believe that the word comes from the Greek Sofos: for the Mussulmans denote by it a sage, or philosopher, who lives separate and retired from the world, by a kind of religious profession. Sofi, therefore, signifies a religious Mohammedan, who is called also Der- wîsh, or Darwîsh, both in Turkish and Persian; and, in Arabic, Fakîr. Shâh Ismael, from his ancestors, took the appellation of Sofi; whence many of our historians and travellers call the kings of Persia in general the Sofi, or Great Sofi. D'Herb. art. Sofi, p. 816. The Turks, in enmity and contempt, call him Sheykh Ogli, the Sheykh's son.

Subdues Shîrwân,
Hej. 906.
A. D. 1500. and Azerbejân, also Persian Irâk.

removed thither. There, having gathered 7000 of that party (B), all devoted to his family, in 906, when he was but fourteen years of age, he invaded Shîrwân; and engaging Feroz-zad, whom he considered as his father's murderer, with that handful of men, overthrew, killed him, and became master of his kingdom (C). Next year, marching from Nakhsirwân with his army to Tauris, where Alwand resided, that prince abandoned the country and fled.

Hej. 908.
A. D. 1502.

AFTER this, Ismael went to Arzenjân, and marched his army into the kingdom of Zûlkâder (D): but had no sooner turned his back, than Alwand returned to Tauris; to the relief whereof Ismael hastening, the other fled to Bâghdâd, and thence to Diyârbekr, where he died two years after, that is, in 908. Ismael staid at Tauris, but sent his forces into Persia, against Morâd Beg, the remaining Turkmân prince; who, being defeated, with the loss of 10,000 men, next year abandoned to him Pârs and Kermân. After this, Ismael went to pass the winter at Kom, in Persian Irâk; and from thence sent Elias Beg with an army against the city of Ray, or Rey, formerly its capital: but Husseyn Beg Jelobi, who lay in the way to meet him, coming to a battle, defeated and killed him. Ismael, on the news of this overthrow, set out immediately in quest of Husseyn, who thereupon retired to the strong fortress of Firîzkûb. This place the Shâh besieged; and, by cutting off the water, which was conveyed from without by aqueducts, obliged the enemy to surrender within the space of one month.

Conquers Pârs,

THIS war being over, in which, though it lasted so short a while, above 30,000 men perished, Ismael set out for Khorassân. But he had not advanced far, when Reysb Mohammed Karrabi, with some forces, possessed himself of Yazd in Pârs. Ismael turned back upon him; and, after a brave defence, took both the city and Karrabi, whom he caused to be burnt alive. This happened in the year 911: after which, Ismael, marching to Shîrâz, ordered by proclamation, that every man, who had been in the war against his father Haydr, should be put to death: on which occasion between 30 and 40,000 persons perished (*). In 914, while he wintered at Turon, Soltân Husseyn Mirza, king of Khorassân, died; and Shaybek Khân, the Uzbek, made himself master of his dominions, driving out his son Bâdi Azzaman, who fled to Irâk for protection.

Hej. 911.
A. D. 1505.
A. D. 1508.

Bâghdâd and Irâk.
Hej. 916.
A. D. 1510.

ISMAEL, after this, marched his army into the country of Rûmestân, or the Turks (E); and, having given the government of Diyârbekr to Mohammed Khân Estayalu, in 916 (F) advanced to Bâghdâd, where Bâribeg commanded; who, on his approach, left the city, and fled along with Morâd Beg, the last of the Âk Koyunlû Turkmâns, into Anatolia, as elsewhere hereafter related. Thus that capital of Arabian Irâk fell into the hands of Ismael, although he lost a great number of men in passing the Tigris (G). Hence turning towards the province of Khûzestân, he took the city of Shuster, which is the capital; and, although it was the depth of winter, he afterwards marched his forces into Shîrwân, where he reduced the cities of Bûkû and Dârhend (H).

Defeats Shaybek.

Hej. 917.
A. D. 1511.

AT length, in the year 917, he marched into Khorassân, against Shaybek Soltân Khân, who, after the death of Soltân Husseyn, son of Baykâra, grandson of Timûr, had seized on that province. On his approach, the Uzbek retired to Mârû, or Marwo: but, being at last provoked to come to a battle, he therein lost it, with his life; the consequence of which was, the possession of Khorassân and Mâwara'n-nâhr. Two years after was born his son Tahmâsp (or Tahmas); and, in 920, Selim I. Soltân of the Turks, went and attacked Arzenjân on the Euphrates. Ismael, who was then at Ispâhân, the capital of Persian Irâk, to stop the progress of the Othmâns, set forward with his forces; and was met by Selim in the plains of Chalderon (I), near Koy: where Ismael being defeated, with the loss of 5000 men, retired to Tauris, and thence to Kasbîn. Selim, pursuing his good fortune, made himself master of Tauris; where, having staid a fortnight, he returned to Amasia in Anatolia. This year the Kezilbâsh slew Morâd Beg in Diyârbekr, and brought his head to Shâh Ismael. Next year Selim took the important fortress of Kemâk (K): he likewise subdued the country of Alâedulet and Zulkâder, with the territories

Defeated by Selim I. who takes Tauris,
A. D. 1515.

(B) These, according to Teixeira's extract, were the tribes of Estayalu, Shambu, Takalu, Virsatlu, Rowbu, Zulkoderlu, Awksbâhr, Kayâr, Sûfiyah, Karayalak, and many others.

(C) According to the Persian historians, after he had subdued Azerbejan and Armenia, he made war on the Georgians, whom he obliged to pay tribute. Chard. voy. en Perse, tome i. p. 125.

(D) Or Dhulgâster and Alaedeulet, in Asia Minor; 'tis part of Kappadocia and Cilicia.

(*) Unjust and bloody monster! unlike his ancestor Sheykh Sefi!

(E) Because the Turks are now possessed of the country of the Romans, or Roman empire, which Rûmestân signifies.

(F) D'Herbelot, in the article Bâghdâd, says it was taken in 1508, which is two years earlier.

(G) According to Teixeira, he lost 12,000 horse, out of 16,000, in swimming over the river; and, with the remaining 4000, took the city. Hist. Pers. part i. ch. 21. p. 35.

(H) Both situate on the shore of the Caspian sea; the last is commonly written Derbent.

(I) D'Herbelot has Gialderan, that is, Jalderan, which, says he, our authors name Chalderan.

(K) On the west side of the Euphrates, twenty-one miles south of Arzenjân, or Arzerogan.

a of Hâlep, or Heppo, in Syria. In 922 the Soltân possessed himself of Diyârbekr (L); after which, A. D. 1518. thinking the conquest of Egypt of more importance than that of Persia, he turned his arms on that side next year, and left Ismael in quiet: who, from the time of his defeat, never undertook any thing of consequence till his death, which happened in 930 (M); after he had lived thirty-eight years, and reigned twenty-four, reckoning from the defeat of Ferokzâd, king of A. D. 1523. Shirwân.

THIS prince was endowed with an unparalleled courage, and intrepid in the greatest dangers: terrible to his enemies, and a severe exacter of military discipline. Rather harsh and cruel, than mild of disposition. Ambitious to such excess, that he used often to say, As there is but one God in heaven, so there ought to be but one king on earth. As he took the name of Sofî, or religious (N), so he was exceedingly honoured by his subjects, whose enthusiasm or frenzy made them think him something more than man: nay, his soldiers would have ascribed to him some sort of divinity; but, as haughty as he was, he always rejected it (O), of which he once gave a signal instance: for, after gaining an important victory, when some saluted him by the title of prophet, others of angel, and others of God, finding that he was not able to dissuade them from paying him such impious homage, he commanded a pit of great depth and extent to be dug; and, throwing one of his shoes into it, ordered the man who loved him best to go fetch it out. No sooner was the word spoken, than some thousands, to shew their zeal, leaped in; and, the moment they were down, all the earth which had been dug out of it was thrown upon them; thus chastising their impious folly, by burying them alive.

c ISMAEL had four sons; Shâh Tabmâsp, Aleas, or Elias Mirzab, Sam Mirza, and Babrâm Mirza b. The European historians give a most confused and erroneous account (P) of the original of the family and empire of the Shâhs. What they have written concerning Ismael, and his successors, taken from the travellers, is no less incorrect and imperfect; the latter having only related what they had observed themselves during their travels, or received from the natives, without consulting the Persian authors, at least sufficiently for the purpose; altho' some of them (Q) might have been capable of doing it. Olearius has given us a brief account of the Shâhs, from their original, down to his own time; but it is so superficial and uncertain with regard to all of them, till Shâh Abbâs, as to be of very little service to us. Concerning Ismael, he informs us, that, after he had subdued some provinces of Persia, he marched into Turky, and defeated the Soltân: that afterwards he conquered Arabian Irâk, Kûrdestân, Diyârbekr, and Armenia, to the Euphrates: then, having secured his frontiers against the Turks, turned his arms eastward, and took Kandehâr, with the adjoining province, from the king of the Indies: that, after this, he went to Kaswîn (or Kasbîn) to be crowned: but, without staying longer than the ceremony required, proceeded to Georgia; and, having defeated the king, called Simon Pâdishâh, obliged him to pay yearly 100 bales of silk, by way of tribute.

b TEIXEIRA, D'HERBELOT, et Pocock, ubi supra.

(L) For the particulars of this conquest, see the reign of Selim I. in the Othmân history.

(M) According to Olearius, he died at Kâsbîn, and was buried at Ardebîl.

(N) D'Herbelot says, he affected to be thought a prophet, and even divine; seemingly with design to throw an odium on him on account of his religion: yet relates the story of the pit, bringing it in very incoherently. In which he seems to be less sincere than Teixeira: who, being a Romanist, would doubtless have been as willing as the other to have told Ismael's impiety, had he seen any foundation for it in his author.

(O) Olearius says, that he was reputed to have been a great observer of justice; but to have made no difficulty to drink wine, and eat swines-flesh: nay, that, in derision of the Turkish religion, he kept a hog in his court, which he named Bâyezîd.

(P) See Byzarrus rerum Persicarum historia; the editor of Krusinsky's late revolution in Persia, &c.

(Q) As Della Valle, Herbert, Olearius, Thevenot, Tavernier, Chardin, Kämpfer, and a few more.

C H A P. II.

The reign of Tahmâsp I. and Ismael II.

2. Shâh
Tahmâsp.

Hej. 941.
A. D. 1543.

Actions and death.

Hej. 983.
A. D. 1575.

Invaded by Soleymân,

who retreats.

TAHMÂSP (A), the eldest son of Ismael, succeeded his father. He had several wars ^a in Khorassân against the Uzbeks; who, having seized Karazm and Great Bukhâria, which bound Persia on the north, became very troublesome neighbours: but that which he carried on against *Soleymân*², the Othmân emperor, was more considerable. Soleymân, having advanced with his forces to attack him in 941, at such time as he had another war upon his hands in Khorassân, he was obliged to return with his army to oppose the Turks: however, he avoided coming to a battle, on account of the great artillery which Soleymân had brought along with him. The Soltân, having entered Persia, laid siege to Tauris, and took it; but afterwards, without penetrating farther into the country, withdrew, and retired to Kûra Amîd (or Diyâr-bekr).

As soon as Shâh Tahmâsp was informed of this, he attacked his dunder, or rear-guard, ^b consisting of 17,000 men, which had been left, according to the custom of the Turks, to prevent their being surprised. In effect, he defeated this body of troops, and retook Tauris: but, Soleymân having marched back upon this news, the Shâh fled before him, and ruined his own country, to avoid being pursued ^b.

TAHMÂSP began his reign in the year 930; and died in 983, after he had reigned fifty-three years (B). He was poisoned by one of his wives, the mother of prince Haydr, out of an eager desire to set him on the throne after his father's death: but her design was frustrated by his sister, who bribed one of the officers belonging to the treasury to kill him, when he went to inquire what money his father had left behind him ^c.

He had two sons more, Ismael and Mohammed, who both reigned after him.

^c THIS is all the account, relating to Shâh Tahmâsp, which has been transmitted to us from the oriental authors (C). Olearius says, that Soltân Soleymân, taking advantage of the weakness of Shâh Tâbmâsp, who did not inherit the virtues and great endowments of his father Ismael, recovered from the Persians, by his generals, all which they had taken from the Turks, excepting Baghdâd and Wân: that, two years after, he entered Persia in person, took Tauris, and besieged Soltânîyah; while Tahmâsp, who was at Kaswîn, had not courage enough to attempt raising the siege, which yet, by accident, was effected: for, in March, some few days before their Newrûz, or new-year's day, there fell such abundance of rain, accompanied with a violent storm, and the snow of the neighbouring mountains dissolving at the same time, all the valleys were overflowed, and the Othmân camp greatly incommoded thereby. This sudden inundation, joined to the colour of the water (which probably, from the nature of the ground thro' which it passed, was reddish), so frightened Soleymân, that he forthwith broke up his camp, and returned home. In his retreat, he destroyed all before him: but, being engaged by the Persians near Betlis, or Bedlis, was absolutely defeated. ^d

ACCORDING to the same author, the Persians spoke slightly both of his conduct and valour (D). They charge him with neglecting to administer justice to his subjects, and leaving the whole management of affairs to his ministers. They blame him for giving protection to Humâyûn, son of Soltân Babr, the Mogol of Industân (E), who was driven out of his kingdom; nor would deliver him up, when demanded by the usurper. But, in this, he did rather a commendable than blameable action ^d.

^a See hereafter, the history of Soleymân.
hamâsh.

Travels, l. vi. p. 345.

^b Turkish annals, ap. D'Herbelot, p. 1016. art. Thahmâsh.
^c EBN YUSEF, ap. Pocock Suppl. ad Hist. Dynast. p. 65.

^d OLEARIUS'S

(A) The Persians write Tahmâsp, and the Arabs Tabmâsh; which is corruptly named Tamas, and Thamas, in the European authors.

(B) Olearius says, he died 11th May 1576, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and forty-second of his reign, which is eleven years short. Minadoi also says, he died the 11th of May 1576.

(C) D'Herbelot seems to have taken the whole article of Thamash from Gaudier's translation of the Turkish annals, and Dr. Pocock's supplement to Abûlfaraj. Several of those relating to the Turkmân dynasties are in like manner transcribed from Pocock and Teixiera; yet he could not have been without good originals, if he had consulted them.

(D) Yet Chardin, from the Persian historians, says, he was a prince of great courage and success. Voy. en Perse, tom. i. p. 125.

(E) Olearius makes sad work here, saying, he was the son of Selim; and that he fled to avoid the attempts of his uncle Jelâlo'ddin Akbar; whereas Akbar was his son, from whom he received no injury. He was driven out by the usurper Shîr Khân, the Afghân, or Avghân, who was his Wazîr, and restored by the help of Tahmâsp.

^a It has been already mentioned in the reign of Ismael, that Georgia was reduced to pay Reduces tribute by Shâh Ismael. That country, besides the kingdoms of Kaket and Karthuel (or Kar-Georgia, duel), was then divided among several feudatory princes, who were continually at war among themselves, which contributed most to the ruin of the whole. In the time of Tabmâsp, Karthuel (or the Eastern Georgia) was possessed by Luarzab (F); who left two sons, Simon and David, between whom he divided his dominions: but, as neither was content with his share, they went to war together, and both craved assistance of Tabmâsp. The youngest happening to apply first, Tabmâsp answered, that he would give him all his father's territories, provided he would turn Mohammedan. David consents; and joins the Persian army, consisting of 30,000 horse, which had already entered the country. From thence he is sent to Kasbin; and, as soon as Tabmâsp has him in his power, he makes the same offer to Simon; who, finding himself pressed by the Persian arms, surrenders himself, but without renouncing his faith. The Shâh, being now master both of the princes and their country, sends the elder prisoner to Jenghâ (G), near the Caspian sea; and makes the other governor of Georgia, changing his name from David to Dawd Khân; at the same time he made him and the Georgian lords take an oath of fidelity, and send him their sons for hostages.

SHAH Tabmâsp had, by several wives, eleven sons (H) and three daughters. Among the Haydr sons, there were three who survived the rest; Mohammed (who, on account of his weak sight, had given up thoughts of governing, and embraced a devout life, was called Khodâbânde, that is, servant of God), Ismael, and Haydr. As Tabmâsp had a particular affection for Haydr, it was his design to make him his successor; and, for that end, he gave him a share in the government during his life. When the Shâh was near his end, the great lords sent to Mohammed, whose right it was by birth, to accept of the crown; and, on his refusal, gave notice to Ismael (I), who was then a prisoner in the castle of Kabak, where he had been confined by his father, for having of his own head made incursions into the Othmân dominions, altho' he professed the Turkish, and hated the Persian sect. Mean time Haydr, who was but seventeen years of age, impatient to get into the throne, had the presumption to put the crown on his head, and appear in that posture before his dying father.

^c MORE effectually to carry his point, during Ismael's absence, he solicited his sister Peria-konkonna, who was older than any of her brothers, to make use of the interest which she had with the grandees, in his behalf. Put to death

^d THE prince's had already declared herself in favour of the elder brother; yet, fearing Haydr should proceed to violences, which might prevent her securing the crown for Ismael, if she opposed his pretensions, suffered him to assume the title of king; and, as such, he was acknowledged all over the palace. However, she had all the avenues so well guarded, that it was impossible for Haydr's friends to carry any tidings of it to the city: so that the young prince, beginning to distrust his sister's carriage, and apprehending their design was to sacrifice him to his brother's resentment, concealed himself among the women; till Shamal (K), a Georgian, his uncle by the mother's side, discovered him, and cut off his head^f.

^e CHARDIN VOY. en Perse, tom. i. p. 125. OLEARIUS, p. 345. MINADOI wars between Turks and Persians, p. 4.
^f OLEARIUS, ubi sup. HERBERT'S Travels, p. 198. MINAD. p. 6.

(F) Minadoi, and, after him, Olearius, calls him Lavasp.

(G) Minadoi says, the castle of Kabaka, between Kasbin and Tauris. Minad. wars between Turks and Persians, p. 4.

(H) Herbert says twelve, and gives the names; Mahomet, Ismael, Ayder Cawn, Solyman, Emangoly, Mamut Ally, Musapha, Ally Cawn, Amet Cawn, Ebrâhym, Hamze and Izema Cawn. Herb. trav. p. 198.

(I) Minadoi, p. 1. says, Tabmâsp appointed Ismael for his successor, who had been imprisoned for the fierceness of his courage.

(K) Herbert calls him Sahamal Khân; and says, Haydr enjoyed the crown but four days: that Peria-konkonna was a martial lady, and encouraged him to ascend the throne; yet, on his death, invited Ismael. Herbert's Trav. p. 198, & seq.

The reign of Ismael II.

^e ISMAEL, being thus raised to the throne from a prison (where he had been confined for 3. Shâh Ismael II. twenty-five years) by the management of his sister, to reward her for the favour, put her to death. However, he did not long survive his parricide; for he died the 13th of Ramâzân, in the year 985 (A), aged above fifty. His death was thought to be procured by poison Hej. 985. infused in treacle, which he took often, and in great quantity. Others say, that he was slain A. D. 1577; by some of the great lords, who went in to him dressed in women's clothes^a. He reigned one year and ten months.

^a POCOCK Suppl. p. 65. D'HERB. p. 505, art. Ismail ben Thahmasp,

(A) Olearius puts his death on the 24th of November 1577, which is near the mark; and postpones that of his sister to Mohammed's reign.

His great cruelty.

He is slain.

ISMAEL confirmed the proverb, that the reign of a prince, who returns from exile, is always cruel and bloody: for he began his reign with the execution of all the kindred and friends of Haydr (B), as well as of those who had advised his father to imprison him; pursuing such as he could not get apprehended, even as far as the frontiers of Turky, the religion of which he openly professed. To find out how the grandees were affected towards him, he caused a report to be spread of his death: but he appeared again too soon for those who had been so imprudent as to discover an aversion to his government; for he took away the lives of all such as he had the least jealousy of; and exercised so great cruelty, that his sister Peria-konkonna, not thinking herself secure while he lived, took care to make away with him: but this was done so secretly, that, when our author was in Persia, it was not known in what manner the inhabitants came to get rid of such a tyrant^b. According to Minadoi and Herbert, his sister, and four lords (C), dressed in women's apparel, entered his apartment one night, as if on a party of gallantry, and strangled him with a silken cord, on the 24th of November 1577^c.

^b OLEARIUS, ubi sup. HERBERT, p. 199. MINAD. p. 10.

^c MINAD. p. 12. HERBERT, ibid.

(B) Herbert says, he put to death eight of his brothers also. Travels, p. 199. Minadoi says the same; from whom both Herbert and Olearius seem to have taken their memoirs.

(C) Khalil Khán, Amir Khán, Mohammed Khán, and Karbi Klán.

C H A P. III.

The reign of Mohammed Khodâbandeh, Hamzeh, and Ismael III.

4. Shâh Mohammed.

ON the death of Ismael, Mohammed Khodâbandeh was sent for from Khorassân, of which he was governor; and, coming to Kaswîn, there ascended the throne. Besides the appellation of Khodâbandeh, which he obtained on account of his devotion, as has been already mentioned, he had also that of Alzarir, or the Blind, given him, because he wanted his sight (A); and it was for this reason that Ismael, who put to death all his other brothers, had spared him. Ahmed ebn Yusef says he reigned a good many years; Teixeira, Minadoi, and Olearius, but seven^a.

Peria-konkonna slain.

ACCORDING to the two last authors, they had a good deal of difficulty to prevail on him to accept of the crown (B); till he was made sensible, that both his person, and the kingdom, would be exposed to great danger, in case it passed to a strange family. However, he resolved not to assume it, but on condition that, before he made his entrance into Kaswîn, they brought him the head of Peria-konkonna (C); who having imbrued her hands in the blood of two of his brothers, might otherwise have it in her power to dispose of the kingdom to another: for this princess had prostituted herself to several lords of the court, particularly to Amir Khán, whom she had filled with hopes of ascending the throne.

His character. Hej. 986.

As soon as Mohammed took on him the reins of government, which was in the year 1578, he seemed studious to imitate those of his predecessors who had contributed most to preserve and exalt the glory of the state. This is what Bizarrus says of him: but the Persians affirm, that never any prince managed a sceptre with greater negligence and pusillanimity; inasmuch that, finding himself unfit for carrying on any military design, he spent all his time within the palace in gaming, and diverting himself with the ladies: that his enemies, the Turks on one side, and Uzbek Tatars on the other, taking advantage of his effeminacy, invaded Persia; and possessed themselves of several provinces, which continued in their hands so long as he lived^b.

Defeats the Turks.

For all this, at first the Persians, under this prince, gained some considerable advantages against the Turks. Minadoi relates, that, in the year above-mentioned, their general Toko-

^a POCOCK Suppl. p. 65. D'HERB. p. 613, art. Mohammed Khod. HERBERT, p. 199. MINAD. p. 15.

^b OLEARIUS, l. vi. p. 346.

(A) But it is not to be understood that he was stone-blind, though he is commonly by authors reckoned so: for we do not find, that his eyes were put out; and it is only said before, that his sight was very weak or bad; which is confirmed by Herbert, in his Travels, p. 198, who calls him the purblind king of Persia.

(B) Herbert says, that, on the murder of his eight brothers, Mohammed began to stir to secure himself, and the people to flock to him. Ibid.

(C) As this seems to be the same princess slain by Ismael, there must be some mistake, or great uncertainty, in this particular among the Persian historians. Periakonkonna may not improperly be rendered the fairy queen.

^a mak, with only 20,000 men, in the Kalderan plains, defeated 100,000 Othmâns under Mos- tafa Pâshâ; and killed 30,000, with the loss of 8000 Kizilbâsh, of whose heads he made a monument, to scare their countrymen. Minadoi says, three thousand of them were the heads of prisoners; and that, ordering them to be laid in a heap, he sat on it while he gave audience to a young Georgian lord, who paid him a visit. But this insult was retaliated on the Turks Khân, as they passed the Konak (in Georgia), 30,000 of them parted with their heads, to raise a higher monument to the Persian valour. After this, Arez Beg, with 10,000 men, sur- ^{His general taken.} prising the Tatars, in their way from Mazânderân, where they had done great mischief, to join Ozmân Pâshâ, left by Mosâfa (in Shîrwân), he attacked and routed a great part of their army. But Abdo'l Gheray, the Tatar general (D), with some select troops, coming unexpectedly upon the backs of the Persians, turned the fortune of the day: for the latter, who were already half-tired, taking them for the Turks under Ozmân Pâshâ, were presently defeated; and their general Arez Beg, being taken, was afterwards hanged at Shamakîya.

^b MOHAMMED KHODABANDEH, quickly informed of the shameful death inflicted on Arez Beg, orders his son Amîr Hamzeh Mirza (the wonder of his age), to revenge the injury. ^{His death re- venged} The prince sets out forthwith from Kaswîn with 12,000 men; and, in nineteen days, comes up with Abdo'l Cheray, and his Tatars, on whom he falls with such fury, that, in two hours, they are put to the rout. This done, he enters Erez, puts the garrison to the sword, and hangs Kaytas Pâshâ, to atone for Arez Beg. Here likewise he recovered 200 pieces of cannon, ^{by Hamzeh Mirza.} which his grandfather Tabmâsp had lost to Soltân Soleymân. After this, hearing where the Tatars were encamped again, he comes on them suddenly with his nimble troops, cuts most of them in pieces; and, unhorsing Abdo'l Gheray himself, sends him prisoner to Erez, where the queen-mother lay. Mean time Ozmân Pâshâ, with his forces, enters Shamakîya: but the Persian prince hastes thither with such fury, that the amazed Pâshâ flies by night, and leaves the city to his mercy; vengeance, we should have termed it: for he set the houses on fire, and may be said to have quenched it with the blood of the inhabitants, to punish their treachery.

^c THE Georgians shook off the Persian yoke after the death of Tabmâsp; as did most of the ^{Affairs of Georgia.} provinces of Persia during the reign of Ismael II. and the four first years of Mohammed Kbo- dâbandeh, who sent an army into their country, to reduce it to his obedience. On the news of its approach, David Khân fled; and his brother Simon, who was in prison, taking that occasion to recover his possessions, turned Mohammedan, and was made governor of Tiflis, under the name of Simon Khân. This is the account given by the Persian historians, which is reconcileable enough with what Minadoi relates from report. According to this author, Simon was confined in the same prison with Ismael, who afterwards reigned the second of that name, where he continued for some time: but his reputation for courage and experience bringing him acquainted with Ismael, that prince afterwards contracted an intimacy with him, prevailed on him at last to change his faith, with a promise to get him released, and ^{Prince Simon released.} restored to his territories. Accordingly, on his ascending the throne, he released Simon: but was cut off before he had time ^f to restore him. However, Mohammed Kbo- dâbandeh, on Simon's application to him, made him Khân of Georgia; and forthwith sent him into that country, accompanied by Ali Kûli Khân, and 5000 horse, to oppose the designs of the Turks, which he frustrated on many occasions.

^f THE war with the Turks continued almost all the reign of Mohammed, who was much distressed for want of sufficient forces to encounter the enemy both in Georgia and Persia: so that, altho' his eldest son Hamzeh Mirza performed wonderful actions, defeating great armies of Othmâns with a handful of men, yet, prevailing by numbers, they gained many advantages; and at length, mastering Tauris, built a strong fortress in the middle of it, which was not recovered during this reign. But, as we have given the detail of these matters in the reign of Morâd, Soltân of the Othmân Turks, ^b we refer the reader thither for farther information.

^c MINADOI, p. 31. HERBERT, p. 200.

p. 125.

^b See hereafter.

^d HERBERT, p. 201.

^f MINADOI, l. iv. p. 135. OLEAR, p. 345.

^e CHARDIN, tom. i.

^z See the Othmân history.

(D) A young man, and brother to the Khân of Krim. Herbert relates of him the substance of what the reader will find in the reign of Soltân Morâd, emperor of the Othmân Turks.

The reign of Hamzeh, or Hamza.

^g MOHAMMED KHODABANDEH died in the year of the Hejrah 993, and ^{5. Shâb Hamzeh.} of Christ 1584, leaving three sons; Amîr Hamzeh, Ismael, and Abbâs. Hamzeh, as ^{Hej. 993.} being the eldest, was crowned king of Persia; yet Ismael, envying the advancement of his ^{A. D. 1584.} brother, brother, had the address to prevail on the chief lords of the kingdom to conspire his death; which was effected in the eighth month of his reign, in the following manner. He procured some assassins, who, dressed in women's cloaths, and covered with veils, according to the custom of the east, went one morning to the Shâh's chamber-door; and, pretending to the guards, that they were the wives of some Khâns, whom the king had sent for, readily obtained admittance to the apartment, where they murdered (A) the unsuspecting prince: but his death was soon after revenged upon the contriver of it^a.

Is assassinated. ACCORDING to Minadoi, Hamzeb was assassinated during his father's life-time, and in another manner. He relates that this Mirza, in July 1586, came to Tauris: but, instead of attacking the fort built there by the Turks, marched to Salmâs, against Zeynel Bey, the Kîrd, whom he defeated, as he did presently after the Pâshâ of Rivân: then, returning to Tauris, he gets together an army of 40,000 men, with design to attack the Turks, then advancing to the city; but that, by the treachery of Ali Kûli Khân, the enemy got into Tauris, and reinforced the garrison: that, at the same time, prince Hamzeb being informed of a conspiracy of several Soltâns to betray him into the hands of the Othmân general, he was obliged to abandon his design, in order to take care of his own safety: that, however, having driven Ali Kûli Khân out of the country about Tauris, he began to look upon himself pretty secure against his secret enemies; and repaired to Ganjeb, a city of Arrân, of which Imâm Kûli Khân, his friend, was governor, designing to march from thence to intercept the Turkish forces in their way to Teflis: but that, while he staid there to prepare for his expedition, he was stabbed by one of his eunuchs who guarded him, set on, as some supposed, by his brother Abbâs Mirza, governor of Heri, or Herât, in Khorassân; others supposed by his father Mohammed. Minadoi, on several occasions, suggests the enmity and attempts of Abbâs against Hamzeb, by mistake, perhaps, for Ismael, whom he does not once mention: besides, as that author, though a very curious and intelligent historian, was not in Persia at the time of Hamzeb's death, his authority must give way to that of travellers, who were in the country, and wrote after him.

Various reports.

^a OLEAR. Trav. l. vi. p. 347.

^b MINADOI, l. 9: p. 380. 387.

^c (A) The Turks say, he was killed, bravely fighting near Salmâs, in the year 993 of the Hejrab, which answers to 1585 of Christ: but this is contradicted by other historians. See hereafter, in the reign of Morâd III. Soltân of the Othmâns.

The reign of Ismael III.

A. D. 1584.
6. Shâh Ismael III.

WHILE Ismael was employed in this fratricide, Abbâs Mirza, who had the government of Khorassân, was set out from Herât, capital of that province, in order to visit his brother Hamzeb: but hearing, on the road, of his murder, thought it more advisable to return to his place of residence, than put himself in the power of the author of it. The year following, while Ismael was in the province of Kârabâgh, Abbâs advanced as far as Kaswîn; where the frequent disputes, which happened between the people belonging to the two brothers, heightened the distrust they had of each other. Abbâs had with him, at that time, Murshîd Kûli Khân, whom, for his prudence and courage, Mohammed Khodabûnde had appointed that prince's tutor. Murshîd, knowing that Ismael would never pardon Abbâs, against whom he had spoken with great animosity, and that his own life depended on the safety of his master's, was resolved, if possible, to prevent the king, now actually on the march against his brother. To effect this, he drew over some of the great court-lords; who, in hopes of gaining the favour of Abbâs, bribed one of Ismael's barbers, named Khûdi, to cut his throat while he was shaving him. The lords, who were present when the fact was committed, to justify themselves, cut the assassin in pieces, and burnt him to ashes. Thus died Shâh Ismael III. after he had reigned eight months^c.

^c OLEAR. p. 347.

C H A P. IV.

The reign of Shâh Abbâs I. surnamed the Great.

^a THE two preceding princes are, by some European historians and travellers, put in the number of the Persian kings; by others, not. The case may possibly be the same with ^{7. Shâh} Abbâs I. the oriental historians; but the misfortune is, our extracts from them here fail us: for Mirkbond, of whom Teixeira has given an abridgment, so far as relates to the Persian kings, does not reach so low down. Abmed ebn Yûsef, made use of by Dr. Pocock, in his supplement to Abû'lfaraj, wrote in the time of Shâh Abbâs the first (A): and D'Herbelot, as if, in them, his sources for the history of the Sofian family had failed him, under the title of Abbâs, says only, that there were two kings in Persia of that name, both well known to Europeans, by the relations of modern travellers. So that we are turned over to them, as the funds from whence we are to draw our materials for the reigns of Shâh Abbâs and his successors.

^b ABBAS had already, by his spirit and moderation, so far gained the affections of the Per- His tutor's sians, that he ascended the throne with a general satisfaction. But the favour of Murshîd Kûli insolence Khân, who had most contributed to his advancement, did not continue long: for, assuming the same authority over the king, as he had done before while only Mîrza, or prince, he created a resentment in Abbâs, which proved his ruin. One day, when the Shâh was going to give his opinion with relation to an important affair, which had been proposed; that lord had the insolence to tell him, before all the council, that he was not fit to speak about points of such a nature, as being above the reach of his years and understanding. Abbâs dissembled his resentment at that time; but considering, that, if such liberties were borne with, it would bring him into contempt with his subjects, he resolved to rid his governor out of the way.

^c HE disclosed his intention to three lords of his council, Mahadi Kûli Khân, Mohammed Ustad severely pu-Shâbi, and Ali Kûli Khân: but as this was a matter of the greatest consequence to them, and nished.
they doubted even the reality of the Shâh's design, they endeavoured to dissuade him from it. He told them, it was his will that Murshîd Kûli Khân should die by their hands; and that, if they scrupled to give him that testimony of their zeal for his service, he should find means to be obeyed. Those grandees finding it would be dangerous to stand out any longer, followed the king into his favourite's chamber; who lying asleep on his back, Abbâs gave him the first blow with his sword, across his mouth; and the others seconded it, with each a stab: but Murshîd Kûli Khân, who was a very stout man, rising off his bed, put himself in such a posture of defence, as made them all afraid; and, doubtless, would have dispatched some of his murderers, had it not been for one of his grooms, who, coming in at the noise, with a battle-axe in his hand, the Shâh said to him: I would have the life of Murshîd Kûli Khân, who is become my enemy; go, dispatch him, and I will make thee a Khân. The groom obeying the king's command, went up to his master, and killed him. Next day, Abbâs put to death all the relations and friends of the deceased, to prevent any disturbances which their discontent might have raised against him; and, besides rewarding the groom with the dignity of Khân, made him governor of Herât, the capital of Khorassân.

^d THIS happened in the first year of his reign. This monarch's first actions discovered his abilities for governing his kingdom, and that he had no occasion for a director. His thoughts were wholly bent on recovering the large provinces which the Turks and Tatars had taken from his predecessors. He began by declaring war against the latter, who had seized the finest part of Khorassân during his father's reign. Accordingly, having raised a powerful army, he entered that province, where he was met by Abdallab, Khân of the Uzbeks (B); who, at first, obtained some advantage over him, by reason the plague, and bad weather, kept the Shâh's forces from action. The two armies lay near six months in sight of each other: but, at last, Abbâs attacked Abdallab Khân, and forced him to retreat to Mashhâd. The Shâh continued three years in Khorassân; in all which time, the Uzbek was in no condition to disturb him in his conquests; and, when he attempted it, was so unfortunate as not only to be defeated, but taken, with his brother, and three sons, whose heads were all cut off (C), by the Shâh's orders ^a.

^a OLEAR. Trav. into Persia, l. vi. p. 347.

(A) Whom he made the immediate successor of Mohammed Khodabandeh, according to Dr. Pocock.

(B) Then possessed of Great Bukharia, of which Samarcant is the capital, where Abdallab reigned. See hereafter; and general collect. of voy. and trav. 4to. vol. iv. p. 524.

(C) This must be a mistake; for Abdallab Khân lived till the year 1597, subduing Karazm, after his expedition into Khorassân against Shâh Abbâs. See the places cited in the former note.

Removes to Ispâhân.

ABBAS, on his return from Khorassân, went to Ispâhân, the capital of Persian Irâk, with a whose pleasant situation, and fertile soil, he was so delighted, that he transferred the seat of his empire thither. His next expedition was against the Othmân Turks. Understanding, by his spies, that the garrison of Tabrîs, or Tauris, were under no apprehension of an attack, he privately assembled a few forces, and, in six days, marched thither from Ispâhân, though it is usually eighteen days journey of the karawâns. Being come to the pass of Shibli, within four leagues of Tabrîs, where the Turks kept a party of soldiers, rather to receive the customs on commodities, than hinder the entrance of the Persians, he, with some officers, left the army, and advanced as far as the turnpike. The secretary of the custom-house, imagining them to be merchants, addressed himself, for the duties, to Shâh Abbâs: who told him, that the person with the purse was coming behind; and calling to Dulfikar Khân, bade him give the officer b some money. But, while the secretary was telling it, he ordered one of his followers to dispatch him: then, obliging the soldiers who kept that post to submit, entered the pass with his army.

Takes Tabriz. ALI PASHA, governor of Tauris, on this news, gathered what troops he could in the time, and went to meet the Shâh: but his forces, being much inferior to the Persians, were defeated, and himself taken. The citadel, built in the midst of the city by Hassan Pâdishâh, otherwise called Uzun Hassan (D), held out a month longer; and was then taken by some intelligence from within. From hence Abbâs proceeded to Nakhjuan (E), the garrison of which retired to Irvân, as soon as they heard of his being on the road: having demolished the citadel of that city, called Kilshikalaban, he followed them to Irvân (F), which he took, after a siege of c nine months. This conquest facilitated the reduction of all the neighbouring cities and provinces, excepting Orûmi (G), which being strongly situated on the point of a rock, he besieged eight months in vain. Finding therefore no hopes of becoming master of it by force, and that the Kûrds did him more injury than the Turks themselves, he sought the friendship of their chiefs by presents; and, among other advantages, promised them the plunder of the place, in case by their means it should be taken.

Perfely to the Kûrds. THE Kûrds, who were a free independent people, and lived solely by rapine, embracing the offer, went over to the Shâh; and, by their assistance, the city was taken. Abbâs, having gained his ends, sent to invite them to dinner with him, with a design to cut them all off, fearing they might, another time, do the Turks the like piece of service they had done him. d For this purpose, a tent was set up, whose entrance had several turnings; so that those who, went foremost were soon out of sight of those who followed; and a little way within were placed two executioners, who dispatched the guests as fast as they entered.

Shirwân and Kilân subdued. FROM this fortress marching on, he became master of all the country between the rivers Kûr and Arrâs (H). Thence proceeding into Shirwân, he reduced Shamakîya, its capital, in seven weeks, with the whole province; the government whereof he bestowed on Julfakar Khân, his brother-in-law. The people of Dârbend, on this news, killed the Turkish garrison, and submitted to the conqueror. After this, he entered Kilân (I), and reduced the inhabitants, who, in the time of Shâh Tabmâsp, had thrown off their subjection: and, as near Lankerân there was a vast fen, or morass, which in a manner covered the whole province, and rendered d the entrance very difficult; he ordered a road, or bank of sand, to be made through it, from that town, and built Khâns, or inns, for the accommodation of travellers, in several parts (K) of the country b.

Turks enter
Persia. IT was the intention of Shâh Abbâs to sit still with the acquisitions he had made: but, about a year after, advice arriving, that the Turks were hastening, with an army of 500,000 men, towards the Persian borders, he assembles all the forces he could at Tabrîs; and orders the inhabitants of the frontiers to retire, with their cattle, into the walled towns, laying waste the country, that the enemy might find no subsistence. Mean time, the Turks having advanced, b OLEAR. Trav. into Persia, l. vi. p. 347.

(D) In Olearius, Ussum Kassan.

(E) Nakhchuan, or Nakshivan, as others spell it.

(F) Called also Iri-van, Eri-van, Revan, and Ri-van, a noted city of Arrân, near the river Arrâs.

(G) Called also Ormîya, a city at the south-west end of the lake Shûbi, in Azerbeijân, about sixty miles to the south-west of Salmâs, on the same lake.

(H) The antient Cyrus and Araxis. The intermediate country is called drân, or Arrân, a fine and fruitful province.

(I) Mazânderân also, having combined with some parts of Kilân, or Gheylân, in 1593, rebelled against Abbâs, who, the next year, marched thither with 20,000 horse; and, in passing a river by swimming, lost 4000 men, and was in danger himself. Teixeira, p. 84. In his return from this conquest (which he soon effected, with the slaughter of 60,000 inhabitants), his general, by stratagem, drew Mâlik Bahaman, and his two sons, out of their impregnable fortress, seated on a rock, in the mountains bounding that province, at or near a village called Rina. Herbert's Trav. p. 187.

(K) As Baindura Khân, at the city of Asiâra; Mortûsa Kûli Khân, at Kejker; Hayder Khân, at Tunkaban; Vizir Khân, at Rasht, or Rejst; Adam Saltân, in the province of Mazânderân; and Huſſeyn Khân, at Astara-bâd.

a and encamped near Tabrîs, Abbâs caused it to be published through his army that such as were willing to serve as volunteers, should lift themselves apart, and receive for every Turk's head they brought him, fifty crowns. On this encouragement, above 5000 Persians lifted themselves, who every day made a prize of some heads, which were presented him, as soon as he rose: among the rest, a soldier, named Babrâm Tekel, brought him one morning five together; for which piece of service he was made a Khân.

At the end of three months, Chakal Oglî, the Turkish general, sent a kind of challenge to Shâh Abbâs, giving him to understand; that, if he had as much confidence in God, and the justice of his cause, as he would have the world believe, he should not be afraid of accepting a general engagement, which he thereby offered him. Abbâs, scorning to be braved by his enemies, gave him battle; which having lasted the whole day, the Turks, who had lost a great number of men, retreated in the night. When word was brought of this next morning, Abbâs, judging it might be a stratagem of the enemy, kept his army on a continual duty, for three days together, without so much as entering his tent himself in all that time. At length, being satisfied by the scouts, that the Turks were retired towards the frontiers, he advanced to the mountain Sabend: where Mohammed Khân Kafak, Shâbirûkb Khân, Eskbar, and Yiskhân, Kurehibashi, were all cut to pieces, for having given poison to the Shâh; who yet received no harm, by means of an antidote which he took immediately.

Two years after this, the Turks made another invasion, with 300,000 men, and besieged the fortress of Irvân, in the province of the same name: but were forced to raise the siege, and retreat. About two years after that, they besieged and took Tabrîs, under the conduct of Morâd Pâshâ, and kept it four months: within which time, there happened five pitched battles between the two nations, with little advantage to the Persians: yet, at length, Shâh Abbâs defeated the enemy, and recovered the city. On his return from this expedition, at Ardebil he ordered Julfûkar, Khân of Shamûkbî, to be killed; and gave his government to Yûsef Khân, an Armenian slave, who had long served him as a footman.^c

AFTER this, Persia enjoyed peace for twenty years successively: at the end whereof, the Turks entered the country again, with a powerful army, under the command of Khalîl Pâshâ, who was joined by several parties of Krim Tatars. The Shâh sent against them Karchûkay Khân (L), the most valiant and fortunate of all his generals, who wearied them out, and forced them to retreat, after several engagements; wherein he took prisoners, Omerse Beg, and Shahin Keray Khân, two Tatar princes, besides the Pashâ's of Egypt, Hâlep, Arzerûm, and Wân. The king, instead of treating them ill, not only presented each with a vest and excellent horse, but sent them back without demanding any ransom.

THIS war being over, Shâh Abbâs went into Georgia, where Tamûras Khân, son of Simon War in (M), had the confidence to enter the province of Segghen (N), situate in the midst of that country, and give him battle: but was forced to retreat, with great loss. While he staid in those parts, which was nine months, he paid his army nine musters together; and hearing that his soldiers spent most of their money in tobacco, he forbade the use of it, with such severity, that he ordered the noses and lips of those to be cut off, who were found to disobey his prohibition. A merchant, who, ignorant of that order, had brought several bags of tobacco into the camp, to sell there, was, by his command, set upon a heap of faggots, with his bags about him, and consumed to ashes.

AFTER the Georgian expedition, Shâh Abbâs went into Kilân, where he put to death his eldest son, through jealousy, raised by a trifling occasion. Besides 4 or 500 concubines, he had three wives, by whom he had as many sons, Safi, or Sefi Mîrza, Khodabânde Mîrza, and Imâm Kûlî Mîrza. The two latter had their eyes put out with fire (O), by his order, and were confined in the castle of Alamût (P), thirty leagues from Kasvîn. The eldest son, whose mother was a Georgian, having fallen in love with a beautiful Chirkassian maiden, presented to his father, by a Shîrwân merchant, begged her for a wife, and had by her a son, named Sain Mîrza, who afterwards reigned by the name of Shâh Safi.

THE over-severe, or rather cruel and tyrannical, government of Shâh Abbâs, was, by this time, grown so odious and insupportable to the grandees, that some of them had the boldness to cast a note into Safi Mîrza's chamber, importing, that if he would consent to the design they had in hand, he might immediately ascend the throne. Safi, abhorring to be an accomplice in ^c OLEAR. Trav. into Persia, l. vi. p. 347.

(L) In the original, spelled Kartz Schuckai Chân. Herbert calls him Kurchiki Cazan.

(M) This is, possibly, a mistake for Alexander; for so Chardin names his father, as will be seen lower down.

(N) Perhaps the same with Zaghen, whose capital, situate to the north of Teflis, is of the same name.

(O) By drawing a red-hot basin before them.

(P) Or Al Mût, that is, the castle of death, in the province of Mazânderân. It formerly belonged to the assassins, who reigned there, as before-mentioned.

his father's death, carried the billet to him; at the same time protesting his detestation of the proposal, and absolute dependence on his will. The Shâh, who dearly loved this son, expressed great satisfaction at the discovery, and commended his affection and piety: but he afterwards fell into such frights, as deprived him of all rest, and obliged him to change his bed-chamber twice or thrice a night. While his mind was possessed with such continual uneasiness, that he conceived he should never be free from it, so long as his son lived (Q); his fears were heightened, when he was at Resht in Kilân, by the false suggestions of a flatterer, that the prince, in conjunction with several great lords, had formed a new conspiracy against him^d.

put to death.

ABBAS resolving, on this new alarm, to put his son to death, would have had his general Karchûkay Khân to undertake the execution: but that brave old man, falling at the king's feet, said, he chose rather to be put to death himself, than imbrue his hands in the royal blood. The Shâh hereupon proposed the same to Bebût Beg; who, not being so scrupulous as the other lord, went immediately, and, meeting the prince on a mule, just come from a bath, accompanied only by a single page, lays hold on the bridle, and saying, Alight, Safi Mirza! it is the pleasure of the king thy father, that thou shouldst die; thereupon throws him down. The unfortunate prince, joining his hands, and lifting his eyes, cries out, O God! what have I done to deserve this disgrace? Cursed be the traitor who is the occasion of it. But, since 'tis God's pleasure thus to dispose of me, his will, and the king's, be done. He had scarce time to utter the words, before Bebût gave him two stabs with a dagger, and laid him dead on the place. The body was dragged to a fen not far off, where it continued above four hours.

Distractions thereupon.

WHEN the news of this murder was brought to the city, the people ran in multitudes to the palace, threatening to force the gates, unless the authors of it are delivered to them. The prince's mother, understanding that he had been slain by the Shâh's order, ran to his apartment; and, regardless of his furious disposition, not only reproached him, in severe terms, with inhumanity, but flew upon, and beat him with her fists. Abbâs, instead of being angry with her, was at a loss what to say for himself. But, at last, with tears in his eyes, spoke thus: What would you have had me do? news was brought me, that he had a design upon my life. There is now no remedy: what is done cannot be recalled. In effect, Shâh Abbâs himself had no sooner heard of the execution, than he repented of his rashness. He shut himself up for ten days, with a handkerchief over his eyes, that he might not see the light; lived a whole month on very spare diet; went in mourning a whole year; and ever after wore no clothes which might distinguish him from the meanest of his subjects (R). He likewise caused the place where the prince was killed to be made a sanctuary^e.

Lords poisoned.

THE first ten days of his mourning being over, he removed from Resht to Kasvîn; where he invited the Khâns, whom he any-way suspected, to a feast, with the flatterer who had made him jealous of his son: and causing poison to be mixed with their wine, saw them all die in his presence (S). The action of Bebût Beg was indeed rewarded with the office of Darûga of Kasvîn, and, some time after, with that of Khân of Kesker; but the next journey which the Shâh made to Kasvîn, he ordered Bebût to cut off his own son's head, and bring it him. The Khân was forced to obey; and coming back soon after, with his son's head in his hands, Abbâs asked him, How he did? Alas! my lord, answered Bebût, I think I need not tell you: I have been forced to kill my only son, whom I loved above all things in the world; the grief of which, I fear, will bring me to my grave. The Shâh replied, Go thy ways, Bebût, and consider how great must have been my affliction, when thou broughtest me the news of my son's death, whom I ordered thee to destroy. But comfort thyself, my son and thine are no more; and reflect, that, in this respect, thou art equal with the king thy master.

Bebût murdered.

NOT long after this, Bebût ended his life, on the following occasion. It happened that one of his domestics giving him water to wash after dinner, according to custom, poured it on so hot, that it scalded his hands. This so incensed the new Khân, that he threatened to have the offender cut in pieces. The slave, considering that he had no quarter to expect from a master, who had made no scruple to murder his prince, and his own son, conspired with some of his fellow-servants, and killed him, the night following, in his drink. Shâh Abbâs was not troubled at the loss of so hateful an object; and resolved not to have punished the murderers, had not

^d OLEAR. Trav. into Persia, l. vi. p. 351.

^e OLEAR. ubi supra, p. 352.

(Q) Tavernier calls this prince Sofi Mirza; and says, that the people's love gave his father jealousy; which was augmented, by his drawing the first arrow at a boar; it being a capital crime to shoot before the king: that, being his only son, Abbâs concealed his displeasure; but that, as soon as he had a son by a slave, he ordered first his eyes to be put out, and then his head to be cut off; which he afterwards lamented. Tavernier's Persian travels, l. v. ch. 1.

(R) This agrees with what Herbert observes, that, in 1628, when he gave audience to the English ambassador; he was dressed in a plain red calico coat, quilted with cotton.

(S) Chardin mentions, that being in a passion with Ali Mirza Beg, he slew him with his own hand, and confiscated his estate, giving his palace, which was a very fine one, to the Dutch. Voy. tom. iii. p. 35.

a the other lords represented, that, if they were not made examples of, none of them could think himself safe, after once giving his servants any threatening language^f.

HERBERT, who travelled into Persia in the reign of Shâh Abbâs, gives a different account of Abbâs, ^{by} this affair. He says, that Abbâs had four sons, the eldest Ismael, Sofi Mirza, Kodabânda Soltân, ^{cruelty} and Emangoli. The two first born of Gordina, daughter of Simon Khân: the two latter of Martha, daughter of Skander Mirza, both Georgian Christians. Ismael, giving jealousy by his delighting in arms, was poisoned. Sofi Mirza (who is the Safi, or Sefi, of Olearius), although extolled, at first, for revealing a conspiracy, was at length thrown down, and crushed to death by a Kapiji. Emangoli (or Imâm Kûli), upon being told by a witch, that he should not live long, grew fearful of his father's temper, and died of melancholy. Kodabandâ Soltân, surnamed Sofi, now the only son living, was a prince of great endowments; and had signalized himself so much in the wars, that his father doated on him, and the people admired him: but this popularity made Abbâs resolve to destroy him.

He was then on an expedition against the Arabs; at what time, falling in love with a prin- ^{towards his} cess of the same nation, he married her, and had by her, in a few years, two children, Soffi and Fâtima. Now Abbâs contrives to put his design in execution against his son. He begins, by putting to death Magar, an Arab, the prince's tutor, under pretence that he infused ambitious notions into him. On this news, the prince, who was then at war against the Uzbeks, leaves the camp, to know his father's reason for this execution; and is surprised to hear him say, It was for thy rebellion. Soffi protests his innocence: but Abbâs, to provoke him, aggravates the accusation. The prince, in the heat of his disorder, imagines he saw Magar strangling; and, drawing his sword, vows to rescue him. His father, then seeming to relent, bids him lay aside his weapon, and walks him into another apartment; where, after a while, pretending to be indisposed, he leaves him.

ABBAS was no sooner gone, than seven men, with bow-strings, enter the room, by a trap- ^{Safi's disfrac-} door, and attempt to seize him. But the prince, though unarmed, kills three of them; when, ^{tion.} being out of breath, they fasten on him, and fit the string to his neck. At this juncture the Shâh coming in, ordered them to bind him, and, before he could recover his senses, deprive him of sight, by drawing a red-hot iron before his eyes. All degrees of people were highly enraged at this act of cruelty. The prince himself grows desperate; and, not knowing how d to be revenged on the author of his misery, choaks his own daughter Fâtima, at a visit she ^{Poisons him-} made him in prison; thinking that way to afflict his father, who he knew doated on her. ^{self.} The princess his wife, who was present, imagined he had killed his child, through mistake, for somebody else, till she perceived him groping for young Soffi, in order, by destroying him also, to deprive his father of a successor: but the mother got him out of the way. The prince continued furious for two days; and the third, being no longer able to bear his misfortune, he put an end to it, with his life, by a dose of poison^g.

WE have been more particular in this article of history, to let our readers see, that natural affection sways not more with the Persian than Turkish princes; and how little certainty there is in the accounts which are brought from foreign countries by travellers. However, let which e will be in the right of the two here cited on this occasion, 'tis certain that Sain Mirza, afterwards called Safi (whence Herbert's Soffi), was the grandson of Shâh Abbâs, and succeeded him. To return therefore to Olearius:

ALTHOUGH the Shâh gave so many proofs of sorrow for his son's death, yet the prince's ^{The Shâh's} widow could not but believe he had a design to make away with her son Sain Mirza. So ^{jealousy.} that, for a long time, she kept him concealed, and would not suffer him to be brought to court, although his grandfather designed him as his successor; as the eyes of his two younger sons being out, they could not ascend the throne. The Shâh was reported to have had a great affection for the young prince; and yet, lest the vivacity of his spirit should revive in the people the affection for him which they had for his father, he ordered opium, about the f quantity of a pea, to be given him every morning, to dull his senses; but that, instead thereof, his mother made him frequently take treacle, and other antidotes against the poison, which she suspected might be given him^h.

ABOUT this time was conquered the kingdom of Lâr, comprising a considerable part of the ^{Lâr subdued.} province of Pârs, or Proper Persia, which had been erected into a sovereignty, in the year of the Hejrah 500, by the Kûrds. These took it from the Arabs, and held it till the year ^{Hej. 500.} 1612, when it was subdued by Abbâsⁱ; who having seized the king, put him to death, for ^{A. D. 1106.} offering violence to, and robbing, the Karawâns which passed that way^k.

^f Ibid. ubi sup. p. 335. ^g HERBERT'S Travels, p. 173, & seq. art. Lâr.

^h TEIXEIRA, Hist. Pers. part. ii. c. 48.

ⁱ OLEAR. ubi sup.

^k D'HERBEL, p. 511.

Affairs of Georgia.

WHILE Shâh Abbâs was in Kilân, Tamûras Khân, taking advantage of his absence, entered again with an army into Georgia, and recovered all those places out of which he had been forced. Against him were sent Ali Kûli Khân, Mohammed Khân Kasak, Mortûsa Kûli, Khân of Talish, and several other Khâns; who brought word back, they found the enemy so advantageously posted, that they durst not set upon him. The Shâh punished their pretended prudence with death; and, next year, marched thither in person: protesting, at his departure, that, if he came back victorious, he would sell the Georgians at an abbâs, or fifteen pence, a head. Accordingly, having met with success, and brought off a great number of prisoners, at his return, a soldier went to him, with two abbâs's in his hand, and demanded two handsome young maids for them, which the king delivered to him. About this time, many Georgian Christians left their country to settle in *Ispâbân*¹.

Taymûraz
king of Kaket.

CHARDIN gives a more particular account of this expedition of Abbâs into Georgia, and the causes of it, from the Persian historians. The king of Kaket (T), named Alexander, had three sons, and two daughters. The eldest son David, famous for his courage, and misfortunes, under the name of Taymûraz (U) Khân, given him by the Persians, was an hostage at the court of Persia, and educated along with Abbâs the Great, who was nearly of the same age. As soon as Alexander was dead, his widow, a wise and beautiful princess, named by the Georgians Ketavâna, and Mariâna in the histories of Persia, wrote to Mohammed Khodâbandeh, desiring him to send Taymûraz, to succeed his father, and accept of his brother, as an hostage in his room. Taymûraz was accordingly dispatched for Georgia, after taking an oath of vassalage.

Luarzab king of Karthuel,

SIMON, king of Karthuel (or Karduel), died at the beginning of the reign of Abbâs, leaving the crown to Luarzab, his eldest son, a minor, under the tuition of his first minister, named Mebrû by the Georgians, and by the Persians Morâd; who one day surprising the king in private with his beautiful daughter, on signifying his concern, Luarzab swore he would never have any other wife but her. However, the marriage was prevented, by the queen, and ladies of the country, who declared they would never pay the submission of subjects to a person of a mean family, as Mebrû's daughter was. The king alleged this as a reason to the father for not marrying her: but as the Georgians are very vindictive, he was advised to make away with Mebrû, to prevent his revenge. The design was to poison him, at a banquet; which being discovered by the page who gave him the cup, he rose up, under pretence of going to the vault, and made his escape to Shâh Abbâs, who was then at Ispâbân, on his return from the conquest of Shîrwân.

provokes
Abbâs.

MEHRU told the Shâh his case, and demanded justice of him, who, he said, was the true sovereign of Georgia. As a still surer way to be revenged of Luarzab, he used all his art to inflame Abbâs with love for that prince's sister, named Darejân, celebrated for her beauty by the Persian poets, under that of Pebri. Abbâs sent ambassadors to demand her. Answer was returned, that she had been promised to Taymûraz, king of Kaket. The Shâh, more inflamed by this refusal, sends a third ambassador, to renew the demand; writing, at the same time, to Taymûraz, not to espouse Luarzab's sister, and to come to court. Luarzab, provoked at these repeated and haughty instances, abused the ambassador, and dismissed him, without further answer. This was about the year 1610; at what time Abbâs, not being in a condition to execute his design against Georgia, dissembled his resentment; and as he was then sending a Carmelite missionary into Europe, to excite the Christian princes against the Turks, with whom he was at war, he ordered that frier to pass through Georgia, and exhort Taymûraz not to join with, or in any sort assist, his enemies.

A. D. 1610.

The Shâh's policy.

A. D. 1613.

TAYMURAZ, either through credulity or fear, did as he was desired; and soon repented of it. For, in 1613, Abbâs left Ispâbân, with a design to invade Georgia: but, as he was full of artifice, he treated this war as an amorous intrigue. He said, that Luarzab's sister loved him, and had written letters to him: that she had even been promised to him: and that her brother was perfidious. At the same time, he had many Georgians among his troops; gave pensions to several of the great lords of the country; and corrupted others every day, by means of Mebrû. Some of the chief princes of the blood had turned Mohammedans, for sake of governments and places. He had in hostage two sons of Taymûraz, and a brother and sister of Luarzab. All things concurred to render the conquest of Georgia easy. He judged it would not be difficult, as matters were circumstanced, to sow divisions among the people, and make the kings jealous of each other. With this view, he wrote to Taymûraz, that Luarzab was ungrateful, a rebel, and a fool: that he was resolved to take the crown from him: and that if

¹ OLEAR. ubi sup.

(T) Kaket, as hath been observed before, is one of the two great provinces into which Georgia is divided, and Karduel, or Karthuel, the other.

(U) Chardin writes Taimuras Khân. In this prince's letters to the pope, inserted in the Historia Armena of Galanus, it is spelled Theimuraz.

a he (Taymûraz) would either seize or kill him, he should have the kingdom. He wrote in the same strain to Luarzab, against Taymûraz; and, at the same time, ordered his general Lalia Beg to enter Georgia, with 30,000 horse, and lay the country waste^m.

THE two kings finding, on an interview, that their ruin was determined, made a strict league; and, to cement it the stronger, Luarzab, in earnest, gave the admirable Darejan to Taymûraz: at which news Abbâs was so enraged, that he swore he would kill his hostages; and hastened his march, to be revenged on the kings who had offended him. Taymûraz, seeing the Persian general approach, and that part of his nobles were inclined to submit, sent his mother Ketavâneb, or Mariâna, to Abbâs, who was still at Ispâhân, to ask pardon for her son. As this princess was still handsome, though not young, Abbâs fell in love with her, or pretended to do so, at first sight, and offered to marry her, if she would turn Mohammedan. On her refusal, he imprisoned her, in a private house (X), and made eunuchs of her two grandsons, after forcing them to change their religion. This done, he departed for Georgia.

ABBÂS being entered the country with his army, which daily increased, by the accession of Georgians, through hope or fear; Luarzab resolved to oppose him, hoping to inclose the Persians in the woods, and there destroy them. In effect, the Shâh having marched twenty-five leagues forward, Luarzab divides his troops in two bodies, and shuts up the passage with heaps of wood, in such sort, that the Persian army could neither get forward nor backward. Mebrû, the general, perceiving the king greatly surprised, as if he thought himself betrayed, promised, in three days, to deliver him out of the embarrass, on forfeiture of his head. Accordingly, he ordered a road to be cut through the wood; and leaving the camp, which was blocked up by the Georgians, took only the cavalry. Abbâs would lead them himself; and, having crossed the wood, fell on the kingdom of Kaket: where he committed great cruelties, so far as to destroy the trees which nourished the silkworms; a damage not to be retrieved.

LUARZAB, on this news, thinking all lost, fled into Mingrelia: but Abbâs, knowing his conquest could not be thoroughly secure, while the kings were at liberty, wrote him a soothing letter; in which he told him, that he had no reason to fly, since his resentment was against the perfidious, the rebel Taymûraz; and that, if he would come to his camp, he would confirm him in the possession of Georgia; threatening otherwise to destroy it intirely, with fire and sword. Luarzab, to prevent this ruin, in love to his people, repairs to Abbâs; who loads him with favours, and sets him on the throne, with the greatest solemnity. This was to deceive the Georgians, and allure them to submit without fighting. Among the presents he made the king, one was a plume of precious stones, which he desired him always to wear on his head, as an ensign of royalty.

THE day on which Abbâs left Tiflis, he asked Luarzab to accompany him to the first encampment. Luarzab, who mistrusted no harm, went; and going to see the Shâh, without his plume, Abbâs, who had ordered one of his guards to steal it from him, asked him, where it was? the king answered, Somebody had stolen it. Abbâs seeming provoked that he should say it was stolen in his camp, ordered him to be arrested; but durst not put him to death, for fear of exciting a revolt in Georgia. However, he sent him to Mazânderân, in hopes the bad air would carry him off. That not having the effect, he was removed to Sbirâz. At length Abbâs, hearing that an ambassador from the Czar of Russia, at the instigation of the princes of Luarzab's party, was arrived on the frontiers, to solicit his deliverance; to avoid either setting the king at liberty, or denying the Czar's request, ordered the governor of Sbirâz to make away with Luarzab, as if his death came by accident. It was pretended that he fell into the water, when a fishing; and Abbâs, in reporting this affair to the ambassador, seemed much concerned at that king's death.

THE brother of Luarzab, called Bagrat Mîrza, or the prince royal, who had before turned Taymûraz Mohammedan, was made governor of Georgia in his room; and an army left to oppose Taymûraz. This prince, having for a time carried on the war, by means of some small succours from the Turks, and neighbouring Christian princes, at length went to Constantinople, to solicit more powerful aid, which he obtained. A great army was sent in Georgia, which gave the Persians several defeats, and re-established Taymûraz in his kingdom of Kaket. But he did not long remain there (Y): for, as soon as the Othmân forces were withdrawn, Abbâs again.

^m CHARD. Voy. en Perse, tom. i. p. 125, & seq.

(X) She continued in confinement several years, and was then removed to Sbirâz; where, in 1624, she died, as 'tis said, under torments, to oblige her to turn Mohammedan, by order of Shâh Abbâs.

(Y) In Galanus's Historia Armena, we have letters from Thimuraz, or Taymûraz, to the pope; in one of which he says, that his country had been under the Persian tyranny, grievously harrassed from 1514 to 1628. Hist. Armen. p. 142. And the missionary Avitabilis says, he at length gave Shâh Abbâs his daughter in marriage, and submitted to pay tribute. Ibid. p. 168.

returned to Georgia, and changed the face of affairs. He built fortresses through the country, ^a which he filled with Persians; and carried away above fourscore thousand families, most of whom he transplanted into the provinces of Mazânderân, Armenia, Azerbejân, and Pârs, or Proper Persia; settling in their room Persians and Armenians. However, to reconcile these people, if possible, by lenitives, he came to an agreement with them, on oath, for him and his successors, That the country should not be charged with taxes; nor their religion changed: that their churches should not be demolished, nor meskûs built there: that their viceroy should be a Georgian, of the race of their kings, but a Mohammedan; and that one of his sons, such as would change his religion, should have the post of governor and grand provost of Ispâhân, till such time as he succeeded his father. After this, the Georgians were quiet during the reign of Abbâs ⁿ.

Bâghdâd
taken.

MUCH about the same juncture, Abbâs received letters from Bikirkeba (Z), commander of the garrison of Bâghdâd, who, dissatisfied with the Othmân court, for refusing him the government of that city, on the death of the Pâihâ, whose lieutenant he was, proffered to deliver it up to the Shâh. Abbâs, on this proposal, immediately marched that way, with a good army: but, before he arrived there, Bikirkeba, having changed his mind, sent him word, that he had only powder and ball at his service. The Shâh was so provoked at the affront, that he vowed not to return without taking Bâghdâd, though it should cost him his life. Accordingly, having passed the ditch, after a siege of six months, and sprung a mine, at which work the Persians are very expert, he caused an assault to be given, and took the city by storm. Bikirkeba, being found among the prisoners, was sewn up in a raw ox-hide, and placed near the ^c highway, till the hide shrinking with the heat of the sun, put him to a painful death. But his son, making it appear that he was not concerned in his father's offence, had the government of Shîrâz bestowed upon him. ^b baffled.

The Turks

THE year following, the Othmân emperor ordered Hafis Ahmed Pâshâ to lay siege to Bâghdâd: but Abbâs forced him to raise it, and continued eight months in sight of the Turkish army; till, being much diminished by sickness, as not so able to endure the heats as the Persians, Hafis was obliged to retreat to Constantinople. The Shâh, at his return from this expedition, began to build Ferabâd, in the province of Mazânderân, on occasion of a village named Tahona, situated on a pleasant river, which, not far from thence, falls into the Caspian sea.

A great overthrow.

THE above-mentioned victory procured the Shâh only two years rest: for the Soltân, ^d desirous to recover Bâghdâd, sent Khâlîl Pâshâ, with an army of 500,000 men, to subdue it. Abbâs ordered Karchûgay Khân to march to the relief of the place, with a small but chosen brigade, while he followed himself with the rest of his forces. The Persian general, advancing to meet the Turks, harrassed them with continual skirmishes for six months together; and, when he had sufficiently tired them, at last gave Khâlîl battle; and, defeating, forced him to fly as far as Neched. On the first news of this victory, Shâh Abbâs left Bâghdâd, to meet Karchugay Khân; and, when near, alighting, said to him, My dearest Aga, by which name he always called him, I have, by thy care and conduct, obtained so noble a victory, that I would not have desired a greater of God: come, get upon my horse; 'tis fit I should be thy lackey. The general ^e was so surprised at this discourse, that he threw himself at his feet, intreating his majesty to look on him as his slave; and not expose him to the derision of every body, by doing him an honour which he could not possibly deserve. However, he was forced to mount, the king and the Khâns following on foot only seven paces.

SHAH Abbâs had many other wars against the Turks: but the most signal victory he ever obtained over his enemies, was the reduction of the city of Ormûs, which he took from the Portuguese six years before his death ^o.

Isle of Ormûz,

THE kingdom of Ormûz, or rather Hormûz, was formerly a dominion of pretty large extent, situate on the coast of Kermân and Pârs, where it first began, some time after the year of Christ 1000; and continued under a race of kings for about 600 years, the history of whom we shall give hereafter: but, by degrees, it fell to decay; so that its bounds were reduced to ^f those of the island of Ormûz, and some other isles adjacent to it, in 1507, when it was taken from its king by the Portuguese; from whom Shâh Abbâs took it in 1622, by the assistance of the English, who joined him, on the following occasion.

taken from the Portuguese,

THE Portuguese, who had always disturbed the English trade in the East Indies from the time they first sailed thither, were resolved also to obstruct their commerce in the Persian gulf, whither some ships arriving in 1621, they were attacked by Ruy Frera de Andrada, and forced to return to India with the loss of their chief commander Andrew Shilling. There having augmented their naval force, from two ships to nine, they set out again to the Persian gulf;

^a CHARD, ubi sup. p. 127, & seq.

^o OLEAR, ubi sup.

(Z) Perhaps Bikir, or Bekr Ky. baya.

and, being come to Kustak, are informed by their factor, that the king of Persia was at war with the Portugueses; that his forces had been seven months besieging a castle, which Ruy Frera, on hearing of the Shâh's design against Ormûs, had built on the isle of Kishmeh, or Kishom, to secure the water with which Ormûs was supplied from thence; and that the Persian general required the assistance of the English against the Portugueses, as their common enemy, in case they expected to trade in Persia.

THE captains, Waddel, Blyth, and Woodcock, finding themselves in this dilemma, and that they could have no safe commerce in the gulf while the Portuguese had the dominion there, repaired to the camp of Imâm Kûli Khân, viceroy of Shîrâz, the chief commander in the expedition; and having obtained very advantageous conditions for the English nation (A), in January 1622 failed to Kishmeh; where, besieging the castle by sea, and lending some aid on shore, it was surrendered in six days by Ruy Frera, who was sent prisoner to Surât, along with three of the fleet. The other six ships went to Ormûs, where the Persians landed the 9th of February, and, with small loss, got possession of the town; while the English fleet battered the Portuguese galleons, five of which they sunk during the siege, which lasted ten weeks. The 17th of March, a breach being made, by blowing up part of the castle-wall, the Persians made an attack; but were repulsed, with considerable loss (B). After this, three breaches more being made by mines, on the 18th of April the general gave an assault with all his forces, and gained part of the castle: so that the Portugueses, being hard pressed, surrendered the place, with themselves, to the English on the 21st; in all, 2600 men; the cannon, in number an hundred and fourteen, 53 pieces mounted, and 92 of brass unmounted, were left to the Persians: excepting 10 of the latter, which the English took to supply those which were damaged in the expedition. The king of Ormûs, Seyd Mohammed Shâh, an Arab of Maskat, whom the Portugueses had lately raised to that poor dignity, with a pension of 140,000 rials, was delivered up, with all the Mohammedans, to the Persians.

ABOUT the end of the year 1629 (rather 1628) Abbâs took a journey to Ferabâd, in the province of Mazanderân, which was the place he most delighted in: but he there fell so ill, that, sending for four of the chief lords of his council (C) to his bed-side, he told them, that it was his will that his grandson Sain Mirza should succeed him in the throne, and assume his father's name. When they mentioned the prediction of the astrologers, that he should reign but eight months at most; the Shah made answer, Let him reign as long as he can, though it was but three days: it will be some satisfaction to me, to be assured that he shall one day have on his head the crown which was due to the prince his father.

As it was conceived that some poison had been given him, his physician ordered him the hot bath for eight days together, and a bath of cows milk for four days more; but these remedies availing nothing, he prepared for death, and appointed where he would be interred; yet, that the people should not know it, he ordered his funeral ceremonies to be performed at three different places at once; viz. Ardebîl, Mashhâd, and Bâghdâd (D). The general opinion in our author's time was, that his body was conveyed to the last city, and thence to the Nechef of Kûfa, near the sepulchre of Ali: for that, going to Kûfa, after the reduction of Bâghdâd, and looking at the Nechef, he said, he had never seen a more delightful place, and that he should wish to be there interred. He ordered that his death should be concealed till his grandchild was secured of the succession: and, the better to effect it, directed that his body should be exposed every day in the hall of justice, seated in a chair of state, with the eyes open, and back to the hangings; behind which stood Yusef Aga, who from time to time lift up his arm with a silken string, by way of answer to the matters proposed by Temûr Beg, on behalf of those who were at the other end of the hall. By this artifice, his death was concealed for the space of six weeks. According to Herbert, Shâh Abbâs died at Kasbîn, in the year 1628, just at his departure from the court; after he had lived seventy years, and reigned forty-three (E) over Persia, and fifty as king of Herî (or Herât, capital of Khorassân).

P PURCH. pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1785. HERBERT Trav. p. 115.
P. 177. 206.

9 OLEAR. p. 354.

† HERBERT,

(A) 1. The castle of Ormûs, with all the ordnance and ammunition, to go to the English. 2. The Persians to build another castle in the isle, if they pleased. 3. The spoil to be equally divided. 4. The Persians to be at half charges for wages, provision, powder, &c. 5. The English to be custom-free for ever in Bander Gomrûn. But the Persians did not keep their agreement with the English, who had no more than 20,000 pounds allowed for their service.

(B) Monoxe, the English agent, whose account of the Ormûs affair is given by Purchas, vol. ii. p. 1793. represents the Persians at that time as wretched soldiers, without either courage, discipline, or the least notion of the art of war.

MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

(C) Viz. Isa Khân, Kurchibâshi; Seyol Khân, Tushmal, or counsellor of state; Temûr Beg, Ouwogli, the lord high-steward; and Yuseph Aga, the chief chamberlain.

(D) Herbert says, it was reported that his heart, bowels, and body, were separated, and buried at Majed Ali, near Kûfa, Kasbîn, and Ardebîl; or, as others said, at Kom, for that few knew the certainty. Travels, p. 206.

(E) Olcarius says, he died in 1629, when he had lived sixty-three years, and reigned forty-five. But that Herbert is right, as to the years of his reign, appears from the chronology; and the year of his death is confirmed by Chardin, and others.

His character. THE Persians have a high veneration for Shâh Abbâs, and speak of him as the greatest prince their country has had for many ages past: nor can this be denied, if such instances of cruelty, as we have mentioned, were struck out of his character. He was wise and valiant, famous for great victories, and extending his dominions on all sides towards the Indians, Turks, and Tatars. He had a great sense of the miseries of the poor, and took a particular care for their subsistence. On this occasion, it was usual with him, after leaving any city, to return incognito; and, going to the market, examine their weights, the goodness of the bread, and other provisions, severely punishing fraudulent dealers. At Ardebil he ordered a rich baker to be put alive in a red-hot oven, for refusing to sell bread to the poor; under pretence that he was obliged to keep it for Abbâs and his soldiers, who, as he said, could never be satisfied.

Care for the poor.

HE commanded a butcher (F) to be fastened by the back to the hooks on which he hung his meat, for using false weights. He took a pleasure in bestowing in alms the sums which arose from public places; because he believed disposing in that manner of the money taken from the people, was not acceptable to the Deity. He could not endure those judges who took bribes; and severely punished such as were guilty of injustice or oppression. Coming to understand that a Kazi of Ispâhân, after he had taken presents with both his hands, to the value of about seventy pounds from each party, would have advised them to accommodate the matter between themselves; he ordered the offender to be set on an ass, with his face to the tail, which served him for a bridle, and his robe to be garnished with the intrails of a sheep newly killed; and, in that equipage, to take several turns round the Meydan, while an officer cried before him, that such was to be the punishment of a corrupt judge.

Severe justice.

ABBAS was too severe; but generally his executions were the punishments of injustice and oppression. The grand master of the ordnance was a person jealous even to fury: for, if any one in the neighbourhood appeared on the terrace of his house, as is customary during the hot days, that officer's eunuchs, who seemed to be on the watch on all parts of the garden, slew him with a musket, under pretence that he might, from his terrace, look in the women's apartment of their master's palace. Complaints of this being made to the Shâh, he bade the grand master take care what he did, and to keep his wives locked up in their chambers in the night as well as day, if he was afraid the eyes of his neighbours would discover them: but this advice was not regarded by the grand master. One of the king's officers, who unfortunately lodged near this jealous fury, happening at night to take the air on the terrace, was killed in the manner above-mentioned. His family, upon this, go in a body to Shâh Abbâs, to demand justice; and representing, that there were witnesses at his palace-gate, who could prove that more than twenty people in the neighbourhood had been murdered in the same manner, the king was exceedingly enraged; and said to some who were in waiting, Go, kill that mad dog, his wives, children, and domestics; let not one soul of that accursed brood remain alive. Which sentence was executed that instant, and all the bodies buried in a ditch at one end of the garden.

The innocent punished.

A sodomite executed.

To put to death so many innocents for the crimes of one guilty person, was certainly both cruel and unjust: but no-body, we presume, will think ill of the example which he made of a certain infamous wretch, who used to kidnap boys, in order to prostitute them. His practice was, to ply all day long at a certain stone which was set in the ground; and, when he saw any lad whom he liked, carried him off with a great deal of dexterity. Having kept the boy all night, next morning, at break of day, he carried him back, and left him in some bye-place, that he might not discover where he had been lodged. Abbâs, being informed of this disorder, and that neither the admonitions nor threats of the people in the neighbourhood were able to put a stop to it, sent some of his officers to seize the villain, and cut him to pieces on the same stone whereat he watched for his prey: which stone is still to be seen at the entrance of the magnificent karawân-seray built by that Shâh at Ispâhân.

Lady buried alive.

SCARCE any punishment could be too great for such a monster: but that which follows may seem too cruel, for a much slighter occasion. The ladies of the Harâm never go abroad but at night: they are usually carried in a sort of long hampers, or cradles, called Kajaveh, which is about two feet wide, and three deep, with an arched canopy over it, covered with cloth. A camel carries two of them, one on each side: the eunuchs help the ladies to get in; and then, drawing the curtains round about, give the camels to the guides, who fasten them by the tail, one to the other, seven in a file, and leads the first by the halter. It happened one dark

^s OLEAR. ubi supra, p. 356. See also TAVERN. Trav. l. v. c. 2. p. 203.
^a Ibid. p. 45.

^t CHARD. tom. iii. p. 39.

(F) Tavernier says, that, having bought six pounds of roast meat at a cook's, and finding it wanted forty-three drams of the weight, he ordered him to be roasted on a spit, in the market, near the oven in which the baker was baked, whose six pounds of bread wanted 57 drams. He was going to put to death the governor of the city, and three or four officers more, for suffering such oppressors of the poor; and indeed that would have been the effectual way to prevent such evils.

a night, while the court was in Mazânderân, that Abbâs, who travelled with his Harâm, took it in his head to go before. In his passage, he met with a string of camels stopped a little out of the road, and a Kajaveh leaning on one side; when, coming up to set it right again, he found the camel-driver in it, with the lady: at which being enraged, as well as surprised, he commanded them both to be buried alive on the spot. Since this time, the ladies of the palace, who were allowed to see the public spectacles without being seen themselves, have been deprived of that privilege ^w.

SHAH Abbâs studied all ways imaginable to establish wealth and good government in his dominions. As he was a prince of good genius, and very enterprising, in consideration that Persia was a barren country, where there was little trade, and consequently little money, he resolved to send his subjects into Europe with raw silks, to see what profit might arise from that commodity. His design was, to buy up all which was produced in his dominions, and dispose of it by his factors: at the same time he thought it necessary to engage the European princes in alliance with him against the Turks. He first sent to Henry IV. of France: but he died before the ambassador arrived. Three or four years after, he sent another to the king of Spain, accompanied with a Persian merchant, putting into their hands a considerable quantity of silk. The merchant would have sold the silk, as was the Shah's order, and bought a present for the king: but the ambassador, over-ruled by a Portuguese Austin frier, who was sent with them to be their guide and interpreter, resolved to present him with the bales of silk. The king of Spain thereupon asked him, If his master took him for a woman, and had sent him so much silk to spin? And Shâh Abbâs, on his return, in reward for the ill success of his negotiation, ordered his belly to be ripped up in the public market-place.

ABOUT fifteen years after, he trusted a considerable quantity of silk with a merchant's son, of Ispâhân, and sent him to Venice. When he came there, he took a stately lodging, and lived at a profuse rate. At length the senate, getting information who he was, thought fit to seize both him and the goods, before all were consumed, and sent notice to the king of Persia; who returned a most obliging answer of thanks, with a merchant to receive what silk was left. Shâh Abbâs, perceiving, by these trials, the little inclination of his subjects to trade, cast his eyes on the Armenians (G), who are sober, frugal, and patient to endure long journeys; who likewise, being Christians, were more fit to deal among Christians. Of these, he chose the most judicious; and intrusted with each a good many bales of silk, for which they were to pay, at their return, a reasonable rate, imposed by the Shâh, who allowed them the surplus-gains for their trouble and expences. These people, in a short time, became so expert in all branches of commerce, that at present they make voyages to Tong-king, Java, the Philippine Isles, and all parts of the east, except China and Japan.^x

THIS prince would not suffer an Indian, or Banyan, to live as a trader in his dominions; and with very good reason: for they are worse usurers than the Jews; their custom being to take up money at nine or ten per cent. for the year, and lend it out again on pledges at two and a half per cent. a month. However, they crept in during the reigns of Sefi I. and Abbâs II.; which was before in the possession of the Armenians of Julfa. This Shâh was not only desirous that all the commerce should be lodged in the hands of his subjects, in order to enrich them, and draw money into the kingdom; but would not suffer it to be transported thence, when it was in. He saw that the annual pilgrimages of his subjects to Mekka carried out abundance of his gold ducats; and therefore endeavoured to divert them from it, by establishing one at home at Tûs, where is the tomb of Imâm Rîdha, or Rîza, the last of the twelve Imâms, who was murdered there; from whence the place has the name of Mashbâd, or the place of martyrdom. This was the more easy to be done, as the Persians had always a great veneration for Rîza; and frequently resorted to Mashbâd, to pay their devotions at his sepulchre; over which hangs one of the legs of Mohammed's camel, esteemed a great relick. Abbâs, to effect his purpose, made the pilgrimage to Tûs himself, accompanied by his nobles; and, at his return, caused reports to be spread of great miracles wrought at the Imâm's tomb: ever since which time, Mekka has been less visited by the Persians than it was formerly.^y

THIS prince, besides building Ferhabâd in Mazânderân, as hath been already mentioned, adorned several of his other cities with magnificent structures. Among other noble works at Ispâhân, he built the royal mosk and palace. He likewise caused the mountains, thirty leagues from thence, to be cut through at an incredible expence, in order to augment the Zenderûdb, which runs through that city, by turning the stream of another river into it.^z

^w CHARD tom. iii. p. 57.

^z CHARDIN, tom. iii. p. 4. 20, 22.

^x TAVERN. Trav. l. iv. c. 6. p. 158.

^y Ibid. l. v. c. 2. p. 202.

(G) Chiefly of Julfa, near Ispâhân, whither he had transplanted them from Julfa in Armenia, on the Arrâs. This was reckoned an act of cruelty in Abbâs; but our author says the charge is unjust, for that they were then only poor labouring men; but that the king enriched them by commerce.

His policy.

WHEN Abbâs ascended the throne, Persia was divided among more than twenty princes, ^a who had usurped their territories, and whom he was obliged to reduce. This Shâh, to prevent the like division of the kingdom for the future, by degrees destroyed all the antient families; and, to render himself thoroughly absolute, and free from all restraint, reformed the troops, who were a check upon former kings, more than the janizaries are at present in Turky. These families, as well as the troops, were all of the race of the Kurchi, who are those Turkmâns, or Tatars, so famous for their great invasions and conquests; and who were linked together, for their mutual preservation, in such a manner, that they might be said to have been masters of the kingdom (H). The method he took to destroy their power, was, to fill his court and army with those people inhabiting Georgia, and other countries on the north-west end of Persia; so that, as their power increased, that of the Kurchi diminished. But he did not put the finishing ^b stroke to his design, by cutting off all the considerable men of that stock, because he stood in need of their assistance in his wars: that work was reserved for his successor Safi, who, during his whole reign, made torrents of blood flow from the chief men both in the government and the army ^a.

His person.

SHAH Abbâs, according to Herbert, who saw him at an audience at Ferhabâd, was of a low stature, but a giant in policy: his aspect quick, his eyes small and flaming. He had a low forehead, and brows without hair; a high and hawked nose, a sharp chin, and, after the mode of Persia, beardless; but his mustachios were exceeding long and thick, turning downwards ^b.

^a CHARDIN, tom. i. p. 210. 217.^b HERB. p. 206.

(H) These were the men, however, to whom his family owed their advancement to the throne of Persia; and who, for their services, were honoured with the red cap, whence they had the name of Kezil-bâsh.

C H A P. V.

The reign of Safi or Sefi I.

Shâh Safi I.

WHILE the death of Abbâs was concealed at Ferabâd, by exposing his body in the ^c court of justice, Zeynel Khân made haste to Ispâhân; and, taking with him Khofrew Mirza Daruga, of that city, went to the apartment of the princess, mother of Sâin Mirza (A), called Taberik Kala; and, after notifying to her the death of the Shâh, intreated her to put the young prince (B) into her hands. The mother, who had still the death of her husband before her eyes, believing it was only contrivance, and that they had an order from his grandfather to murder her son, locked herself up in her chamber; and made all the passages so secure, that the two lords, being afraid to lose the opportunity of executing the king's will, after they had lain three days at the door, sent the princess word, that, unless she gave them access, they should be forced to break it open. Upon this message, she yielded; and delivered to them the prince, with these words, Go, child, to the same place where thy father is; here are ^d the murderers ready to dispatch thee. But, when she saw those lords prostrate themselves, and kissing the prince's feet (C), her fright was changed into raptures of joy ^a.

His inauguration;

FROM hence the lords conducted the young prince to the royal palace, where they seated him in the Divân Khâneh, on a stone table, on which were as many carpets as there had been kings of Persia of his family: for every king, at his coming to the crown, has one of these carpets (called Kalitse Adalet, or carpets of justice) made for him; and having sent for all the lords who were about Ispâhân, they crowned him, kissed his feet, and wished him a long and happy reign. Immediately after his inauguration, he took his father's name of Safi, according to the desire of Shâh Abbâs; and bestowed on Khofrew Mirza the dignity of Khân, with the name of Rustam, which is that of one of the Persian heroes celebrated in their histories and ^e romances.

bloody disposition.

It is reported that Shâh Sefi (D) came into the world with his hands bloody; and that his grandfather Abbâs should say on the occasion, that this prince would often bathe his hands in

^a OLEAR. Trav. l. vi. p. 356. TAVERN. l. v. c. 1. p. 197.

(A) Rather Shahin Mirza, according to D'Herbelot. in his Biblioth. orient, art. Safi. Shahin signifies Royal.

(B) Then about sixteen years of age.

(C) At the same time they took off his clothes, and tore them, which is a mark of mourning in Persia; and, according to custom, put on him another plain garment, which he wore till midnight; when, putting on his royal robes, they set him on the throne, and did him homage. Tavernier.

(D) He should have been named Saffah, which signifies bloody in Arabic, instead of Safi, or Sefi, the chosen.

blood

a blood. Accordingly, says Olearius, till the time of our embassy, his reign had been so sanguine, that Persia had not for many ages before seen so many executions: for, immediately on his coming to the crown, he followed the council of the chancellor, and made away with Rustam Khân, whom he had made generalissimo of the armies of Persia, and governor of Teflis, with several other lords. He likewise slew with his own hands, or ordered to be killed, all his relations, and other persons whom he had any suspicion of. By this means, he so accustomed himself to killing people, that he made it his practice, on the slightest occasions, to take away their lives. He began his cruelties with an only brother, tho' by a different mother, whose eyes he caused to be put out. Khodabânde and Imâm Kûli Mîrza, his uncles (younger brothers to Sefî Mirza), whom their father Shâh Abbâs had deprived of sight, and imprisoned in the castle of Almût, as before related, were, by Sefî's order, cast headlong from a high rock; for this reason, he said, that, having lost the benefit of seeing, they were of no use in the world. The next instance of his barbarity was in the person of his uncle Isa Khân, and his three sons, on the following occasion:

ISA KHAN was so much in favour with Shâh Abbâs, that, to demonstrate his esteem for him, he bestowed on him his daughter, by whom he had the three sons in question. This princess was very handsome; and so agreeable in her conversation, that her nephew, Shâh Sefî, was extremely taken with her company. Being one day with the king, she took the freedom to tell him, "she wondered that he, who was so young and vigorous, and had so many great beauties to command, could get no children; whereas she had three already by her husband." Sefî made answer, "that, having many years to reign, he hoped, as he was but young, he should have time enough to get heirs to inherit the crown after him." His aunt, desirous to carry on the jest, replied, "that ground, not well cultivated, rarely brought forth any thing;" imprudently adding, "You speak very well, my liege; but I fear me, that, after your death, the Persians will be glad to pitch upon one of my sons to succeed you." The Shâh was extremely nettled with the boldness and poignancy of the repartee; yet made a shift to dissemble it, and got from the room without the princess perceiving that he was incensed against her.

BUT next day opened a dreadful scene to her view; for Sefî commanded her three sons to be brought to him, the eldest twenty-two years of age, the second fifteen, and the third nine; and, having conveyed them into a garden, ordered their heads to be cut off. Not content with this butchery, at dinner-time he disposed the heads into one of the covered pots in which victuals are served up; and, sending for the mother, ordered them to be taken out one after another by the nose, and said to her, See the children of a woman who bragged so much of her fertility! Go, thou art young enough to bear more of them. The princess was so astonished at this horrid spectacle, that, for a while, she was not able to speak: at last, fearing his indignation, which was still in his eyes, might fall also on herself, she fell at his feet, kissed them, and said, All is well, all is well; God grant the king a long and happy life! This forced submission saved her own: but, as soon as she had left the room, Sefî sent for her husband Isa Khân; and, pointing to the heads of his children, asked him, What he thought of that pleasant spectacle? The Khân, who knew whom he had to deal with, smothering the tenderness of paternal affection, made answer, That he was so far from being displeased at what was done, that, if his majesty had commanded him to bring the heads of his sons, he would have been the executioner himself; and that he would have no children at all, in case it was the king's pleasure that it should be so. This abject flattery saved the brutish father's life at that time: but Sefî, reflecting that, after such treatment, Isa Khân could neither love nor be faithful to him, gave order for his head likewise to be taken off.

'Tis the greatest crime to be faithful to tyrants; for they hate their benefactors most. Zeynel Khân, who had contributed no less than Isa Khân to this monster's advancement, in the year 1632 performed an act of fidelity, for which perfidy to the public he deserved the death he suffered. The Shâh, having forced the Turks to raise the siege which they had laid to Bâghdâd in that year, encamped with his army near Hamadân (E). At this place, several lords, who were met together, reflecting on the executions with which the king had commenced his reign, said among themselves, "that since, in his tender age, he could commit so many cruelties, it was to be feared that he would in time extirpate all the grandees of Persia." Zeynel Khân, who was present at this discourse, went immediately to the Shâh, and gave him an account of what had passed in that plot; advising him to rid himself of those who had most credit among them, and so secure his own life.

SEFI, having received an information to which probably he owed his life, made this answer to the bringer of it: "Thy advice, Zeynel Khân, is so good, that I will immediately follow

^b OLEARIUS, ubi supra, p. 357.

(E) The ancient Ametha and Ecbatana, one of the capital cities of Persian Irâk.

“ it, and begin with thee ; for thou art the person of the greatest age, and most authority, a “ among them ; consequently must needs be of the conspiracy : in that also I shall follow the “ example of the king my grandfather, whose reign was neither safe nor happy till he had “ executed the person who had the same post of Kurchi-bâshi, which thou now enjoyest.” Zeynel Khân, who, on hearing this ungrateful speech, it may be presumed, deeply repented of his officious zeal ; replied, “ that his majesty might reward him, for this proof of his fidelity, “ just as he thought fit : that, for his part, being arrived at the greatest age man could attain “ to, it would not trouble him much to have his life shortened by a few days ; but that possibly “ his majesty might one day be troubled, for having put to death one of his most faithful servants, “ when he came to reflect on the importance of the discovery, and the zeal he had shewn for “ his safety.” b

Slain for it.

THIS answer respited his execution, which had been resolved on by the king, who immediately went to his mother's tent (for, according to antient custom, she, and the other ladies of the Harâm, followed him in his expedition), to acquaint her with what had been told him. Next morning that princess sent for Zeynel Khân to her tent-door, to hear from him all the circumstances of the conspiracy : but, as soon as Sefi came to understand that the Khân had spoken to his mother, he was so incensed, that he went and killed him with his own hand in her presence. Zeynel Khân was certainly one of the most eminent men in all Persia, who owed his fortune to his good conduct, and the fidelity with which he had served Shâh Abbâs in several affairs of great importance ; one of which it may not be amiss to mention c.

An instance of

ABBAS, being to send a solemn embassy to Labôr, to adjust the differences between him and the Great Mogul, about the frontiers of Kandabâr, employed Zeynel Khân, as the person he reposed most confidence in : at his departure, recommending to him the most tender concern for his interest ; and that he should take care to do nothing which might be prejudicial either to his reputation or service. Zeynel promised to observe his commands ; and was as good as his word : for, at his audience, he refused to do Shâh Jehân reverence, by putting both hands first to the ground, and then upon his head ; but entered the hall with a grave pace, and only saluted the king with his Sala Mâlek. The Mogul was so concerned at this behaviour, that he sent to intreat him to alter it, and pay him the same respects which former ambassadors from his court had done ; backing his request with the offer of considerable presents : but finding Zeynel Khân inflexible, he ordered a door to be made in the hall of audience, d opposite to the throne, so low, that the ambassador could not enter without stooping, and thus be obliged to do him reverence. However, Zeynel Khân eluded this artifice, by going in backwards, so that his posteriors made the first appearance : which piece of disrespect so provoked Shâh Jehân, that he not only forbore making him the usual presents, which are of great value, but also forbade that he should be supplied with provisions at his expence. By this means Zeynel Khân was reduced to such extremities, that he was forced to sell his plate, and even what gold and silver there was on the furniture of his horses, in order to buy necessaries for subsistence. The Great Mogul sent likewise to complain of Zeynel Khân's behaviour, to Shâh Abbâs ; who indeed pretended to disapprove of his ambassador's conduct, but, not long after, shewed his satisfaction, by honouring him with the title of Khân, and bestowing on him the government of Hamadân, Terkisin, Kulpajân, and other cities. e

The queen's concerns.

To return to his barbarous murder : the queen-mother, struck with horror at the action of her son, represented to him how much he was to blame for treating in such a manner one of his grandfather's most antient servants, and who had been a chief instrument in setting him on the throne. Sefi, for the present, seemed to be troubled for what he had done : but, if he had in reality any compunction at all, her lecture made no very lasting impression ; since, not many days after, the chancellor, the lord high steward, and even his own mother, according to circumstances, found no better treatment from him.

Execution of

ONE day, during the aforesaid expedition, when Sefi was encamped at the mountain Sehend, within a league of Tauris, the lord high steward, named Ugûrlu Khân, being to command the guard about the king, at which the chiefs are obliged to be personally present whenever the Shâh is in the field, he happened to go and sup with Tabûb Khân, the high chancellor ; who had also invited the Dawâtter, that is, the Secretary of the Closet, named Hassan Beg, and a certain poet. Towards the end of supper, the Kishiji Bâshi, or captain of the guard, whose name was Mortûza Kûli Khân, came to give Ugûrlu Khân notice, that it was time to come to the king's tent : but the chancellor, unwilling to dismiss his guests, told the Kishiji Bâshi, that There was no necessity for Ugûrlu Khân's personal appearance ; and that the king, being but a child, would take no notice of his absence. The captain insisted that the guard could not be set without the high steward, and repeated his instances for him to come away : saying, otherwise he should be obliged to complain to the Shâh. The chancellor, offended with this sort of f a language, commanded his domestics to thrust Mortûza Kûli Khân out of doors; which they did, but so roughly, that he was hurt in the face ^d.

MORTUZA, incensed at this treatment, went, all bloody as he was, to the king, and gave ^{the great} him an account of what had passed at the chancellor's. Sefî ordered him to say nothing of it: ^{chance} but next day, being at dinner with the king, sitting in his usual place, the Shâh ordered him to approach; and said to him, What does he deserve, who, eating the king's bread, and living by the pure favour of his master, is so far from paying the respect due to him, that he slights him? The chancellor answered, He deserves death. The king replied, Thou hast pronounced thy own sentence: thou art the person, who, living solely by my favour, and eating at my table, hast had the insolence to treat me as a child, in the discourse which passed yesterday betwixt thee and Mortûza Kûli Khân. Tabûb Khân would have spoken in his own defence: but Sefî, not giving him time to say a word, ran him into the belly with his scimitar. The chancellor, as he fell, only cried out, Ha Padishâh Aymayn. At the same time the king commanded his Rika (F) to cut his head into little bits. Sefî, perceiving one of the pages, who, struck with horror, turned aside, not able to behold such an act of cruelty, said to him, Since thy fight is so tender, it will be of no use to thee (G); and commanded his eyes to be put out immediately.

THE execution of Tabûb Khân was soon followed by that of Ugûrlu Khân; whose head the ^{lord high} Shâh ordered Ali Kûli Khân, the Diwân Beg, or President of the council, to bring to him. ^{steward} Ugûrlu Khân had just stepped out of the bath, and was going to put on his clothes; when, seeing Ali Kûli come in, attended by two servants, he was startled, tho' the other's intimate; and said, Woe is me! dear friend, I fear thou bringest me no good news. Ali Kûli Khân made answer, Thy fears are but too true, dear brother: for the king hath commanded me to fetch him thy head; the only way is, to submit. Hereupon, without further ceremony, he closed with him, cut off his head, made a hole in one of the cheeks, thrust his finger thro' it, and so carried it to Safî: who, looking on it, touched it with a little wand, and said, It must be confessed, thou wert a stout man: it troubles me to see thee in that condition; but it was thine own fault: 'tis pity, if it was only for that goodly beard of thine. This he said by reason his mustachios were so long, that, going about his head, they met again at his mouth; which is reckoned a great ornament in Persia: his post was conferred on Mortûza Kûli Khân. Hassan Beg, who had also been at the ^{and others} chancellor's entertainment, received the like treatment: but the unhappy poet fared worst of all; for, being some time after falsely accused of putting these executions in verse, and singing them in the Meydan, he was carried to that place, where they cut off his nose, ears, tongue, feet, and hands, whereof he died some few days after.

Not long after, Safî sent for the sons of those lords, and said to them, You see, I have de- ^{Effects of} stroyed your fathers; what say you to it? The son of Ugûrlu Khân answered, without hesita- ^{slavery.} tion, What does a father signify to me? I have no other parent but the Shâh. This unnatural reply restored him to the estate of the deceased (H), which otherwise would have been confiscated: but the chancellor's son was reduced to great misery, and had not any thing allowed him of all his father had possessed; because he expressed more concern for his death, than satisfaction at what the king had done.

WHEN Safî was returned to Kasvîn, he summoned all the lords and governors of provinces ^{Ali Merdân} to court. They all obeyed this order, excepting Ali Merdan Khân, governor of Kandahâr (I), ^{Khân} and Dawd Khân, governor of Kenjeb (K); who thought it enough to assure the Shâh of their ^{revolts.} fidelity, by sending up one of their wives and children as hostages: but Safî did not look on that submission as sufficient. Hereupon Ali Merdan Khân revolted, and delivered up the fortress to the Great Mogul. Dawd Khân understanding, by the Akhta, or groom of the king's chamber, who had been sent to him, that it was dangerous for him to repair to court, resolved to retire into the Turkish dominions. The better to effect this design, he thought proper to

^d OLEARIUS, p. 359.

^e Id. ibid. p. 359.

(F) They are part of the Shâh's guards, who carry pole-axes, and often do the office of executioners; for, properly speaking, they have no executioners in Persia, at least at court, where any lord, or other person about the king at the time, is sent on the office.

(G) Tavernier says, the words were, What! art thou afraid to punish the wicked? on seeing the domestic turn his head when the executioner began to prick the eyes of the lord with the point of a pen-knife, Trav. l. v. c. 4. p. 207. Abbâs I. observing the Portuguese ambassadors turning away their eyes from a malefactor, whose belly he had ordered to be ripped open in his presence, said (by way of apology), that certainly those executions would be too horrible to be practised among Christians, who were rational people; but that they were absolutely necessary among the Persians, who were beasts. Thevenot. Trav. part. 2. chap. 11. p. 107.

(H) Thevenot, in his travels, part ii. chap. 11. p. 98. mentions an instance of a son, who, at the command of this cruel prince, cut off the ears, nose, and then the head, of the aged lord his father; for which parricide the king gave him his estate. Perhaps, this is the same fact, told from a different report.

(I) Safî was jealous of him on account of his vast riches, which came to him by inheritance, as being descended from the ancient kings of Kandahâr, who were originally Tartars. His plate was all gold, and his palace as magnificently furnished as the king's. Tavernier. Trav. l. v. c. 1. p. 198.

(K) Ganjeb, or Ganja, a city of Arrân.

try: how his servants stood affected; and, finding that fifteen of them were unwilling to follow him, he caused them to be cut in pieces in his presence. Then wrote a very reproachful letter to Safi; and went away with all his wealth to Taymíraz Khán, a prince of Georgia, his brother-in-law: from whence he removed into Turky, where he was received with great friendship by Soltán Ibráhím. The king, to be revenged of both, sent their wives to the public stews; and exposed the son of Dawd Khán to the brutality of the grooms about court: reserving Ali Merdan's son, who was very beautiful, for his own use.

Imám Kúli
Khán,

SOME time after this, Safi sent orders to Imám (L) Kúli Khán, governor of Shíráz, and brother to Dawd Khán, to come to court. The Khán had notice sent him of the king's intention to put him to death: but he made answer, "that he could not be persuaded he should be so ill requited, after having done such considerable services for the crown (M): yet that, whatever might happen, he would rather lose his life, than be out of favour with his prince, and become a criminal by his disobedience." Pursuant to this imprudent resolution, he repaired to Kasvín, where the court then was: but was no sooner arrived, than his head was ordered to be taken off. This bloody tyrant did not intend to take away the lives of Imám Kúli Khán's children: but, while his eldest son, about eighteen years of age, was prostrate at the king's feet, which submission his friends had advised him to, a wicked flatterer told Safi, that the youth was not the son of the Khán, but of Sháh Abbás, who after getting one of his women with child, had bestowed her on the father.

and sons, slain.

THIS suggestion occasioned the death not only of the young lord, but also of fourteen of his brothers; who, being conducted to the Meydán, were all beheaded near the father's body. The mother made a shift to get away, with the sixteenth, into Arabia, to the prince her father, who resided at Helbisa, three days journey from Basrah, or Balsara. The bodies of Imám Kúli Khán, and his children, remained three days exposed in the Meydán to public view; till Safi, fearing that the lamentation, which the Khán's mother made there day and night, would occasion an insurrection, commanded them to be taken away^f.

The Khán's fidelity.

THIS affair is related somewhat more particularly by a subsequent traveller; who informs us, that Sháh Abbás gave one of his own wives, whom he loved extremely, to Imám Kúli Khán; and that, when she left the Harám, it was thought she was three months gone with child: for, six months after she was bedded by the Khán, she lay-in of a son, of whom the king was the reputed father; and who, being born before Sháh Safi, pretended a right before him to the throne. By virtue of this claim, contrary to the will of Sháh Abbás in favour of Safi, this ambitious lord, who only passed for the Khán's eldest son, but was of a daring resolution, earnestly solicited his father to seize on the Sháh, and make himself king, at least to open him a way for him to the throne; particularly one day, being a hunting with the young king, near Shíráz, he rode up to his father, and said, See now the opportunity, Sir, that offers you the throne: for I will go instantly, and bring you Sháh Safi's head. But the Khán, holding him by the arm, declared he would suffer any thing, rather than consent to such a crime: that Safi was appointed by Abbás to succeed him, as being his son Safi's child, and consequently his lawful heir: that he had sworn to support the right of Safi, who had been recommended to his care; and that he would die, sooner than commit a breach of trust.

His popularity.

THIS generous resolution of the Khán broke the young lord's design upon the king's person. However, the queen-mother, being not ignorant of the train which was laid for him, thought it the wisest way to prevent the blow, by getting rid of such as had conspired his death. Two other of the Khán's sons took part with him they called their brother: and altho' the Khán himself was loyal, yet his power, wealth, and reputation among the soldiery, as well as the affection borne him by the people, concurred to render him an object of jealousy. The queen-mother, therefore, in concert with Mírza Takeb, the prime minister, representing to the king, that he was not safe so long as Imám Kúli Khán, and his three eldest sons, lived, he readily consented to their destruction. And as at this time Morád IV. Soltán of the Turks, had taken ^f OLEARIUS, p. 360, & seqq.

(L) His name is commonly written Imám Culi Khán. Our Frier is the only traveller who has best expressed it, according to the true pronunciation; he writes Imaum Cooli Caun. Herbert, Emangoly Charwn.

(M) He conquered the greater part of the kingdom of Lár, and the kingdom of Ormús, in the reign of Abbás I. with all the coast of the Persian gulf, from cape Jafkes to Balsara (or Basrah). Tavern. Trav. l. v. c. 3. p. 204.

(N) News coming to Safi, that the Soltán had burnt Tauris, and was marching farther into the country with 100,000 men; Let him come, said he, without any oppo- sition; I know how to make the Turks pay for their invasion, without any great trouble. They were not above fifteen days march from Ispáhan, when he turned the course of all the streams both before and behind, which are only cut from certain springs, and brought by canals into the inland parts of Persia, where there are no rivers; by which means the whole army perished for want of water. Tavern. Trav. p. 20.—Morád IV. was at Tauris in 1635; but the Turkish historians do not mention this loss of his army. See his reign among the Othmán Soltáns.

^a Erivan, and ruined Tauris (N), that invasion afforded a good pretence for summoning all the Khâns and governors to attend the Shâh with troops under their command.

IMÂM KULI KHAN obeyed the order among the rest; but, as he was on his march to Kashân His resolution, with his three sons, the eldest, suspecting the worst, said to him, Sir, we are making haste to the king, that our heads may the sooner fall at his feet. To this the Khân replied, Perhaps, my son, thou mayest speak the truth: but, as to this day I have punctually obeyed the king's commands, so, whatever may happen, I will persevere to do my duty till death. The Khân was received by Shâh Sâfi with great appearance of favour; and, three days after, was, with the other lords then assembled at Kashân, invited to a great feast. His three sons went to the banquet: but, the Khân desiring to be excused on account of his great age, the king sent word, that the Khân of Shîrâz was at liberty to do as he thought fit. The third day of the feast, Sâfi rose from his seat; and going out of the hall, half an hour after, three executioners, attended by others, entered with their simeters drawn, seized on the Khân's three sons, and cut off their heads.

THE three heads, being put in a gold basin, were presented to the king; who ordered the executioners to carry them to their father, and, as soon as he had seen them, to take off his head also. The Khân, who was at prayers when they came, only desired time to say them out; and then, without changing countenance, or uttering more words than Let the king's will be done, he submitted to a death which he might easily have avoided. The four heads were brought back to the king, to be sent into the Harâm to his mother: and a courier was dispatched to the Khân's lieutenant, to put to death all the rest of his children, only two excepted, who were at nurse, and never could be discovered^e. The Persians for a long time bewailed the death of Imâm Kûli Khân, on account of his liberality. He was the son of Allawerdi Khân, who, at his own charge, built the bridge of Ispâhân; and was as much esteemed as any lord of his time, for the noble actions he had performed in the wars^h.

THIS Khân was prodigiously rich (O); and so very magnificent, that his expences almost equalled those of the king: which occasioned Shâh Abbâs I. who talked with him one day on that subject, to tell him, that he desired him to spend one penny less than he every day, that there might be some difference between the expences of a Shâh and a Khân. Imâm Kûli Khân's noble qualities had gained him the affections of all people: for he was liberal as well as magnificent, highly recommended brave soldiers and learned men: loved strangers, and took a peculiar care to encourage arts and sciences. For this end, he built a fair college at Shîrâz, for the instruction of youth; and several inns, as well in the city as on the road, for the benefit of travellers. He caused mountains to be cut through, in order to shorten the way; and joined others by bridges, of so bold a structure, that it is difficult to conjecture how such prodigious arches could be turned over such vast precipices and torrentsⁱ.

THIS tyrant's cruelty favoured the ladies no more than the men: for, about the same time, he killed one with his own hand (P), and committed several other murders. When he intended any execution, he usually dressed in scarlet, or some red stuff; so that all trembled when he put on any thing of that colour. As these unheard-of cruelties frightened every body, some persons undertook to shorten his days by poison: but, the dose which they gave him not proving strong enough, he overcame it, after a sickness of two months. When he recovered, he ordered a strict inquiry to be made; and it was discovered, by a servant who had been ill treated by her mistress, that the poison had been prepared in the apartment of the women; and given him by the direction of his aunt, Isa Khân's widow. He revenged himself sufficiently the night following: for the palace was filled with dreadful shrieks; and it was found the next day, that he had ordered a great pit to be made in the garden, wherein he had buried forty women alive; some of them ladies of the seray, and others their attendants. Much about the same time a rumour was spread, that his mother died of the plague; but it is more likely, says our author, that she bore the ladies company who had been buried alive^k.

^f TAVERNIER seems to excuse the cruel executions of Shâh Sâfi, by laying the blame or cause of them on the queen-mother, and the Etemâd Addawlet (Q), or prime minister, named Mirza Tâkeh, who paid her four hundred gold ducats every day, to dispose of as she thought fit. These two governed the kingdom between them; and held a private council in her

^g TAVERN. l. v. c. 3. p. 204, & seq.
^h OLEARIUS, l. vi. p. 361, & seqq.

ⁱ OLEARIUS, l. vi. p. 361.

^k TAVERN. ubi supra.

(N) See the preceding page.

(O) It must be observed, that the revenue of Shîrâz, Lâr, Ormûs, and the coasts of the Persian gulf, was solely at his disposal, and none of it returned into the king's coffers; instead of that, the Shâh was obliged to send him money to pay the army. This was one thing which incensed the queen-mother and first minister against him. Tavern. Trav. l. v. c. 3. p. 204.

MOD. HIST. VOL. II.

(P) Perhaps this was his Georgian queen, as related lower down.

(Q) That is, the trust and support of the state. The contraction is Memâd Dawlet: this word is corruptly written in our travellers, Athemadaulat. He is the first minister, or Wazîr Ajem, in Persia, who has in his hands the direction of all affairs.

Slaying the lords.

Harâm, where he had free admission, as being close cut (R) : and here they overthrew in the night whatever the lords concluded in the day, by changing at pleasure the king's mind, over which they had the ascendant. It was thought that Shâh Abbâs had left a private order with these two, to rid themselves of Imâm Kûli Khân, and seven other great lords, at the head of whom was Jâni Khân, as soon as Safi should be settled in the throne ; and fill all places with governors in whom the king might confide. Accordingly the king, by their advice, began at Kasbîn with Imâm Kûli Khân. After this, the other lords, getting some information of the design against them ; and judging, on the king's return to Ispâhân, that the time for their execution drew near, resolved to prevent the Etemâd Addawlet (S). With this view, they met one morning before the palace-gate ; and, having killed the porter, entered that minister's bed-chamber, and stabbed him before he could rise. As soon as they had effected the business, they went to the king ; and Jâni Khân told him what they had done. Safi, dissembling his anger at so bold an attempt, answered, That they had done very well, and had only prevented the order which he intended to have given himself. But a few days after, while those lords were sitting in council, an eunuch entered, which was the signal for the king to withdraw ; and, as soon as he was gone, the chamber was filled with eunuchs, who fell upon and slew them. Their bodies were exposed in the Meydân ; where the people, kicking the heads, said, These are the heads of those dogs who have opposed the will of the king : for, generally speaking, in Persia, whatever the king does is thought to be right¹.

His severity.

BUT, for all this traveller makes these executions rather the act of others than of Safi, yet he owns that he was very severe, and his punishments often amounted to acts of cruelty. One day, when hunting, a poor peasant appeared from behind a rock, with a paper in his hand, having been deputed by the village to make some complaint to him : but, while the poor man cried for justice, Safi, without making any answer, shot two arrows into his body, and killed him. That which moved him to this act of cruelty, was, the rigorous custom which takes place with regard to his women, some of whom were along with him ; for, on such occasions, there is no mercy shewn to those who happen to be in the way when they pass by. There is a custom no less tyrannical, and of pernicious consequence to the subject, touching the person of the king ; which is, that if any man points at him as he passes along the street, or upon the road, he must lose his hand. One day that Shâh Safi was in the country, two merchants of Constantinople meeting him with his train upon the road, they stopped to see him : when one of them innocently lifting up his hand, to shew him to the other, who had never seen him, by pointing to the heron feathers by which his cap was distinguished from those of the lords who followed him, two horsemen immediately rode up to him, and cut off his hand with a scimeter.

Rigorous
customs.

Two smokers executed.

THE Persians, both men and women, are so addicted to take tobacco, that, should it be prohibited for any long time, the revenue would suffer considerably. However, Safi once, in a humour, having forbidden the use of it through his dominions, two rich Banyan merchants were found smoking in the Indian inn at Ispâhân ; and, being carried forthwith bound before the Shâh, he ordered melted lead to be poured down their throats in the public Meydân. The people imagined that the king pronounced the sentence only to terrify them ; and that he would have reprieved them at the place of execution. Mean time four other merchants went to the Etemâd Addawlet, and offered 2000 Tomâns to save the lives of their friends ; but, on the chief minister's signifying the same to Safi, he fell into a passion ; and, asking whether those Indian dogs thought that a king of Persia would sell justice? sent a second order for executing the unhappy smokers without delay^m.

A Swiss in favour.

To the foregoing passages we may add the execution of Ralf Sadler, a protestant ; which, if not to be reckoned as an instance of his cruelty, may well pass for one of his inconstant temper, and want of resolution. This person was a watch-maker of Zurich, about thirty-eight years of age ; who, putting himself into the service of the emperor's resident at Constantinople, was carried by our author Tavernier to Ispâhân. There he made a small repeating watch, about the bigness of half a crown ; which being a neat piece of work, the English bought it, at the rate of 200 crowns, to give to Imâm Kûli Khân. The Khân made a present of it to the king ; who was so pleased with it, that he carried it hanging about his neck, under his cloths, in a gold chain. One day, happening to break the fusil, by turning the key the wrong way, he sent for Sadler to Kasbîn ; who presently set it in order again. Hereupon the king ordered him a pension of thirty Tomâns, with diet for him and a man, and provision for ^m Ibid. l. v. c. 3, 4. p. 206, & seq.

¹ TAVERN. l. v. c. 1. p. 194.

(R) When governor of Ghilân, in the reign of Shâh Abbâs, missing a page whom he had abused, and suspecting he was gone to complain to the king, in order to divert the storm, he deprived himself of the instruments of his crime ; and, taking a bye-road, went in a litter, with his surgeon, to court, where he presented the marks of his repentance in a plate of gold to the king : who thereupon sent him back to his government ; and recalled the page, whom he had sent to take his employment, and send him the offender's head.

(S) Both the occasion and manner of this minister's death are very differently, and at large, related by Charadin, who calls him Sarâzi. Voy. en Perse, tome iii. p. 10, & seq.

a two horses ; for which he was obliged every morning to wait on the king at his rising, in order to wind up his watch.

THIS brought him into so great favour with Safi, that the Holstein ambassadors endeavoured to gain his friendship, and often invited him to entertainments. One night, going from them to his lodging, he found a young Persian with a Nestorian girl, whom he kept. The young man being brother to one of the king's porters, Sadler complained to him of the injury, and desired him to warn his brother to come no more : but a few nights after, Ralf, finding him again with his mistress, by the help of his slaves, bound him to a tree in the court, and went to bed. As soon as their master was withdrawn, one of the slaves began to make game with the prisoner ; who, having his feet at liberty, killed him with a kick in the belly. Sadler, awakened by the cries of the rest, got up ; and, taking a pistol in his hand, went and shot the Persian through the head (T). Next morning, the king asking him what news, he told him plainly what he had done, and the reason why. The king, on his report, told him that he had done well, according to the custom of the country. But the prime minister, who hated Sadler on account of an old grudge (U), pretending to the king, that Sadler had represented the matter very differently from what it was, Safi sent for him ; and told him, that he must either turn Mohammedan, or die. On Sadler's refusing to renounce his faith, the king ordered him to prison. However, as he had a great affection for him, he sent for him twice or thrice ; and made him very large offers, if he would change his religion. But the Swiss rejected them all ; nay, refused to conform but for a while, and in appearance : so that he was delivered up to the brother of the deceased Persian ; who put him to death in the Meydân, with a poniard, in October 1637ⁿ. Kills a Persian. Constaney, and death. A. D. 1637.

It is commonly observed that cruel men are cowards : but Shâh Safi expressed courage enough when occasion required it ; and it is certain that the beginning of his reign was remarkable for the great victories which he gained over his enemies. He defeated Karib Shâb, in the province of Kilân : he forced the Turks to raise the siege of Bâghdâd ; and took by assault the fortrefs of Ervân (Rivân, or Irivân). Although, to speak impartially, says Olearius, the glory of these successes was owing to the valour and conduct of his generals, and to fortune, rather than his prudence : for he discovered not much in any of his actions, which were for the most part rash, and not of a piece ; of which his behaviour at Ervân is a proof. Safi, finding the siege but little advanced in four months, grew so impatient, that he would needs assault the place in person ; saying, he would rather die in the attempt, than rise from before a town which the Turks had formerly taken in three days. He had already put on the clothes of one of his footmen, to prevent being distinguished, and had given orders for a general storm. His mother, set on by the lords, who durst not contradict him, urged the impossibility of taking a place before a breach was made ; and that he was only going to destroy himself, and the whole army : but all the answer she got, was a sound box on the ear. In short, he was fully bent to pursue his resolution, and had taken a pole-axe in his hand, in order to lead them on ; when the principal lords, finding a necessity to interpose, fell at his feet, and intreated him to grant them but one day more to try their efforts. This request they obtained ; and then ordering the whole army, even to the boys, to make an assault, carried the place by storm (X) : but they lost in the action 50,000 men. Safi's wisdom. Conduct at Erivân.

THE good success which, till then, attended his designs, soon failed him, after he had put so many great persons to death ; of which the taking of Bâghdâd (Y) by the Turks, after twenty-six years loss, is a remarkable instance. The only good action which he did during his reign, was that of sending back, to their respective countries, those poor people whom Shâh Abbâs removed from Ervân, Nekhsivân, Khalej, and Georgia, to Ferhabâd in Mazân-derân ; where they were employed in great buildings, and lived in miserable slavery : yet but a few of them reaped the advantages of that good order ; for, out of 7000, only 300 got home, the rest having perished by hunger and want. Did one good action.

SAFI took great pleasure in drinking wine ; and was very kind to those who bore him company. But his chief recreations were women and hunting ; not much troubling himself about the affairs of government, or the administration of justice to his subjects. He had three wives. One was the daughter of a colonel, whose first employment was to drive the mules His wives.

ⁿ TAVERN. p. 207. & OLEAR. l. v. p. 280.

(T) Olearius, who, in several particulars, tells the story differently, says, he was a house-breaker, who came to rob him : that Sadler, after beating and turning him out of the house, repenting he had let him go, followed him, and shot him with a pistol.

(U) The minister Mirza Takeb having, by way of gratifying Sadler for above thirty watches which he had mended for him, sent him fifteen or twenty camels load of straw and barley for his horses, as knowing he kept seven or eight, besides four or five servants ; Ralf, slighting such a present, said to the servant, Tell thy master that I am neither horse nor ass, and therefore let him eat his present himself.

(X) It was recovered, not long after, by Morâd IV. Soltân of the Turks, in 1634. See his reign hereafter. But Safi took Pânalso, in the year 1636.

(Y) This was by Soltân Morâd IV. in the year 1638.

which

which brought water to the king's kitchen; and came to be known to Shâh Abbâs, by helping him to some fair water, one sultry day, while he was hunting, when none else could meet with any. This service was requited by the king bestowing on him the village where he was born; and made him known at court, where he found means to get an office: which is no difficult matter in Persia, for such as have money. Some time after, he procured a post in the army, where he proved so fortunate as to obtain the command of a regiment of 1000 men. Abbâs thought his daughter so handsome, that he made a present of her to the widow of Safi Mirza, appointing her to be brought up, in order for a marriage with his son Sain; who, at his coming to the crown, accordingly married her.

His second wife was a Georgian, the daughter of Taymûraz Khân; often mentioned in the reign of Abbâs, whose peace with that prince was confirmed by means of this marriage^b.

Kills his queen. ONE day, returning from the Kalenter of Julfa's house, where he had drunk to excess, he gave order that this queen (Z) should come to him. As she understood that he was in liquor, she made no great haste; so that he fell asleep. But, awaking soon after, and not seeing her, he called for her a second time; on notice of which, she immediately went to him. When she entered the chamber, she found the king fallen asleep again; and, in expectation of his awaking, hid herself in a nich behind the hangings, where generally the mattresses and coverlets are laid by. Safi presently after coming out of his slumber, and not yet perceiving the queen, in a great haste demanded the reason of her stay. The queen-mother, who was a Georgian slave, and hated the young queen, because she was a king's daughter, took the occasion to put her out of favour; and, having first spoken ill of her, gave the Shâh to understand, by a sign, that she was hidden in such a place. On this, Safi, rising in a fury, stabbed her four or five times in the belly, with a dagger; and, scarce knowing what he had done, went to bed again. Next day, forgetful of the fact, he called for the queen: but when they told him what had happened the night before, he became extremely afflicted, and sent an express mandate through his dominions, that no man should drink wine; with an order, that the governors should stave all the casks, and spill the liquor, where-ever they found them^c.

An odd letter. THE third queen was a Chirkassian lady, daughter of Bika, and sister to prince Mussal. The mother brought her as far as the river Bustrow (A), in 1637; and wrote to Shâh Safi, "That she sent him her daughter, not as a concubine, or slave, but as his lawful wife: that it was her hope he would look on her as such: and that she should find from him an affection equal to that which she herself had expressed towards the princess his mother; who, though she was then her slave, and had undressed her, even to her stockens, had been treated by her like her own child: that, as to her daughter, who was now on the way to him, she had rather see her drowned in the river Bustrow, with all the misfortunes which might happen to her, than that she should be ill used by him."

His other women. BESIDES these wives, he had 300 women in his Saray; for the handsomest virgins all over Persia were brought thither. The greatest lords themselves presented him with the maidens whom either they or their relations had brought up. While our author was in Persia, the Kalenter of Shamakhiya, capital of Skirwân, having had some ill offices done him at court, recovered the king's favour; by presenting him with his own niece, one of the greatest beauties in the country, and a sum of money sent to the chancellor. The Armenians, to prevent the searches which are often made among them for maids of twelve years old, dispose of them in marriage, if handsome, before that age. By reason of this great number of women, it happens that the king lies but once with some of them; and then bestows them on those lords of the court who are most in favour.

His death. SHAH SAFI, or SEFI, died in the year 1642, in the twelfth year of his reign, or, to speak more properly, of his tyranny. It was thought his life was shortened by poison (B), as the only remedy to deliver the Persians from his cruelties.

His person. As to his person, there was nothing of his bloody disposition to be read in his countenance. On the contrary, his aspect was mild and amiable; and his complexion so good, that none who saw him could imagine he possessed such a barbarous heart. He was of a middle stature, and very well shaped.

^b OLEAR. p. 362, & seq.

^c TAVERN. l. v. c. i. p. 198.

(Z) She was the mother of Shâh Altâs II. Tavern. p. 172.

(A) Near Tarki, between Afrakbân and Derbend, in Skirwân.

(B) Tavernier says, he died in 1642, of a surfeit occasioned by excess of drinking, after he had reigned fourteen years. Trav. l. v. c. i. p. 199.—He was buried at the city of Kom, in the northern road to Isfahan; where he has a magnificent sepulchre, of which Chardin has given a view in his Voy. en Persé, tom. ii. p. 211.

- a He left a son, named Abbâs, who succeeded him, in May the same year, being then but thirteen years of age^a. His father, it seems, for what reason none could ever discover, had given orders that he should be deprived of sight with the hot iron: but the eunuch charged with that office, in compassion to the young prince, only moved a cold iron before his eyes, teaching him to counterfeit blindness. When his father was in his last sickness, he became deeply afflicted for having so treated his heir: which the eunuch perceiving, promised to restore the prince to sight; and accordingly, soon after, brought him, with the use of his eyes, to the king's bed-side. The joy which Safi conceived on this occasion, prolonged his life till next day; and gave him time to command all the grandees to acknowledge him as his rightful successor.
- b On this occasion, it may be observed, as a farther proof of the bloody-mindedness of this Shâh, that, before the time of Safi, they were content to blind the royal issue by moving a red-hot iron to and fro before their eyes: but this cruel prince, perceiving that his command had been negligently executed, and that the poor unhappy princes had some sight left them, ordered their eyes to be dug out (C) of their heads^c.

^a OLEAR. l. vi. p. 363, & seq.

^c TAVERN. l. v. c. 9. p. 21.

(C) Chardin. tom. ii. p. 214, ascribes this cruel order to Abbâs II. but we often find one prince put for another. Thus, in the same place, Cha Ismael Codabende is put instead of Cha Mokâmmes Codabende. And, tom. iii. p. 11, 12. the plot of Jani Khân is placed in the reign of the same Abbâs, although said to be in the year 1645, which can agree only with the reign of Safi I. in which Tavernier has rightly inserted it. According to Chardin, only the pupils of the eyes. But Thevenot says, in his travels. part ii. ch. 11, p. 98. that the eyes are taken out whole, with the point of a kanjar, or dagger, and carried to the king, in a bason. He adds, that, as the king sends whom he pleases to do that cruel office. some princes are so butchered by unskilful hands, that it costs them their lives.

C H A P. VI.

The reign of Abbâs II.

- c S H A H Abbâs II. ascended the throne, at Kasbîn, with the usual ceremonies, at the end of the year 1642; and made his entry into Ispâhân the beginning of the next. On the day of the solemnity, all the citizens were ordered to be in arms, and march out of the city; where they were filed off on each side of the road. In the same manner were all the horse and foot ranged, for five leagues together. All the road, for two leagues from the city, was covered with tissues of gold and silver, silk, carpets, and other rich stuffs. All this is done at the expence of the inhabitants, who are taxed for the purpose, by the Shâh Bander, an officer like our mayor. The English and Dutch also, among whom was our author Tavernier, went to meet the Shâh. When they drew near, they alighted; and the king being informed by Jâni Khân, general of the horse, held his leg stretched out of the stirrup, for them to kiss his boot. None but the king rode over the tissues, which were laid single, length-ways. On his left was the Etemâd Addawlet, or prime minister; and on his right, the general of the cavalry: yet they did not ride even with him, but so, that the heads of their horses reached to the crupper of the Shâh's. As soon as the king was passed over the stuffs, the people scrambled for them, each carrying away whatever he could lay hold of.
- d The king stopped at a garden, called Hezârjerib, a quarter of a league from Ispâhân, thinking to have made his entry into the city. But an astrologer came and told him, that the fortunate hour was past; and that he must stay three days before the lucky minute would return again. This he complied with; and the third day made his entry. For three days together fire-works were played off in the Meydân, whose piazza was illuminated from top to bottom. In the principal inns, the merchants had adorned the doors and windows of their chambers, according to the mode of the country; and our author believes it cost the chief of the Holland company above 900 Tomâns (A)^a.
- e As the king of Persia's eldest son comes very raw to the throne, his first recreation is to make short journies into the provinces, by that means to become acquainted with things by degrees. Above all, he never fails to visit the principal church of the Armenians at Julfa, in order to see the women, who are very handsome, as well as to gratify his queens, who are fond of all diversions. On this occasion, there is a Kûrûk through the city; at what time all the men must retire to Ispâhân, or to their friends at a distance. Shâh Abbâs went several times in that manner to Julfa; where one day having seen the wife of the Kalenter Gorje Safras, the report of whose beauty had given him that curiosity, he liked her very well; and desired her to accompany his queens, who carried her into the Harâm. There she continued fifteen days, and then returned home, with a fair pearl necklace, which the king made her a present of when she went away ^b.

^a TAVERN. l. v. c. 1. p. 199.

(A) That is, about 3117 l. 3 s. 9d. sterling; a Tomân being 3 l. 9 s. 2 d.

Clock with chimes.

ON account of this Shâh's inexperience, at his advancement to the throne, there was built a pavilion, called the pavilion of the clock. This is a mere play-thing for a child, or a man who has seen nothing; which indeed is the case of the kings of Persia, at their inauguration. It is a machine which puts in motion a great number of large puppets, heads, arms, and hands, which are fastened to figures painted on the wall, and hold musical instruments; also the forms of birds and beasts, made of wood, and painted, which chime every hour. The Persians behold this machine with more admiration than Europeans do the clock of Strasbourg, or that at Antwerp, and as a master-piece of mechanism, although the chimes are very despicable ones, and the figures still more rude ^c.

A. D. 1643.
Uzbek prince received with honour.

IN the year 1643, the prince of the Uzbeks came in person, to desire aid of Shâh Abbâs, against his children, who had excited his subjects to rebel against him. His eldest son, who first took arms, having gained a battle, his other brother joined his interest: and, though the chief of the nobility, still adhered to the father, yet, coming to a second battle towards the end of the year 1642, he lost it, with his left eye, shot out by an arrow, which obliged him to retire into Persia. The Shâh, to honour him, sent 15,000 horse and foot to meet him, as far as Kashân, which is four days journey from Ispâhân. His officers tent, and led horses, whose furniture was covered with jewels, were every day changed. The way was covered with carpets, for a league and half from the city; and the king went himself to meet him, as far as where the stuffs began to be laid. Yet, to shew his state, although young, as soon as he saw the Tatar king, he made a shew of spurring on his horse; and, being come up, put his foot out of the stirrup, as if he intended to alight, but did not. The Uzbek prince, as old as he was, presently leaped from his saddle, to salute the Shâh, who made him some compliments on having alighted. After this, the Etemâd Addawlet, and other lords, remounting him, the two kings rode together on the silks, Abbâs giving his guest the left-hand. This prince lent him 15,000 horse, and 8000 foot, with 60,000 Tomâns in money. The Uzbek, in return, gave him one of his provinces bordering on Persia, which yielded him a very good revenue; in regard the inhabitants were all Turkmâns (B), who bred an infinite number of cattle, wherein the wealth of that province consists ^d.

Receives
Kandahâr

ALTHOUGH Kæmpfer says this Shâh's reign was famous for many warlike expeditions, yet authors mention but very few. The travellers at least speak of no more than two; namely, those against Kandahâr and Jaskes: in the first of which only he came off with success; and this success was owing more to policy or treachery, than force of arms, or military skill. It has been already observed, in the reign of Shâh Safi, that Ali Merdan Khân, governor of Kandahâr, being sent for to court, rather than trust himself in the hands of that bloody prince, chose to deliver up that important fortress to the Great Mogul. All the world believed, after such a piece of treason committed by the father, that Safi would have ripped up the bellies of his two sons, who remained at his court as hostages. Instead of that, he conferred on them the same kind of favours and employments which Shâh Jebân bestowed on Ali Merdan Khân. This piece of policy proved very advantageous to Shâh Abbâs II. who, intending to recover Kandahâr, marched, and besieged it with 50,000 men. For the Persian troops, of whom the greater part of the Mogul's army consisted, remembering how kindly Shâh Safi had treated Ali Merdan Khân's sons, gave very little opposition to Shâh Abbâs, who, in a short time, made himself master of that fortress. On this occasion it is related, that Shâh Jebân, being much troubled at the loss, asked Ali Merdan Khân, By what means he might retake Kandahâr? to which the Khân made answer, That it might be easily enough done, provided his majesty could only find such another traitor as he had been ^e.

Prince of Jaskes

BETWEEN cape Jaskes and cape Guâdel, the two most southern points of the coast of Persia, along the Indian sea, there lies a mountainous and marshy country, in several parts inaccessible ^b TAVERN. c. v. p. 211.

l. v. c. i. p. 200.

^c CHARD. Voy. en Persé, tom. iii. p. 21.
^e Ibid. l. v. p. 198.

^d TAVERN.

(B) From this, and other circumstances, this should be the Khân of the Uzbeks of Karazm: but we find no such account as this in the history of Abûlghâzi, Khân of that country. On the contrary, in the year 1642, he fled from the court of Persia, where he had been ten years, and returned to Karazm, which was then in the hands of the Kalmûks, or Elûths; but a year or two after took possession of it.

a fible, extending from the sea to the province of Kermân. This region was possessed by three petty princes. The two towards the east are ethnics; the third, who assumes the title of prince of Jaskes, and is most potent, professes Mohammedism. Shâh Abbâs I. after the conquest of the province of Ormûz (or Hormûz), intended to subdue all the maritime parts beyond Jaskes: but, meeting with resistance, was content that the prince should become his vassal, and pay him tribute; which was performed during his reign. But, on the accession of Shâh Sefi I. the prince of Jaskes refused to pay the tribute, without being called to an account. At length, in the reign of Abbâs II. the Khân of Ormûz, by his leave, invaded the country, with 20,000 horse: but, in hunting as he marched, he fell into a bog, and perished, with twenty or thirty horsemen more.

b THE army, on the Khân's death, retreated. However, soon after, they entered the country again, led by the Khân's brother, whom Abbâs had sent to succeed him. The new general made haste to reduce the rebellious prince; but was defeated by him, with the loss of a great number of men. The prince of Jaskes, puffed up with this success, and believing the Persians would not return in haste, resolved on a voyage to Mekka, in order to return his prophet thanks: but the Khân, being informed of his design, had him way-laid by sea, and brought to Ormûz. From thence he was convey'd to the mountains, ten or twelve leagues distant, whither the governor had retired, to avoid the heats; who immediately sent to acquaint Abbâs, and know what was to be done with his prisoner. Mean time, the princess of Jaskes, hearing of her husband's misfortune, and being a woman of masculine courage, sets out with 5 or 600 horse; and hasting by long marches, surprises the Khân at midnight, kills him with her own hand, cuts in pieces the greater part of his men, whom she found asleep, and carries away ten or twelve of his women, along with her husband, before the Persians could put themselves in a posture to oppose her.

c ABBAS, still more incensed at this news, sends the third brother to be governor of Ormûz; against the with a command to those of Shirâz, Lâr, and Kermân, to march, with 30,000 horse, to revenge the affront, and reduce the rebel. But the prince of Jaskes, being assisted by the other two maritime princes before-mentioned, defeated those troops, with the Khân of Ormûz at their head. However, his lieutenant-general happening to be taken prisoner in the battle, the Khân, in revenge of his brother's death, caused his body to be larded with lighted candles, and led about the streets, mounted on a camel, at noon. But, after he had been thus tormented, for three days together, the Khân, at the intercession of the Dutch company, forbore his cruel treatment.

d SHAH Abbâs II. reigned about twenty-four years, and, according to Tavernier, died of an inflammation in his throat, which came by excessive drinking^s. But this prince's death is more particularly related by Kämpfer and Chardin. The first informs us, that, being at his palace of Asbirâf, in the province of Mazânderân, or Tabrestân, he took a fancy to lie with one of the dancers, who belonged to the court: and altho' the girl fell on her knees, intreating him to forbear, for that she was infected with the foul disease; yet he would not be persuaded. A month after, the symptoms of a pox appeared on him; which, through neglect, broke out over his whole body. As he took no care to live regularly, and his physicians, through want of skill, or virulence of the distemper, were at a loss how to treat it, the contagion degenerated into a cancer, which ate away the palate of his mouth, and bridge of his nose.

e EIGHT days before he died, when it was too late, he began to live more regularly; and removed to Khosrawabâd, a village near Damagân. There he passed his time among his women, in conversation, reading, and painting, in which he was continually employed. But, while he flattered himself with the hopes of living, and being soon able to undertake his long designed expedition against the Uzbeks of Bâlk, he was one evening suddenly seized with such intolerable pains, that in the night he grew distracted; and died about four in the morning, accusing his physicians with having poisoned him, on the 26th of Rabia'lakar, in the year of the Hejrah 1077, which answers to the 25th of September, N. S. 1666^h.

f CHARDIN says more expressly, that his death was owing to an imposthume, caused by the venereal disease, which ate quite through his throat: so that he could swallow nothing, every thing he took passing out by that orifice, which opened his mouth quite through his head. A matter, says this author, not only extraordinary in itself, but the more surprising in a king of Persia, whose Harâm is so well furnished with choice of womenⁱ. But the seeming difficulty has been already cleared up by Kämpfer. He was buried at Kom (C), where he has

^s TAVERN. c. 5. p. 217.

ⁱ CHARD. ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 148.

^h Ibid. p. 200.

^h KÆMPFER. Amœn. exot. fascic. 1. p. 28.

(C) Tavernier, by mistake of the printer, has Kour for Kom.

a magnificent sepulchre, near that of Safi, or Sefi; the draught of which is given us by a Chardin^k.

Character.

ABBAS was a prince of great capacity, and famous for many warlike expeditions: just, prudent, and gracious, to all men; but kinder to strangers than his own people, whom he would not suffer to abuse Christians. He even removed some of his considerable officers, both ecclesiastical and civil, who bore them an ill-will; comparing the state to a body, whose members ought to agree among themselves, and whose prince should distribute love and justice to them all alike. If both Persians and Christians are to be believed, it is hard to name the virtue which he was not possessed of. His only vices were wine and women, which brought him to his grave^l.

His cruelty.

THIS is the character of Abbâs II. as given by Kämpfer. But Tavernier, who was in Persia during his reign, and entertained by him at Ispâhân, says, he was no less cruel than his father Safi, and would be as punctually obeyed^m. In another place, he observes, that this Shâh was too much addicted to drinking, and governed by passion. However, he adds, that otherwise Abbâs was a lover of justice, as well as very magnificent, and generous to strangersⁿ.

An instance.

THAT our readers may the better form a judgment of the character of this prince, we shall illustrate it by instances. And first, of his cruelty. Abbâs had two sisters, whom he married to two of his lords, both very rich, but of mean extraction. Soon after, understanding that they were with child, he ordered physic to be given them, to destroy the foetus's. About three months after, he was informed they were pregnant again, and suffered them to be brought to bed: but commanded that they should not give the children any nourishment, but let them starve to death.

Another.

THIS prince caused the tongue of one, who filled him tobacco, to be cut out, for a word spoken idly. For Abbâs calling for tobacco, one of the pages ran hastily to the person who had it in charge, and bidding him make haste; the other answered, sharply, To hell! have a little patience. The Shâh being informed of it, sentenced him to the punishment above-mentioned. The poor man desired the executioner to cut it as deep as he could, and leave it very short, by which he spoke some words to be understood^o.

Ladies burnt alive.

AMONG other excesses committed by this Shâh in his cups, one time returning home in liquor, he would needs drink on, and forced three women to drink with him. The ladies, finding he would not give over, stole away, one after another, without taking leave: which Abbâs perceiving, in a mad humour sent his eunuchs to fetch them back; and, being come, ordered them to be thrown into the fire, where they were burnt to death^p.

A fourth instance.

ABBAS had another of his women, one of the finest creatures among them, burnt alive, for putting a deceit upon him, to avoid being gotten with child. One night sending for this lady to come to his bed, she excused herself, under pretence that she was out of order, and durst not approach his person in that condition. Next day, the Shâh went to her chamber; and she, seeing him enter, fell at his feet, beseeching him not to touch her, out of order as she assured him she was. Abbâs, whose love made him suspicious, caused her to be examined; and being informed, that what she had told him was false, he ordered her to be bound in a chimney, with wood set round her, and there consumed by fire. The reason why this young lady avoided the king's caresses, was, because those of the Harâm who have once had a child, or only been with child, are rarely ever given to the great lords for wives, as the others are; a thing which they all covet, in order to be delivered from the confinement they are under in the palace^q.

Apology for him.

IT may, indeed, be said in excuse of this prince, that the acts of cruelty which he committed, were rather the effects of his drinking, than his natural temper: for most of those cruel orders which we meet with an account of, were given when he was in liquor. On the other hand, the parties who fell the victims of his excesses, were often the cause of their own misfortunes. However, it does not appear that the following instance hath either of those palliations to allege in his favour.

Barbarous order.

IN the year 1620, Abbâs the Great banished a great number of eunuchs from court, who were useless, and only incumbered his palace, assigning them a larged hôtel, divided into several piles of building, with gardens belonging to them. But, thirty years after, Abbâs II. finding that these eunuchs did not die fast enough, sent persons one night to kill those who were youngest, and bury them in the garden, without any noise: so that, in 1667, when Chardin was at Ispâhân, there did not remain above fifteen or sixteen^r.

Instance of justice.

FOR all this Shâh did acts of injustice himself, he would not suffer others to follow his example. In a mosk at Konishâb, a town not far from Ispâhân, in the road to Konrân, there ^k CHARD. ubi supra, tom. i. p. 207.

p. 209.

^l CHARD. tom. ii. p. 279.

^m Ibid. p. 211.

ⁿ KÄMPFER. ubi supra.

^o Ibid. p. 209.

^p Ibid. tom. iii. p. 71.

^q TAVERN. l. v. c. 5.

^r Ibid. l. iv. c. 13. p. 172.

a are kept certain fishes, held to be sacred. One day an Armenian, who was in the mosque, ventured to take some of the fish, thinking nobody observed him. But it happened, unluckily, that he was perceived by a Persian, who, fired with religious zeal, ran at him, with his pontifical in his hand, and slew him on the spot; imagining that he did a good act, to revenge the sacrilege committed on things sanctified by his religion. The Sadr, who is the grand pontiff of Persia, believed so too; and therefore, on the murderer's application, gave him absolution, for a small sum of money; declaring, that he killed the Armenian very justly. But the king, being informed of the affair, ridiculed the impertinent reasoning of the ecclesiastics, That to take away consecrated fish was a crime, for which the party deserved to be killed by the first person who met him; and reprimanding the Sadr severely, obliged him to pay a fine to the family of the Armenian, who had been slain; and ordered the Persian murderer to be punished¹.

ONE time the Nâzar, or seer, who is like the grand master of the king's house in France, The Nâzar being a person of low extraction, and advanced to that dignity in a short time, grew so proud, punished that he contemned all the laws of the court. There was no dealing with him about any business, unless he was first presented; and he paid nobody, without making some advantage of it. The people hereupon cried out against him: but, although every body had reason to complain, none knew how to come at the king, to make their complaints. At length they made their applications to the master of the wardrobe, and high treasurer, two black eunuchs, who had the king's ear in the night. These, taking the opportunity, when Abbâs was in a good humour, let fall some words concerning the Nâzar's management of affairs; and thence slid into a detail of his injustice, which caused the people to cry out against him, and speak evil of his government. One morning, after this, when the king intended to go a hunting, the Nâzar, who had always a large train attending him, coming to the Shâh's tent, was denied entrance by one of those eunuchs. About the same time, Abbâs came forth, for taking presents and seeing him there, commanded his officers to take off the bonnet from the head of that dog, sent who received gifts from his people; and that he should sit three days, bare-headed, in the heat of the sun, and as many nights exposed to the air. After this, he commanded, that he should be chained about the neck and arms; condemning him, at the same time, to perpetual imprisonment, with no more than one Mahmûdi (or eight pence halfpenny) per day, for his subsistence: but he died for grief, within eight days after his confinement.

JAFFER KHAN, governor of Astarabâd (D), was a generous lord, and kept a magnificent Two flatterers train. At first, his administration was very mild; but at last he oppressed the people with punished heavy exactions. The king being one day drinking with some of his lords, and seeing the master of his music, who was a merry droll, asked him what the people said of Jaffer Khân; adding, that though he had made him governor of several provinces, he had never heard any complaint of him before: but that now he was accused of very tyrannical proceedings. The music-master, who was a mere flatterer, knowing that the Khân was extremely beloved by the king, confidently averred, that he was falsely accused; and that, to his knowledge, he was always apter to give than to receive. There was, at the same time, in the apartment, for excusing a an Haji, named Manîchar Khân, lately returned from Mekka, who, having been long acquainted favourite with Jaffer Khân, was asked the same question, and returned the same answer. Hereupon the king, who had been well informed of the Khân's behaviour, turning to the lords then present, said, What think you of these two flatterers, who speak directly contrary to what they know? And, at the same time, commanded two of the music-master's teeth to be pulled out of his mouth, and driven into the head of the Hâji, which had like to have cost him his life, being a very old man. As for Jaffer Khân he was disgraced for a while; but, being a person of fine qualities, was afterwards recalled to court².

ABBAS was very kind to the Franks, or Europeans. He not only honoured Tavernier with Kind to the a Kalaat and gown. but invited him to entertainments. Particularly, in January 1665, being Franks sent for one morning to court, he found Father Raphael, superior of the capuchins, and two Dutchmen, with the Nâzar; who, after a while, brought them to the room where the king was, sitting on a low pallet, with two mattresses, covered with a rich carpet. He leaned his back against a large cushion, four feet long, having before him eight or ten plates of fruits and sweetmeats. There stood also two bottles, with long round necks, of Venice crystal, stopped with pitch, full of Shirâz wine, and a gold cup. On one side was a vessel with a handle, near full of the same sort of wine, with a gold ladle, which held the quantity of a pint. The bottles were for the king's drinking; that in the tub for his guests.

AFTER they had made their obeisances, the king called to Raphael, saying, Come hither, Treats them come hither. The friar went towards him, and, being near, fell on his knees. Raphael, said

¹ CHAND. tom. iii. p. 91.

² TAVERN. l. v. c. 5. p. 210.

(D) A city of Jorjân, on the Cassian sea.

Abbâs, if thou wilt drink wine, stay here ; if not, be gone. The frier, though unaccustomed to drink wine, replied, That, since his majesty did him so great an honour, he was willing to drink a little. 'Tis very well, answered the king, smiling, go then, and take thy seat. Hereupon he bid one of the Dutchmen fill some wine : which he did, with a trembling hand, being unused to drink with kings : and having laid his hat on the carpet, the Shâh ordered him to put it on, it being a very ignominious thing in Persia to be bare-headed. The great ladle went smartly about, considering it was but early in the forenoon. At length the king, bethinking himself that the Franks were not used to drink without eating, gave orders for victuals to be brought, consisting of both flesh and fish, roasted and boiled.

with great familiarity.

AFTER this breakfast, the king put our author upon a relation of his travels into India ; and, opening a satchel, drew out several portraitures, in miniature, representing the Great Moguls, and their sons, with some Rajahs and officers of the court, whom Tavernier knew, by their resemblance. Among the rest, there were the pictures of some ladies ; which turned the discourse on the subject of beauty, and gave the Shâh an occasion to ask our author's opinion about it ; which afforded him some diversion. After this, he put questions concerning the present state of Europe ; and, as he spoke very low, the rest of the company retired out of hearing, only the king's uncle kept his place, standing five or six paces behind his majesty. At intervals the dancers were called in ; and Abbâs diverted himself with asking our author, which he thought the handsomest, the reasons for his opinion, and making them kiss him. Thus the time passed till eleven at night ; when the king enquired if any present knew how to sing. On this, one M. Dau'ier began : but Tavernier, observing that the king did not like his voice, because not a base, and being in a merry vein, sang a drinking air ; which so pleased his majesty, that he cried out Bârik Allah ! Bârik Allah ! O ! the works of God !

An instance.

Effects of liquor.

FOR all this condescension and freedom, which was found in Abbâs, he would not suffer any acts of misbehaviour or disrespect from strangers, any more than his own subjects, as may appear from the following instances. Next night, the king fell a drinking again (E) with company, among whom there was an Hâji, or pilgrim, newly returned from Mekka, and consequently obliged never to drink wine. While this Hâji stay'd, one of the Persian lords got so deeply fuddled, that he twice struck the Hâji's turban from his head ; refused to drink when the king commanded him ; played the fool with the women, when dancing ; and committed so many other impertinencies, that the king at last, in a great fury, said, This rascal has lost all his respect, and thinks he is no more my slave ! drag him out by the heels, and throw to the dogs ! He was accordingly dragged out of the hall, by four or five officers ; and every body wondered that he was not thrown to the dogs : but it was thought some of the king's women begged him off. At this entertainment one of the dancers gave another a box on the ear, in the gallery where they were drinking together : which yet being heard by the king in the hall, he ordered her to be struck out of the number of courtezans, and another put in her place, by the Darûga, or judge of the city ; who was to get her married, and 100 Tomâns were allowed her for a portion^a.

Narrowescape

JAFFER KHAN being restored to favour, the king sent for several lords of the court to come and drink with them. He likewise commanded five Franks, who were in his service, to attend : their names were, Sain, a goldsmith ; Lagis and Varin, watch-makers ; with Marais and Bernard, gun-smiths. After they had been warmed a little with wine, the king drew off his finger a ruby, which our author sold him for 100 Tomâns, and a diamond jewel worth 1400, which he gave to Jâffer Khân, with whom he whispered at the same time. The Nâzar, who sat at a distance, fancying the Shâh was talking about the incursions of the Uzbeks towards Mashhâd (or Tûs), and being emboldened by the liquor, told his majesty, aloud, That if he would but let him have 4000 horse, he would cut all that rabble to pieces. The king, displeased at this freedom, bid him hold his tongue, and go sleep. For all this, Marais, who, when in liquor, could not forbear prating, took on him also to tell Shâh Abbâs, That, if he wanted a general, none was fitter than Jâffer Khân ; and fell into a long detail of his praises. The king commanded him to be silent ; which he was for a while, and then began his impertinencies again. On this, Abbâs ordered the Meter, or master of his wardrobe, to drag him out of the room by the feet, and rip up his belly. He was dragged out accordingly : but the Meter, having a great kindness for him, and knowing the king loved him much, delayed the execution, by pulling off his clothes very leisurely ; and, finding that his majesty did not rise to go into the Harâm, which is a sign that no pardon will be given, he caused him to be dragged as near the king as he could, to move his compassion, while of a Frenchman.

^a TAVERN. l. iv. c. 17. p. 183.

(b) Tavernier says, he had so strong a head, that, after a whole day's debauch, having sent for the French, they found him as sober, and in as good a frame of mind, as if he had not drank one drop ; so that he continued it one day more, without intermission ; being seldom drunk. Trav. part ii. ch. 11. p. 100.

a some of the lords implored mercy for him: which, at length, Abbâs granted, ordering him to put on his clothes again, and resume his place *.

ABBAS was a lover of the mechanical arts, and artificers. It has been already remarked, Drawings of Abbâs, that he was fond of drawing; and Tavernier tells us, that he delivered to him the patterns of several sorts of drinking-cups, and trenchers, with that of a dagger (F), in order to have them made in France: the dagger was to be goldsmiths work, enamelled. These patterns were drawn by himself (G), having learned to design of two Dutchmen, who were in his service †. Chardin informs us, that, besides drawing, he knew how to turn, and write very neatly ‡. But this is not so strange, as what the same author relates concerning two blind princes of the blood, one of whom made all sorts of models (in wood or wax), to great perfection; and the other was well skilled in mathematics, especially algebra. He could so well distinguish the goodness and difference of work, by his feeling, and ear, that he would buy watches of great price upon his own judgment §.

* TAVERN. l. v. c. 5. p. 210, & seq. voy. en Perse, tom. ii. p. 215.

† Ibid. l. iv. c. 16, 17. p. 181, 183. § Id. ibid. tom. iii. p. 64, & seq.

‡ CHARD.

(F) Kämpfer observes, that, among other instances of his industry, he made the handle of a simetar in wax; and adorned it, in a very beautiful manner, with jewels, to the value of 1500 Tomâns, as a pattern for the sword-maker to set them in a gold handle. Kämpf. Amœnit. exot. Fasc. 1. Relat. 2. p. 28.

(G) This prince built Seadet Abbâs, that is, the abode or seat of felicity, one of the suburbs of Ispâhân. Chard. Voy. tom. iii. p. 75.

C H A P. VII.

The reign of Shâh Safi II. or Soleyman.

c AS soon as Abbâs was dead, the lords, who were about him, sent advice thereof to his eldest son Safi, or Sefi, by the Topiji Bashî, who is general of the musketeers, and Mirza Bayad, chief of the astrologers. As soon as they came to the door of the Harâm, they desired to speak with the mother and her son; who, as usual, believed them arrived on some dismal design. But they were perfectly freed from their fears, when, on the prince's coming forth, they fell at his feet, and saluted him king, declaring the death of his father. On this, Sefi immediately tore his garment, according to custom: he likewise observed another usage, which is, that as soon as the new Shâh, after much intreaty, quits the Harâm, he throws himself on the ground at the door of it; then, rising, sits down on his heels, while one of the lords, sent to notify his accession, girds the sabre about his waist, saying these words: May it please your majesty to remember your slave, who has the honour to gird you with this sword. This done, he goes and orders the trumpets to sound, and drums to beat; on which notice, all the people in the morning run to the palace-gate, crying out, Padishâh salamalek, that is, I salute thee emperor. Form of inauguration. A. D. 1667.

THIS is all the ceremony used when any king of Persia ascends the throne; for, says our author, I never saw any crown set upon the head either of Shâh Abbâs, or Shâh Sefi. They do no more than gird on the simetar, as in Turky; and put on the cap or bonnet of the Sofi (A), which is very richly set with jewels, but has not the least resemblance of a crown. And it is with the same ceremony of the sword and cap, that the Great Mogul, the king of Vizapûr, and king of Golkondâ, are inaugurated. No coronation.

e SHAH SEFI II. some time after his coming to the throne, fell dangerously sick; nor had he before ever enjoyed a perfect state of health. It is the custom of those eastern countries, that, on such an occasion, all the court-lords, and governors of provinces, bestow a sum of money, according to their inclinations, usually in gold; which they put into a basin very richly set with precious stones, and bear it three times over the king's head, pronouncing these words, Padishâh bashena olfun; that is, this money is offered for the health of the king's head. If the Shâh recovers, all that money, to which both himself and his Harâm add very liberally, is given to the poor: but if he dies, it is put into the treasury, and they get nothing. The 20th of August 1667, was the critical day of his distemper, and every one thought that he would have died; hereupon all the grandees went to the mesku, or mosk, called Babarun, which is without the city, to pray for his health; and gave amongst them near 1000 Tomâns to the poor. Next day they commanded the Armenian Christians to pray for the king's recovery; which they did, both clergy and laity, on the side of the river between Isfahan and Julfa. They also sent their Kalenter, with fifty Tomâns in gold to wave over the king's head: but, instead of the Persian formula, they only say, Beray te sadâuk, destined to alms.

(A) That is the Taj, described before, c. 1. in the reign of Shâh Ismael; which serves in place of a crown.

Superstitious
customs.

THE danger being over in a few days, they endeavoured to restore the Shâh to a thorough state of health: but, as he continued in a languishing condition, he began to ascribe it to the ignorance of his physicians; some of whom met with but indifferent entertainment on the occasion. The rest, in fear of the like treatment, thought it time to look about them; and, reflecting that Persia was at the same time afflicted both with famine and the Shâh's sickness, concluded it must needs be the fault of the astrologers, who had mistaken the propitious hour for his ascending the throne. As they pretended no less skill than the others in the art of fortune-telling, they proposed that a lucky minute should once more be fixed, in which the ceremony of his inauguration should be renewed; and that he should change his name. The king and his council being pleased with this expedient, the physicians went to work with the astrologers to find out the first unlucky day; which, according to their rules, would certainly be followed by a fortunate one.

A second inauguration.

WHEN the day came (B), they set a Gawr, or fire-worshipper, descended from the Rustâms, who were antient kings of Persia, upon the throne; with his back against a wooden figure, which represented him to the life. After this, all the great lords came and did him homage, according to his order, as their king; which ceremony lasted till the favourable hour arrived. This happened a little before sun-set; at which time an officer of the court came behind, and cut off the head of the wooden image, while the mock king took to his heels and fled. Immediately after, the Shâh appeared in the hall; where being re-invested with the Taj and simetar, he ascended the throne, and took the name of Solimân. By acting this farce he seemed to take a new possession of the regal dignity, by expelling a pretender who had usurped the same; claiming a right, as descended from the antient kings, who reigned before the time of Mohammed. From that time, the Shâh recovering, and the famine decreasing, the physicians grew in high repute; and the astrologers were cast out of favour, excepting two or three of the most skilful.

Ali Kûli Khân banished;
ed;

ONE of the first actions of this prince, which we meet with, is his taking into favour Ali Kûli Khân, who had been general of the Persian armies. This Khân, who was of a daring spirit, and could not forbear speaking with too much freedom, had been banished three or four times from court on that occasion. Hence he was called the king's lion, who was chained up when the Shâh had no business for him, and was let loose when there was any thing for him to do. The last time he was exiled, he was kept five or six years in a fortress, without ever stirring out of it. But at length, having a fair tongue, he prevailed on the governor to let him go a hunting with him. At his return, with the help of some of his servants, he seized his keeper, and gave him the bastonado so severely on the feet, that he almost killed him; telling him withal, That it was to teach him his duty, not to let a man go, whom the king had committed to his charge. Shâh Sefi (or Soleymân), hearing of this, though very young, was desirous to see Ali Kûli Khân; and, notwithstanding the endeavours of the grandees to hinder his return, ordered him to be set at liberty, with a better allowance to live upon.

restored to favour;

Two or three days after, the king sitting in council, the whole assembly was amazed to see Ali Kûli Khân enter; who, approaching his majesty with a profound reverence, told him, That the lion, being now let loose, was humbly come to kiss his hands. Hereupon the king fell a laughing; and, casting a favourable glance upon him, said, he had done well. Nor was it long e'er Soleymân, finding him no less pleasant in conversation than able in the field, made him generalissimo of his armies, as he had been in the reign of his father Shâh Abbâs. When the courtiers saw Ali Kûli Khân so well received, every one was forward to testify joy for his return. They sent him horses, mules, camels, rich carpets, and every thing else fit to furnish the house of a nobleman. But all this while he wanted money; and, because he could not meet with it among the Persians, he was forced to have recourse to the Armenians, of whom he desired to borrow five or six hundred Tomâns: but they refused to lend him any such sum.

humbles the Armenians.

Soon after, the king taking a walk to Julfa, Ali Kûli Khân put it in his head to go see the great cathedral belonging to the Armenians, where several bishops and monks resided. The Shâh, entering into the church, where the bishop stood ready at the head of the clergy

^a TAVERN. l. v. c. i. p. 200, & seq.

(F) This second coronation fell on the 20th March, N. S. 1668. Kierzf. Amœnit. exot. Fasc. 1. Relat. 12. p. 43.

a to receive him; and seeing all things new and strange, as being but lately come out of the Harâm, asked his favourite what sort of people those were, clad in such an extraordinary manner? Ali Kâli Khân told him they were devils. Devils! says the king: What, added he, dost thou bring me into a house of devils? Soleymân, by this means incensed against the Armenians, resolved to force them to turn Mohammedans. But the Khân, who was a Georgian, repenting that he had raised the king's indignation to so high a pitch; and believing their conversion would be no advantage to him, contented himself with frightening them: which was enough to bring the Armenians on their knees, to intreat his intercession in their behalf; a favour which, as he ordered it, cost them 10,000 Tomâns to the king, and 4000 or 5000 to himself.

b ONE day Ali Kâli Khân presented two handsome youths, with very delicate voices, to the king; who, being pleased with their singing, expressed a concern that he could not have Villainy disguised that satisfaction in his Harâm. The Khân, upon this, sent for a French surgeon, promising him a great reward, if he could cut the youths, and save their lives. The surgeon for lucre undertook the job, and performed a perfect cure: but although the Shâh was by this means highly gratified, yet the surgeon got nothing for his wicked action: for Ali Kâli Khân died soon after, without paying him; and being advised to present a petition to the king by the Meter, this lord asked him, if he would turn Mohammedan? and, being answered in the negative, bid him be gone, like a rascal; telling him withal, that he did not think the religion of the Christians had permitted such acts of villainy. The case of the two youths was the more deplorable, as they had been promised in marriage by their parents; who, on hearing of their childrens misfortune, came from Kâsbân to Ispâbân to weep over them: which being observed by Soleymân, to appease their affliction, he gave them pensions during life ^b.

WE find very little in the authors before us relating to the military transactions of this Shâh's Uzbek reign; who indeed was very averse to war; insomuch that he suffered many insults from the Uzbek Tatars with impunity. This, which may justly be ascribed to his effeminacy, Kempfer imputes as a virtue in him; alleging in his favour, that he chose rather to let one province be harrassed by those robbers, than, by revenging the injuries, or provoking them, expose many provinces to the like depredations. On the same principle he excuses Soleymân's pusillanimity, with regard to the Dutch; who having with their fleet taken from him the island of Kismis, near Ormûz, in the Persian gulf, he not only pardoned the offence, but even granted their demands; being unwilling, says the same author, to punish a whole nation, for the fault of a few men, committed out of their own country.

HOWEVER that be, he was not so complaisant to the Kosâks, as he was to the Uzbeks and The Kosâk in the Dutch: for, in the year 1667, Stenko Radzin, general of those people, having ravaged the vastion shores of Kilân and Mazânderân on the Caspian sea; a considerable army was sent against A. D. 1667. them, under the direction of certain astrologers, who were to point out the lucky day and hour for fighting: in fixing which, much time was lost. The Kosâks, who were then in an island on the coast of Lenkorân, being acquainted with their superstition practised on such occasions, counterfeited a flight in two of their largest ships; which they made to float about in the sea, as if they had not pilots on board to conduct them. By this stratagem they drew their pursuers, who thought themselves sure of the victory, into an ambuscade laid in the island, and cut them off all to a man. The Persians put to sea in ships chained one to the other, to the end that the waves should not separate them; and that they might hinder the enemy's escape, by surrounding them with their vessels. But this contrivance proved their ruin: for the first ship, heavy laden with arms, being sunk, drew down the second with its weight; that the third, and so on: while those on board were hindered by the darts of the enemy from unfastening their respective vessels. About 10,000 Persians fell a sacrifice, on this occasion, to the imposture of the astrologers. As to the Kosâks, their whole number was not above 1000, as our author was told by persons who were present at the action ^c.

BESIDES this war against the Kosâks, we meet with no remarkable public transactions of any kind during this reign, excepting a procession, and a great hunting; which latter will be mentioned hereafter on another occasion. The procession was made at Ispâbân on the Grand procession 23d of September, N. S. 1677. Nothing, says Tavernier, could be imagined more magnificent: all the richest furniture was brought out of the exchequer into the Meydân; the gold buckets to water the horses; the golden vat, out of which they take the water; with the buckles, harness, and nails of gold to which the horses are tied. After the king had played at mall, and shot at a goblet on the top of the mast in the middle of the square, he went and sat in the Divân, which is over the gate called Ali Kâpi, where he had the pastime to see the wild beasts fight; such as lions, tigers, bears, bulls, and rams. But that which seemed most admirable to our author, was, to see a man stand upright on the saddle, while the horse ran full speed: this he did thrice the whole length of the Meydân, although he happened to fall the first time^d.

^b TAVERN. l. v. c. 8. p. 218, & seq.

^c KEMP. Amœn. exot. fascic. 1. relat. 3. p. 56, 58.

Soleyman's sickness;

SOLEYMAN, towards the close of his reign, became greatly afflicted with the gout; which confined him to his bed two whole years. During this time, being attended solely by eunuchs, these people had an opportunity of insinuating themselves into his favour to such a degree, that, when he recovered, he raised them from that contemptible state, in which they were before, to honours and powers; which at last proved fatal to his posterity^e, and occasioned that great revolution under his son and successors, which put an end to the race of Shâh Safi, as will be related in the next chapter.

and death;

A. D. 1694.

SOLEYMAN died on the 29th of July, N. S. 1694, in the 48th year of his age, and 29th of his reign; when, by the indiscretion of his first physician, his death became public, contrary to custom, before his successor was seated on the throne. His corpse was conveyed in a herse to a chapel a league from Ispâbân; from whence it was carried to Kom, there to be interred with his ancestors^f.

person and dress;

THIS prince, as to his person, was very tall and slender (C); very handsome and majestic: his visage long, lean, and palish; his forehead high and open; eyes large and blue; his looks cheerful and modest; his complexion exceeding fair, and nose a little hooked. He had a handsome mouth, and full lip; his whiskers strait, and of a moderate length; his beard cut short, made black by art, and ending at his ears: his carriage graceful and easy; his voice low, but masculine enough. His walk was grave and very upright; he rode slowly, and continually cast his eyes about him, looking very steadfastly at strangers; but with a mild countenance. His dress was always plain, of yellow or red silk, and much inferior to that of his ministers; from whom he was distinguished only by the Taj, fastened behind him on his right side: on the same side he wore a dagger, and from his neck hung the privy-seal down upon his breast^g. According to Chardin, no man could well have a more robust constitution. At the Nazar's feast before-mentioned, to shew his strength, after shooting with the bow, he took cups of enamelled gold, about the thickness of a crown piece, and with one hand squeezed them flat, one after the other. This thing, which seems almost incredible, our author has been often a witness of. At another feast he took a quince, and squeezed it with his fingers till the juice was all out^h.

very strong;

neglects
affairs;

SOLEYMAN never applied himself to the affairs of government, but left it wholly to the care of his prime minister: who might be said to have possessed the royal power; while the Shâh, quite negligent and ignorant of every thing which passed, enjoyed only the title and honourⁱ. This remark of Kempfer is confirmed by other travellers (D), particularly our Doctor Fryer; who farther observes, that, in 1678, being wholly taken up with his debaucheries, he had not stirred out of his palace for eleven months, nor on any occasion shewed himself in public^k.

gross debauched;

IN the beginning of his reign he discovered worthy inclinations: but when Chardin arrived at Ispâbân, in 1673, he found the court very much changed from what it was in his first voyage, and in great confusion. Almost all the grandees, who filled it in the time of Abbas II. were either dead, or disgraced; and the royal favour ingrossed by certain young lords, who had neither generosity nor merit^m.

sordidly covetous;

BESIDES his neglect of government, he is by most authors charged with several vices; particularly, covetousness, drunkenness, and cruelty. According to Kempfer, he was, at the beginning of his reign, very munificent, and even extravagant, in his gifts to favourites and flatterers: but, finding the revenue did not answer his expences, he fell into a contrary extreme, to a degree of sordidness unbecoming a prince (E). He reduced the salaries of some widows of the blood to about sixteen pence a day, or took them wholly away; and kept the highest places a long time vacant, for sake of possessing the profits himselfⁿ. When this disease of ^d TAVERN. ubi. supr.

BRUYN. Trav. Pers. vol. i. c. 42. p. 210.

p. 255. tom. iii. p. 149.

^m CHARD. tom. i. p. 219.

^e See KRUSINSKI's hist. of the late revolution in Persia, vol. i. p. 81.

^g KEMPF. ubi sup. p. 43, & seq.

ⁱ KEMPF. ubi sup. p. 60.

ⁿ KEMPF. p. 47, & seq.

^h FRYER. Trav. p. 349.

^f LE CHARD. tom. i.

^k Ibid. p. 354.

(C) Fryer says, p. 353 of his Travels, that Shâh Schehymen (as he writes the name) had a good presence, and no mean capacity; unless that, by indulging his body, he had made it gross, and thickened his understanding; that he was tall and fleshy; so that when he moved, or laughed, all the muscles of his shoulders, as well as ribs, moved together. Perhaps he was fallen away when Kempfer saw him.

(D) Tavernier says, when he was at court (about 1673), he only diverted himself with his wives in going a hunting, leaving the affairs of state to his ministers: and that he would not be seen sometimes for ten or twelve days together; during which time there were no petitions to be preferred, nor complaints made. Tav. Trav. l. v. c. 1. p. 201.

(E) Fryer makes the very same remark, p. 349; adding, that he begrudged the common expences of his palace. P. 354, he charges this Shâh with abominable extortion.

a covetousness took possession of Soleyman, is not marked by our authors; but it seems to have been later than the year 1674, in which we meet with an instance of great bounty, if not profuseness.

THE sash windows of the queen-mother's apartment being out of order, a glazier was sent for ^{instance of} to mend them; and, though exposed to the snow and piercing cold weather, wrought himself, ^{profuseness;} as well as made his men work, with great diligence. The Shâh, who saw him trembling with cold, notwithstanding his exercise, was so well pleased; that, when the work was finished, he took off his own upper coat, made of sable skins, worth 500 pounds, and put it on the glazier's back. In consequence of this honour, he was much caressed at court; and it was said, the king bestowed on him above 200,000 crowns, in lands, houses, and pensions ^o.

b SHAH Soleyman was greatly addicted to liquor; and, for several years past (reckoning from 1673) was drunk almost every day ^p. Nor was he ashamed to expose his debauchery to the eyes of his subjects.

AT a feast given by the Nâzer, in September 1673, he spent the whole night in drinking, shooting with the bow, and other exercises: with which, and the good cheer, he was so tired, that at day-break he was forced to be carried to his palace, being able neither to ride, nor stand on his legs. The grandees, who had been at the same banquet, were so weary and drunk, that the greater part of them, not being able to sit on their horses, ordered themselves to be laid down on the bulks in their way home; which the Nâzer being informed of, he sent soldiers to stand round them, that none might come near, or see them, in a condition so dirty and unworthy of their quality ^q.

It was reported that, after he had drank so much that he could scarce stand, he was able to drink a large flask, holding more than a gallon, of Shîràz wine, before he was quite drunk; and as soon as he arose out of bed, he returned to his debauch before he came to himself. If he happened to be sober when he got up, he paid a visit to his women ^r.

SOLEYMAN committed great excesses in his drink; and often gave very cruel orders. He ^{excesses in li-} took a sort of aversion to Sheykh Ali Khân, his prime minister, and one of the greatest men of ^{quor;} his time, for refusing to drink wine. That minister always excused himself, not only on account of his age, and dignity of prime minister, but as he was more strictly obliged to the observance of religion, by the titles which he bore of Sheykh and Haji. These were sufficient reasons for his declining liquor: however the Shâh, vexed to see that he was the only lord who would not drink wine, often gave him abusive language, and one time struck him several blows. He ordered cups of wine to be thrown in his face, at his head, and on his clothes: loading him with a thousand indignities of the same nature, when he was in liquor. For all this, Soleyman held him in the greatest esteem, on account of his perfect attachment to the good of the state, his virtue, and great qualities ^s.

SOME time after this, the king, being as much in liquor as he well could be, ordered wine to be given to Sheykh Ali Khân; on his refusal, as usual, he commanded the cup-bearer to throw it in his ^{abuses the} face; which was done accordingly. At the same time, rising up, he went towards that minister, and looking him in the face with an air of ridicule, Grand Wazîr, said he, I can no longer suffer you to keep your senses here, while we are all drunk: a drunken man, and one who does not drink at all, pass their time but ill together. If you will divert yourself with us, and give us pleasure in your company, you must drink as much as we have done. The minister, on hearing this order, fell at the feet of the Shâh; who, finding that he excused himself on the score of religion, said, It is not with wine that I intend you shall be drunk; drink of Kokenar: which is an infusion of the juice of poppy, much more intoxicating than wine itself. Sheykh Ali Khân, not being ^{for not drink-} able to stand out any longer, drank several cups of that liquor, and soon fell drunk upon the ^{ing;} cushions. The king shouted for joy, on seeing him in that condition; and for two hours together did nothing but laugh and jest at him, with his favourites; who were as drunk as himself. After this, he commanded one of them to carry a cup of wine to his prime minister, imagining that he would drink it, without knowing what it was; but he was so fuddled, that they could not get him to move. The king, laughing all the while, cried to him, Grand Wazîr, this is what will bring you to yourself.

Not many days after, Soleyman, in his liquor, put a much greater indignity on Sheykh Ali Khân, ordering one of his gentlemen, who shaved him, to take off that minister's beard; ^{his cruelty;} which, on account of religion, he wore long. The Wazîr whispered the chamberlain, not to cut it so close as to let the skin be seen; which he unfortunately complying with, the Shâh ordered his hand to be cut off upon the spot, for not punctually obeying his command. Mean time the prime minister, pierced to the soul with this enormous affront, and almost beside himself, went out from the king's presence without taking leave. Next morning, the Wazîr not ^o CHARD. tom. iii. p. 147.

^p CHARD. tom. i. p. 220.

^q Ibid. tom. i. p. 220.

^r Ibid. p. 225.

^s FRYER, p. 349.

appearing at the usual hour, Soleymân, who easily guessed the cause, sent for him. The minister set forth the grievousness of the injuries he had received, and how much dishonour they reflected on the Shâh himself, in such pathetic terms, to the lord who brought the message, that the king sent for him a second time, gave him his hand, and not only promised to make him amends for the many insults offered to his person, but also swore never for the future to drink to such excess as he used to do¹.

barbarous order

WHETHER the Shâh kept his promise, does not appear; it is likely he did not: for altho' the prime Wazîr came to court, yet he did not care to act in that capacity; as is obvious from the following account, which affords an instance of his cruel orders. In 1673, while Chardin was at Ispâhân, Soleymân, being in liquor, fell in a passion with one who played on the lute; and, because he did not like his music, ordered his favourite Nâsr Ali Beg, the governor of Eriwân's son, to cut his hands off: in pronouncing this sentence, he threw himself on a heap of cushions to go to sleep. The favourite, considering this cruel order as the mere effect of liquor, contented himself with reprimanding the musician for not studying to please his master better. But the Shâh, awakening an hour after, and seeing the lute-player touching his instrument as before, enraged with the young lord no less than the musician, orders the grand master of his palace to cut off the hands and feet of both of them. The grand master falling at his feet to intreat grace for the favourite, Soleymân, in a fury, calls to his eunuchs and guards to execute his sentence on all three. Lucky for those unhappy mortals, Sheykh Ali Khân, the late first minister, happening to be present, fell at the Shâh's feet, kissed them, and implored their pardon. The king upon this, pausing a little, said, You are very rash, to hope that I will grant your request; I, who cannot prevail on you to resume the post of prime minister. The prostrate Sheykh immediately replied, Sire, I am your slave, and will always do what your majesty shall command me. This speech appeased the king, who pardoned the condemned persons, and next morning sent a Kalaat to Sheykh Ali Khân; who thereupon resumed his place of Etemâd Addawlet, which had been vacant four months².

luckily prevented;

maims his officers

HIS women and domestics often felt his cruelty, by unheard-of tortures. As a proof of this, when his tents were removed in any of his journies, the mangled bodies of people were found on the spot where they were set up; and when our author was at Ispâhân, about 1678, scarce a day passed but some of his attendants in the palace lost either their lives, or else some limb: which punishments he inflicted for the slightest mistakes³; whereof we shall produce a few instances.

on slight occasions;

ONE night, in 1675, being in an ill humour, he ordered a colonel to be bastonaded so severely, that he died in two days. The same night, in his way back from a feast to which he had been invited, the chief of his link-carriers going at some distance before, for fear lest the sparks should fly in the Shâh's face, as the wind was high; that prince, who was drunk, not considering the reason of it, said to that officer, Is it out of shame or ill-will to serve me, that you march so far before? and at the same time ordered the hand of that dog, as he called him, to be cut off: in giving this barbarous command, he stopped to see it executed, and then went forward. All the lords were struck with fear on this occasion; yet were obliged to put a good face upon it, while Soleymân, looking at them one after another, to increase their fright, breaks out in these terrible words: I will this day let the blood out of the bodies of two dogs, whom I have borne with too long. The prime Wazîr before-mentioned was supposed to be one of the two; and in effect had lost his head that day, if the Korchi Bashi, or general of the army, although that minister's enemy, had not interceded for his life at the risque of his own⁴.

punishes a favourite;

IN the same year some persons, who had been greatly oppressed by Sefi Ali Khân, governor of Eriwân and Armenia, having petitioned Shâh Soleymân against him; Nâsr Ali Beg, the Khân's son, who was the king's chief favourite, being highly incensed for this attempt against his father, and seeing them at the palace-gate as he was going out one day, gave them very injurious language; which they returning, he had the rashness to strike them with his cane, and draw his sword. At this they set up so loud a cry that the king heard it; who, being informed of the cause, fell in a great passion: Has this dog, says he, the insolence to draw his sword in my palace against those miserable people, whom his father's tyranny has forced to come and demand justice of me? go, cut off the hand which has been guilty of such an audacious action. This command was immediately executed. Presently after, the king retired to his Harâm; where coming to himself in a little time, he appeared sorry that he had given the order.

THIS prince's severity so far may be considered as no other than an act of justice; and his relenting, as a mark of compassion: but sure what follows can admit of no excuse. The news of Nâsr Ali Beg's misfortune being quickly spread through the palace, his relations and friends,

¹ CHARD. tom. iii. p. 245.

² Id. tom. i. p. 220.

³ FRYER, p. 349.

⁴ Id. tom. iii. p. 242.

a many of whom were there, seemed quite distracted at it. Among the rest, one of his sisters, burns his sister; a young and beautiful lady, became mad as it were with rage. Not content to tear herself violently, she ran to the king; and, loading him with bitter invectives, attempted two or three times to fly at him with her hands. The king at first pardoned the sallies of the fair creature's passion; but finding his threats could not oblige her to desist, he, with a brutal rage, ordered her to be burnt alive: which horrible sentence was executed on the spot, by binding the tender victim in a chimney, and placing faggots about her, to which they set fire¹.

SOME time after, Soleyman missing one of his best dancers, and being informed, that Nâsr Ali Beg had entertained her in his house; he was no less surprised to find that his disgraced men; favourite could be so merry, when his life was in danger, than at a loss to think where he should get money to live so voluptuously, since all his effects had been confiscated. For although these dancers are common to any who hire them, yet the expence of only one amounts to near ten pounds a night. On questioning the dancer, she told him, that the Beg was supplied by his mother: at which Soleyman, being much incensed, but more by her running into praise of that lord, commanded all Nâsr Ali Beg's women to be prostituted in the public stews. They were already set on asses, with their faces bare, and towards the tail, in order to be carried thither; when, being informed, that his wives were women of quality, and his slaves very beautiful, he commanded them to be brought to his palace.

THE relations of Nâsr Ali Beg, willing to make use of the favourable disposition which the eunuch flay'd Shâh seemed to be in, begged of the grand 'squire, who is one of the principal eunuchs, to intercede along with them for their kinsman. The good-natured eunuch, upon this application, brought them into Soleyman's presence; where they fell at his feet: but that prince, to their great confusion, flew into a passion at what ought to have moved his pity; and said to the eunuch, Thou dog, wilt thou not give me time to settle my anger; let him be flay'd alive this instant. Which dreadful sentence was immediately executed on the poor unhappy intercessor; but the eunuch, being advanced in years, soon expired under that horrible punishment².

IN this instance we find the mediation of his officers cruelly punished; in the next we shall see puts to death the neglect of it highly condemned by this prince. The same evening that Shâh Soleyman had so profusely rewarded the glazier, as before related, he fell to drink with the principal lords of his court: among whom there happened to be Khosrû Khân, viceroy of Mazânderân, and general of the musketeers, a brave man, and one of the best officers in the army. The Khân, who had drank hard, becoming at length as drunk as the Shâh himself, drew near to him; and, after asking leave for his slave to speak, said, the troops encamped in the neighbourhood, exposed to the snow and the bitter wind, were in a very poor condition; and therefore he was of opinion, that it would be better to distribute 200,000 crowns among them, than on a mechanic, whose fortune would be sufficiently made with one hundred pounds. Soleyman, though in liquor was offended with the liberty which the Khân took to direct him; and, threatening him for his presumption, fell asleep on the cushion which he leaned on. An hour after, the king, awaking, began to drink again, and ordered wine to be filled out for Khosrû Khân. On being told that the Khân had retired, he was provoked at that further liberty; and commanded Mansûr Khân, another of his generals, to go and cut off his head.

IT is customary, when the king of Persia gives such orders in his drink, for the court lords Khosrû to fall at his feet and implore pardon for the offending party: but this happened not to be the Khân; case of the unfortunate Khosrû Khân, who had a great many enemies; and, what was still worse, Mansûr Khân was one of the principal. This lord immediately went and took a black slave with him to do the execution. Khosrû Khân was gone to sleep in the apartment of his women, when a servant came to tell him Mansûr Khân wanted to speak with him from the king. Ab! it is my head, said he, which the Shâh wants, since it is my enemy whom he hath sent on the message. Accordingly, as soon as he came forth, Mansûr Khân said to him, The king hath sent me to fetch your head; fall upon the ground. And while Khosrû Khân expostulated the matter, the other bid his black take off the Khân's girdle, and tie his arms. Khosrû, finding himself seized, intreated Mansûr to forbear a few moments; the slave begged the same favour for him also: but Mansûr Khân, who mortally hated that great man, told the black if he delayed one instant, he would have him flay'd alive. Hereupon the general was thrown down, and had his head cut off: but the execution was scarce over, when an officer of the king arrived with a counter-order.

SOLEYMAN, who was very much grieved for this Khân's death, testified his concern a few days and repents; after: for at another debauch, having commanded the head of one who played upon the lute to be cut off, because, being intoxicated with liquor, he could not hit the tunes right, all the lords of the court fell at his feet to beg pardon for him. At which the king, as in a fury, cried:

¹ FRYER, p. 187.² Ibid. p. 211, & seq.

Ab! traytors, it was for the brave Khostrû Khân that you ought to have interceded, and not for such a wretched dog as this, a player on the lute; 'tis you who have been the cause of his death ^a.

suffers quarrels

THIS prince, who on some occasions punished severely the slightest faults, at other times suffered great offences to pass with impunity. Soon after, at a debauch, where most of the great men were drunk, the lord high-chamberlain, and Mansûr Khân before-mentioned, happened to give one another abusive language. Hereupon the king said to the prime minister: Khân, why do you suffer them to quarrel thus in my presence? The minister answered, Please your majesty, where my king is, it is not my business to speak. Soleymân replied, Why don't you drive them out? Upon this, the Wazîr going to push them out by the shoulders, the grand chamberlain stood his ground, crying out: It is my post to be near the king; you may kill me at his feet if you please; but I will not go out before my master. The Shâh, who could drink no more, upon this arose and went into the Harâm. It is there where every thing which has passed is repeated, and resolutions are accordingly taken. In this place it was represented to him, that, in case he suffered such insolences, the great lords would not fail in a short time to pluck the crown from his head ^b. And indeed it may as well be wondered, how they durst venture to take so great liberty with so rigorous a prince, as that he should let such a liberty go unpunished. Although drink might have emboldened the lords, it can hardly be imagined that fear withheld the king.

in his presence;

Soleymân
Khân's
escape;

ABOUT the same time, Shâh Soleymân committed another piece of cruelty, more savage than the former, although inflicted on a meaner subject. The year before, he had sent one of his domestic officers to take off the head of Soleymân Khân, viceroy of Kûrdestân; who, he was informed, held a secret correspondence with the Pashâ of Bâghdâd. This execution was to be performed at the house where the Kalaat, or vest, is received; about two miles from the Khân's residence: but he, being informed of the design, when the officer arrived, sent him word: that the astrologers judged the hour to be unlucky; and that he desired him to come to the palace till a more benign aspect took place. The messenger, to avoid giving the viceroy any suspicion, immediately repaired thither; and was entertained very nobly with music, dancing, and a splendid banquet. But having been plied with wine till he became drunk, and was put to bed; two hours after, the viceroy made his escape in the night. The officer, at his return, was directed by the grand Wazîr, whose son-in-law the viceroy was, to tell Soleymân, that the Khân was fled, before his arrival in Kûrdestân.

kills an officer;

THUS the affair stood for more than a year; although at length, one night having drank hard, he called for that officer, and questioned him again upon the subject: but could get nothing from him more than he had told him at first. The king, vexed at this, ordered wine to be served him with the rest of the company; imagining that the likeliest way to get the truth out of him. However the officer still stuck to his text; affirming that the viceroy was fled before his arrival at the place of his residence. Hereupon the Shâh, with a frown, asked him, on whom he depended? He answered on the prime minister. And whose slave are you? replied the king. Your majesty's, said the officer. How comes it then, returned the Shâh, that, being my slave, you have neglected to execute the order which I gave you, to take off the head of Soleymân Khân? you must either bring it me, or leave your own here. And having spoken these words, he rose up, drew his sabre, and hacked the poor officer to pieces at the feet of the prime Wazîr, who stood up. At the same time, looking stedfastly at that minister, and the other grandees on each side of him, said, with an angry tone; I have then ungrateful traitors about me, who eat of my salt: but this sword shall cut all their perfidious heads off ^c.

wounds Mansûr Khân;

SOLEYMAN continued drinking to such excess, that people wondered he did not burst; and his cruelty increased so with his debauches, that almost every time he drank proved fatal to some of the great lords of his court. At last it came to Mansûr Khân's turn to feel his severity. The Shâh being a hunting three leagues from Kazbîn, fell to drinking on the fourth day; and, when he could drink no more, bid the general of the musketeers get that instant on horseback; for that he had a mind to return to the city. The Khân told him, it was then eleven at night; that as he was not expected in Kazbîn, nothing was prepared for his reception; adding, that it would not consist with his dignity to enter the city so abruptly at such an hour. Soleymân, incensed at that opposition to his will, drew his sword, and saying, Dog, as thou art, hast thou the impudence to gainsay thy master? made a stroke at him, which would have cleft his head in two, if he had not warded it off with his hand; which yet received a great cut, as well as his turban; half of which fell to the ground.

makes him
amends;

THE general, upon this treatment, only told the Shâh, That he was so drunk he knew not what he said: but if he had been so unfortunate as to incur his majesty's displeasure, he might order him to be killed without staining his sacred hands with the blood of such a dog as he was: he added, that a he would stab himself to the heart. The king, instead of making any reply, ordered him to be taken away, and his wound to be dressed. Three days after he sent him a royal habit and two hundred Tomâns, to let him see that he was as much in his favour as before^d. These instances shew how difficult it is to behave towards an arbitrary prince, who has no settled rule of action, but is governed by caprice and an unsteady humour. Soleyman, who at one time suffered Manfir Kbin to give another lord abusive language in his presence with impunity, at another time attempts to kill him for offering to administer proper advice.

^a FRYER, p. 147, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 148.

^c Ibid. p. 148.

KEMPFER represents Soleyman in a different light from other authors; but from his own shew-^{his mercy com-} ing, favours him too much. He says, that, excepting his avarice and venery (F), he was one of ^{pared} the best of princes; and particularly extols him for his piety, justice, and mercy. With regard to this last article, he cites two or three instances; one is of the lady (Nâfir Ali Beg's sister) whom he did not punish, notwithstanding she refused to accept of the husband he ordered for her, and spoke very ill of him (G): but that author does not mention his cruelty to her sister, whom he burnt, as before related, for much the same offence. Another is, of his sending to recall the officer sent to take off the head of the governor of Lâr, in 1687, for not giving him timely notice of the arrival of Soltân Akbar, son of the Great Mogul; who, being in rebellion, and defeated by his father's troops, fled to Soleyman for protection^e.

BUT these instances of mercy are trifling, if compared with those which he produces of his ^{with his} cruelty. The first is, that the Divân Beg (H), a great officer of state, having left a feast ^{cruelty;} abruptly, the Shâh sent an officer after him, to pluck his eyes out; and conferred his post on that officer for his pains. Our author's next instance is still more barbarous and unreasonable: he relates, that Soleyman, standing one day on the battlements of his palace of Takhta Sofa, built on a hill near Julfa, and commending the place for its fine situation, one of his ladies, who was present, happened to say, it was rather too much exposed to the cold air. For which censure only, he ordered her to be cast down headlong, as unworthy to abide in the place.

THIS savage sentence was not only passed on a very trifling occasion; but seems to have been pronounced in cool blood. His cruelty must not always be ascribed to liquor; but rather to his barbarous and revengeful disposition; of which the following instance, given even at the beginning of his reign, is a signal proof. One of his favourite ladies, of a noble Chirkassian ^{mean revenge;} family, having somehow offended him, he ordered her to be married forthwith to one of the most abject fellows who could be found. The first they happened to meet with was the son of a linen-bleacher belonging to the court; but well enough as to his person. The marriage was performed without seeing each other, according to custom; especially when the parties are so unequal, as to rank. Nevertheless, as the king's order was to have it not only performed, but also consummated, the lady complied with it, and took to her husband. The ^{horrid barbari-} king, who intended, perhaps, only to vex her, and did not imagine, that she would suffer ^{ity;} such a mean fellow to come near her, when he heard of what had happened, conceived a secret resentment against the innocent husband; whose father, the whitster, happening to die some years after, he applied to succeed him in his place. The king, who had smothered his malice all that while, taking this opportunity to discharge it, sent for the poor man, and said to him, When, by my order, you married that lady of such incomparable beauty, and great birth, what sort of feast did you make on the joyful occasion? Sir, answered he, I am a poor man, and had not wherewithal to defray the charge of an illumination (I). Since this dog, said the Shâh, made no illumination on so eminent an occasion, let an illumination be made of his body. This fiery sentence was executed in the following execrable manner. They laid the unhappy mortal backward on a plank, to which they bound him fast: then, with a dagger, making a great number of holes in his flesh, large enough to put in one's little finger, they filled them with oil, and setting in each a bit of cotton wick, lighted them all at once^f. It must shock human nature to think in what exquisite torments the poor miserable creature must have expired.

THE foregoing instances relate only to single cruelties: but we shall, in the last place, pro-^{great inhu-} duce one, of his sacrificing some hundreds at a time to his humour; and that from his advo-^{manity;} cate Kempfer. This author tells us, that, in 1683, Soleyman made a solemn hunting; at which all his court assisted, with 80,000 men, armed with clubs and staves. It being then the heat of summer, and water falling short, 40,000 of them saved their lives by desertion: but,

^d FRYER'S Travels, p. 185.^e KEMPFER, p. 52, & seq.^f CHARD. tom. iii. p. 241

(F) He suggests elsewhere, p. 46, that Soleyman left off women and wine early: saying, that, although at the beginning of his reign he gave himself up immoderately to those vices, which impaired his health, yet that, on his recovery, he lived more temperately.

(G) Chardin gives the story at large, Voy. en Perse, tom. iii. p. 241.

(H) Rather Divân Beghi, who is the lord chief justice in criminal affairs.

(I) The Persians adorn their houses and gardens with lights on such occasions.

rather than dismiss the rest, he suffered 500 of them to die with thirst; although the game he took did not exceed twenty-five stags, and seven antelopes^a.

observes his treaties;

As a proof of this Shâh's justice and piety, the same author alleges his punctual observance of his foreign engagements. He tells us, that Soleymân might easily have recovered Bâgdâd from the Turks, when they were engaged in war with the Christian princes; and possessed himself of Bâsrah, by a surrender from its prince, if he could have been prevailed on to violate the faith of treaties. On the same principle, he refused to accept of the vassalage offered him, in the year 1684, by the Arabs, who dwelt about the river Tigris^b. But these things might have been owing to his indolence, and aversion to war, more than to his regard to justice.

His children,

SHAH Soleymân left many sons behind him. Chardin heard an eunuch of the Harâm say, and was assured, on strict enquiry, by others, that in the year 1672, this prince had threescore children living; which number, though surprizingly great, falls very short of that ascribed to Morâd III. Soltân of the Turks, who is reported to have had two hundred^c.

and successor.

He was succeeded by his son Shâh Huseyn. This was a very handsome and good-natured prince; but exceeding weak, and wholly devoted to pleasure, which made his subjects despise him. He neglected affairs of state to such a degree, and suffered himself to be so much governed by his eunuchs, that some of his chief officers, after reproaching him with his failings, in very indecent terms, have laid down their posts, and refused to serve him any longer^d. This bad management at last brought on the troubles raised by the famous Mir Avîs, and which ended in the ruin of himself, and most of his family, by the rebellion of Nâdir Kûli, otherwise Tahmâsp Kûli Khân, who, usurping the throne, reigned by the name of Shâh Nadir.

^a KEMPF. p. 54.
Persia, vol. i. ch. 42. p. 211, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 56.

^c CHARD. tom. ii. p. 280.

^d LE BRUYN. Trav. in

CHAP. VIII.

The reign of Shâh Huseyn.

SECT. I.

Affairs of Persia, till the revolt of the Afghâns.

11. Shâh Huseyn.

SHAH SOLEYMAN left only two sons, who were in a capacity to succeed him, and both by different venters. The elder named Mirza Abbâs, the younger Huseyn. This last prince had two brothers; one of whom the Shâh having put to death, Huseyn often taxed him with cruelty. His mother, fearing that he might undergo the same fate for his freedom, had him conveyed out of the Harâm, and soon after fell a sacrifice to her affection. Others say, in a fit of madness she threw herself headlong from the top of the palace.

Person and capacity.

HOWEVER that was, from this time Soleymân took a peculiar love for Huseyn, so that he would appoint no successor; but left it to the eunuchs, and other grandees, to chuse which of the two sons they pleased. Mirza Abbâs was well-shaped and robust, had a noble air and inclinations, delighting only in military exercises; in short, he had all the necessary qualifications for a great prince. On the contrary, Huseyn, though handsome enough in other respects (I), had monstrously crooked legs, and withal was splay-footed. He was, moreover, born without ambition, and loved retirement to such a degree, that they commonly gave him the name of Der-vish. He was wholly intent on reading the Korân, which got him the nickname of Mûllab Huseyn, or Parson Huseyn; and discovered as much modesty in his behaviour, as probity in his sentiments¹.

¹ KRUSINSKI Revolut. of Persia, vol. i. p. 60, & seq.

(I) Le Brun, in his Travels, has given his portrait; which has a very handsome face. Gemelli, who saw him the 6th of August 1694, but five days after his inauguration, says he was about twenty-five, rather short than tall, with a fair complexion; his eyebrows thick, and very beautiful; his eyes black; his beard of the same colour, but short; his face little; and constitution puny. Gemelli Voy. round the world, in Churchill's Collection, vol. iv. p. 141, & seq.

a THESE qualifications determined those who had the disposal of the succession to prefer him Advanced to the throne. to Abbâs, who had too much understanding to be governed by them; and had, indeed, dropped some words against the exorbitant power of the eunuchs, which made them dread him. On the other hand, Huseyn's maternal grandmother assured them, upon oath, to make him their friend; while the ministers, and principal officers, being accustomed, during the latter years of Soleyman, to cringe to the eunuchs, and comply with pacific measures, gave their votes for Huseyn.

ALTHO' Abbâs was, on his brother's advancement to the throne, more closely confined than before, yet the eunuchs could never prevail on the new king to deprive him of sight. 'Tis said, this was in pursuance of an agreement made between them, on oath, when first put to read the Korân. However, he extended the same indulgence to his younger brothers.

b WHILE the eunuchs, to make sure of him, were for inspiring him with a bent to debauchery, Wine forbidden and re- stored. he published an edict for prohibiting the use of wine, as forbidden by the Korân. He, to enforce the law by his own example, caused all the wine-vessels in his cellars to be publicly flayed to pieces; and forbade the Armenians of Zulfa to bring any more, under the penalty of forfeiting their estates. As wine had been tolerated in Persia, ever since the reign of Shâh Abbâs the first, the grandees were all alarmed, as well as the eunuchs; who were sensible, that a temperate king would not always be kept in leading-strings. To ward off this blow, they applied themselves to the king's grandmother, who loved wine herself, and was obliged to them for placing her favourite on the throne. By their advice, she falls sick, and the physicians prescribed her wine. The king himself presents it to her: but she refuses to take it, unless he first tasted it; and, to remove his religious scruples, quotes the Persian maxims, That Kings are subject to no law; and that whatever they do, they commit no sin! By this artifice was the weak good-natured prince ensnared. He drank a large cup of it; and liked it so well afterwards, that he was scarce ever sober.

THE eunuchs were admitted to scarce any office in the government of affairs, excepting Eunuchs gain power. that of keeping and managing the king's treasure, before the reign of Shâh Soleyman. This prince, towards the end of his reign, was confined to his bed with the gout, for two years; in which time, being attended wholly by his eunuchs, he found many among them of learning, knowledge, and abilities; one of whom, named Khojâb Drak, he set at the head of affairs. This able minister discharged his trust so much to the general satisfaction and advantage of the kingdom, that, on his recovery, he formed a council of eunuchs, which he made superior to the rest. This changed the face of things in their favour, and gained them respect from the people, who treated them before with contempt. Under Huseyn their power increased to such a degree, that the officers of state did not dare to decide any-thing of importance, without taking orders from the eunuchs, who composed a sovereign senate; from which slavish submission the Etimâdaddowlet himself was not exempt.

c WHILE the king was buried in the delights of his Harâm, this sovereign senate sold the chief posts in the kingdom, and disposed of the fortunes of the grandees at pleasure. These wretches, though without heirs, were yet so avaricious, that they invented all sorts of methods to extort money out of both the grandees and the people. To procure presents, they often sent the Kalaüt or vest of favour, to the governors of cities and provinces; who did not complain, as it furnished them with a pretence to raise ten times as much on the people. After this, they made the governments to be held during pleasure, which before were for life; and thus sold the same post often in the compass of a few years. These frequent changes drained the people in the provinces, by the sums raised to defray the expences of the governor's reception, and the presents made to him on his entrance into office; not to mention the losses they suffered by the copper-money coined by the old governor, sinking one-half in value.

d As the council consisted partly of black and partly of white eunuchs (K), naturally in opposition, from their colour, and jealous of their authority, they could never agree. This antipathy was greatly augmented by that spirit of faction which divides the Persians in general. This pernicious practice of ruling by parties was introduced by Abbâs I. to prevent his subjects from plotting against him, and to secure the throne in his family. The method which he took to compass this design was, to settle, in all the cities of Persia, foreigners of such nations as were most opposite in their customs, manners, and language; and to form, in the towns and villages, two factions, which were distinguished not only by the names of Peleuk and Feleuk, but also by the colour which each chose for the neckbands of their shirts. They carried their antipathy so

^a KRUSINSKI Revolut. of Persia, vol. i. p. 63, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 71, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 74, & seq.

(K) The first are for guards to the Harâm of the women. The white either attend the king, or guard the Harâm of the princes of the blood.

far, that they would neither marry nor eat together; and as, at the feast of Haffar and Husseyn, a sons of Ali, they were permitted to fight, although they could make use only of stones or sticks, yet they fought with such fury and bloodshed, that, to part them, the king was often obliged to send his guards; nor sometimes could these do it, without killing many of them; as happened in 1714, when above 300 were slain^a.

politically introduced.

THIS spirit of division had more force to keep peace every-where than the most numerous garrisons; and had it been as well kept up at Kandabâr, as it was in other parts of the kingdom, without doubt the rebellion which produced the late revolution, would have been prevented: but on this fortress being retaken from Shâh Sefi by Shâh Jekân, the Great Mogul, that policy ceased; nor was it revived by the Persian governors, after its recovery under Abbâs II. The factions, for want of being well managed in other places, broke-out into war; b and the governors often set them together by the ears, that they might have a pretence afterwards of fining both parties for their disobedience. These parties, which, while under proper restraints, were serviceable to the Shâh, proved very detrimental to his affairs, when that restraint was taken off. Husseyn experienced this on several occasions, particularly during the siege of Ispâhân; which was lost by the animosity between the Lorians and Baktiarians: for although each nation, able to raise 20,000 men, could have driven off the Afghâns, yet they would neither unite their forces, to deliver the city, nor one permit the other to acquire that honour^c.

Influence of the eunuchs.

THE factions at court grew as unruly as those in the provinces; and the eunuchs, having thrown off all restraint, made slight of the Shâh's authority. This prince was obliged to comply with the requests of each, in their turn; who were continually supplanting one the other: as soon as one party had procured a government for their creature, the other set all engines to work, to turn him out again. If a general was appointed by the interest of one faction, to command on any expedition, the other did all they could to render it abortive; either by not furnishing a sufficient number of troops, by not sending them into the field in time, by stinting them of ammunition and provisions, and often by betraying their designs to the enemy. By these pernicious practices, several fine armies were destroyed, and the Afghâns encouraged to advance to Ispâhân. These lawless eunuchs, to increase the disorders, and weaken the state, set the grandees at variance, and turning out the able officers, put those of less merit in their places. To embroil families, they inverted the order of succession: they d turned Ali Merdam Khân, the greatest captain at that time in Persia (and the only one perhaps capable of hindering the revolution), out of his hereditary government, and gave it to his brother. They did the same by the princes of Ganjea and Georgia, who became vassals to Abbâs I. conditionally, that their principalities should always remain in their families. Thus relations, made irreconcilable foes, frequently had recourse to arms; and, to revenge themselves on one another, gave intelligence to the enemy of their designs, to the ruin of the national affairs^e.

Instances of oppression,

IT was a fundamental maxim, established by the last-mentioned Shâh, to inflict corporal punishments on the great, and fine the commonalty: but the eunuchs subverted this rule, by commuting the pains of death and the bastinado, which kept the great in awe, into forfeitures e and mulcts, which they converted to their own use. So that these checks being taken off, all who were in authority every-where did nothing but contrive how to rob and plunder the people, because they might do it with impunity^f. In towns which paid 50 Tomâns (L), by way of annual tax, the governors have, in one week, raised 300 Tomâns (M), by way of fines. They carried their extortions to a shameful degree. The governor of a certain town, perceiving a man's ass grazing in his neighbour's vineyard, fined the owner of the ass fifty crowns: and when the Armenian who owned the vineyard informed him, that, among them, such trespasses of cattle were not taken amiss, the honest magistrate condemned him in the same fine; and then told them both, That it was to teach them to keep what they had. These instances our author himself was witness of. Every-body knew that the Deroga (or Mayor) of Ispâ- f hân itself, instead of prosecuting thieves and robbers, when taken, obliged them to pay a ransom, like prisoners of war; and when they were not able to redeem their liberty, he let them out at night, that by a second robbery they might be secured from the punishment incurred by the first.

in the magistrates.

THIS magistrate having committed a thief to prison, for breaking open an Armenian's house, and stealing several goods, let the owner know, that to come by his goods again, he must prove the property, as well as the theft. The Armenian, fearing some foul play, thought

^a KRUSINSKI, p. 89, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 93, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 98, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 105, & seq.

(L) Or 125 pounds.

(M) Or 750 pounds.

- a it would be best to compound with the robber, and give him up part of the effects, on condition he confessed the theft. The Armenian now thought all was safe; but soon found himself mistaken: for the Derog, turning towards him, said, in a very cold manner, "What, have you no better witness to produce than this, a rogue, a thief? You would have me take such evidence, would you? Go, friend, and bring me witnesses of credit; witnesses too who are Musselmans, not Armenians; and then I'll hear you." In this manner was justice dispensed openly at Ispahan, in the reign of Huseyn: and it is not to be thought that the public roads were more secure than the streets of the capital. The guards called Radars (N), established by Abbas I. became no longer of use. Highway robberies were not only tolerated, but in a manner authorised. The peasants made robbery a trade; and the mothers encouraged their children to it, by promise of rewards. So that the Karawans, not daring to trust themselves in the villages, chose to encamp under tents^u.

In the time of Shah Soleymân the roads were so secure, that merchants had no need to travel in companies: and Tavernier having been robbed of goods to the value of 200 pounds, the governor of the town not only paid him the full, according to his bill of entries, but also made him a present of provisions^w. But it was to no purpose now to complain, or expect redress from the governors. All the answer which a merchant, who had been robbed of considerable effects, received from one of them, was this: Shew me the robber, and I will oblige him to make you restitution. Put me in your place, said the merchant, and yourself in mine, and I will soon find you out the robber. But how sharp soever the answer was, the governor was not offended; for no people in the world bear injuries and reproaches more patiently than those of quality in Persia. If a creditor, who wants his money, says the most provoking things to their face, they take no exceptions at it, but hear him with an air of insensibility not to be paralleled. In short, the Karawans, not being able either to guard against the robbers, or obtain justice of the governors, were obliged to compound with the highwaymen, as those who were robbed did in the towns^x.

- WHILE they ran thus to ruin every-where, Huseyn lay buried in his Harâm, which surpassed that of all his predecessors, for the number and expence of the women. In the beginning of his reign, he caused all the handsome women in Persia to be brought thither: and the orders were so well executed, that the year 1701 took the name of Kisverân, or The Year of Women, from the plentiful crop which was gathered of them. Each had her eunuch and chamber-maid: their maintenance was profuse; and he gave them a considerable portion, when they married: for he bestowed them not only on his courtiers, but his inferior officers, and even his cooks. The daughters of great men he gave to other great lords, even when with child by him; and what was worse, this child superseded all their former children, and carried away the bulk of their estates; as happened to the governor of Ervân, in 1719. These issue called themselves Shah Zadeh, or King's Sons; but being very numerous, many were poor, and made a mean figure^y.

- HUSEYN had three times more eunuchs than any of his predecessors: they almost equalled the number of his guards; and indeed he had no other guard at the time of the Kûrûk, or Kow-rowk, which is a proclamation to give notice of the hour when the Shah goes abroad with his Harâm, made three days before he sets out. The ladies rode on horses or mules, with each an eunuch to hold the bridle, and the female attendants on asses; while Huseyn made it one of his great diversions to whip them till they threw their riders, in order to make sport for the rest. Besides the body of eunuchs armed with guns and swords, which surrounded the whole female cavalcade, there were two others. One of them advanced far before, and the other closed the march. Besides these, others were employed either to search the houses by which they passed, or scour the country, in order to put to the sword all who were found within the forbidden limits^z.

- THE maintenance of such a number of eunuchs must have been very burdensome to the state. Yet this Shah was more lavish still in other articles, particularly that of building, in which he exhausted all the treasures left by his predecessors. He pulled down the old palace, a magnificent structure, and built a new one, at a prodigious expence. He erected another, still more sumptuous, at Farabad, a league from Ispahan; likewise a monastery for Dervishes, whose magnificence may be conceived from the chief gate only, which is of massy silver. Huseyn, completely to exhaust his treasures, and ruin all the provinces through which he passed,

^u KRUSINSKI, ubi sup. p. 110, & seq.

^x KRUSINSKI ubi sup. p. 113, & seq.

^w TAVERN. Trav. book i. chap. 4. and book v. chap. 14.

^y Ibid. p. 120, & seq.

^z Ibid. p. 123, & seq.

(N) From Radaria; the duty laid on every camel or horse-load, for the maintenance of these guards.

undertook a pilgrimage to Mashhad (O), above 200 leagues from Ispahan. He was accompanied by his women, escorted by a train of 60,000 men. This journey proved so expensive, that half the sum would have defrayed the charge of all the expeditions against the rebels of Kandabâr ².

Husseyn's
character.

A. D. 1603.

His clemency hurtful.

From what hath been said, it is easy to infer that Shâh Husseyn had none of those virtues necessary for a monarch. He was good-natured (P) and merciful; but in those qualities the wicked found their account more than honest men. The only instance in which he discovered marks of greatness, was his passion for magnificence: but to that passion every thing else was sacrificed; and, like some people, who are more forward to give alms than pay their debts, he built monasteries and hospitals, while his troops perished with hunger, or dispersed for want of pay. He seemed to think he was obliged to take care of nothing but of his palaces; and to what a degree he forgot that he was a king, may appear from one remarkable instance: for when, on the approach of the rebel army, his ministers endeavoured to rouse him out of his lethargy, by representing the danger, "'Tis your business", said he, "to look to that; you have armies provided: for my part, if they but leave me my house at Farabad, I am content."

His notions of clemency may be judged from a well-known instance. He took a pleasure, sometimes, in firing a pistol over a pond in his garden where ducks were swimming, not to hurt, but frighten them. However, happening one day to wound some with the shot, he was terrified as much as if he had committed murder: crying out, as is usual in Persia on the shedding of human blood, I am polluted with blood: and, as an atonement for the supposed sin, ordered 200 Tomâns to be given to the poor ³.

A PRINCE so tender-conscienced, in the case of wounding a few ducks, was very loth, it may be presumed, to consent to the shedding of human blood, tho' as the punishment of the greatest crimes. For more than 20 years, which his reign lasted, he never passed one sentence of death; and, consequently, never put on the red habit; which was the colour worn by the kings of Persia, when they were to pronounce judgment for capital offences.

² KRUSINSKI ibid. p. 125, & seqq.

³ Ibid. ubi supra, p. 105, & seqq.

(O) That is, The Place of the Martyred: a name given to the city of Tûs, the capital of Khorassân, as being the burying-place of Imâm Riza, or Ridha, one of the 12 Imâms, who was murdered there. This saint is interred in a famous monastery dedicated to him.

(P) He was no persecutor, nor offended with any person on account of his religion.

S E C T. II.

Affairs of Persia, from the revolt of the Afghâns, to the death of Mîr Weis.

Revolution in Persia.

SUCH were the unhappy circumstances of Persia, under the government of a very weak prince, and a very corrupt administration. But notwithstanding the incapacity of Husseyn, and tyranny of the eunuchs, who governed him; notwithstanding the bad state of all the provinces, and the general discontent of the whole kingdom, 'tis yet very probable that Shâh Husseyn would have died in peace upon this throne, as many other kings of his character have done, if, unhappily for him, Mîr Weis (Q), the chief of an Afghân tribe, a man of a bold and enterprising spirit, had not been forced against his will to come up to court, from the remotest corner of his frontiers, to observe the weak condition to which the monarchy was reduced; and how easy it was for one of resolution, like himself, with barely the forces of his own nation, not only to throw off the Persian yoke, but even to subdue the kingdom under his obedience. The occasion of his journey to Ispahan was this:

The Afghâns
revolt,

THE Afghâns, a people who inhabit the province of Kandabâr, finding themselves much oppressed by the exactions of the governors, whom the ministry had sent to command in that province; at length, unable to be treated any longer as slaves, began loudly to complain, and discover evident signs of a disposition to revolt. The Persian ministry, alarmed at this advice, judged that the only way to prevent a rebellion, was to send a person of resolution and conduct to govern the province of Kandabâr. There was then at Ispahan a prince of the family of Bagrathioni, which has often given sovereigns to Georgia. This person, named Gurghin (R) Khân, having been made Wali (S) of his province, tried to assert the independency of his ancestors, and made a stand in Teflis, the capital city: but being abandoned by most of the grandees of the country, who suffered themselves to be bribed by the ministry, he went

(Q) By some called Mîr A'wis, or Veis, of which Mîr Weis is a compound: the name, which is Arabic, signifies Lion-necked. Mîr is an abbreviation of Amir; that is, Commander.

(R) Or Gurji Khân, as some write.

(S) Wali, or Tali, as some write, is a viceroy, who is more immediately descended from the sovereigns of the country over which he presides.

and

a and made his submission to the king. Shâh Hufseyn, who stood engaged for him at his circumcision, when he turned Mohammedan, was so pleased with his behaviour, that he not only forgave what was past, but also loaded him with favours ^b.

This prince, being judged a proper person to quell the rebellion of Kandabâr, had the government of that province joined to those of Kermân and Georgia, which he possessed before. ^{occasioned by oppression} He soon got together an army of 20,000 Persians; with whom, reinforced by a body of Georgians, he began his march; the very news of which dispersed the rebels. The Khân, naturally severe, left the people to the discretion of his army, who committed all sorts of violence. They took from them their tents and horses, forced women from their husbands, and virgins from their parents. The chiefs of tribes were no more secure in their lives and fortunes than the meanest peasants. The Afghâns had private meetings on this occasion, and sent deputies to complain of the tyranny which they groaned under. But altho' they got safe to Ispâhân, unknown to Gurghin Khân, yet his friends there prevented all access to the Shâh for a considerable time. However, at the vernal equinox, when the kings of Persia always appear in public, and their meanest subjects have free access to them, they presented their petitions, signed by the chiefs of all the Afghân tribes. But before we proceed farther, it will be proper to give some account of the origin and manners of these people ^c.

THE Afghâns are divided into three principal tribes, who, like the Mohammedan nations, ^{Their origin} derive their genealogy from Noah. According to their history, Japhet had three sons, Armen, Afghân, and Karduel: the two first remained in Armenia, which takes its name from the eldest; ^c as Karduel gave his name to the province of Georgia, so called, where he settled. The families of Armen and Afghân, having greatly multiplied in process of time, the descendants of the latter quitted their country, and went to dwell at the foot of Soleymân Kûb; a chain of mountains which separates the province of Kandabâr from Hindûstân, or the Mogol's empire.

This nation was formerly divided into two principal tribes; one of whom lived in the mountains, under the general appellation of Afghâns; the other, distinguished by the name of Bal-lûchi, ^{and different tribes} extended itself in the plains beneath; but in the reign of Ismaël al Sammâni (T), towards the end of the ninth century, a numerous colony of Afghâns, quitting the country of Kandabâr, to settle in Hafaray, the eastern part of the province of Herât, formed a third tribe, called Abdollis; who soon after turned Mohammedans, and converted the rest of their nation, ^d who till then had been of the old Persian religion, or fire-worshippers.

In the beginning of the 11th century, the tribe of Kliji (U), the most numerous and powerful of the three Afghân tribes, which inhabited Soleymân Kûb, was almost wholly destroyed by the famous Mahmûd (W), founder of the Gâznab dynasty; so that from a city of that name (X) in Kborassân, where he established his empire, in order to be nearer the Indies, which he intended to conquer. In his return from one of his expeditions beyond the Indus, which were always successful, he divided his army into separate bodies; of which the Kliji having intelligence, they defeated most of them in their way through the mountains, which the Gâznis were obliged to pass, and stripped them of the inestimable spoils of India, which they were loaded with. These Afghâns expected to be called to an account by Mahmûd; but imagined ^e that the winter would secure them from his visit till spring. When spring came they proposed to retire to that part of the mountain which was least accessible: but in this they were mistaken; for the Soltân no sooner heard of this insult, than he assembled his best troops, and, notwithstanding the rigor of the season, entered the country of Kandabâr with such expedition, that he found the Kliji still in the plains, where they had divided their booty, and almost exterminated the whole race, except a few who escaped to the mountains. By these the province was again re-peopled; but so slowly, that till the reign of Timûr Beg, or Tamerlan, they had not recovered their strength ^d.

The Abdollis, who had quitted that country 200 years before, were not involved in the ^{The Abdollis} same calamity. They continued free and independent till the beginning of the 17th century; when the Uzbek Tatars having invaded the province of Herât, this tribe, tho' amounting to 30,000 families, was yet obliged to have recourse to Shâh Abbâs I. king of Persia: that prince, surnamed The Great, took them under his protection; and marching against the ^f

^b HANWAY'S Hist. Acc^t of the British trade, &c. vol. iii. p. 27. & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 28, & seq.

^d Ibid. p. 23,

(T) Founder of the dynasty of princes, named from him Sammâniens; who reigned over Kborassân and Mazendân, or Great Patlâria, in the 11th century.

(U) There is some defect here: for the other two tribes are not distinctly mentioned, unless we suppose them to be the Afghâns proper, and the Abdollis.

(W) In our author's text, named, by mistake, Mahmûd.

(X) Viz. Gâznab, not Gâznavi, as in our author. This last word implies of or belonging to Gâznab, and consequently is the Gentile name of this prince (who first assumed the name of Soltân), or of his successors. He is, in fact, named Mahmûd Gâzni, or Gâznavi, by the oriental historians.

enemy, soon obliged them to retire. Hereupon, the Abdolis, either thro' gratitude or necessity, became tributary to their deliverer ; on condition only, that they should be governed by none but a chief of their own nation.

Revolutions in Kandahâr.

KANDAHAR was, at this time, subject to Akber the Great Mogol, who reigned in Hindûstân, to whom it had revolted, on some umbrage given by Abbâs to the sons of Mirza Bayrâm ^a, the Persian governor : but, on Akber's death, Shâh Abbâs recovered the province from Jehân Ghîr : and thus the whole Afghân nation, consisting of the Klijis and Abdolis (Y), were again united under the dominion of Persia. They continued in this state till the second revolt to the Great Mogol Shâh Jehân, under Ali Merdân Khân (Z), to secure himself, and treasure, from the griping claws of the bloody Shâh Sefi I ^b. This Shâh, it is presumed, recovered, and again lost, this fortress (A). However, it fell once more into the hands of the Great Mogol ; at which time the Klijis were no fewer than 50,000 families, divided into tribes of 10 or 12,000 each, and formed the principal part of the inhabitants. These people, according to their ancient custom, lived for the most part in tents, and fed cattle. Such as went to dwell in towns, were employed in the most servile offices. This, with the tribute which they paid for the right of pasturage, rendered them so contemptible, that the name of Kliji became a term of reproach among the Kandahâr Indians. The Afghâns, disgusted with this usage, sent deputies secretly to the court of Persia, to invite Shâh Abbâs II. to take possession of the province. On this invitation Shâh Abbâs raised a considerable army, and took that important fortress, in 1650. The Shâh, to reward their services, distributed gifts among their chiefs, and reduced the annual tribute. They continued faithful to Abbâs, and his two successors, till the cruelty and avarice of the Persian governors obliged them to petition Shâh Huseyn, as hath been before related ^c.

*Mir Weis's
character.
A. D. 1607.*

THE Shâh was inclined to have given orders in their favour ; but the friends of Gourghin Khân, by false suggestions, so prejudiced that prince against them, that the deputies were dismissed as the agents of turbulent and seditious people. Gourghin Khân, not content with having thus baffled their design, resolved also to let them feel his resentment : to effect which, he ordered Mir Weis to be seized and sent to Ispâhân. This was one of the most powerful persons of his nation ; and besides, being head of a tribe, was Kalentar (B), an office which added weight to his credit. But his birth, his generosity, as well as a certain graceful and popular air, joined to some indications of an ambitious spirit, were the cause of his being suspected as the author of the late disturbances : and as such he was represented to the court by the Khân, who added, that he was a turbulent man, and likely to foment new troubles, if not secured. Having thus gotten rid of the person from whom he apprehended any uneasiness, he disbanded his army ; only keeping his Georgians about his person.

Accused, but acquitted.

MIR WEIS, quickly perceiving the disorders and factions at court, judged that he might draw some advantage from the posture of affairs. He first made it his business to get acquainted with the party which opposed Gourghin Khân ; at the head whereof were the steward of the king's household, and Fatey Ali Khân, master of the hunt (C), afterwards prime minister. These he soon made his friends, by his presents, which amounted to 30,000 Tomâns (D). As Mir Weis was neither Feleuk nor Peleuk ^a (the revolutions which Kandahâr had undergone having extinguished the animosities of the inhabitants), he easily made each of them believe that he was of his party, and gained his favour. Having taken such prudent measures, he was not afraid to demand an audience : in which he justified his conduct with so much address and eloquence, that the king, already prejudiced by some of his ministers, both acquitted and granted him his protection.

*Meditates a
revolt.*

MIR WEIS did not stop here : but as he had now free access to the Shâh, he resolved, if possible, to destroy his accuser. The better to conceal and compass his design, he always spoke of his enemy with respect ; but spoke in such terms of his power, and how much was to be feared from it, that Huseyn began to imagine, that Gourghin Khân had sent him to court

^a See next vol. p. 61.

^b Two factions, see before, p. 645.

^c See before, p. 623.

^e HANWAY ubi supra, p. 24, & seq.

(Y) The Baliûchis having, by their long separation, lost the name of Afghân, it is presumed were not included. Hanway.

(Z) This was in the year 1632.

(A) It was not recovered by Shâh Saffi or Sefi, but by Shâh Abbâs II. in the year 1650. See before, p. 630. Shâh Jehân endeavoured twice to recover it ; and Aureng Zib three or four times, without effect. See next vol. p. 114. Aureng Zib must have taken it after the death of Shâh Jehân, although the fact is not mentioned by authors ; and it continued in the hands of the Mogols, till recovered, during the distractions at court, about the year 1736. See next Vol. p. 124.

(B) Kalentar, or Kalântar, signifies the greatest, or Mayor, as Kempfer says ; that is, of a city. Amœnit. exotic. p. 141. This officer is however charged with collecting taxes, and sometimes acts as a sub-governor. Hanway.

(C) Miri Shekâr Bashi, or great huntsman.

(D) Or 75,000 pounds ; which sum was remitted to him by the Afghâns for the purpose, in 30,000 woollen shawls of Termay, a city in the territories of the Great Mogol. Hanway.

a only to get rid of a person, who too curiously inspected his conduct. His view in getting the Khan removed, was not only to be revenged on him as his enemy, but also to clear the way for rescuing his country from the Persian yoke; perceiving that there was scarce any-body else capable of obtruding his design. Farther, to give a legal sanction to his enterprize, and unite more effectually the Afghâns in his favour, he resolved to make the pilgrimage to Mekka, under pretence of religion, but in reality to obtain a licence for revolting¹.

As this journey removed him still farther from Kandabâr, his petition was granted, without any difficulty. Soon after his arrival at Mekka, he sent to Medinab, to desire the opinion of the chief doctors of the law, upon the following points: "1. Whether it was lawful for Mussul-mâns, restrained in the exercise of their religion by heretics, to take up arms, and free themselves from the yoke? 2. Whether their oath taken to a heretic sovereign was binding, when he did not observe the conventions which he had sworn to; but made them slaves to infidels?" After this he enlarged on the avarice and violence of the Georgians: observing, that many Afghâns had already changed their religion, merely to free themselves from this oppression. The reader is to understand, that of the two chief sects, named Sunni and Shiay, into which the Mohammedans are divided, the Afghâns are of the former; which is followed by the Arabs, Turks, and most other nations of that faith, excepting the Persians, and some Uzbek tribes. These two sects brand each other with the title of heretics; and this difference between them was the ground of Mir Weis's application, aggravated by the charge of being obstructed in the public exercise of their worship; which however was not true.

c THE Mollabs did not hesitate to give their sentence in the affirmative; and the pretended Haji or pilgrim, having obtained the Fetfa or Fetva, that is, the decision, returned to Ispâ-bân. Altho' this authority for rebellion could be of no service to him, till he should return to Kandabâr, yet he discovered no inclinations that way, waiting to see what time might produce; which soon declared in his favour: for not long after, there arrived on the frontiers of Persia an ambassador from Russia, with a numerous retinue. He was an Armenian, named Israel Orîi; and pretending to be descended from the ancient kings of that country, though originally a common soldier, dropped some hints that he did not renounce his right to the sovereignty. This report, tho' frivolous, was enough to alarm the Shâh and his ministers: and another, that he had threatened to get all the Romish missionaries expelled the kingdom, stirred up the Europeans against him, so far as to suggest, that the letters which he brought from the Christian princes were spurious. On this occasion, certain predictions, said to be preserved by the Armenians, were alleged, importing, that the kingdom of Armenia should be established one day, under the protection of *Russia*².

As idle as these reports were, yet Mir Weis, finding they obtained credit, resolved to make some use of them. He insinuated, that as Georgia bordered on Armenia, and that the inhabitants of both countries were allied by religion, those of the first would favour the pretensions of the ambassador, and Gourghîn Khân be encouraged to renew the attempt which he had lately made to recover the sovereignty of Georgia, which he laid claim to. The court was so terrified with apprehensions, on this occasion, that, but for fear of disobliging the Czar Peter I. Hufseyñ would not have suffered the ambassador to proceed to Ispâbân. Mean time the artful speeches of Mir Weis made such an impression on the timorous ministers, that they began to grow jealous of Gourghîn Khân's power; which being easily infused into the head of their weak prince, it was resolved to place some trusty person near him, who might watch over his conduct, and be able to make head against him, in case he offered to create any disturbance. By means of the prime minister, who was Mir Weis's friend, and the Khân's enemy, the former was chosen for the purpose: and, to increase his credit with the people, he was honoured with the Kalaet (E), as well as restored to his former employment.

MIR WEIS being returned to Kandabâr, about the end of 1709, was at a loss in what manner to acquaint his countrymen with his project, and engage them to assist him in the execution, when a favourable opportunity offered for the purpose. Gourghîn Khân, who had continued to treat the Afghâns with severity, was so provoked at the return of Mir Weis, that, as it were in opposition to the court, he resolved to do something to dishonour him. The method which he took, was to demand his daughter, esteemed the most beautiful lady in the province, for his Harâm. The Afghâns are averse to marry their females to persons of a different nation and religion, much more to their being treated as slaves. Mir Weis judged this a proper occasion to impart his long-concerted design to the principal men among them, whom he assembled in his tent. They all applauded his project, and promised to support him;

¹ KRUSINSKI's Hist. of the late Revolut. of Pers. vol. i. p. 150, & seq. HANWAY, ubi supra, p. 29, & seq.
² Ibid. p. 160, & seq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 36, & seq.

(E) Khalaet signifies perfect or accomplished; a robe of honour given by the king's orders. It is used also for any present of horses, arms, or the like, from a superior.

The Turks call this Kaftân; which word the Russians use for a coat in general.

“ swearing to suffer their wives to be torn from them, and their slaves to be set at liberty, if “ they did not perform their engagements. This oath they also confirmed upon bread, salt, “ their sabres, and the Korán !”

Dissembles injuries.

A. D. 1709.

As soon as the assembly broke up, Mir Weis sent a young handsome girl, magnificently dressed, to the Khân, as his daughter. The deception passed the more easily, as women of rank are never seen by men till they are disposed of: and the Afghán chief, by bribing the governor's domestics, so far prevailed, as to obtain leave to appear in his presence. At this interview, he behaved with so much submission, that the Khân believed he had effectually humbled his most powerful enemy; and Mir Weis improved this opportunity so well by his assiduities, that he was reckoned among the number of his most intimate friends. Things being brought to the point he aimed at, the Afghán chief resolved to put his plot in execution. b Altho' the Georgians whom the Khân had retained about him, as before-mentioned, did not amount to 1000 men, yet being the bravest troops in the east, they were an invincible obstacle, to his design: but he removed it, by his address. He secretly engaged the chiefs of the tribe named Tirin to refuse to pay the usual taxes; on notice of which rebellion, the greater part of the Georgians were sent to suppress it. Mean time Mir Weis, who had directed his own tribe to approach within two or three leagues of Kandabár, invited the Khân to an entertainment in the camp; which the governor accepted the more readily, as that artful chief expressed more resentment than any body against the mutineers. On the day appointed for the feast, he caused many armed men to mix with the Afgháns, who were daily admitted into the town to do laborious offices; and gave them orders to stay after sun-set, when, the gates being shut, c strangers were obliged to depart.

Kills the governor.

THE camp was designedly pitched near one of the governor's country-houses, the better to prevent suspicion. After the banquet, Gourghín Khán, oppressed with heat and wine, fell asleep in the same tent; as did his retinue in those whither the Afgháns had invited them to partake of the entertainment. When all was quiet, Mir Weis, at the head of 50 men, armed with spears, rushed into the tent, and slew him, after a brave resistance, in which he killed several of the assassins. The Persians and Georgians were all massacred at the same time, by their hosts. Their arms, cloaths, and horses, were distributed among the bravest of his tribe; and having himself taken those of Gourghín Khán, he marched to Kandabár. They arrived at the city an hour after sun-set; and the guards, deceived by those false appearances, opened d the gates, and were cut to pieces. The flower of the Afgháns soon coming up, were joined by those concealed in the city; and proclamation being made for the townsmen to keep within doors, where they should be safe, every soldier of the garrison, and person attached to the Khân, were, in a few hours, destroyed m.

The inhabitants revolt.

NEXT morning the principal inhabitants being summoned, Mir Weis, in soothing terms, told them, “ It was not ambition, but a desire to free them from the slavery of their masters, which had moved him to take so bold a step: that Gourghín Khán was the only soldier among the Persians, who now dared not to besiege a fortress, which the Mogol emperors, with more troops than there were stones in its walls, had attempted in vain: that however, if there were any among them who had not courage to enjoy the precious liberty dropped e down to them from heaven, they should have free license to go in quest of some new tyrant, beyond the borders of that now happy state.” The inhabitants, not expecting such mild proposals, answered with loud applauses, and swore to stand by him with their lives and fortunes. Mir Weis exhorted his people to do nothing to offend the townsmen; and immediately gave orders for putting the place in the best posture of defence.

Defeats the Georgians.

THREE days after, the Georgian detachment, ignorant of what had happened, coming back, loaden with the spoils of the rebels, they were suffered to approach within musket-shot, and then had the cannon of the town discharged upon them. At the same time Mir Weis marched out, at the head of 5 or 6000 horse, intending to cut off their retreat; but found them better trained to war than his Afgháns. Notwithstanding the great superiority of these f latter in numbers, who attacked them five times in one day, yet they were always defeated: so that the Georgians, after quitting their booty, fought their way thro' the country, for eight days; and, at last, forcing a passage sword in hand, passed the defile of Zebil. This narrow strait is on the side of Persia, as that of Kabul is towards India, they are only passes thro' the mountains which surround the province of Kandabár; and the acquisition of this defile (with the expulsion of the Georgians), was the only advantage which Mir Weis reaped from this expedition. That chief having learned now by experience, that valour alone is not sufficient in carrying on war, left troops to guard the defile of Zebil, and applied himself to discipline his men n.

R. fails to negotiate

THE Persian court, reflecting on the difficulty of penetrating thro' the mountains with g an army, and the danger there was, that the Afgháns, if hard pressed, might surrender the

¹ HANWAY, ibid. p. 38, & seq.
² ibid. p. 184, & seq.

³ ibid. p. 44, & seq. KRUSINSKI, ibid. p. 183.

⁴ ibid. p. 48, &

a country a second time to the Mogol, resolved, before they had recourse to force, to try what could be done by negotiation. Mohammed Jani Khân, who was sent on this deputation, used all his rhetoric and art to prevail on Mir Weis, with whom he had been intimately acquainted, to return to his duty. As he added menaces to the fair promises offered by the court, the chief, afraid lest his discourse should affect the hearers, silenced him abruptly, "calling him a deceitful man, and upbraiding him with laying snares to entangle them," sent him to prison. By the confinement of Jani Khân, the court was ignorant of what had passed; and being uneasy, sent a second deputation. For this purpose, they chose the lieutenant of Mohammed Khân, governor of Herât; who, having performed the pilgrimage to Mekka in company with Mir Weis, the ministers judged he would be less suspected, and more acceptable to him, than the other. But when he had explained his commission, the Afghân chief told him in an angry tone, "That was it not for having been his fellow-traveller, and that he was unwilling to violate the laws of hospitality, he would punish him for offering to make such base proposals to men who were free." He added, "Slave to a king who is going to lose his sovereignty, listen to what I say: The victory comes from God; and this victory is near (F). The impure worship of the followers of Ali, hath too long infected the most fertile province of Asia: heaven has at length declared against the Persians. The Afghâns, who are charged with the Divine vengeance, will not sheath their swords, till they have destroyed this prince, and extirpated his nation." After this menacing speech, which seemed in some degree prophetic, Mir Weis contented himself with detaining the Haji.

The court at length perceiving that there were no hopes of recovering Kandahâr by negotiation, ordered the Khân of Herât to march against the rebels with 15,000 horse. Mir Weis, acquainted with the difference there was between the Persians and Georgians, with only 5000 horse, raised in a hurry, went to meet the enemy; who fled, on firing some field-pieces, and gave themselves up to slaughter. Two or three such actions, in the space of 18 months, emboldened the rebels, and so intimidated the Persians, that in September 1710, 5000 horse, under Mohammed Khân, governor of Tauris, were defeated by only 500 Afghâns, who killed and wounded above 1000 of his men, and took him prisoner, with three of his sons. The court on this sent 30,000 Persians, and 1200 Georgians, under the command of Khozrof Khân, nephew to Gourghîn Khân, and Wâli of Georgia, a proper person to revenge the cause of his countrymen. In November 1711, he encamped near Farra (G), a city not far from the rebels. Here he staid to inform himself of the strength of the enemy, and nature of the country. He likewise agreed to a negotiation; which proving of no effect, he advanced towards the straits of Zebil.

MIR WEIS, whose army was inferior in number to the Khân's, perceiving how difficult it would be for cavalry to act in those defiles, and being unwilling to make his men dismount, retired to the river Belese, three leagues distant. The Persians passed the straits, surprised to find them unguarded, and came to the river, which they crossed on horseback, led by their general. The Afghâns, astonished at their resolution, and being attacked with equal intrepidity, gave way, and retired in disorder. Mir Weis kept the field with his shattered troops, while the Khân marched on to besiege Kandahâr. The inhabitants affrighted, offered to deliver up the place, on condition to have their lives, liberty, and fortunes, preserved. But the general, elated with success, and urged by a thirst of revenge, imprudently sent them word, that they must submit at discretion.

THE Afghâns rejected such abject terms: and while the Khân besieged the town, the number of troops under Mir Weis augmented every day. The Balochis, inhabiting the province of Mukrân, to the south of Kandahâr, a fierce and warlike people, joined him, on his invitation; and the Tirins (H) resorted to him in great numbers. However, he chose to cut off their forage and provisions, rather than hazard any more battles, without necessity. The besiegers falling quickly in want of necessaries, the Khân's troops deserted in large bodies. The general then began to repent that he did not sign the capitulation; and seeing his army reduced to 10,000, resolved to retire. But it was now too late; for he had scarce begun to raise the siege, when Mir Weis, arriving with 16,000 men, to relieve the place, fell upon his troops; who, disheartened, fled at the first attack. The Khân finding his efforts to rally them in vain, and resolving not to survive the disgrace, rushed, with the few remaining Georgians, into the thickest of the enemy's squadrons, and bravely fighting, was slain. This was the most con-

^a HANWAY ibid. p. 51, & seq. KRUSINKSK. ibid. p. 188, & seq.

(F) A passage out of the Korân.

(G) A square town about half a league in compass, surrounded with a mud-wall, in a fertile well watered country. Hanway. 'Tis called also Parra, and is mentioned by Tacredin, and other travellers, particularly our Saltuck and Cowart, Steel and Crozier, to be found in Purchas's Pilgrims. It lies in the road from Isfahan to Kandahâr, and has a great trade for silk.

(H) The Balochis and Tirins are mentioned before. The first are a branch of the Afghâns; the latter a tribe of the Klijis.

Mir Weis made king.
A. D. 1713.

considerable shock which the Persians had yet received from the Afghâns: for seven days they were pursued, and so harrassed, that only 700 escaped either death or slavery^p.

A. D. 1715.

His death.

THE astonished court sent another army in 1713, under Mohammed Rustan Khân, who had no better fortune than his predecessor; and from this defeat, all the towns and strong holds, which had yet held out against the new government, submitted to them: so that the whole kingdom of Kandabâr fell under the dominion of the Afghâns. It is said, indeed, that the Georgians, ascribing the loss of so many expeditions to the cowardice of the Persians, in 1714, offered to subdue the rebels, provided their army should be composed only of troops of their own nation: but that Husséyn, afraid they might make a bad use of their success, rejected the proposal. However that was, the court having lost all hopes of reducing him by force, as well as negotiation, ceased to arm against him: so that this prince died peaceably in his new kingdom in the year 1715.

It may be said of Mir Weis, that he was no less circumspect in undertaking any enterprize, than resolute in the execution; and that his success was as much owing to his prudence as his valour. He had, for some time, assumed the title of king, with other ensigns of sovereignty, and ordered the Kotbah (I) to be made in his name. The inscription round his coin, in Persian, was, "The celebrated Mir Weis, emperor of the world, a most just prince, has caused this coin to be struck at Kandabâr, the place of his residence."

^p Idem. ibid. p. 54, & seq. KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 190, & seq.

^q Ibid. p. 57. KRUSINSK. p. 198, & seq.

(I) The Kotbah is a prayer read by the Imâm or priest of every Mosque, every Friday (which is their day of worship) in the afternoon, for the health of the king.

This is an essential mark of the acknowledgment of his sovereignty.

S E C T. III.

Affairs of Persia continued, to the dethronement of Shâh Husséyn, by Mir Mahmûd, Son of Mir Weis.

Succeeded by his brother.

Resolves to submit.

MIR WEIS was succeeded in the throne by his brother Mir Abdollah, whom he had appointed his successor, his sons being too young to hold the reins of government. But he never discovered so much want of judgment in any-thing, as he did in that choice: for Abdollah had neither his genius, his ambition, nor his resolution. Of this he soon convinced the Afghâns; for he was scarcely invested with the supreme authority, when he formed the design of restoring Kandabâr to the crown of Persia (K). The tribes were divided in their opinions about it: the aged and infirm, the peaceable and timorous, were for it, as fearing they were too weak long to withstand so formidable a power; and that a reconciliation was the only means to screen them from the resentment of their ancient masters. On the other hand, the military men, with those of youth and spirit, exclaimed against the project, as absolutely destructive. They alleged, "That after the provocations given, they could not depend on treaty-security: That as soon as the Persians had again gotten possession of the strong-holds, they would take signal vengeance for the losses and disgrace which they had suffered: That it was strange they should be disheartened by their victories, and fight for liberty only to become more slaves than before: That since their enemies dared no longer to invade them, they ought in their turn to take advantage of their weakness, and attack them; at least ought to enjoy the tranquillity they had obtained, so long as they saw no danger of losing it."

Slain by his nephew,

HOWEVER, Mir Abdollah, finding his scheme approved of, tho' but by a few of the chief men, resolved to proceed in his design. His intention was to restore the city and province to Husséyn, on three conditions: 1. That the annual tax which the Afghâns paid before their revolt, should be taken off. 2. That no foreign troops should be sent into the province. 3. That the Shâh should grant the government of the kingdom to him, and his family, successively. Accordingly, instructions were secretly drawn up for deputies, to be sent to Ispâhân; and they had some reason to believe that their proposals would be agreeable to the court. But for all the care which they took to conceal this negotiation, which they knew was disagreeable to the majority of the tribes, it came to the knowledge of Mir Mahmûd (L), the elder of Mir

^r KRUSINSK. p. 202, & seq. HANWAY'S Acc't. of the British trade, &c. vol. iii. p. 58, & seq.

(K) Mir Weis may be, in some respect, compared to Oliver Cromwell; and Mir Abdollah to his son Richard. Krusinski puts his death in 1717.

(L) Miscalled Mahmûd by our author, and those whom he followed.

^a Weis's two sons. This prince, then aged about 18, sensibly piqued to see himself deprived of what he looked upon to be his right, by inheritance, thought this a proper occasion to shew his resentment. With this view, accompanied by about 40 of his father's friends, he went to the palace, which he made himself master of; and then entering the apartment where his uncle was asleep, killed him. The conspirators immediately proclaimed the new Soltân, with loud acclamations; and the people, alarmed with the sound of military instruments, flocked thither to learn the cause.

MIR MAHMUD made no difficulty to declare what he had done; but alleged, that his ^{Who is made} motive was the public good. As a proof of this, he read aloud the instrument, and other ^{king.} papers, relating to the treaty, which his uncle was going to conclude. This evidence, joined ^b to the signal proofs which this young prince had given of his courage, having almost from his infancy followed his father in all his expeditions, determined the people in his favour, especially the military men, whose suffrages being confirmed by the rest of the tribes, he was, with the general consent, proclaimed king of Kandahâr, six months after the death of his father ^c.

This young prince had scarcely ascended the throne, when several events happened, which ^{A. D. 1716.} seemed to presage the troubles his reign was to produce; at the same time they removed part ^{The Abdollis} of those obstacles, which stood in the way of his ambition. The family to whom ^{A. D. 1717.} Abbâs the Great had given the government of Hafaray, being extinct, his successors had subjected this province to the authority of a Khân or governor, who commanded in the province of Herât. The Abdolls, who had submitted to Persia, as hath been said, on condition of not being subjected to foreign governors, impatient any longer to lie under their yoke, resolved to follow the example of the Afghâns, and make themselves free. Mohammed Zammân Khân, the then governor of the province, pleased with the agreeable aspect of Ezâd-allah, son to the chief of an Abdell tribe, demanded him of the father: who, allured by lucrative views, used all his persuasion to engage his son to live with the Khân. Ezâd-allah heard the proposal with indignation; and finding his father determined to use his authority to constrain him, to avoid the force, in conjunction with some young men, like himself, was induced to kill him.

^d THE Khân, to punish the parricide, and prevent an insurrection, to be apprehended from ^{and Herât} so bold a step, ordered 500 horse to march against Ezâd allah's party; who met and routed ^{revolts.} them. The governor, shocked at this disgrace, assembled his troops at Herât, and marched towards the rebels camp. Ezâd-allah, now at the head of 2000 men, left one half in ambush, and with the other 1000 encamped on the river Morgâb. The Khân perceiving the enemy to be so few, charged them, without any precaution: when those in ambuscade so terrified the Persians with the shouts they made in falling forth, that they fled precipitately to Herât. Ezâd allah, transported by his youth and courage, followed them so closely, that he entered with them pell-mell into the town. As the inhabitants had all formerly been of the Sunni sect, and hated the extortions of the Persian governors, they joined with Ezâd-allah against the garri-son, who were put to the sword. In less than three months he got possession of the other places of the province. And thus Herât became an independent republic, in which its deliverer held the most considerable rank ^e.

THE revolt of Herât was followed by several other alarming incidents. In 1719, the Kürds, ^{Other provin-} a restless roving people, after wasting the country round the city of Hamadân (M), had the ^{ces fall off.} insolence to commit robberies under the walls of Ispâbân, and even to carry off many of the ^{A. D. 1719.} Shâh's horses. The Uzbek Tatars also, on the east side of the Caspian lake, taking this advantage of the distracted state of Persia, ravaged the north part of the vast province of Khorassân. At the same time the Lesji Tatars, inhabiting Dâghestân, on the west side of the same inland sea, to revenge the stoppage of 1700 (N) Tomâns subsidy, renewed their incursions into the province of Shîrwân, where they committed all sorts of outrages.

SHAH HUSSEYN, astonished to see so many provinces declare against him, at length roused ^{alarmed.} out of his lethargy. As the Abdolls and Uzbeks, who had entered into a confederacy, appeared to be the most formidable enemies, he resolved to make an extraordinary effort against them. The court having lost all their best generals, they made choice of Seffi Kûli Khân, who had, for several years, been Divân Beghi, or Lord Chief Justice of Ispâbân (O); but finding the king prejudiced by his enemies, resigned that employment, and retired. The Khân, sensible of the difficulties to be encountered with in so ticklish a commission, and the opposition he should find in the execution of it, from the prevailing faction, declined the offered honour: but the

^a HANWAY ibid. p. 60, & seq. KRUSINSK. p. 203, & seq.
HANWAY ibid. p. 61, & seq.

^c KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 208, & seq.

(M) This, and not Tauris, as generally supposed, is the antient Eclatana of the Greeks, and Ametha of the Old Testament.

(N) They make 4200 pounds.

(O) It should seem no more odd that Asia should have fighting Lord Chief Justices, than that Europe should have her fighting Bishops.

court hit on an artful expedient to engage him to accept of it. They invested, in a very a pompous manner, his only son, then but seventeen years of age, with the title of generalissimo; rightly judging that his father would accompany him in the expedition.

The Persians overthrown.

THEY set out with an army of 30,000 chosen troops, besides a numerous train of artillery; and had scarce entered the province of Herât, when they met with a body of 12,000 Uzbeks, whom they cut to pieces. This first enterprize raised the courage of the victors: yet Ezâd-allah, at the head only of 15,000 horse, and without any cannon, did not fear to offer them battle. During the war there was not a more obstinate engagement: it began at sun-rise, and continued, without intermission, till one in the afternoon. The victory was still doubtful, when the Persians lost it, by the inattention of those who commanded the artillery. These officers, not having observed that their own troops occupied a post which the Abdolis b had just quitted, fired upon them, which put the whole army into such confusion, suspecting some treachery, that Ezâd-allah, taking advantage of a circumstance, the cause of which was perhaps unknown to him, made a vigorous charge on the Persian troops, who, after a faint resistance, fled. The victor, to make his blow complete, pursued them a whole day. They lost 8000 men, with their general, and his father, who were killed in the retreat; their baggage, the military chest, and twenty pieces of cannon. Of the Abdolis 3000 were slain ^u.

Bâhrayn
taken

HUSSEYN's armies being thus unfortunate, new enemies declared against him. These were the Arabs of Maskât, whole country lies along the Arabian coast, opposite to Ormûs. They are of a particular Mohammedan sect; yet nearer to that of the Sunni than the Shiay, and sub- c ject to an Imâm (P), or ecclesiastical sovereign, who has an absolute power over them. They had already taken Bâhrayn (Q), and threatened to attack Bander Abbâsi (R). Fatey Ali Khân, then Etemâd-addawlet (the prime minister), offered to march against them: but the king, fearing that the addition of the authority of generalissimo might make him too powerful, returned him thanks, and appointed Luft Ali Khân, that minister's brother-in-law, to com- mand the expedition. In the beginning of the year 1720, that general marched with his

A. D. 1720.

by the Maskât Arabs.

troops to Bander Abbâsi; from whence, by contract with the viceroy of Goa, the Portuguese fleet was to transport his army to Bâhrayn. It consisted of four large vessels, fifteen pinks, and some other transports. But whether the Khân did not think this fleet strong enough to engage that of Maskât (S), or his enemies at court with-held the money, he did not pay the d sum which had been stipulated. The commander of the fleet proposed to send for a reinforcement; but finding the payment still refused, he prepared to sail back to Goa. Mean time the Arabs resolved to attack his fleet before any reinforcement came. The *Portuguese*s went to meet them at the mouth of the straits of Ormûz: but having lost a small vessel in the engagement, and not caring to run more hazard, they set sail in the night for Goa.

Mahmûd seizes Ker-mân.

LUFT ALI KHAN, thus deserted, instead of invading the Arabs, was obliged to defend the coast of Persia against their insults. Mean while Mir Mahmûd, finding that the distractions which then reigned in the Mogol's empire, secured him from any danger on that side, judged this a proper juncture to put in execution the design which his father had conceived of subduing all Persia. But to establish his reputation, by some signal exploit, before he would venture e to disclose his intention to the Afghâns, he resolved to make an expedition to Kermân. This project was approved of; and having raised about 10,000 choice men, he set forward on his march towards that province. In that part of Sæjestân (or Sistân) which separates Kermân from Kandabâr, there is a sandy desert to be passed, of fifteen days journey over; and although Mir Mahmûd took all the precautions necessary for supplying his troops with water, provisions, and forage, yet he lost 2000 men in the march, besides many beasts of carriage ^w.

^u KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 213, & seqq. HANWAY ibid. p. 63, & seqq. p. 67, & seqq.

^w Ibid. ibid. p. 217, & seqq. &

(P) Captain Hamilton says these Arabs are of the sect of Ali, that is Shiay: that they are very humane to their slaves, courteous to strangers (he speaks by experience), and governed by a king. See his new account of the East Indies, vol. i. p. 60, & seqq.

(Q) Bâhrayn, the dual of Bâhr, in Arabic, signifies, the two seas; so named from its situation in the Persian gulf. Captain Hamilton says they took it in the beginning of this century; but quitted it again, because the pearl-fishers, who are mostly Arabs, deserted it. But they returned afterwards, when the Maskât Arabs had withdrawn. Ibid. p. 74.

(R) This signifies the port of Abbâs. It was called Gomrân, before the first Shâh of that name put it in its present condition, with the materials of the city of Ormûz, which he had demolished. It still bears the name of Gomrân. Gomrân, or Laurân, among Europeans.

(S) It is likely that both reasons concurred to hinder the payment, as the event shews. As to the strength of the Maskât fleet, we learn from Captain Hamilton, that in 1715 it consisted of one 74 gun ship, two 60 guns, one of 50, and eighteen small ships, from 32 to 12 guns each; besides some trankis, or rowing vessels, from 4 to 8 guns; with which they kept all the sea-coasts in awe, from Cape Kowrân to the Red Sea. New account of the East Indies, vol. i. p. 70.

a As soon as the Afghâns appeared on the frontiers of Kermân, the Khân, who had no troops Driven out to oppose them, fled; and left Mahmûd a free passage to the capital (T), which bears the same again name. Although the city opened her gates to him, yet he laid heavy contributions on all the inhabitants, and put numbers of them to cruel tortures. They had been four months under this tyranny, when Luft Ali Khân came and rescued them. He marched to their relief, as soon as he heard of the invasion, with some select troops, and put to flight the little army of the Afghâns; which news revived somewhat the spirits of the court, then newly arrived at Tabiran. The Khân fortified the citadel, and left a strong garrison in it: but whether to be revenged on his enemies at court, who had considerable estates there, or in order to maintain his army, he laid heavy contributions on the country, and quartered his soldiers b on the inhabitants at discretion, taking from them also their arms, horses, and camels.

In autumn the army marched to Shîrâz, the capital of Pûrs (or Proper Persia), the place by Luft Ali Khân of rendezvous. All the troops assembled there in November, and formed the best-appointed army which had been seen in Persia for many years. Every-thing seemed to presage the ruin of the Afghâns, against whom these preparations were making; when of a sudden the general was arrested, by an order from court, whither he was sent up prisoner, and the whole army at once dispersed. This sudden change was owing to the resentment of the lords whose lands he had lately ravaged. They judged by the credit which he had already gained with the Shâh, on account of his late victory, that their interest at court would be reduced very low, in case he should succeed in reducing Kandahâr; which, therefore, they were resolved to prevent: c but as this could not be done, so long as Fatey Ali Khân continued in his office, they first resolved to make a sacrifice of him*.

ACCORDINGLY, the king's great almoner and chief physician, who were in the plot, enter- He is impris- ing their sovereign's chamber, at midnight, informed him, that they had discovered a con- -soned spiracy contrived against his majesty, between the Etemâd-addawlet and Luft Ali Khân, who, supported by the army, and a body of 3000 Kûrds, were that night to seize his person, with all the royal family. In proof of this, they produced a letter, written, as they said, by the prime minister, with a counterfeit of the royal seal upon it: at the sight of which the deluded Shâh Huseyn swooned away. As soon as he came to himself, in a council of some principal eunuchs, who were in the plot, the Kurchi Bâshi, or general of the household troops, d was commanded to break open the prime minister's house, and bring the king his head, in case he made any resistance. He was roused out of his sleep, and obeyed the order: but, as soon as he was brought to the Kurchi Bâshi, he had his eyes plucked out (U), and was put Prime minister to the torture; under pretence of obliging him to discover the plot, but in reality to force him blinded, to discover his effects (W), which the eunuchs expected would be confiscated in their favour. At the same time messengers were on every side dispatched to secure that unfortunate minister's relations and friends, especially his son-in-law Luft Ali Khân; who being decoyed by the governor of Shîrâz into that city, was there closely confined; on which his fine army disbanded, as before related.

MEAN while preparations were making to defend the city against the Kûrds, and other by a court plot, e forces, who were hourly expected: but as soon as day-light came, and Shâh Huseyn saw that no enemy appeared, this deluded prince began to suspect that his ministers had imposed on him. He severely reproached the informers; and, as soon as the Etemâd-addawlet was recovered of his wounds, he held a Divân, in which he presided himself, to examine into that minister's conduct. That unhappy lord made his defence with great force and resolution. But although he pleaded his cause so movingly, that the king was convinced of his innocence, and wept for his own hasty judgment, yet it was thought fit, out of policy, to confine him in the castle of Shîrâz, with the allowance of a considerable pension; in which state he died two years after. All who had been confined on his account, were restored to their estates; and Luft Ali Khân discharged out of prison, only refunding the plunder taken by him f on the frontiers*.

THE Lesji had, in 1719, with a body of more than 30,000 men, in the night, surprised The Georgi- the Khân of Shamakhiya, in Skîrwân, with an army of 40,000. On this occasion, the Khân ans disgusted was slain, with a considerable part of his troops: but understanding that Vushtanga, Wâli of Georgia, had gotten together 60,000 men, and concluding it was to punish them for the

* KRUSINSK. p. 220, & seqq. HANWAY ibid. p. 71, & seqq.

† Ibid. ibid. p. 223, & seqq. &

(T) It is famous for the beauty of the fashies and stuffs made there. The wool of which they are made, is allowed to be the best and finest known; and draws thither many Indian merchants. Hanway.

(U) Or rather put out, by drawing some red hot piece of metal before his eyes.

(W) His estate, by his own acknowledgement, amounted to 900,000 Tomâns, or 2,250,000 pounds sterling.

ravages made in his territories, in his absence, they sent to implore the clemency of Shâh Huseyn, and intreat him to interpose his authority in their favour. The chief Mullah and physician reflecting, that a son-in-law of the late prime minister was brother to Vashtanga, were afraid lest this prince, after defeating the Lesji, might attempt to oblige the court to punish them for their iniquitous conduct. They therefore alarmed the Shâh with dangers from the Georgian prince; and then counselled him, that the only way to prevent them, was to grant a peace to the Lesji, and order the Wâli to forbear hostilities. This was done in such an imperious tone, that Vashtanga, already on his march, ordering the courier into his presence, drew his sabre, and swore he would never fight again in the service of his king, or in defence of Persia.

Bâhrayn restored.

A. D. 1721.

THIS treaty, with the restitution of the island Bâhrayn, for 8000 Tomâns (or 20,000 pounds), seemed to promise tranquility to Persia, especially as the Afghâns, intimidated by their late defeat, were ready to come to an accommodation; and Douri Effendi, the Turkish ambassador, whose arrival alarmed the timorous Huseyn, had assured him, that his master was determined to observe the peace. In April the court was informed, that the Abdolis had made such bold incursions, that Herât, and its dependencies, if not secured, would soon be obliged to submit; and that the 26th of the same month, Tauris, the second city in Persia, and capital of Azerbijân, was destroyed by an earthquake, with near 100,000 of the inhabitants. Shâh Huseyn returned to Ispâhân the first of June: towards the end of which, the sun disappeared for ten days, and gave little more light than when totally eclipsed; the horizon being covered with a red cloud. The astrologers being consulted, some predicted an earthquake like that at Tauris; others a general conflagration, by fire from heaven. The affrighted Shâh was weak enough to quit his palace, and lodge in tents; while the inhabitants, following the example of the king, and his court, all the gardens and public squares were filled with people².

The Lesji conquer Shîrwân.

THE Lesji, freed from their fears of Vashtanga, and confiding in his oath, unmindful of their obligations to Huseyn, in spring 1721, made an irruption into Shîrwân, with 15,000 men, under Soltân Ibrâhîm and Dawd Beg, their chiefs. Their pretence for this revolt was the disgrace of Fatey Ali Khân, who had been condemned, they said, only because he was descended from their antient sovereigns. After over-running the flat country, they sat down before Shamakhiya the 15th of August, in hopes to take it by favour of the inhabitants, who were mostly Sunni. The governor Huseyn Khân, apprehensive of the danger from them, made the best defence he could without rallying; but, after twenty-five days siege, those of that party found means to open one of the gates to the enemy. The governor, who too late endeavoured to escape, being pursued, was taken, and put to the acutest tortures, as they imagined he had buried his treasures. Whether he had or not, he confessed none; for which reason the barbarians cut him in pieces, with his nephew and another of his relations, whose bodies they threw to the dogs. They put to the sword 4000 Shiay, and plundered the foreign merchants. They soon became masters of the rest of Shîrwân; and then passing the Kûr, defeated 40,000 Persians under the Khân of Iriwân, who shut himself up in Ganjr, where they besieged him.

So many misfortunes on the back of each other completed the consternation of the court; and Shâh Huseyn, like all weak princes, who impute the fatal effects, naturally resulting from their own misconduct, to the wrath of heaven, bent his whole attention to appease it, by acts of humiliation and prayer; while his wicked ministers, who had brought down all those evils, instead of being put to death for their crimes, were still continued in the management of public affairs.

The Afghâns take heart.

THE defeat of the Afghâns before Kermân, and the preparations which Luft Ali Khân was making for the siege of Kandabâr, had so disheartened them, that they waited only for his approach to sue for peace: but, when they heard that he was imprisoned, and his army disbanded, their courage returned; and Mîr Mahmûd recovered his credit, which had been sunk, with the people. The first thing he did was to raise troops, and put the province in a good condition of defence. When this was done, the thoughts of invading Persia revived in him afresh; and the feeble state, which that country was in at that juncture, flattered his hopes. The province of Kandabâr, Herât, Sablestân, Makrân, and Dâghestân, had thrown off the yoke; Sâjestân, Kermân, and the greater part of Khorassân, had been laid waste, while the dispersion of Luft Ali Khân's army, and the oath of the Wâli of Georgia, rendered Persia intirely defenceless³.

Mahmûd sets out.

THESE arguments, accompanied with proper acts of liberality, soon brought the Afghâns to enter into his views. Fifteen thousand presently enlisted themselves under his banners; a and no sooner did the news of the intended expedition reach the neighbouring states, than the Abdolis, Balochis, with the inhabitants of Kabul, and the adjacent parts, flocked to him. These made an army of 25,000 men (W); with which crossing the desert of Sajestán, with the same fatigue as he had done the year before, towards the beginning of January, 1722, A. D. 1722. he reached Kermán. The city being peopled mostly by Parsís (X), and Indians, who considered them as friends, soon submitted: but all his attempts against the citadel were baffled by the strength of the place, and bravery of the garrison. This distracted him. He saw, that if he persisted in the siege, he should destroy all his army; and that, to break it up, would prove his utter disgrace. He was thus reduced to the brink of despair, when the governor, either disheartened by such vigorous attacks, or for want of provisions, offered him b 2,500 Tomâns (or 6,250 pounds) to withdraw his forces. The proposal was accepted with joy: and Mahmûd, having recruited his loss of 4,000 men, in the march and in the siege, with Parsís, who are numerous in Kermán, took the road to Yazd, about seventy leagues distant, through a sandy country. As soon as he arrived, he assaulted the city on every side; but, being repulsed with loss, would hazard no more. He therefore proceeded forward, resolving nothing should stop him till he arrived at Ispâhân, which was his reason for taking the roads least inhabited.

² KRUSINSKI'S Revol. Pers. vol. i. p. 266. & seqq. HANWAY ibid. p. 81. & seqq. vol. ii. p. 1. & seqq. & p. 93. & seqq.

³ Ibid. ibid.

At length, having passed through the plains, which lie between the cities of Pabunavens and Biben, he entered the cultivated country, which the people deserted for fear. Here he defeated some troops of observation, and went on: but, when within four days march of the capital, he was met by two officers deputed by Mohammed Kâli Khân, then prime minister. By these he was offered 15,000 Tomâns (or 37,500 pounds), on condition that he should neither proceed any further, nor ravage the territory of Ispâhân. Mahmûd, judging from hence of the weakness of the court, dismissed the deputies without giving them an answer, and advanced hastily to Gulnabâd (Y): a village within three leagues of that city, where he pitched his camp^b.

This unexpected visit of the Afghâns, at a time when the court was wholly unprepared to receive them, threw the ministers into the greatest consternation. However as something must be done, they collected the few troops which were at hand; and to these they joined the militia, raised in a hurry in the city and the neighbourhood. A Divân was called to deliberate on measures; but, as in times of distress, when unanimity in sentiments is most necessary, the pusillanimity of some, and wickedness of others, generally create perplexity, so the council was divided in opinion. The prime minister was for intrenching the army, to cover the town, and not hazarding a battle. He urged, "that, by this means, the militia would be emboldened, and the provincial troops have time to join them; that, if the rebels attempted to force their lines, they would be fought to advantage; and, if they continued unactive in their camp, it would be easy to cut off their provisions." On the contrary, Abdallab Khân, Wâli of Arabia, treating the Afghâns as slaves, and with the greatest contempt, was for attacking them without delay; insisting, "that the honour of the king and of the nation was concerned to chastise their insolence."

e This last advice was approved of, and the 7th of March the Persian army appeared within sight of the enemy's intrenchments, but did not engage them; the 8th being fixed for the attack by the court astrologers. The centre consisted of 8000 of the king's troops, one half foot, covered by twenty-four pieces of cannon, under Shaykh Ali Khân; the right wing formed of 2000 Kûlams, or king's slaves, was commanded by Rostam Khân, brother of Vashtanga, Wâli of Georgia. It was strengthened with 3000 Arab horse by the Wâli (Z) of Arabia, who shared the general command with the prime minister. This minister headed the left wing, composed of the king's household, and was joined by Ali Merdan Khân, Wâli of Lori-stân (A), with 500 horse. They had besides 18,000 infantry of militia armed with muskets; in all near 50,000 fighting men.

f MAHMUD's army, consisting chiefly of horse, were not above half that number, armed with a sabre and lance: many of them carry pistols also. Their defensive weapons are a buckler and cuirass, made of hard leather doubled. They were divided into four bodies: the right wing, which was most numerous, under the command of Aman Ola, a native of Kâbul; who, from a Darwîsh, choosing a military life, joined Mahmûd as an ally with a large body

^b KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 7, & seqq. HANWAY ibid. p. 98, & seqq.

(W) According to Krusinski's account, vol. ii. p. 12, he left Kandahâr with about 54,000 men, and lost 14,000 before Kermân.

(X) Parsî is the name by which the old Persians, who worship the fire as an emblem of the deity, are distinguished at present. Many of them are settled in India about Serât.

(Y) This name signifies conserve of roses.

(Z) He is called in Krusinski, Machmet (or Makmet) Wâli.

(A) A mountainous province, belonging now to Kûrdestân, by colonies from whence it was peopled. Beran-gerât near Hamadân is its principal fortress.

of troops, on condition of sharing equally the fruits of their conquests. Mahmúd was in the second division or centre; he gave the third to Nazr Ollab, a Parsi, one of his lieutenant-generals; the fourth and least numerous of these bodies were select Pehlaváns, or Nessakchi (B). He, in some measure, supplied the defect of cannon, which his quick march would not permit him to bring, with a kind of harquebusses which carry a handful of musket-balls. Each with its stock was carried on the back of a camel trained for the purpose^c.

of a general;

THE Persian troops made a very brilliant show; while the Afgháns appeared all in tatters, and disfigured with fatigue, in consequence of so long a march. The two armies looked at each other most part of the day; and the prime minister would fain have acted on the defensive: but the opinion of the two other generals prevailing, they began the battle, by attacking with their forces the left wing of the Afgháns, with such impetuosity, as flung them into disorder. At the same time, the Wáli of Arabia, taking a great sweep to the right, overthrew all he met, and seized the enemy's camp. Mahmúd, who observed whatever passed from a throne raised on the back of an elephant, began to think all was lost; and it is likely that had been the case, if the Wáli had returned directly, and charged the enemy in the rear. Mahmúd, terrified at the danger, was preparing for flight, and had ordered the lightest of his dromedaries to be made ready for him, when a new turn of fortune in his favour gave him new courage. The prime minister, seeing both armies engaged, charged the enemy's right wing with great bravery. Aman Ola, who commanded it, on this made a feint of giving way, and retired orderly about fifty paces; then, commanding his men to open their ranks of a sudden, 100 camels appeared kneeling with harquebusses on their backs: from whence a general discharge being made, most of the foremost rank were killed; and the rest, being vigorously attacked by the Afgháns, turned their backs.

and Persia distressed.

AMAN OLA, without giving the Persians time to recover themselves, pursued them to their battery, which he came behind; and having cut 2000 cannoneers, who guarded it, to pieces, caused the artillery to be pointed against the centre of the Persian army, who were thus put to flight before they had fought a stroke. The Wáli of Lorestán, and some Kháns, finding things grow desperate, withdrew with their troops to their respective provinces, leaving none to oppose the Afgháns but the Kúlár Agáfi. This general had already cut part of the opposite wing in pieces, and pushed the remainder as far as their intrenchments, when Mahmúd, advancing to take him in the rear, the Persians dispersed; so that the brave officer, after a desperate defence, was slain with 400 Georgians who stood firm to him. The Wáli of Arabia, who all the while remained in the Afghán camp, and would neither attack the enemy's rear, nor send succours to the generals in distress, who demanded them, had, by this time, taken the road to the town, loaded with Mahmúd's treasure, and the plunder of his camp. But the treasure, artillery, and baggage of the Persian army, made ample amends. Thus were the Persian generals and their best troops sacrificed by the treachery of a villain (C), whom yet the misguided king still confided in. His army lost 15,000 men (D): that of the Afgháns but an inconsiderable number^d.

Husseyn proposes to retreat.

ON this occasion the king called a council, in which, for once, he spoke with proper dignity and strength: for, after representing the danger his person would be exposed to, if he suffered himself to be besieged in a city destitute either of fortifications or provisions, he added, "It is not for my own security that I propose to remove: a prince, who is afraid to die with his subjects, is unworthy to rule over them. But the greater part of the provinces obey me. Their fate is connected with mine: for the rebel will be master of the empire as soon as he has my person in his power." The prime minister confirmed the king's remarks, and advised his majesty's retiring that night to Kasbín; where, being at full liberty to act, he might easily assemble an army to raise the siege. He added, that the loss of Ispáhan would be only the loss of one city: whereas, if the king should continue there, the loss of it would draw on the loss of the monarchy. This speech seemed to convince the greater

^c KRUSINSKI, ibid. p. 17, & seqq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 101, 104, & 98. & p. 105, & seqq.

^d Ibid. ibid. p. 30, & seqq.

(B) The Afgháns give this name to their forlorn hope. Hanway. Pehlaván, or Pahalarván, signifies in Persian, a brave and valiant man, or, as we say, a hero.

(C) Krusinski says, he was not the traitor then, but the Persian general.—This Arab prince, by religion a Sunni, whose father, thirty years before, had attempted to throw off the Persian yoke, either held a correspondence with Mahmúd, or was governed by the pernicious maxims of those generals, who, to prolong their own authority, do not choose to terminate a war, when it is in their power to bring things to a fortunate issue, for their sovereigns and their country. As generalissimo.

he had 50 Tománs, or 125 pounds, a day. Hanway, p. 123.

His villainy was punished afterwards by Mahmúd; not by death, but by imprisonment for life, and confiscation of his estate. He was the only minister or officer who escaped with life, of those who betrayed their king and country. He was hereditary prince of Khuzestán, the ancient Susiana, called by the Arabs, Abwáz, after its capital city. Ibid. p. 151.

(D) Krusinski says but 2000, and the Afgháns as many.

a part of the assembly: when the Wâli of Arabia, who had so basely betrayed his trust that very day, and yet, by a strange fatality, was continued in his office, stood up; and, speaking of the Afghâns as a contemptible gang of robbers, said, that to quit his capital would not only stain the honour of the Shâh, but dishearten his subjects; and open the gates to the conqueror, sooner than the force of arms.

THE boldest opinion prevailed over the most prudent. Shâh Huseyn, now ashamed to abandon Ispâhân, resolved to stay and defend it. New levies were made, the walls repaired, and intrenchments thrown up in places most exposed. The Wâli of Arabia was made governor of the city; and he of Lorestân, generalissimo of the armies. The provincial troops were sent for up; and Huseyn, now sensible of his imprudence in affronting the Wâli of Georgia, sent pressing letters, accompanied with magnificent presents, to persuade him to march to his assistance.

THE king's affair might still have been retrievable, had the same care been taken to order things within, as had been taken to order them without the city. But there they failed egregiously: for the people from the country were permitted to come into the city, and every person forbidden under pain of death to stir from thence; although there were no magazines of provisions in the place.

MEAN time Mahmûd, rather astonished at, than encouraged by, his victory, was so irresolute what course to pursue, that he neglected to carry off the cannon which had been taken in the battle. The vast extent of Ispâhân, and number of troops within it, made him judge the siege would hold out till the governors should arrive with their forces to crush him. On the other hand, he thought that he could neither with honour nor safety abandon the enterprise. His mind was thus wavering, when his spies brought him an account how matters stood in the city, and the consternation it was in. This made him resolve to push on his fortune before the enemy had time to recover themselves. With this view he began his march. The Persians, who imagined, from the artillery being abandoned by the Afghâns, that they had no intention to besiege Ispâhân, were surprised to find their whole army encamped on the 12th of the same month near Shîrestân, a town not far to the eastward. This motion so terrified them, that they abandoned the strong but magnificent palace of Farabâd, built at immense expense by Huseyn, three miles from the city; a place which might have served as a fortress to incommode the enemy. It was deserted (on the 17th) in such a hurry, that they left all the cannon behind, which the Afghâns took possession of on the 19th.

MAHMUD, being now advantageously posted, resolved to retrieve the time which he had lost by his late irresolution; and, accordingly, the same day appeared before Julfa. This is a colony of the Armenians, only a mile and half south of Ispâhân, on the south bank of the Zenderûd, or fresh river, along which it extends almost three miles. The great privileges granted them by Shâh Abbâs I. who founded the town, began by degrees to be diminished by the court; and, in the reign of Huseyn, fell into contempt. Under this oppression industry declined, and the spirit of commerce, for which they had been so long distinguished, left them. These people, though merchants, yet brave and warlike, were willing to assist their oppressors against the rebels: but the ministers, who had injured them so much, that they were afraid to trust them, instead of employing, at this very time disarmed, them. For all this new provocation, and though almost stripped of their arms, yet they bravely withstood Mahmûd's first assault, in expectation of succours from the Wâli of Arabia, who yet broke his word with them; and even hindered Sefi Mîrza, the Shâh's eldest son, from proceeding to their relief. So that it was thought to have been Huseyn's intention, by advice of this general, to sacrifice Julfa to the safety of Ispâhân; imagining that the Afghâns would be content with the wealth which they should find in that place, whose inhabitants were suspected of corresponding with the enemy.

WHILE the Armenians were preparing against a second assault, a breach was made in the earthen wall by means of an elephant, after it had been pierced by a Parsî, by favour of the night; and the Afghâns took possession, waiting only for daylight to enter. As soon as the besieged had discovered what had been done, they ransomed their lives and effects by a contribution of 70,000 Tomâns, or 175,000 pounds. Mahmûd afterwards demanded a certain number of young virgins, to be picked out of the most considerable Armenian families. All the young women above nineteen years of age, who were remarkable for their beauty, being produced, fifty were selected, and conducted to Farabâd, adorned with their richest clothes and jewels. There they were presented to the conqueror, who kept part for his own Harâm, and distributed the rest among his principal officers. The disconsolate mothers made Julfa resound with their lamentations; and some of those young maids were so shocked at their

^c HANWAY, ibid. p. 111, & seqq. & seqq.

^f KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 24, 37, & 54. HANWAY, ibid. p. 113, misfortune, that they died with excessive grief. But who will say, that any Barbarians are a incapable of compassion, or the sense of feeling for others, when he is informed, that the Afghâns sent home those who discovered most affliction, and suffered others to be ransomed by their parents? so that very few remained (E) in that kind of slavery.

and pillaged.

HOWEVER they were inexorable in regard to the contribution. The Armenians pretended they had not the money ready, but offered their bond. In this they overthot the mark. As soon as Mahmûd got it in his possession, he insisted upon their paying what money they held in their hands as part; and thereupon ordered their houses to be searched. It was then they saw their error; but it was too late to retrieve it. Their silver, jewels, and furniture, were carried off and sold. The plunder amounted to more than the sum demanded, altho' valued at 20,000 Tomâns (F). They had recourse to tortures to make the principal persons discover b their effects; but none could withstand it, except Dominic Jacques Kardians, a man of weight and figure, who would confess nothing. To avoid this tyranny, many retired to Ispâhân; among whom were the Armenian bishop, and the Romish missionaries. But Mahmûd put a stop to this desertion, and prepared to besiege that city *.

State of Ispâhân.

ISPAHAN, including its gardens and suburbs, is computed to be twenty-four miles in circuit. It was then in its highest pitch of splendor, and esteemed the most large as well as magnificent in all Asia. It contained 600,000 inhabitants, besides about 100,000 more, who resorted thither on occasion of this invasion. It stands in a plain to the north of Zenderûdb, which separates it from Julfa, and is covered with four bridges. The largest and most beautiful is that of Julfa (G); 360 geometrical paces long, and thirteen in breadth. The two extremi- c ties are flanked by four round towers, with a covered gallery, which ranges the bridge on both sides, and is finely ornamented. It is joined by two causeways made with a gentle descent to a double row of trees, 3000 paces long. This delightful alley, lined with terrasses and plane trees, is called Char Bâgh, or the four gardens. It is terminated by a large pavilion, erected in the royal garden, named Hazar-gerib, or thousand acres. The bridge of Abbas-abid is about one mile and a half to the west of the former, and belongs to the suburbs (H) of that name. The bridge of Barbarowi, not quite so far from that of Julfa to the east, nor much inferior in architecture. About one mile further eastward is the bridge of Sbirîz, near which is the village of Shabrestân before-mentioned.

The city attacked.

SUCH was the disposition of Ispâhân; before the ramparts of which Mahmûd ordered some d troops to present themselves, the same day he entered Julfa. The 21st of March, he proposed to make a general assault: but the Zenderûdb being swelled, nothing passed but some shots on both sides, at the bridges. The besieged, who observed the faint motions of the Afghâns from the tops of their terrasses, began to take heart; which Mahmûd being informed of by his spies, on the 23d caused the bridge of Sbirîz to be attacked. This was done with such resolution, that the Persians gave way at once; and the Afghâns would have entered the city with them, if they had not been stopped by Abmed Aga, a brave white eunuch, now governor of Ispâhân, who came up with some veteran troops, and drove them back to the middle of the bridge, which was cleared of them by some cannon from a neighbouring battery (I). Mahmûd might have been undone, if the Wâli of Arabia had fallen upon him at e the same time with his troops: but this treacherous general sacrificed every thing to his sinister views *.

Mahmûd proposes peace.

MAHMUD, despairing of success from the vigorous defence of the Persians, and fearing another repulse would dishearten his soldiers, resolves to make proposals of peace. He had the better colour for this, as the king, some time before, had offered him a large sum of money, with the sovereignty of Kandabâr; and also to cede to him the province of Haffaray, but refused to grant him one of his daughters in marriage (K). It was this refusal which determined him to lay siege to Ispâhân, at a time when he was thinking how to secure an honourable retreat. He now resolved to make proposals of peace on his own part, which were for the Shâh to grant him one of the princesses, with a portion of 50,000 Tomâns, or f 125,000 pounds; and, besides acknowledging him sovereign of Kandabâr and Kermân, which he already possessed, to yield him likewise the province of Khorassân.

* KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 37, 47, & seqq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 118, & seqq. b ibid. ibid. p. 48, 56, &

(E) This remainder was afterwards, when they got other Persian women, sent home. See Hanway, p. 126.

(F) Or 50,000 pounds, in part of 175,000.

(G) It is called also the bridge of Allah Werdî Khân, from the Khân who built it.

(H) It is the largest as well as most beautiful of all the suburbs of Ispâhân, of which Julfa is reckoned to be one.

It is described by Chardin, with the rest, in his voyages, 4to. tom. iii. p. 68, & seqq.

(I) Played off by one Jacobi, a Courlander, who from a cartwright was made an officer of the artillery. Hanway.

(K) To this vain refusal the loss of all was owing.

a THESE terms being rejected as dishonourable by Huseyn, who besides flattered himself, from the slow progress of the Afghâns hitherto, that the provincial troops would have time to come to his assistance, Mahmûd proposed to obtain by famine what he no longer hoped for by force: and having secretly renewed his alliance with the Wâli of Arabia, sent out several parties to ravage the district of Ispâhân. This fruitful plain contained about 1000 villages built by Abbâs the Great, and peopled from several provinces; most of which they subdued, killing most of the men, and carrying away most of the women and children, so that five or six fell to every soldier's share. Thus he cut off provisions from the city, and filled his own magazines.

b MEAN time he amused the Persians with negotiations, and recruited his army out of those who followed his camp, making the prisoners supply their places. His next view was to open a passage over the river, which he did by favour of an accident: for the last day of April, hearing that the Georgians, who guarded the bridge of Abbâs-abid, had received a quantity of spirituous liquors, he sent 1500 men to attack them. As the Afghâns found them so drunk that they could not stand, they were cut to pieces, hardly making any resistance. Thus masters of this important post, part of the army filed over the bridge, and spread themselves all round the city. Guards were placed at the principal passages; and scouts ordered to march continually from one post to another; so that Ispâhân was the same day intirely invested. The besieged, alarmed at this success, insisted on liberty to march out and attack the enemy, which they had long solicited. This indeed was the only expedient left; the c Etimâd-addawlet, or prime minister, and most of the grandees, were of this opinion; so was the king himself. But the Arabian Wâli, who had still an ascendant over his weak mind, persuaded him to wait for the succours, which he expected without ever receiving¹.

FOR the governors of the provinces believing themselves able, each separately, to beat the Persians rebels, had refused to serve under Ali Merdân Khân, Wâli of Lorestân, who, at the head of 10,000 men, waited for them to join him at Honsâr. Kassum, Khân of the Bakhtiarians (L), was the first who appeared with 12,000 horse; and, without joining the Wâli, advanced towards Ispâhân: but Aman Olla, who kept the field with a flying camp, falling on him unexpectedly, put his forces to flight, after killing 2000 on the spot. A greater misfortune still than this followed presently after. The Wâli of Lorestân had amassed a great quantity d of provisions, and designed to convoy it into Ispâhân, by forcing one of the posts of the rebels: but while he was abroad making new levies, one of his brothers, who had before supplanted him in his command of Wâli, corrupting part of the troops, joined the Khân of Hamadân, and marched with his convoy towards the city. These two chiefs had 6000 men, and hoped to join the troops of Kokbilân on their march. Instead of this they fell in with the Afghâns under Aman Olla, who defeated them; but he stained his victory by his cruelty and breach of faith: for, though part of the Persians laid down their arms, on promise of quarter, yet he saved only those from whom he expected ransoms, suffering the rest to be massacred in cold blood. Above 3000 fled, among whom was the brother of the Wâli. But he did not long escape punishment; for Ali Merdan Khân, provoked at e an action which defeated the chief hopes of the empire, sacrificed this unnatural brother to his own resentment, and to the public vengeance.

AMAN OLLA however did not enjoy the fruits of his success; for the inhabitants of Ebn Ispâhân (M), a town situate on the side of a hill, three miles from the city, assisted by others, fled thither for shelter from the neighbouring places. These having received intelligence, that the Afghâns were on their return much fatigued, and, without observing any order, attacked them with such fury, that they put them to flight, and seized on their baggage, as well as recovered the convoy. Mahmûd was so provoked at this disgrace, that he immediately set out with a body of horse, and overtook them before they got home. But these peasants gave him such a resolute reception, that, after cutting part of f his troops in pieces, they obliged him to turn his back, and leave them a considerable number of prisoners, among whom were his uncle, his younger brother, and two of his cousins. Who will say, that a regular militia are not fit to defend their country and possessions, when undisciplined peasants can perform such exploits*?

MAHMUD, at his wit's end for this fresh disgrace, but more on account of his captive relations, sent to intreat Shâh Huseyn to interpose in their behalf. This prince, who expected an Rejected by the Shah.

Besieges Ispâhân.

Persians defeated.

Disgrace of the Afghans.

Mahmûd in despair.

¹ KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 27, 61, & seqq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 124, & seqq. & p. 127, & seqq.

* Ibid. ibid. p. 67, &

(L) Bakhtiâr, in Persic, signifies happy. These people inhabit the east part of the desert west of Ispâhân: they live mostly in tents, and are divided into two tribes, called Chabor Ling and Esh Ling. They pretend to have embraced Christianity under Constantine the Great. Their Khân resides at Honsâr. Hanway.

(M) That is, the Son of Ispâhân; as much as to say, Little Ispâhân.

accommodation, sent an officer of his court to Ebn Ispâhân: but he arrived too late; for a he saw their bodies fixed on stakes. This they told the officer was to revenge the late perfidious slaughter committed by the Afghâns in cold blood. Mahmûd, however, who would not allow of the law of reprisals in a case which so sensibly touched him, in his turn ordered all the Persians in his power to be massacred; and forbade his soldiers from thenceforth to grant any quarter to the enemy. After this he fell into a kind of despondency: and, having reinforced the guards of the bridge of Abbâs-abâd, with the other posts, and leaving only a small garrison in Julfa, he ordered the remainder to return to Parabâd, as if he intended to secure his retreat.

All advantages lost.

A. D. 1722.

THE fate of the empire was then in the king's hands. He might easily have recovered the bridge of Abbâs-abâd, and forced those posts which were too far asunder to support each other; or, if he had but made a motion that way, it is likely the enemy would have abandoned their several stations, and, instead of besieging, been besieged themselves. The Armenians of Julfa, though accused of favouring the rebels, gave notice of their consternation; and offered to put the garrison to the sword as soon as they should see the king's troops in action. The troops indeed had his orders to act; but the Wâli of Arabia, by his affected delays and neglects, gave the Afghâns leisure to provide for their security. In short, after wasting time without doing any thing, he led the troops back into the city; pretending the forces he expected to join him did not come up, and that he could not depend on the promise of so suspected a people as the Armenians. This step saved Mahmûd; and the defeat of the Khân of Kobkîlân soon after, who out of 10,000 men lost 2000, revived his hopes; while the refusal of Vashtonga, Wâli of Georgia, to assist the Shâh, which at this time arrived, completed the despair of the court: for, being deprived of this hope, they had no other left, since they found that the provincial governors would not submit to the authority of the Wâli of Lorestân.

Tahmâsp Mirza

SHAH HUSSEYN now thought it high time to enter into measures to prevent the whole royal family from being involved in one common ruin. This monarch had 14 sons and four daughters. Three days after the battle of Ghulnabâd he had declared Abbâs Mirza, the eldest, his successor to the throne, and resigned the government into his hands. This young prince, being of a warm temper, and disdaining to dissemble, began his administration with ordering the Wâli of Arabia, the first physician, and some other persons of figure, to be put to death; and happy would it have been, if his orders had been executed. Instead of that, they prevailed on his infatuated father to shut him up again in the Saray, where the princes are always confined. Sefi Mirza, the next, was substituted in his place, but returned to the same prison about a month after, as being judged too weak to govern. The third brother, who was thought to have had too much devotion for a king, being overlooked, Tahmâsp Mirza, the fourth, was, towards the end of May, acknowledged presumptive heir of the crown (N)¹.

escapes to Kâf-bîn.

THE king resolved to send this young prince out of Ispâhân, as well to take from his generals all pretence for not assembling under his command, as to secure the succession. He set out the 21st of June in the night, escorted by 300 chosen horse from the gate Tokchi. The Afghâns posted to block up this avenue, were commanded by Mohammed Amîr, surnamed Asbrâf Soltân, son of Mir Abdallah, whom Mahmûd had deprived of his throne and life in Kandahâr. This young prince, dissembling the aversion which he had conceived against his father's murderer, behaved with so much valour and prudence, that at length he gained his confidence, as well as the esteem of the whole army. This post was the best guarded, as by this passage the city could most conveniently receive succours; but weakened by the detachment made from the army under Aman Olla, which at this time consisted of no more than 100 men. This small body, being vigorously attacked by the prince's convoy, was defeated, and lost 30 men.

THIS escape of the heir to the crown threw the Afghâns into a consternation, expecting his return quickly at the head of an army; and Mahmûd, in his fury, said, it would be to little purpose to reduce the capital, since there would be still a prince able to dispute the throne with him. As for Asbrâf, he accused him of corresponding with the enemy, and condemned him to death: but this young prince justified his conduct so effectually before an assembly of the principal officers, that they acquitted him; and Mahmûd, disguising his jealousy (O), restored Asbrâf to his employments.

¹ KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 71, & seqq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 130, & seqq.

(N) This prince's right name is Tamâshch, which, in the ancient Persic, signifies most pure. HANWAY. The true spelling is Tâmâsch, or Tâmâsch, as hath been remarked before.

(O) It is likely he wanted a pretence to cut him off; for, we are told, that Mahmûd's mother, who was extremely fond of this young lord, had by her intreaties saved him more than once from the cruelty of her son. As this last had neither children nor brother, of a proper age to succeed him, Asbrâf might be considered as his heir: and this is urged as a reason why it is not likely that he was false to his trust.

a MEAN time Tabmâsp Mirza, having reached Kasbîn, spared no pains to compass his father's delivery: but, as authority is an empty name where there is no force to support it, so neither his orders nor entreaties could prevail. Thus the king scarcely received any assistance from near 50,000 regular troops, which were quartered on those frontiers (P). The feudatory princes, being less interested than the natural subjects in preserving the monarchy, shewed but little zeal on the occasion; and many considered the distress of the sovereign as a proper opportunity to recover their independency. In short, the Wâli of Lorestân, seeing the impossibility of assembling an army, marched back from Honsâr to his own country. Tabmâsp still hoped to find more submission in the Shâb Seven (Q); but, having summoned this militia, most of the lords pretended they were not obliged to march, unless the king b commanded in person; and the small number furnished by the rest, consisted only of peasants ill kept and ill paid, who took the first opportunity to disband^m.

At Ispâhân provisions daily grew scarcer; and, as every body saw that there was no way to procure any but by opening a passage for the purpose, the people insisted on having the posts of the enemy attacked. But when any persons applied to the king, he referred them to the Wâli of Arabia; and this general flattered them with hopes of the prince's return. It is true, he sometimes marched out to avoid their importunities: but he immediately came back without attempting any thing, under the idle pretext that his astrologers declared, that the hour was not favourable. Growing tired with these evasions, in the beginning of July they assembled in a tumultuous manner, demanding, that Shâb Hufseyñ should come forth, and lead c them against the enemy. He let them know by some officers, that he would give his answer next day: but, the populace insisting that he should appear himself, the eunuchs dispersed them by firing some muskets from the palace. Such provocation at this time might have occasioned a general insurrection, if Abmed Aga, governor of Ispâhân, had not put himself at the head of a body of veteran troops, which, with the people who joined him, made near 30,000 men. With these he marched out of the city, followed by the Wâli of Arabia and his Arabs. A. D. 1715

THIS gallant eunuch immediately fell with great impetuosity on one of the enemy's principal posts, which he forced, and would have maintained his ground, altho' part of the rebel army came to its assistance, if he had not been deserted by the Wâli of Arabia. Abmed, provoked at such infamous behaviour, ordered his men to fire on the Arabs; and Tabmâsp Khân d to attack them. The Afghâns, taking advantage of this dissention, vigorously charged the Persians, who, being almost hemmed in, were obliged to abandon the post and retire. Thus the opportunity was lost of bringing in the convoy of provisions from Ebn Ispâhân by the treachery of the Wâli: yet Hufseyñ was so deluded by his artful discourse, as to impute the misfortune intirely to Abmed Aga; and not only refused to hear his defence, but took the government of the city from him. The faithful eunuch, unable to survive this disgrace, a few days after died, whether by grief or a dose of poison, is uncertainⁿ.

ALL hopes of succours were now vanished; and the besieged, already pressed by famine, deserted in crowds, altho' the Afghâns slew all the Persians who fell into their hands (O). Whether the Shâb at length began to suspect the fidelity of the Wâli of Arabia; or hoped to change his fortune by changing his general, he offered the command of his troops to Luft Ali Khân: but this lord finding the forces so weak, that he could not rely on them, and warned by what he had already suffered from the intrigues of the ministers, he constantly refused to accept of it. Hufseyñ, therefore, in despair, either of receiving any succours from abroad, or any relief from his people within the walls, resolved to renew the negotiations which the enemy had set on foot at the beginning of the siege. He sent the Kurchi Bâshi to Fabrâbâd to offer Mahmûd the terms which he had demanded, namely one of his daughters in marriage, with 50,000 Tomâns (or 125,000 pounds), and the sovereignty of the provinces of Khorassân, Kermân, and Kandahâr: but that prince, too well acquainted with the state of affairs, now rejected them d with disdain, answered almost on the same terms he once did in a like occasion, "The king ⁿ HANWAY, ibid. p. 137, & seq.

^m KRUSINSK. p. 79, & seqq. HANWAY, ibid. p. 134, & seq.

(P) Shâb Soleyman, the predecessor of Hufseyñ, maintained 130,000 men on the frontiers, without reckoning his household troops, which were 14,000 men. Krusinsk. Hanw.

(Q) That is, the well-affected to the king. This militia is very little different from that of the Zaims and Timariots in Turky. It was established by Abbas the Great, and consisted of persons chosen among the nobility, to whom he gave lands, on condition that they should lead a certain number of their vassals into the field when the Shâb should require them. This body, which at that time amounted to 300,000 men, was the last resort in any extremity, or sudden danger. But as, under the late reigns, very little care had been taken to oblige the holders of those hereditary possessions to discharge their duty, they no longer looked on them in any other light than as legal estates. Krusinsk. Hanw.

(O) About this time, Krusinski, the Jesuit, author of the memoirs from whence part of this history is compiled, obtained leave to remove to Julfa. Two other missionaries of the same order attempted to escape with the French consul to Shirâz. One of them was killed with some other Europeans; but the consul, tho' wounded, escaped with several others of his little troop.

“ of Persia, said he, offers me nothing which is in his disposal; this prince and the prin- a cesses are already in my power: he is no longer master of those three provinces which he offers me. The fate of the whole empire is now to be decided between us.”

A governor's disloyalty.

THUS things stood, when news came that Meluk Mahmúd, governor of S. j. fán, was arrived at Gulnabád with 10,000 regular troops. This event raised the hopes of Sh. b. Huseyn, and threw the Afghán prince into despair. The siege had already cost him 2000 men: and he concluded, that the forces within the city, when joined by the Sajestán troops, would be an overmatch for him. He therefore thought it the best expedient to tempt the fidelity of his new enemy. Nazr-Ullab was dispatched to Gulnabád with such magnificent presents, as rather betrayed the fear than expressed the liberality of the donor: but they dazzled the eyes of Meluk too much for him to perceive it; and the offer of assistance to invest him in the sovereignty of any province he should choose, determined him at once to agree to the proposal of Nazr-Ullab, who, at the same time, gave him to understand, that the empire being attacked on every side, and the capital at the last extremity, could not avoid its approaching ruin. Meluk Mahmúd made Korassán his choice, as lying near Kandahár and Herat, from whence, in case of need, he might be readily assisted; and, having concluded the treaty, set out to take possession of his new dominions °.

Completes Huseyn's
ruin.

MASHHAD (P), the capital of that country, was then in the hands of the Abdallis and Uzbeks; who had taken it by storm after a few days siege. But whether they had no further view than to pillage, and had abandoned it, or the thing was concerted with the Afghán prince, Meluk was received on the 20th of November; and, as Ismael Khán, governor of the province, unable to oppose him, had retired to Kashin, the other cities of Khorassán, knowing he was a Shiay, made no difficulty to acknowledge him for their sovereign. The defection of this general put an end to all Huseyn's hopes of relief; and, his treasure being now exhausted, all the gold and silver plate in the palace was carried to the mint. When this was gone, his last shift was to borrow considerable sums on his jewels of different merchants (Q). At length, the latter end of September, when there was neither money nor provisions left, this unfortunate prince ordered his ministers to go and treat for a capitulation.

He submits to Mahmúd.

As Mahmúd had it in his power to command what terms he pleased, he might have finished the negotiation at once: but this would not answer his views. He saw that he could not be safe in Ispáhán, so long as the inhabitants were greatly superior in number to his troops. He might indeed have destroyed them at once by a general assault, as his chief officers advised him, but he was either afraid of losing part of his best troops, or the great riches of the place by the plunder of the soldiers. He resolved therefore to destroy them by famine before he signed the treaty; and, for this end, lay still within his lines during the last two months of the siege. What heart can, without the utmost horror, reflect on the dreadful effects of this artful conduct! In August, horses, mules, and other beasts were so excessive dear, that none but the king and principal lords, or wealthiest inhabitants, could afford to eat of their flesh. Dogs and other unclean animals were consumed in a few days. And when the bark of trees, leaves, and leather, the food which succeeded, failed, they were obliged to have recourse to human flesh. Never was so much of it eaten in any siege; and, when dead bodies were not to be found, they sometimes murdered their fellow-citizens, or children, to appease their raging hunger. Many, rather than prolong life a little by such shocking means, chose to poison themselves and their families. The streets, the squares, and very gardens of the palace, were strewn with dead, which the living had not strength to bury. The water of the river was so corrupted with carcases thrown into it, that it could not be drank; and, in a less wholesome climate (R), the few remaining people must have been destroyed by the infected air. It was in vain to fly to Julfa; all who attempted, men, women, and children, excepting the Armenians, were sure to meet with death °.

Sets out of Ispáhán,
A. D. 1716.

MIR MAHMUD, having at length agreed to terms, on the 21st of October, Sh. b. Huseyn, clad in mourning, went out of his palace on foot, and walked through the principal street of Ispáhán, bewailing aloud the misfortunes of his reign, which he imputed to the bad counsels of his ministers. He endeavoured to comfort the multitude, who surrounded him, with the hopes of their meeting a better fate under a new government; while the people, pierced with ° HANWAY, ibid. p. 139, & seq.

° Id. ibid. p. 141, & seq.

(P) That is, the place of martyrdom, so called from Imám Ridha, or Riza, one of the twelve Imáms who was slain and buried there. Its proper name is Fás, or Tows. The great Abbás made it a place of pilgrimage, to divert the Persians of the Shiay sect from repairing to Mashhad Ali, near Hellab in Irakamí, which carried much wealth out of the kingdom.

(Q) Especially the English and Dutch, which last lent him 340,000 crowns.

(R) Mr. Hanway says, that the air of Ispáhán is remarkably rarefied; and that it resembles much that of Madrid, as he had been assured by a Jesuit who lived many years in both cities.

a grief, lamented the disgrace to which they beheld their good-natured prince reduced, after a reign of 23 years. Huseyn, having thus taken his leave of his subjects, the next day sent plenipotentiaries to sign the capitulation, by which he obliged himself to resign the empire, together with his person, and principal officers of the court, into the conqueror's hands. On the other side, Mahmûd engaged that no ill treatment should be offered, either to the king, the nobility, or any of the inhabitants. The 23d Mahmûd sent horses for the king and his court; who, having sacrificed five camels (S), mounted on horseback accompanied with about 300 persons, among whom were the Wâli of Arabia, the Etimâd-addawlet, a brother of the Wâli of Lorestân, and the principal lords of the court. They moved on slowly, with their eyes fixed on the ground; and the few inhabitants, who had strength to attend this mournful b cavalcade, expressed their grief by a gloomy silence.

It was now past noon, when two couriers arrived to give notice to the grand master of the ceremonies (T) of Mahmûd's court, that the king was drawing near. To humble the Persians still more, the same couriers were sent back with orders to the Shâh, to halt at the foot of a hill near the camp, under pretence that Mahmûd was asleep: thus the unhappy Huseyn was treated with marks of servitude, even before he had quitted the ensigns of royalty. He tarried about half an hour at the place prescribed, and then, obtaining leave to continue his march, he arrived at Farâbid, where the Afghân chief had his head quarters. The grand master of the ceremonies introduced him into a hall, at the corner (U) of which Mahmûd was seated, leaning on a cushion of cloth of gold. The king advancing towards the middle of c the chamber, saluted him, saying, Salâm aleyokom, that is, All hail (W). The Afghân then rose up and returned the salute with the same compliment. After which, the Etimâd-addawlet conducted the Shâh to another corner on the left of Mahmûd, where a like place was prepared for him.

THE king, being seated, opened the conversation by saying, "Son, since the great sovereign of the world is no longer pleased that I should reign, and the morning is come which he hath pointed out (X) for thee to ascend the throne of Persia, I resign the empire to thee with all my heart: I wish that thou mayest rule it in all prosperity." At the same time he took the royal plume of feathers (Y) from his turbân, and gave it to Mahmûd's grand Wazîr. But that prince refusing to receive it from his minister, the king stood up, and, d taking it again, fastened it himself to the usurper's turbân, who still continued sitting, saying, Reign in peace: after which he retired, and sat down in his place. Coffee and tea were afterwards served up, when the Afghân prince, taking these liquors, addressed himself to the Shâh after this manner; "Such is the instability of human grandeur: God disposes of empires as he pleases, and takes them from one nation to give them to another: I promise to consider you always as my own father; and I will undertake nothing for the future without your advice." After these words, Huseyn was invited in another apartment which had been appointed for him; and 4000 Afghâns were ordered to take possession of the royal palace, and the gates of the city. Thus the dynasty of the Seffis, or Safi's, ended in the person of e this prince, the 10th successor of Ismael, its founder, after having lasted 223 years¹.

f This prince was ruined by the incapacity and negligence of his ministers, corrupt through avarice, and divided into factions from ambitious views: which is always the case, when, through the weakness or indolence of the sovereign, the administration of affairs is left wholly to the management of his favourites, who seldom have either virtue, knowledge, or capacity, for government.

It was some consolation however to the Persians, in their afflictions, to see those traitors punished who had corresponded with the enemy, or otherwise contributed to the ruin of the state, through neglect, ignorance, or party quarrels. They were all put to death, excepting some few whose estates were confiscated, and themselves sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. The thing most to be regretted is, that, among those few were the Wâli of Arabia (Z), the chief physician, and the chief eunuch, who deserved to die by the most exquisite tortures. At the

¹ HANWAY ibid. p. 143—149.

(S) Perhaps the only camels he had left. Mr. Hancarley, or his author, says, they were killed without any ceremony; nor does he know for what purpose this sacrifice was ordered. That of one camel, prescribed by the laws, should have been made at Âshka the 10th of the preceding moon.

(T) Estâ A. dî.

(U) The corner is the most honourable place in oriental countries. It is also the most commodious, as it is the only one in which a person can lean on both sides on the cushions which are placed round the walls.

(W) This compliment is seldom made, but to persons of the same persuasion in religion. It is the highest expression of respect.

(X) These words are conformable to the Mohammedan doctrine of predestination.

(Y) This plume of feathers is called Jiga, and is the mark of sovereignty.

(Z) It is thought, Mahmûd had taken an oath not to put him to death. Kryfnyk, vol. ii. p. 101.

same time that the traitors were punished, the Etimâd-addawlet, Luft Ali Khân (A), and other faithful ministers, were not only spared, but raised to posts of honour and trust by the conqueror.

WHAT person, who reads the history of this strange revolution, will any more wonder at the conquest of Mexiko by Cortes; who, besides his Spaniards, skilled in the art of war, and armed with cannon as well as muskets, was assisted by 100,000 Tlaskallans, a nation of Indians, equally as brave as the Mexikans themselves?

(A) Although he had always avoided entering into any engagements prejudicial to the interest of his late sovereign, yet Mahmûd hoping to win him, loaded him with favours. In Dec. 1723 he fled with design to serve Tabmâsp; but being taken at Ebn Ippâhân, and brought back, Mahmûd in his rage hewed him in pieces. Krusinski. p. 172.

S E C T. IV.

An account of the Afghân princes, and descendants of Shâh Hufseyn who usurped the Persian crown during his imprisonment, till the death of Kûli Khân.

Mahmûd ascends the throne.

A. D. 1685.

THE 27th of October, being the day appointed for the Afghân prince to ascend the throne, Mahmûd marched out of the camp towards the city, preceded by a numerous train both of horse and foot. The deposed king rode on his left side; they were followed by the principal officers of his conqueror's court; and after them came those of Hufseyn's, mixed with the croud of Afghân officers. The whole closed with 100 camels, each carrying an arquebus, 600 musicians, and 6000 horse. As soon as they had passed over the bridge of Sbirâz, the Shâh was conducted across the gardens of the palace to the place of his confinement; Mahmûd thinking it impolitic to lead him in triumph through the city. The inhabitants received him with the honours of a king, spreading the street with carpets, and filling the air with perfumes. The guns on the camels were often fired; and in the intervals, ten Afghâns, at the head of the procession, pronounced loud imprecations against the followers of Ali.

THE new monarch, being arrived at the palace, mounted the throne, and was a second time saluted king of Persia by the captive Hufseyn, brought for that purpose. After which he received the oath of allegiance from the princes, ministers, and grandees, as well as chief officers and citizens. The artillery of the town and citadel proclaimed this news to the people; and the ceremony concluded with an entertainment given by the Soltân (which title Mahmûd assumed) to the deputies, who, in the name of the whole city, came to acknowledge his authority.

His prudent conduct.

SOLTAN MAHMUD began his reign with great lustre, and displayed the abilities of a consummate statesman. He confirmed the Persian officers in their employments, only associating with each a colleague of his own nation. He left no other post, except that of a Divân Beghî, intirely to an Afghân; and administered justice with so much rectitude, as soon reconciled the Persians to his government, which they found far preferable to that of their own ministers under Shâh Hufseyn. He likewise gave content to the consuls of European nations, who were confirmed in their privileges. He indeed reduced the late Shâh's train of women and eunuchs to five of each: yet shewed a great regard for this prince, whom he consulted on every occasion; and omitted nothing to make him easy under his misfortunes. He gave one of his daughters in marriage to his own Mianghî (B), in imitation of Hufseyn, who had bestowed another on the Sedr Al Sberibab, or chief justice, and married the youngest himself. This induced the dethroned monarch to ratify his abdication by a circular letter, and enjoined all his late subjects to acknowledge the victor's authority.

Kazbîn taken and recovered.

MEAN time Tabmâsp Mirza having assumed the title of Shâh at Kazbîn, the new king took that pretext to levy money for carrying on the war. He demanded of the citizens 120,000 Tomâns (C), and taxed the chief physician, who had been one of the prime instruments of Hufseyn's ruin, at 20,000 (D). With these sums he sent to raise new forces at Kandahâr; but the officer employed for that purpose, was defeated, and the money seized by the governor of Banda, a fortress in Sejestân. Aman Olla, who was dispatched with 10,000 troops against Kazbîn, took that city, from whence Tabmâsp fled to Taceris, in December. But the avarice of the general, and the licentiousness of his soldiers, caused the inhabitants to rise, in January 1723, and drive them out again.

^r KRUSINSKI'S Revol. Pers. vol. ii. p. 98, & seqq. HANWAY'S Trav. vol. iii. p. 148, & seq. ^s Idem ibid. p. 10, & seqq. HANW. ibid. p. 150, & seq.

(B) The Mianghî is the same whom the Turks call Misri.

(C) Or 300,0000 pounds sterling.
(D) Or 50,000 pounds.

^a THE Afghâns lost 1600 men in the action at Kazbîn; and Aman Olla was wounded with a Mahmûd's musket ball in the shoulder. Mahmûd, much alarmed at this disaster, caused public rejoicings ^{cracly.} to be made at Ispâhân, as if his troops had gained a victory. However, to prevent the like ^{A. D. 1723.} danger in that metropolis, he caused the ministers, lords, and other Persian chiefs, to be massacred at an entertainment which he made for that purpose. Two hundred youths of the first nobility of Persia and Georgia were brought from the academy, and cruelly butchered. Three thousand men of Hufseyñ's troops, whom he had taken into pay, underwent the same fate. This was not all; for he ordered his soldiers to put every man to the sword who had at any time received either salary or pension from the Shâh's exchequer; which execution lasted fifteen days. After this, he secretly put to death a great number of the inhabitants of Ispâhân ^b able to bear arms, and extorted large sums of money, not only from the Persians and Armenians, but from the English, Dutch, Indians, and other foreign merchants.

WHILE Mahmûd was employed in slaying the people, and taking the towns in the neighbourhood of Ispâhân, Shâh Tahmâsp remained at Tauris, giving himself up to pleasures, and ^{Tahmasp's} neglecting his affairs, for which, coming raw from the Harâm, he had no capacity. He removed Vashtangâ, Wâli of Georgia; and hearing that Mahmûd was marching against him with 10,000 men, sent Feridûn, Khân of the Kürds, against him with 8000 choice troops; but they were defeated, and 2000 slain. The loss of this battle was attended with the loss of Makon, and also of Gulpaygân (E), a town situated to the west of Kashân. The Soltân after this returning to Ispâhân, left the command of his army to Zeberdest Khân. ^{indolence.}

^c MEAN-time his dominions were attacked by two other powers much more formidable than Distressed by the Afghâns; the Russians on the north, and the Turks on the west. Soltân Ahmed III. ^{Russia;} envying the progress made by the Czar, who had subdued Daghestân and Darbend, would fain persuade him to abandon his conquests in Persia, in which he wanted to have the sole footing. But the Czar proceeding in his design, enters Khilân, or Ghilân, which submits to him; as did Georgia soon after to the Turks. Shâh Tahmâsp, being thus oppressed on all sides, sends one ambassador to the Porte, and another to Petersburg. The Turks, pretending to be offended with his applying to a Christian power for assistance against the Afghân rebels, rejected his proposal. The true reason was, that it was deemed a sin to assist heretics against true believers: ^{and the} the Persians being Shi'ay, and the Afghâns, Sunni, of which sect the Othmâns are. ^{Turks.} The Shâh's ambassador succeeded better in Russia, where a treaty was signed the 23d of September; by which it was agreed, that the Czar should drive the Afghâns out of Persia, and re-establish the government. On the other hand, Tahmâsp was to yield to the Czar the towns of Darbend and Bâkû, with the provinces of Ghilân, Mazanderân, and Astarabâd.

ABOUT the same time Luft Ali Khân, on whom favours had been heaped by the new king, fled from Ispâhân, with design to join the Shâh in Tauris; but being discovered by the people ^{Luft Ali} of Ebn Ispâhân, who had lately submitted to the Afghâns, they delivered him up to Mahmûd, ^{Khân slain.} who, in a rage, hewed him in pieces. What gave this prince much more uneasiness, Aman Ollab, being recovered of his wound, demanded the performance of his contract at setting out from Kandahâr, which was to divide with him the conquests made in Persia, on account ^{A. D. 1687.} of the assistance given in the expedition. As that general was exasperated at Mahmûd's delays, Aman Olla hearkened to the instigation of his lady, a daughter of the late Shâh's, who advised him to ^{discontented.} join his forces with those of Shâh Tahmâsp, and expel the usurper. Aman Olla set out in December, pretending to march for Kandahâr: but when Mahmûd understood, that he had changed his route, he followed him with all the forces which he could collect; and overtaking him, won him over once more with promises.

AFTER this, he joined Zeberdest Khân, to whom Kashân had just then submitted: but the joy of this success was allayed by the death of Nasr Ollab, his ablest general, slain at the ^{A Georgian} siege of Shirâz. Mahmûd, having sent Zeberdest Khân to succeed him, returned with his army to Ispâhân, in March 1724. As he entered the city, a woman disguised in man's apparel, ^{Amazon.} rode up to his troops in full gallop, and attacking them sword in hand, slew 20 of them, before she was taken, covered with wounds. She was brought before the Soltân, who being informed of her history, admired her resolution, and ordered her to be treated with extraordinary care. This woman, hearing of the death of her husband, killed at the battle of Abbâs Abâd, set out from Georgia, her native country, where she left two children in her brother's care, with a resolution to revenge his death on the first Afghân she could meet.

^f IN April the Khân of Shirâz, after an eight months siege, pressed by famine, sent to treat Afghâns ^{talâ} with Zeberdest Khân; but the Afghâns, observing that the besieged had deserted their posts, Shirâz.

^a KRUSINSK. ibid. p. 106, & seq. HANWAY, p. 160. & seq.

^b KRUSINSK. p. 126, & seq. HANW. p. 173, 182, & seq.

^c KRUSINSK. p. 132, & seq. HANW.

(F) Koulpekient by Krusinski.

detained the deputy, took the city by assault, and put all, whom they found in arms, to the sword. Some of the soldiers having found a considerable quantity of corn, concealed in the house of a private man, they tied him to a stake in his granary, where he died with hunger. From hence the general sent a detachment of 400 men into the south part of Párs. They penetrated without opposition as far as the city of Lár, which they plundered; but the castle refused to submit. The commander then pushed on to Bânder Abbâsi, or Gumrûn (F). This place had been pillaged by 4000 Ballûchis, in January 1722; but on their attempting to break into the fortresses where the English and Dutch East India companies had their counting houses, they were repulsed with considerable loss. The Afghâns did not succeed so well; for on their approach, the people retired with their effects to the mountains; and the Europeans being prepared to give them a warm reception, they accepted of a supply of provisions, and returned to Sbirâz, reduced to a handful by the malignity of the air, and badness of the water.

Checked at Gomrûn.
1724.

Miscarry against Kok-hilân.

THE acquisition of this last city giving the Afghâns new spirits, Mahmûd led them out to new conquests. He departed from Ispâhân in June, at the head of near 30,000 men, with intent to subdue the country of Kokbilân (G). But his troops were so harrassed in the way by the Arabs, that they agreed to return, on condition only of being left unmolested, and supplied with provisions. The Arabs however continued to attack them, which, with the bad air they met with, destroyed one half of his army. Mahmûd was so shocked at this disgrace, that he entered Ispâhân without the usual marks of honour; and to cheer up his soldiers, distributed among them 50,000 Tomâns (or 125,000 pounds) to indemnify them for the loss of his baggage*.

Tahmâsp's indiscretion.

THE weakness of the Afghâns at this time gave Shâh Tabmâsp a fair chance of recovering his crown. But while he should have employed his forces against his enemies, he turned them against the Armenians, his subjects, in order to compel them to pay the excessive taxes with which he had loaded them. Having by force entered and plundered some of their principal towns, those of Kâpan and Chiava took up arms, and so warmly received him, that he was obliged to come to a treaty; whereby he gained what he could not procure by foul means.

Turkish pro-
graji.

MEAN time the Turks having secured Georgia, by the defeat of Mohammed Kûli Khân, who had surrendered Teflis to them the year before, in February entered Azerbeyjân; and in two months took Khoy by storm. In June with 30,000 men, they besieged Erivan, the capital of Armenia, about six leagues from mount Ararat. It stands on the river Zenghî, which three leagues lower falls into the Arâs, and is defended with two walls, and a castle built on a steep rock. A breach was soon made; but they were defeated in three general assaults. In September more forces arriving, a fourth assault was given with worse success than before. The Turks had now lost 20,000 men, and were resolved to retire, when considerable forces arrived in their camp. This gave them new courage, and intimidated the garrison of the town, which being much reduced by losses, and in want of ammunition, as well as provisions, without hopes also of relief from Tabmâsp, the Khân surrendered it, on condition of saving the lives and effects of the inhabitants; and retired to Abr, where the Shâh then resided†.

Repulsed at Tauris.

THE Armenians of Nak Sivân, despairing of success from the Persians, and fearing the cruelty of the Turks, invited them to conquer the country: and on their appearance rose up in arms. They joined the enemy, who, driving the Persians out of that city, and Ordubâd, became masters of most part of Greater Armenia. Mean while the Bâshâ of Vân, with 25,000 men, marched towards Tauris. This city, though lately destroyed by an earthquake, was still one of the finest in all the east. But, like Sparta, its only bulwark consisted in the number and valour of its inhabitants; for it had neither walls nor artillery. The Turks crowding in were already masters of one quarter of the town, when the people blocking up the streets to hinder their retreat, cut off 4000. The Bâshâ after this being repulsed in several attacks, by his spies; and retired to Tassû, a town 20 leagues from Tauris, on the north side of the lake Shâbi. Here, to be revenged of the Persians for their gallant defence, he put to the sword the men of the neighbouring villages; and made slaves of the women and children. The inhabitants of Tauris, provoked at this cruelty, resolved to pursue the Bâshâ, who marched out to meet them with 8000 men. But most of them being slain, he fled with the rest to Khoy.

Take Hamadân.

IN the interim the Bâshâs of Bâghdâd and Bâsrâb, entering Persia with their forces, laid siege to Hamadân, to whose relief Tabmâsp sent Flagella Khân; but he was defeated. The city had held out bravely for two months, when a mine, sprung by a German renegado, made a

* KRUSINSK. p. 128, & seq. HANW. p. 188, & seq.

† KRUSINSK. p. 130, & seq. HANW. p. 191,

(F) Commonly Gombrûn, its former name.

(G) Or Kajok Kilan, as Krusinski has it. It is 10 days journey from the city of Ispâhân, on the way to Bâsrâb, or Bassora.

a large breach, at which the enemy entering, carried all before them, and made a great slaughter, till one of the generals opened a gate for the inhabitants to escape.

ALTHOUGH the Turks had made such considerable conquests in Persia, yet Soltán Ahmed was greatly dissatisfied with the cession made by Sháh Tabmásp, to Peter the Great. His commissaries at the court of Russia declared, "That Tabmásp, in his then precarious circumstances, could not alienate any of his dominions; that therefore such engagements were void: and that, as the Soltán would not suffer any foreign power to extend his dominion in Persia, the only way to preserve peace was for the Czar to relinquish all pretensions derived from that treaty, and likewise abandon his conquests along the coasts of the Caspian sea."

b As these commissaries broke off the conferences abruptly, it was thought the Porte would declare war against the Czar. The French ambassador advised the Russian resident to enter into a negotiation; but this minister declining it for want of instructions, the ambassador undertook to do it himself. The Grand Wazír, who secretly pressed this affair, found it difficult to bring the Diván into it, especially as the point was to join with a Christian power, in sharing the dominions of a Mohammedan prince. However, at length, preliminaries were signed: the first article of which was, "that Sháh Tabmásp should be obliged to send an embassy, to beg that the Soltán would set limits to his conquests, and consent to the execution of the St. Petersburg treaty." The other articles concerned the limits of conquest made, or to be made, in Persia, by either of the contracting powers. After much contest, articles of the treaty were agreed to. The first regulated the barrier between Russia and Turky, by a line, to begin 22 leagues from the Caspian sea, on the confines of Dághestán; and to pass at the like distance from Dárbend, from thence within seven leagues of the coast, including Shamakhiya; which, as stipulated by the second article, was not to be fortified by the Turks; and to terminate at the confluence of the Kúra and Arrás.

THE line separating Turky from Persia, by the third article, began where the former ended: from whence it passed three miles to the east of Ardevíl, and forward to Hamadán, whose territory it comprised; terminating at Kermán Sháh, the new conquest of the Turks. In case Tabmásp should not agree to the said limits, they were jointly to conquer the places within them, and give up the rest of the kingdom to him, independent of any foreign dependence. But in case he should agree to them, the Soltán, by the fifth article, was to acknowledge him for king of Persia; and to join his forces with those of Russia to place him on the throne, in case the usurpers should oblige him to declare war against them. Lastly, if Tabmásp should refuse to conform to the treaty, the contracting powers, after becoming masters of the provinces assigned them, should establish tranquility in the kingdom; and, without listening to any proposals of Mahmúd, deliver it into the hands of the person most deserving of it^b.

THIS treaty, which was signed the 8th of July 1725, soon came to the knowledge of Táhmásp Sháh Tabmásp, who, unable to help himself, saw his country torn from him. He ordered the Russian resident to withdraw from his court. The Czar however ordered an ambassador extraordinary, whom he had sent to that prince, to continue his journey. It is presumed, that Peter the Great would have been contented with Ghilán only, could he have thus prevented the progress of the Turks, and restored Tabmásp to his dominions.

WHILE these affairs were transacting, Mahmúd recruited his army with Dárghezins (H), some Mahmúd de- Turks, and a body of Afgháns from Kandahár. In order to retrieve his late disgrace, towards the end of December, 1724, he marched to besiege Yezd, or Yezd, with 18,000 men. As he had gained the Parísís, who dwelt there, to betray the city, he depended on success. But the plot being discovered, and the traitors put to the sword, he missed of his aim, after several fruitless assaults. At length the Afgháns being weakened by large detachments sent out to forage, the garrison sallied, and cut off 3000: so that Mahmúd was obliged to save himself by flight, leaving his baggage and artillery a prey to the Persians^c.

ON this new disgrace the soldiers grew mutinous, ascribing their late defeats to the introduction of that very effeminacy and luxury which had destroyed their enemies. They railed at Mahmúd, and loudly declared, that they could never hope for success so long as they were governed by a chief, who had adopted both the dress and religion of the conquered. This had reference to some words dropped by Mahmúd, either to vex the Turks, or flatter the Persians. Their murmurs grew the louder from the presence of Asbráf who had returned from

^a KRUSINSK. p. 141, & seq. HANW. p. 105, & seq. HANW. p. 202, & seq.

^b HANW. p. 198, & seq.

^c KRUSINSK. p. 144.

(H) Sometimes called Darguzzis. They are Mesopotamian Kurds, removed by Sháh Abbás I. to Derghezim, a town three days journey from Hamadán towards Kaf- bin. They are of the same sect with the Afgháns. Krus- sin. vol. ii. p. 115. Hanw. vol. iii. p. 163—168.

Kandabár in the last karawán. This prince, who was the son of Abdalla, had fled twice to avoid the jealousy of Mahmúd. The first time was in 1722, when, upon Husseyn's resignation, he deserted his post; and, with an escorte of 100 horse, set out for Kandabár: but being pursued, was brought back to Mahmúd, who would have put him to death, but for fear his soldiers would desert him, as they threatened, in case he offered to take away the life of Ashráf. The second time was after the revolt of Kazbin, from whence he departed for Kandabár with 300 horse, either through apprehension of a general revolt; or, more likely, for fear of Mahmúd, whom he had reason always to distrust. The army had always been extremely fond of him; and the great desire which they expressed for his return, was the chief motive of his coming back. In effect, the principal officers considering Mahmúd had no issue fit to govern, and that his health daily declined, in some measure obliged him to recall Ashráf, in order to declare him his successor. He at first treated him with all the appearances of the most tender friendship; but was no sooner informed of the murmurings of the troops, than he ordered him to be lodged in the palace, where he was strictly guarded^a.

Mahmúd turns penitent. THIS prudent step checked the mutinous designs of the soldiers; but did not make the Soltán easy in his mind; on account of his two late disgraces, which had weakened his power and authority. He therefore resolved to regain the favour of heaven by performing the Riadhiat; a kind of spiritual exercise introduced by the Indian Mohammedans into Kandabár. This superstition consists in shutting themselves up for 14 or 15 days in a place without light; during which time they are employed in repeating incessantly with a strong guttural voice the word Hû (I), by which they denote one of the attributes of God; and live upon nothing but a little bread and water which they take at sun-set. These continual cries, and the agitations of body, with which they are accompanied, naturally unhinge the whole frame, when, by fasting and darkness, the brain is disordered, they fancy they see spectres, and hear voices: for they believe, that, during this penance, the devil is compelled, by a superior power, to let them into the knowledge of futurity.

Destroys the royal family. WHEN he came forth of his subterraneous vault, he was so pale and emaciated, that they scarcely knew him. What was worse, this extravagant devotion had impaired his reason. He became restless and suspicious; often starting, as if he feared his best friends intended to destroy him. He was in one of these fits when a report spread, that Seffi Mírza, eldest son of Sháh Husseyn, had made his escape, and fled into Turky. This, whether true or false, he made a pretext for cutting off all the princes of that family, excepting Husseyn himself; among whom were several of his brothers, three uncles, and seven nephews. On the 7th of February those victims being assembled in the palace-yard, with their hands tied behind their backs, the tyrant, with a few of his intimates, killed them all with their swords: excepting two sons of Husseyn, the eldest but five years old. The unhappy father, hearing their cries, flew to the place of slaughter, and received on his arm the stroke with which Mahmúd intended to dispatch them. However the sight of blood issuing from a king, whom he used to reverence, stopped his murdering hand. The number of princes butchered in this manner (K) were about 100; nor is it surprising that kings, who have so many women, should be fathers of a numerous offspring. Besides, Husseyn exceeded all his predecessors in filling his Harâm, into which 30 cradles have been carried in the space of one month^c.

1725. Mahmúd grows delirious. THIS cruel execution, instead of allaying Mahmúd's terrors, much increased them, as well as impaired his understanding. The torments of his mind were augmented by an insupportable pain in his bowels. After the physicians had in vain tried to restore him to his senses, they had recourse to a superstitious remedy, practised by the Armenian priests. It consists in reading, over the head of the patient, what they call the Red Gospel (L); and is a ceremony used also by the Mohammedans of the country, who hold it to have wrought many cures. In the beginning of April, the clergy of Julfa, dressed in their sacerdotal, passed in procession (M) to the apartment of Mahmúd: who, in one of his lucid intervals, being told what they had done for his relief, sent them 5000 pounds in money, and as much in goods; promising to restore all which he had taken from them, in case he recovered his health. The same he did to the Indians and Dutch. But, after some hours ease, he relapsed into a more terrible condition: his body was covered with leprosy, and his flesh rotting, seemed to fall from his bones.

^a HANW. p. 204, & seq. also p. 147—159.

^c KRUSINSKI, p. 147. HANW. 206, & seq.

(I) Or How.

(K) It is said, none escaped but Tahmâsp, and the two infants above-mentioned; so that Seffi Mírza must have been among them. HANW.

(L) Probably some passages relating to the miracles of Christ. HANWAY.

(M) Exorcisms and processions are common in all popish countries. The late king of Portugal at several times caused the several orders of ecclesiastics to walk in procession thro' his chamber. HANW.

^a At the same time, news arrived that Sháh Tabmásp had defeated a party of Afgháns commanded by Seydal, in their way to Kazbín, near Kúm, or Kom. From the time Mahmúd fell ill, Asbráf, who was no longer strictly watched, found means to correspond with Tabmásp; and, when he found things ripe for his purpose, sent word, that now was his time to recover the throne: that things were in such confusion at Ispábán, that, on the first news of his approach, his friends would join him in a body. Asbráf had imparted this design to the Persian lords who had been spared at the massacre, with a view to ensnare them; and by them it was that he corresponded with the Sháh. They wrote him word, that the Afghán prince insisted on nothing for himself and his party, but their lives, liberty, and effects. Tabmásp sent him a deed, engaging, under the most solemn oaths, to perform the conditions; and it was this which drew him so near Ispábán.^f

^b This new disgrace greatly alarming the Afgháns, determined them to chuse a new master Mahmúd in place of Mahmúd, who was no longer able to manage their affairs. The right of succession belonged to Husséyn Khán, the Soltán's brother, who governed for him at Kandahár: but as they could not wait his arrival, and Asbráf was most beloved by the army, he was chosen with their unanimous consent. In this revolution, no person was so active as Aman Olláh, the chief minister and generalissimo. Observing himself to be watched, he resolved to be revenged; and took the affront so heinously, that, when Mahmúd returned from his last expedition, he refused to go out to meet him. As soon as his election was proclaimed, the Afgháns ran to take the new king out of confinement. The Abdolis, who guarded him, for a while disputed the entrance; but, at length yielding, Asbráf was proclaimed king of Persia the 22d of April. But this prince, under pretence of revenging his father's death, would not accept the ensigns of royalty till they brought him the head of Mahmúd; who, being in a high frenzy (N), had not many hours to live.^g

^c This destroyer of the dynasty of the Sháhs was but 27 years old when he died. He was middle-sized, squat, and clumsy; his neck so short, that his head seemed to grow to his shoulders: his face was broad, his nose flat, and his beard thin and reddish. His looks were wild, his countenance austere and disagreeable. His eyes blue, and a little squinting, were generally downcast, like a man absorbed in deep thought. Yet, inured by habit, few excelled him either in horsemanship, or the use of the lance. He was master likewise of several talents worthy of a sovereign. Although his soldiers accused him with excess in venery, yet he never had but one wife, and was ever constant to her. He slept little, and endured great hardships; was extremely vigilant both in the camp and city, often visiting the centinels in the night. In labour indefatigable; in danger intrepid; and, with all his faults, was a very strict observer of his word, as appears from his regard to Aman Olláh, even when he knew that general was contriving his ruin. His soldiers charged him with avarice, and depriving them of the booty obtained by their valour in war. Above all, they could not forgive his saying in passion, after the defeat of Yezd, That he wished they were as great beggars as when they first came into Persia, that they might fight as bravely as they did then: although the loss seems to have been owing to his want of conduct. To this might be added, his cruelty to his enemies, and want of fortitude under his disgraces. In a word, his expedition against Ispábán seems extremely rash and extravagant; nor can it be justified, but by the success. That inconsiderate temerity, which constituted the chief part of his character, fitted him indeed for making conquests; but he wanted the qualifications necessary to secure them.^h

^f KRUSINSKI, p. 150, & seq. HANW. p. 209, & seq.

^g KRUSINSKI, p. 153, & seq. HANW. p. 211, & seq.

^h KRUSINSKI, vol. ii. p. 159, & seq. HANW. vol. iii. p. 212, & seq.

(N) The Jesuits say, that, in this frenzy, which continued seven days, he tore his flesh with his teeth, and made such wounds that he was ready to expire.

S E C T. V.

The reign of Ashráf.

^f THE resistance which the partisans of Asbráf met with at the palace, furnished a pretext for removing some of his enemies. The same day, he caused the late Soltán's guards to be put to the sword. His ministers and confidants underwent the same fate. Among whom that of Almas, the Kúiar Agasi, or commander of the slaves, was bewailed by both Afgháns and Persians. He was a great good man, generous, and humane in a high degree; refused presents, and used the ascendancy which he had over his master, to divert him from barbarous resolutions. Yet he was tortured to discover treasures which he had not; and, to avoid a repetition of the rack, slew himself, after he had slain his wife. He next caused all those to be arrested, who had been concerned in the conspiracy, which placed him on the throne, confiscated their estates, not excepting the Mianji, whose riches were his crime; put some of them to death, among whom was the proud Aman Olláh, whose intrepidity and riches hastened his ruin; and the rest were imprisoned. None but Seydal, routed by Tabmásp, and the grand master of the ceremonies, remained untouched. His aunt, the widow of Mír Weis, and mother of Mahmúd, who had been prevailed on by her to spare his life, he confined a whole night in the palace-yard among the dead bodies massacred by her son: however he afterwards treated her with becoming regard^a.

THE severity shewed to his younger brother was abominable. This young prince, flying to avoid being confined in the Saray, was, when taken, deprived of his sight, and then shut up there. A son of Mahmúd's, yet in the cradle, was treated in the same manner; and the mother, by report, poisoned. To efface these first impressions in his disfavour, he waited on Sháh Huseyn, and pressed him to re-ascend the throne; but the deposed monarch had sense enough not to accept of the offer. In return, Asbráf, who took the title of Soltán, ordered his monthly pension of 125 pounds to be paid him weekly; gave him the direction of the buildings then erecting in the inclosure of the palace, which greatly pleased him; and, after repudiating his wife, married one of the king's daughters. He likewise, to ingratiate himself with the people, distributed money among his soldiers, established an exact order in the city; and imposed no new tax, contenting himself to recall the sums which Mahmúd had restored during his illness.

His first attempt was to establish his authority in Kandahár, by destroying Huseyn Khán, brother of Mahmúd; but he failed in his design, as he did in another to seize the person of Sháh Tabmásp at an interview, wherein he intended to offer him the diadem, as he had done to his father Huseyn, and settle their respective interests. This prince had just defeated Seydal a second time at Kashan, when he received a splendid embassy proposing an interview. At the same time a letter was sent, advising him to be on his guard. But the letter being intercepted, Tabmásp marched with only 3000 men to Varami (A), where his enemy was advanced with 12,000. On this he fled to Mazanderán: and Asbráf attempted Takirán, but in vain, as he did Sava; but Kúm capitulated for want of provisions. Here he found the wife of Tabmásp, with part of his court and treasure, twenty pieces of cannon, and three elephants.

ASHRAF, on his return to Ispáhan, put to death all the lords, concerned in writing the above-mentioned letter, at a hunting match. At this time the authority of Tabmásp was acknowledged only in the provinces of Mazanderán, Astarabad, and a few places of Persian Irák. The Afgháns were masters of Khorassán, Kermán, and Párs (or proper Persia); the rest were in the hands of the Russians and Turks. These last went on making conquests, and reduced Tauris with the loss of 20,000 men; but the Persians lost 30,000. Another army of them advanced within twenty leagues of Ispáhan, and then retired on meeting the Afghán guards, with whom they were not at war. Asbráf dreading their power, sent an embassy to court their alliance; but, refusing to admit the Othmán Soltán to be the sole Imám, or head of religion, the Turks made it a pretence for declaring war against him in March 1726^b.

MEAN time Kasbín and Marágha having submitted to them, their army marched towards Ghilán, at the solicitation, as was supposed, of the English and French ambassadors, displeased to find the Armenian karawán, which brought silk from thence, discontinued. Sháh Tabmásp, seeing his affairs were desperate, offered to cede to the Porte the conquered countries, in lieu of a truce for three years; which however was not granted. Asbráf, no less alarmed on his side, perceiving Ispáhan was too large for his forces to defend, ordered a second city to be built and fortified within the first, four miles in compass, including the old citadel, the great square, and king's palace; yet this was finished in three months. Also, to render the access more difficult, he sent troops to ravage the country as far as Kazbín, which, with other cities, were, by his emissaries, induced to declare for him. To prevent a visit in November, he marched to Hamadán, and cut off 6000 Turks: on which the Seraskier intrenched himself. Asbráf, to supply want of force by art, sent spies into the enemy's camp, with four Sheykhs, to protest against Musulmáns slaughtering one another, and to exhort them to peace. By joining with the Turks at noon prayer, they gained over 5000 Kyurds, and many others. To prevent a more general desertion, the Bashá with 70 or 80,000 men attacked the Afgháns, who had but 17,000 foot, and 16,000 horse, with 40 harquebusses mounted on camels. Asbráf appeared on his elephant, surrounded by his ministers, and repulsed the Turks in three fierce a attacks, who lost 12,000 men. At night, being joined by 20,000 Kyârs more, the Bashâ retired in the dark, leaving all his baggage and artillery behind him.

^a HANWAY, Revolut. Pers. vol. iii. p. 216, & seq.

^b Ibid. p. 220—239.

(A) Between Kúm and Takirán.

To retrieve this disgrace, new forces were sent in spring 1727; but, refusing to engage in a war which they looked on as unjust and impious, orders were sent to the Bashâ to conclude a peace on the best terms he could. They arrived just as he was going to attack the Afghâns; and soon produced the act which both parties desired. By the treaty signed in October, the cities of Zengân, Soltania, Abber, and Tabirân, were to be added to the Turkish conquests, and Khuzestân, newly taken, restored. The Othmân emperor was to be acknowledged the true successor of the Khalifas; and the Khotbâh, or public prayers, said in his name throughout Persia. On the part of Ashraf, he was to be acknowledged lawful sovereign of Persia, and named after Soltân Ahmed in the Khotbâh; was to coin money in his own name; and at liberty to send the Persian Karawân to Mekka, by way of Bâghdâd.^{1727.}

MEAN time Shâh Tahmâsp remained at Farabâd in Mazanderân, pent up as a dependent on Fatey Ali Khân, who, during the troubles, had seized that province. He was in these distressed circumstances, when Nadir Kuli, a soldier of fortune, sent from the borders Mazanderân to offer him his service with 5000 horse. This is that extraordinary person who afterwards recovered Persia out of the hands of the Afghâns and Turks, and then usurped the throne. He was born near Kallât, a strong fortress ten days journey to the south-east of Mashbâd, the capital of Khorassân. Being a Tatar, or Turkmân, of the tribe of Afshar, who supply the Persians with cattle, he was bred a shepherd. His father, who lived by making caps and sheepskin coats, died when Nadir was but thirteen. An ass and camel were his whole estate, on which he carried to market sticks gathered in the woods, and sold them to support himself and his mother. In 1704, he was carried off by the Uzbeks, but escaped in 1708. The first action we hear of him was that of robbing a flock of sheep. In 1712, he became a courier to a Begh. Being sent with dispatches to court, he killed his companion; and, at his return, slew his master, who appeared to be displeased; and fled with his daughter to the mountains: there he had by this lady, Imâm Kûli Riza, of the same disposition with himself. After this, he turned robber again for a time; and in 1714, offering his service to Babulâ Khân, governor of Khorassân, was made him his gentleman-usher.

In 1717, for his behaviour against the Tatars of Khyeva (B) and Bokhâra, he was made a colonel; and two years after, with 6000 soldiers, defeated 10,000 Uzbek invaders, killing 3000, the Khân promised to get his command as general confirmed; but, finding a younger man preferred, he reproached his patron with his breach of honour; which liberty was rewarded with the bastinado. On this, he retired to the fortress of Kâllat commanded by his uncle, the chief of an Afshar tribe: but his assuming temper giving disgust, he took a third time to robbing. With 7 or 800 soldiers, which, in 1722, he collected, he pillaged several Karawâns, and laid Khorassân, with the adjacent provinces, under contribution at pleasure. He continued this course till 1727, when Seyfo'ddîn Begh, one of the Shâh's chief generals, flying for some offence, joined him with 1500 men, which increased his troops to about 3000. His uncle then wrote him a kind letter, and promised to obtain his pardon, provided he would engage in the service of Tahmâsp. Nadir accepts the proposal; and, having obtained a pardon, repairs to Kâllat: but the return which he made his uncle was to seize his castle, and murder him.^{1719.}

He staid there five months, raising contributions and more troops: then marched to drive the Afghâns and Baluchis out of Nishabûr. The governor with his whole garrison, consisting of 3000 men, issued out against the enemy, who were but 600 men, and pursued them ten leagues to a pass in the mountains, where Nadir lay concealed with 1500 men. There Kûli Khân, facing about, fell on them in the rear, and cut them all to pieces, excepting a few. On this, he took possession of Nishabûr in the name of Shâb Tahmâsp; and, having been recruited with 1000 men, went to offer that prince his service, as hath been mentioned. Fatey Ali Khân received him with open arms, and introduced him to the king, who signed his pardon. He soon, by his address, insinuated himself into the Shâb's favour; and, to gain the whole sway, resolved to remove the Khân, by pretending to discover a plot of his to deliver Tahmâsp into the hands of Malek Mahmûd, the rebel governor of Mashbâd. The fiction was improbable; but it was not Tahmâsp's fortune to be much wiser than his father Husseyn. He was willing to get rid of Fatey Ali, who had usurped too much authority, but had taken an oath never to hurt him. Nadir replied. "If your majesty has taken an oath, I have not;" and that same day had him murdered as he came to court.

NADIR, who succeeded him in the title of Khân, and post of general, now began to dis- and reduces Khorassân.
1728.

^a HANWAY, p. 240—254.

^d Ibid. vol. iv. p. 14, 173, & seq.

play the talents of an able minister as well as officer. At his instance the Sháh marched with his little army of 8000 into Khorassán. He was received with joy into Nishápur; and, his forces soon augmenting to 18,000, he advanced to Mashhád, which being a place of no strength, the Balluchis abandoned it. To reward his new general, he ordered him to be called Tabmásp Kúli Khán, the addition of his own name being the highest mark of dignity. Nadir, to deserve that honour, marched to reduce the other revolted cities of Khorassán, which he did within the year: and then, with 12,000 men, proceeded to Herát, which the inhabitants delivered up with the garrison, and the governor, whose head he cut off^a.

Defeats
Ashraf.

1729.

ASHRAF, alarmed at these successes, called all his forces together, which did not exceed 30,000, including Afgháns, Darguzzi, and Haffarags; and then, leaving only 200 as sufficient to guard that once vast city, marched towards Khorassán, to attack the Sháh before he could gather more strength. But Tabmásp, by the advice of his general, met him near Damagbân in Kumes with 25,000 Persians. Ashraf, whose fate depended on the issue of a battle, saw, by their disposition, that he ought to proceed with great caution; but, urged by his officers, on the 2d of October he vigorously attacked the enemy, who, to his great surprize, stood the shock; and, attacking them in their turn, obtained an easy victory. The Afgháns lost about 10,000 men, with all their harquebusses, camels, and baggage. They plundered Tábiran in their flight to Ispáhan, which they plundered also, and then retired to Murchakor, 25 miles east of that capital. Kúli Khán followed them; and coming-up on the 13th of November, received the enemy's first fire: then, advancing close to them, gave a general discharge, which caused such numbers to fall, that the astonished Afgháns fled back to Ispáhan, leaving 4000 dead. They pretended a victory, which made the inhabitants dread a massacre, as had been often threatened; but were diverted by their panic from doing mischief.

Restores Tahmásp.

HOWEVER, Ashraf found time to imbrue his hands in the blood of Sháh Housseyn, and other males of the royal family. Then, having loaded several camels, and 300 mules, mostly with the treasures and rich effects of the palace, they left the city at night, to the number of 12,000, after having reigned as conquerors of Persia seven years and twenty-one days.

THE Persian troops arrived soon after, and put an end to the plundering which the populace had begun. Mean time Sháh Tabmásp advanced from Tábiran, and was met by his general six miles from Ispáhan. As soon as he saw him, he alighted from his horse, as did Kúli Khán, who ran to him in a respectful manner: but the Sháh would walk a few steps with him, declaring, that "he could not shew too great distinction to the person who had delivered his country from a foreign yoke." His joy on entering the capital was allayed by the news of his father's death, and sight of the ruined palace. As he entered the Harám, an old woman threw her arms about his neck in transports. This was the lady his mother, who, disguised in a slave's habit, had, ever since the Afghán invasion, submitted to all the offices of drudgery^c.

Routs the Afgháns.

TAHMASP by his conduct so won the hearts of his subjects, that, notwithstanding their poverty, they contributed liberally to support the army which was increased to 40,000 men. Expressing his concern, that the Afgháns should be still at Shíráz, where they exercised great cruelties, and his female relations held in slavery; Kúli Khán said, "He was ready to march against them, provided a power was given him to levy money for paying the army; adding, that military operations were often defeated by the intrigues of a court, as in the case of Lust Ali Khán. The king (C) was startled at this demand, which was in some measure to demand the sovereignty: but being advised to temporize till a proper time should arrive to punish his insolence, Tabmásp complied. Kúli Khán begun his march in the end of December, and in twenty days reached Astakbar (D). Although his army was much diminished by the severe season, and want of provisions in a ravaged country, yet, on the 15th of January 1730, he attacked them with such vigour, that he put them instantly to flight.

1730.
Ashraf slain.

ASHRAF's affairs now grown desperate, he offered to deliver up the princesses, and all his plunder, for liberty to depart with his troops. This proposal Kúli Khán rejected. And threatened to put all the Afgháns to the sword, unless they delivered up their chief. Mean time Ashraf, who expected nothing but a cruel death, if he fell into the hands of the Persians, marched off in the night. His troops, to facilitate their retreat, separated into parties; after whom the Khán sent several detachments. Ashraf, distressed for want of provisions in the depth of winter, and attacked on all sides by the peasants, was obliged at length to abandon all his baggage and the captives. Some of his followers killed their women, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. The Afgháns being now quite dispersed, their chief had with him no

^a HANW. p. 10—24.

^c Ibid. p. 25—35.

(C) He had made him governor of Khorassán, and intended to give him his aunt for a wife.

(D) Supposed to be the ancient Persepolis.

- a more than 200 men, when he was attacked by a body of Ballovchis. He made a gallant defence, but in the end was with his people cut to pieces (E). This ended the usurpation of the Afghāns ⁵.

⁵ HANW. p. 35—40.

(E) There are different accounts of his death. The Gazettes, among others, reported, that he was carried to death on a scaffold at Ispāhān.

S E C T. VI.

The reign of Shāh Tahmāsp.

- b A MONG the captive ladies thus recovered, were the aunt and sister of the Shāh, who gave the former in marriage to Kūli Khān. This general, after two months stay at Sbirāz, ^{1731.} marched towards Hamadān, with intent to wrest from the Turks what they had conquered during the late troubles. After a complete victory over them near that city, he took it; and then, by a quick march, got before Kyoprili Bāshā to Tauris, which he also subdued with Ardsbil. The enemy terrified, demanded a peace; which he granted, that he might punish the Abdallis of Herāt. After defeating them, he took that city, and put the governor with the principal rebels to death. Tahmāsp distrusting the Turks, marched from Kazbīn, with 50,000 men, by the way of Tauris to Eriwān, to which he laid siege, after escaping an ambuscade, and defeating Ali Bāshā: but, for want of provisions, was obliged to raise it. In his retreat to Tauris the Bāshā followed; and, being joined by Kyoprili, defeated him at Astabad on the Zengbi. His army now reduced to 30,000, he abandoned Tauris to secure Hamadān. Joined there by the garrison, a bloody battle was fought with Abmed Bāshā of Bāghdād, and lost together with that city ^a.

- c THE Bāshā, induced by the troubled state of affairs at Constantinople, where Abmed III. was deposed, proposed a peace. His late defeat, and the exposed condition of Ispāhān without an army to defend it, moved the Shāh to accept of the proposal. By this peace, concluded in January 1732, the Arrais was to be the Persian boundary: so that he gave up his right to all Armenia and Georgia, comprising a country near 200 miles in extent. The Ottomans on their side were to assist him, to compel the Russians to quit their acquisitions along the Caspian sea, where, since the death of Peter I. they had made no conquest but that of Labijān. This peace was against the earnest solicitations of Kūli Khān, who intreated him to persist in the demand of all the conquered provinces, promising to join him soon with a powerful army. ^{1732.}

- d THE Shāh having disbanded his army, wrote to his general to do the same, and return to Ispāhān. This conduct increased Kūli Khān's jealousy of the court. He told his officers, That "this peace was inglorious, and tended to involve Persia in new troubles; that there "was the less reason for sacrificing so many provinces to the Turks, when there was an army "on foot sufficient to humble them: that therefore those measures seemed to be levelled at "them by the ministers, who were always jealous of their success." Having by these speeches, which had the air of patriotism, attached to him the army, now augmented to 70,000, most of them Tatars in whom he might confide, he marched for Ispāhān; near which he encamped in August. He then waited on the king; and having told him, that those who advised the peace were his enemies, he produced letters to shew how much he was abused by evil counsellors; and that they were playing off the same diabolical engines used by those in the time of Hussayn, to cut off Lust Ali Khān, when the army under his command might have saved Persia ^e.

- f THE Shāh was astonished at the perfidy of several he most confided in, and believed his general to be as faithful, at least, as his other ministers. But Kūli Khān finding that the letters had no effect with regard to the persons whom he wanted to destroy, he judged himself to be marked out for destruction. His officers were of the same opinion: and, considering his interest to be their own, readily agreed to prevent their common danger, by deposing Tahmāsp, and setting his son, prince Abbas Mirza, but six months old, in his place. With this intent, he invites Tahmāsp to a review. As he rode through the ranks, many of the soldiers let him know, "that if he had any particular command for them, they were ready to execute it." Kūli Khān surprised, desired the Shāh to tell them, "that the proof of their obedience to him "was to obey their general." After the review, he invited Tahmāsp to a repast; where being intoxicated with a little wine, he was conveyed under a strong guard to an apartment in the royal gardens. His attendants were confined; and next day, an assembly being called, he set forth the king's incapacity to reign, and the bad consequences which would attend the peace, unless he was deposed. The general having bribed the great officers of state, as well as of the army, they approved of his advice; and swore allegiance to the young prince, then lying in his cradle, by the name of Abbâs III^k.

^a H. N. Rev. lxx. Pers. vol. iv. p. 30, & seq.

^c HANW. p. 67, &c.

^k HANW. p. 70, & seq.

S E C T. VII.

The reign of Atbâs III.

Gives the Turks

1733.

two great defeats.

KULI KHAN, now in effect sovereign of Persia, conferred the principal governments on his own relations; and disposed of every thing at pleasure. He sent to acquaint the Bâshâ of Bâghdâd, that he soon intended to pay him a visit: on which advice war was proclaimed at Constantinople the 6th of October, and Topal Osmân Bâshâ dispatched with an army of 80,000 men. Bâghdâd had been besieged for three months with an equal force, but without cannon; and, though defended with a garrison of 20,000, could not hold out above four days when the Seraskier approached. Kûli Khân met him with 70,000; and had gotten the better, when the Bâshâ of Mosul came up, and turned the scale. About 30,000 were killed on each side, and Kûli Khân had two horses slain under him, and lost all his baggage. Mean time the Bâshâ of Bâghdâd, sallying forth, raised the siege: and the Persian general retired, sending him word, that he would be with him early next year, that it might not be thought he intended to fall on him the same winter. But, having with speed repaired his losses, he, in October, forced his way into Turky. Topal Osmân, who had often in vain wrote for troops, at length got together 100,000 men; and met the Persians at Leylan, five leagues from Kerkowd. Kûli Khân attacked the Turks on the 25th, and was repulsed; but next day, the battle becoming general, he obtained a complete victory. The Turks lost 40,000 men, among whom was the brave and honest Seraskier pierced with two wounds, all their baggage and military chest. He was diverted from visiting Bâghdâd, to march against his general Mohammed Khân Balluchi, who at Sbirâz had proclaimed Shâh Tahmâsp at the head of 30,000 men. Kûli Khân, with the like number, attacked and routed him; who, being taken, hanged himself to avoid a worse fate^l.

1734.
The conquered countries recovered.

1735.

In spring 1734, with 100,000 men, he entered Georgia, which submitted, as did Armenia; the Turks retiring, unable to oppose him. Then entering Sbirwân, he destroyed Shamakîya, for favouring the Lesghi Tatars. Next year he sent an embassy to Russia, in the name of Abbâs, to desire an alliance with the empress, and demand restitution of the conquered provinces; which, being too expensive to be kept, were surrendered, and a treaty concluded. His forces now amounting to 120,000 men, he marched from Teflis to Erivân, where the Turks had 80,000 commanded by the Seraskier Kyoprili. Kûli Khân, who had then but 50,000, feigned a hasty flight, till he came to a certain defile, where, posting some troops in ambush, he made a stand. The van coming up, were attacked in both flank and rear: the action was bloody, and lasted five hours. Kyoprili, after having two horses killed under him, was slain himself with several other general officers, besides 20,000 men. The baggage and military chest were taken, with 32 pieces of cannon. The rear, which could not come up to assist the van, fled, and suffered much in the pursuit. Hereupon Erivân surrendered, and, by the end of the year, all the conquered provinces were recovered. The Turks wanted to make peace: but Kûli Khân would not hearken to it, unless Bâghdâd was restored, and the expences of the war paid^m.

^l HANW. ubi sup. p. 74—112.

^m Ibid. p. 112—121.

S E C T. VIII.

The reign of Nadîr Shâh.

1736.
Kûli Khân elected king.

IN the beginning of the year 1736, the young king Abbâs died, whether naturally or by art is uncertain. On the 10th of March, the Persian new year, all the governors, great officers, and generals, were convoked in the plains of Mogân, near the river Arâks, to chuse a new king; Kûli Khân recommending Shâh Tahmâsp, if they thought him fit to govern: but, a at the end of three days, he was desired, by the deputies, to accept of the diadem himself, as none, they said, was so worthy of it as he who had restored the glory of the Persian monarchy. The general accepted of it on three conditions; 1. That they made the crown hereditary: 2. That they should not entertain in their houses any of the family of their old kings: 3. That they should not curse Omar, Osmân, and Abu-Bekr, nor meet to commemorate Hussayn's (F) death. The high-priest, offering to dissuade him from changing the established religion, was rewarded with a bow-string; and next day, he was proclaimed king by the name of Shâh Nadîr. On his arrival at Kazlîn, he assembled the ecclesiastics of the neighbouring provinces, and confiscated the revenues of the church, telling them, "That their prayers, not having prevented the present calamities, shewed that God was not pleased with them; but that the deity having made his soldiers the instruments of redressing them, they were the priests most worthy to be supported by the revenues of the church." Presently after he published a decree to unite the Shi'ay and the Sunni sects^a.

TOWARDS the end of the year, a peace was concluded with the Turks; whereby all the conquered provinces were yielded back, and liberty given the Persians to perform the pilgrimage to Mekka duty-free. After this he marched to Ispâhân, which he repaired; and, having done several acts to encourage husbandry and commerce, set out in December to reduce Kandâbâr, possessed by Hussayn Khân, brother of Soltân Mâhmûd. He defeated Hussayn's troops; but, for want of heavy cannon, could not take the place: so that after a long siege, he was obliged to confirm him in his government, on condition to surrender the town, and recruit his army. Mean time his son Rizi Kili Mirza, governor of Masbâd, subdued the Uzbeks of Balkh and Bokhârâ. He likewise renewed an invitation from several lords of the Mogol's court to march his forces into India; which he did about the middle of the year 1738: of which famous expedition we shall give a more full account in its proper place^b. On his return to Kandâbâr with 120 millions sterling, he set out with 50,000 men to chastise the Uzbeks, who, during his absence, had invaded Persia. The Khân of Bokhârâ submitted, and was restored. But he of Khyevâ, after a brave resistance with 20,000 troops, was obliged to surrender; and had his throat cut, with thirty of his attendants, for murdering Nadîr's ambassadors^c.

In his return to Masbâd, he was shot at, and wounded in the left-hand, by an Afghân, Escapes being employed by his son Rizi Kili to kill him. This prince, on a report that the Persian army lost was defeated in Hindustân, revolted, and murdered Shâh Tabmâsp in the fortress of Sebzwar. The fear of his father's anger, made him contrive his death. Nadîr Shâh, who loved him, would have pardoned his crime; but provoked with his offensive language, and justifying what he had done, he ordered his eyes to be put out. After two expeditions against the Arabs and Uzbeks, who had revolted, he entered Daghestân to chastise the Lesghi; but, advancing too far, was greatly harrassed, and narrowly escaped an overthrow. The Turks alarmed, declare war; and, while the Shâh besieges Bâghdâd and Bâsrâb, a pretender is sent into Persia, but defeated. At the same time Astarabâd and Shirâz revolted. The Turks having assembled an army of 130,000 men near Eriwân, Nadîr met them in August 1745 with 80,000 troops, and overthrew them, killing 20,000, with several Bâsbâs, and among them Abdâllah Kyoprili. The Persians lost 8000, and Nadîr had two horses killed under him. Revolts in Georgia and Kho- the Turks. rassân prompted him to propose a peace; by which the Persians were allowed free access to Mekka, and a priest at Masbâd Ali, another place of pilgrimage (G)^d.

ALL this while Persia was reduced to the deepest distresses, by the avarice and cruelty of the Shâh, who, on his return to Ispâhân, committed great barbarities, as well as made cruel exactions. He afterwards did the same at Khermân; and then at Masbâd, where he arrived next with his army. From thence he marched to the plains of Soltân Meydân, a day's journey to the north-west: but there his fate met him; for some time after he had gone to rest, Saleb Beg (H), colonel of the Afghân body-guard, with four chosen men, under pretence of business, rushed by the guards into the outer partition of the Harâm, where they killed an eunuch. Then entering the inner Harâm, slew an old woman also whom they met. They were still at a loss to know Nadîr's tent, till, by the light of a lamp, they espied some jewels. There they found ^a DE HIR vid. sup. p. 34. HANW. p. 123—131. ^b See vol. iii. p. 124, & seq. ^c Ibid. p. 205—224—234—258.

P HANW.

(F) Eldest son of Ali, who was horridly butchered by them, with his whole family (†). In memory of which, the Persian priests were obliged to bid the people to curse them as often as they called them to their prayers. They moreover ordered an annual cavalcade thro' the city of Isfahan, attended with magnificent pageants, representing that horrid scene to the life, with the most affecting gestures, songs, music, &c.; both which customs Kili Klân now abolished, in compliment to the Turks.

(G) Near Hellâh on the Euphrates in Arabian Irak.

(H) Molânnâd Kili Klân is praised as the person who destroyed this tyrant, by the procurement of his nephew and successor Ali Shâh. Present Troubles of Persia and Georgia, p. 27.

Nadir Shâh him arisen from his bed (1), roused perhaps by the woman's cries. The Shâh drawing his a State, his sabre, demanded what they wanted? Saleb Beg answered him by a cut on the left side of his collar-bone. For all this, he killed two of the soldiers who advanced to strike him; and then went to retire out of the tent; but stumbling over the cords, Saleb gave him a mortal wound. Nadîr cried, "Mercy, and I will forgive you all." The Beg replied, "You have "not shewn any mercy, and therefore deserve none." And then cut off his head¹.

to prevent a It is said, that Nadîr Shâh had formed a design of putting to the sword, that night, all the insurrection. Persians in his camp; and that, while he communicated it to the chiefs of the Uzbeks, Turk- mins, and other Tatars, who composed a great part of his army, a Georgian slave overheard the plot: that this slave discovered it to the principal Persian officers, who agreed to dispatch the tyrant; and that Saleb Beg, an officer of great intrepidity, offered to be his executioner. b
 The Tatars enraged, took to their arms, and attacked the Persians, so that 5000 fell on both sides; mean time a general pillage was carried on. After which, both the body and head being produced to the Tatars, the whole army disbanded.

His person and Thus fell the scourge of Persia and India at the age of sixty-one, after a reign of eleven character. years and three months. He had a comely aspect; his forehead was high; his eyes large and expressive; his complexion swarthy, and hair black. He was of a robust make, and six feet high. His whole person and aspect were awful, especially when he spoke. His voice was exceeding strong, and memory great. His presence of mind remarkable, and his resolutions as quick as his thoughts. He was far in years before he learned to read; and owed no part of his knowledge to books. He studied the finances thoroughly, and knew the exact revenue of c Diet and dress. each province. His diet was simple; his dress thin, and not showy, for his soldiers to imitate. His pride lay in precious stones, with which his diadem as well as turban was adorned. He often amused himself, when alone in his tent, with a large sapphire. And, when he gave audience, played with a battle-ax; the use of which he revived. It is said he always bore a chain-work coat of mail under his cloaths. He loved women, and severely punished sodomy. Though his avarice and jealousy made him latterly very cruel, yet our author never heard that he put any man to death in cold blood with his own hands, as his predecessors used to do².

¹ HANWAY, p. 249, & seqq.

² Ibid. p. 262—268.

(1) It is said his wife, the daughter of the Great Mughal, was in bed at the same time. Present Troubles of Persia and Georgia, p. 29.

C H A P. IX.

The reign of the Arab kings of Hormûz, or Ormûz, in Persia.

Kingdom of THE kingdom of Hormûz, or Harmûz, which the Portuguese write Ormûz, or Ormus, d Harmûz, contained part of the coasts on both sides of the Persian gulph, with the islands lying between them: but it is not easy, by the history, to determine the exact bounds of it, when in its greatest extent. We can only say, that, on the side of Arabia, it seems to have comprised the maritime parts, from Râs al Gât, the most eastern part of that country, to Al Kalif; with the islands of Babrayn, lying off that port: and that, on the Persian side, it reached from Cape Jâsk, or Jâskes, as the Portuguese call it, to Bander Kongo; and perhaps a good deal farther, so as to include the country of Mogostân, in the province of Kermân, and part of the coast of Pûrs, or Proper Persia, with the adjacent islands. The chief of these, beginning our reckoning westward, are Lar, or Lara, Andarvia, Keyson, or Keysh, Nabjan, or Peytombo; to the south of which are two others, Brokbt, or Kishmis, called also Kishom, and Jerûn, e or Hormûz: and, to the south of it, Larek. All these islands are small, excepting Brokbt, or Kishmis; which is about fifty miles long, and 13 broad; Jerûn and Larek lie off the eastern end of it; those three islands being about two or three leagues distant from each other. But we shall not enter into the description of places here: because there will be occasion to speak of them more properly in the course of our history.

a OUR materials, so far as relate to the kings of Harmûz, to the time of Turân Shâh, who Its origin, was of the number, are taken from the history written by that prince (A); who gives two somewhat different accounts of the original of the Harmûzian monarchy. The first is this. An Arabian prince, named Mohammed Dirhem Kûb (B), descended from the ancient kings of Sabab (C), a province in Arabia, being ambitious to extend his dominions, subdued the neighbouring countries, as far as the shores of the Persian gulf (called by the Portuguese the Gulf of Ormûz). Not contented with these conquests, he persuaded his troops to cross over to Persia, intending there to build a bander, or port-town; which should, in splendor and trade, exceed that of Sobâr, in Arabia (D), then much frequented by foreign merchants.

b HAVING fixed this resolution, he marched to Kalayât, a port near Cape Ras al Gât: according to where leaving his son, under the care of a Wazîr, with orders to secure that port for a retreat, in some case of the worst, he embarked with his followers, and arrived at Jask, or Jaskes, a well-known place on the coast of Persia; from whence, sailing northward, he put into Kushek, or Kostek, another port on that side of the gulph. There landing his men, and seeking for a proper place to settle in, he was informed, that there was a very commodious one a little farther up. Thither he marched; and, finding the situation agreeable to his mind, founded the city of Harmûz; where he resided in peace and justice. The lands, which were in the neighbourhood, he divided among his people, and coined money in his own name; from whence he had the appellation of Dirhem Kûb. As Shâh Mohammed was of a good temper, wise and brave; the governors of Shirâz and Kermân maintained a strict amity with him. At his death, c he left Hormûz in a prosperous condition to his son Soleymân; who had accompanied him in his expedition, and by whose industry the new city greatly increased ^a.

d THE other account, which Turân Shâh gives of the origin of the kingdom of Hormûz, is thus. When the father of Shâh Mohammed was king in Arabia, being at war with another prince, he lost a battle; and, not thinking himself secure in that country, crossed over the gulph to Mogostân, in Persia, and settled there, with his son Mohammed, who bore him company. About that time a tyrannical king reigned in those parts; who, besides the other wrongs which he did his subjects, obliged them to give him the first night's lodging with every maid, who was to be married. Mohammed, who, though young, had a great soul, taking compassion on those oppressed people, offered to deliver them, at the hazard of his life. The method which he took to accomplish his design, was this. He pretended to marry a maiden of quality, belonging to the town where the tyrant resided. And, being as yet beardless, as well as handsome, he cloathed himself in a woman's habit. Thus disguised, but armed underneath, and well attended, he was brought in the evening to the king; who immediately retired into his bed-chamber with the supposed maid. Mohammed, by pretending bashfulness, gained time, till he had a fair opportunity to dispatch him with his dagger: after which he quitted the apartment, and having informed those, who waited the event, that he had slain the tyrant; they immediately proclaimed liberty through the city. Another tradition.

e THIS piece of service was so acceptable to the people, that they made their deliverer king; ^{1st, King} who took on him the title of Shâh Mohammed; adding the surname of Dirhem Kûb, for the Mohammed reason before-mentioned. After this, the better to improve his dominions, he founded the city of Hormûz, in a plain of the same name (E); from whence all the kingdom was denominated. And this Teixeira judges to be the most likely account of its origin: but the time (F) when these transactions happened is not mentioned ^b.

THE second king of Hormûz was Soleymân, son of Shâh Mohammed; who succeeded him as ^{2. Soleymân.} hath been said before. He was affable, and beloved for his virtue and justice; which gained him great renown. He reigned many years in peace, and left the throne to his son.

^a TURAN SHAH, apud Teixeira Hist. Perf. p. 377, & seqq.

^b TEIXEIRA. ubi supra, & seqq.

(A) He died in the year of the Hejrab 779, or of Christ 1377. The history, written in the Persian tongue, both in prose and verse, is intitled, Shâh Noma: that is, a relation of the king or kings; and begins from Adam. It makes a considerable volume, of which an abstract was published in Portuguese, by Pedro Teixeira; who has added the succeeding kings to his time; and interspersed several remarks, relating to places mentioned in the history; which is to be found at the end of his history of the kings of Persia, extracted from Mirkond, a famous historian of that country.

(B) Not Dramkû, as Teixeira writes; so we are told by D'Herbriet, who seems to have read the original history of Turân Shâh; not Torunxa, as the other spells it. See D'Herb. Bibl. Orient. p. 457. art. Hormouz.

(C) In the kingdom of Yaman (by Europeans called Arabia Felix); and where the queen of Sheba, who visited Solomon, is supposed to have reigned.

(D) Soâr, or Zoar. It is now an inconsiderable place; but its ruins, with the conveniency of its situation, convinced Teixeira, that it was formerly a place of note. It lies to the east of Masfat, near Kalayât, and Cape Ras al Gât.

(E) According to this account, Hormûz took its name from the plain wherein it was built, by one of the ancient kings of Persia of that name. See D'Herb. p. 457. art. Hormouz. Hormouz fils de Schabour, & Hormouz fils de Narfi. This city belonged to the province of Kermân, the Persian Karamania of the Greeks.

(F) The first date we meet with, is the year of the Hejrab 676; that is, of Christ, 1277; when Rokno'd-dîn Mohammed, the 12th king of Hormûz, died. If then you subtract from that year 216 years, for the reigns of the first 12 kings (allowing 18 years to each), there will remain 1061; about which time the kingdom might have been founded.

3. Iza. IZA, the third king; who proved a good prince also; so that his reign was blessed with a peace and prosperity. He made his people apply themselves to tillage, and planing of palm-trees; in which he was very assisting to them. On the other hand, they were ready, on all occasions, to serve him in his wars; so that he considerably extended his dominions. He was succeeded by his son,
4. Lashkari. LASHKARI: who was as good as his father; a lover of justice, and protector of the poor. Among his sons, one was named Kay Kobâd; to whom, for his excellent qualities, he resigned the crown, and retired himself from court, to lead a solitary life; in which state he died some years after.
5. Kay Khobâd. KAY KHOBAD no way degenerated from his predecessors; but was a lover of justice, supported the needy, curbed the great ones; and, dying, left the throne to his son,
6. Iza II. IZAH, who was a martial prince, and successful in the wars, which he undertook. The kingdom of Hormûz prospered under him; and, at his death, devolved to his son,
7. Mahmûd. MAHMUD. He was a good prince, and had many children. It was a custom of the kings of Hormûz, for their own greater security, and to prevent commotions, to send all their kindred, who might aspire to the crown, to forts and other places remote from their residence. Among the rest, Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Molongh, one of Mahmûd's nephews, was appointed to reside in the fortress of Gât, which is in Persia; and in the lands of Brabem and Mostagam (G). But Mahmûd, being informed, that his nephew had contrived to kill him, ordered him to be secured; intending to put him to death, in case the treason was proved. Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn had intelligence of this, and fled to the fortress of Skugon; where he was well received by the governor, who also gave him his daughter in marriage; by whom he had a son, called Nôserât Regbdar (H); and a daughter, named Setalkânûm Shabâbo'ddîn. In the mean time, Mahmûd died at Harmûz; and was succeeded by his son,
8. Shahân Shâh. SHAHAN SHAH. This prince used all his endeavours to get Molongh into his power: but could not. After some years, great numbers of men, from the land of Hîr, invading his territories, he marched to oppose them: though with a force much inferior to theirs. Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Molongh, thinking this a proper opportunity to be reconciled to his uncle, with his father-in-law's leave, raised all the troops he could, and went to his assistance. After kissing his foot, he fell back, and followed him, attended by his forces: but the uncle made him ride by his side, and expressed other marks of much affection. As soon as they met the enemy, they engaged; and Shahân Shâh, being slain in the battle,
9. Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Molongh. MÎR SHAHABO'DDIN was proclaimed king. He prosecuted the war against the people of Hîr; whom he entirely routed; and then returned to Hormûz, where he reigned to general satisfaction. He married his daughter, Set al Kâtûn Shabâbo'ddîn, to Amîr Seyfo'ddîn ebn Azâr, son to his brother Ali, king of the island of Keys. Soon after this match, Ali died; and the people of Keys, at the instance of the king of Hormûz, received Amîr Seyfo'ddîn for their king; who immediately repaired thither, with his wife. Not long after, died Molongh, king of Hormûz; and one Resh Shâbrear usurped the throne. As soon as this news reached Keys, the people deposed Amîr Seyfoddîn; who fearing farther mischief from them, went to Hormûz; where he was well received by the inhabitants. Shâbrear, the usurper, was then at the fortress of Kareâm, with ten of his kindred; but Seyfo'ddîn hastening thither, after an obstinate resistance, slew them all.
10. Seyfo'ddîn. SEYFO'DDIN becoming thus possessed of the crown; the first thing he did, was to marry the three daughters of Resh Shâbrear to three of the chief men of his court. Then, calling to mind how he had been treated by the inhabitants of Keys, he invaded their island with his troops; and overthrew them in a battle, with great slaughter. He likewise took several of the principal men prisoners; and, carrying them away with him, at the island Jerûn (now called Hormûz, and then not inhabited), into which he put with his ships, slew them there on a hill; from thence called Keri Kostoron; that is, the hill of the slain; which name it still retains. After this he returned to the city of Hormûz, on the opposite coast: where he spent the rest of his days in peace; and was succeeded by his nephew, 11. Mahmud. SHAHABO'DDIN MAHMUD II. son of Iza; who enjoyed peace all his reign, and did nothing remarkable. At his death, he left the crown to his nephew, 12. Mahmud. AMIR ROKNO'DDIN MAHMUD; under whom Hormûz prospered exceedingly. He kept on foot a considerable number of good forces, who gained him considerable victories, and enlarged his dominions; extending them as far as Zafar. He reigned 35 years; and died in that of the Hejrab 676; of Christ 1277 (I).

^c TEIXEIR. p. 379. & seqq.

(G) There were several other fortresses, and lands, in Persia, possessed by the kings of Hormûz, and subject to the Portuguese, in the time of Teixeira.

(H) This name is much corrupted; as are many others, so as not to be intelligible.

(I) Teixeira puts 1278; which is wrong; as are most of his computations of the year of Christ; which are generally out by one or two years. But we have rectified them, as we go along.

^a AMIR SEYFO'DDIN NOSERAT, his son, who succeeded him, was opposed by two of his 13. Noserât, brothers, Amir Kothbo'ddin Tabatân, and Amir Moezo'ddin Fulâd, or Palâd; and, although most of the army favoured Noserât, yet he could not prevail against his competitors; who, at length, obliged both him and his mother, Babi Banek, to fly the kingdom. Babi Banek retired to Kermân; which province was then governed by Soltân Jalâlo'ddin Suragetmesb; who gave her an honourable reception, and such a supply of forces, as restored her son Noserât to his dominions. However, his brothers did not give over molesting him; but, at length, he took one of them; viz. Amir Moezo'ddin Fulâd, and put him to death. Mir Kothbo'ddin, ^{Civil war.} the other brother, being supported by one Mâlek Seyfo'ddin Abubekr Haoni, invaded Hormûz; and, coming to a battle with Noserât, at Denu, defeated him; who, thereupon, fled to Kom-zâra; and thence, in a Tarranki (a kind of light boat), passed over to Last, a port-town in the island of Brokbt, generally called Queyshom, by the Portugueses.

AFTER Noserât's flight, the two confederates fell so much at variance, that Malek Seyfo'ddin killed Kothbo'ddin: but the army, as well as the people, disapproving of his proceedings, they called home Noserât, and expelled the usurper. However, the restored prince did not long enjoy the throne: for two other of his brothers, Amir Masand and Amir Turkân Shâh, ^{Hejrah 689. A. D. 1290.} aspiring to the crown, basely murdered him, with his sisters, Bibi Banek, and Bibi Neyti (K), in the year 689, after he had reigned 12 years ^d.

MASAND, having killed his brother, possessed himself of the kingdom. He was of a martial 14. Masand. temper, and very brave: but so cruel and stern, that he soon incurred the hatred of every body. Being sensible that he had lost the affections of the people, he, through fear, put to death many of the nobles and commoners. Upon this, most of the principal men repaired to Amir Babâo'ddin Ayâz Seyfin; whom Noserât, the late king, had advanced to be Wazîr of Kalagât (or Kalayât), a port in Arabia, before-mentioned. He, pitying the calamities of the kingdom of Hormûz, raised forces; and, transporting them over the Persian gulf, fought, and defeated Amir Masand; who fled to Kermân, and thence removed to Sirjân (L): where he died several years after, having reigned no more than three years.

UPON this victory, Mir Babâo'ddin Ayâz Seyfin, who had been a slave to Noserât, taking 15. Ayâz Seyfin upon him the regal power, began to restore things to their former order; but was hindered by the troubles which ensued: for Mir Turkân Shâh, and Mir Saljak, two brothers of Masand, holding a correspondence with him, attempted to restore him. However, Ayâz, being informed of it, had them seized, and cut off their heads. This execution procured him some quiet for a while: but in the year 700, the Turks (M), who had already possessed themselves of several provinces of Persia, breaking into the kingdom of Kermân, came down from thence into that of Hormûz; destroying all the country, as they passed. Yet might this have been tolerable; and had not the wealth, which they found in those parts, invited them to come so often, that the Hormûzians, no longer able to bear their oppressions, resolved to abandon their lands in Persia, and retire into the island of Brokbt.

THIS island, called Quishom (N) by the Portuguese, is the largest, as hath been said, of all the islands belonging to the kingdom of Hormûz, on the side of Persia; and is separated from 16. Brokbt; the continent only by a very narrow channel. Thither the Hormûzians, by order of Ayâz, passed over; taking with them all which they had saved from the rapacious hands of the Turks. After a few days rest, Ayâz set out again in quest of some other island, more convenient, to settle in with his people (O); and, at length, come to one, which was desert, two leagues distant from that of Brokbt. On the north point of this island; where afterwards the Portuguese built a fortress, they found an old man, named Jerûn, with his wife, who lived there upon fishing; furnishing the ships, which passed to and fro between India and Keys, with what fish he caught: in return for which, they gave him rice, cloth, and other necessities of life.

THIS Jerûn, understanding that Ayâz was looking out for an island to settle in, advised 17. Jerûn him to come over thither, as being the only one to be found fit for his purpose; and the king, having viewed it, resolved to beg it of Neîn (P), the king of Keys, to whom it belonged; as did all the other islands in the gulph of Persia.

KEYS (or Kays), so called by the Arabs, as well as Persians; and, by the Portuguese, Quays; is a small island in the gulph, well wooded and watered. It was once the head of ^d TEIX. p. 381, & seqq.

^e Ibid. p. 384, & seqq.

(K) Bibi signifies, in Persian, lady.

(L) There seems to be some mistake here; for Sirjân otherwise called Kermân, is the capital of the province of Kermân in Persia.

(M) These must be the Tatars, who then reigned in Persia; for the Seljukian dynasties both of Irân and Kermân, were extinct before the year 590 of the Hijrah.

(N) Queyshom, or Keyshom; and, by others, Kismis, or Kismish.

(O) It was possibly too large, and near the continent, to be defended easily; as is remarked in Purchas Pilgrim. vol. ii. p. 1786.

(P) In Teixeira, Neyn, and Neym.

a kingdom (Q) ; though, in Teixeira's time, not inhabited (R) : because the trade was fallen off, for fear of the Nawtaki and Nichelus, two sorts of pyrates, continually infesting that sea. It was formerly possessed of all the trade, which was afterwards removed to Ormúz (S) ; but lost all by the wars, and scarce retained its name.

and buys Jerún.

WHILE Ayáz was at Jerún (T), so called from the old man, there came over one Sbeykb Ismael, a Mollab, born in a village near Lár, in Persia ; who used to go every year all about those islands, begging for himself, and the poor of his hamlet. Ayáz, finding this Mollab fit for his purpose, sent him to treat with the king of Keys about that island ; and he managed the affair so well, that Nein offered to bestow it on Ayáz : but this prince would not take it, without paying for it. For this service, done by the Mollab, the kings of Hormúz gave every year to his descendants a certain acknowledgement ; which our author has seen them come to demand.

Its situation ;

AYAZ, having thus obtained the island, gave it the name of Hormúz, in remembrance of their ancient country ; although the Persians and Arabs generally call it Jerún. Nor has the ancient Hormúz on the continent lost its name, but still retains it. Jerún, or Hormúz, stands just within the mouth of the Persian gulph, which is divided by it into two parts ; one called the gulph of Hormúz ; commencing at Port Guâdel, in Persia, and Cape Râs al Gât, in Arabia, and extending to that island about one hundred leagues ; the other is named the Gulph of Basrah ; reaching from Jerún to the mouth of the river Tigris ; near which that city is seated, the space of almost 200 leagues. This island is betwixt six and seven miles in compass (five from Dozâr, the nearest part of Persia ; and nine leagues from the coast of Arabia). Formerly it was on fire ; which left it so uncouth, that it is amazing to behold. A high mountain crosses it from east to west : from the foot whereof, to the north point, where the city and fort stand, being about a mile, there is a plain, somewhat more level than the rest, where the city is built ; but beyond the mountain (southward), there is nothing to be seen, but dismal hills, clefts, and rocks ^f.

extent and soil ;

IT yields abundance of fine sulphur, and very transparent mineral salt. During the summer also, the water which descends from the mountain in winter, and overspreads the plain about the city, is converted into salt by the heat. Besides these stores of salt, there are three springs, which gushing from the foot of the mountain, form three rivulets of very clear water ; but as salt as that in the sea. The surface of these streams is turned into salt, by the sun, as they glide along ; which makes so hard a crust, that our author, Teixeira, has often crossed on horseback, without breaking it ; the water running underneath. Both the mineral salt, which is found to grow, and the other sort, are very medicinal ; so that the fort only, which is made by the sun's heat, is used for seasoning of meat : for the mineral is so sharp, that, instead of preserving flesh, it corrodes and spoils it ; or any other thing which it is used with (U). At Torunpuka, which is a piece of white salt clay-ground, at the southwest end of the island, among certain rocks not far from the sea, there gushes out some brackish water, which the natives call Ab Dorman, or medicinal water : which, having a purging quality, is much resorted to at one time of the year.

all sulphur and salt ;

*of fresh water ;

THE island has no fresh water, but what is gathered from the rain in cisterns ; which are numerous. Only at Torunpuka, above-mentioned, there is a little fresh water, made use of to water the orchards of the king and his Wazîr. Ferragut Shâb, who reigned in 1596, found out another stream of fresh water ; in hopes thereby to marry a rich widow, who enjoined him that task (W). These gardens produce every thing, which is planted, in perfection, contrary to all the rest of the world ; where there is neither tree, nor plant ; unless in the plain ^f TEIX. p. 386, & seqq.

(Q) There was formerly in this island a very rich and splendid city ; of which the ruins are still to be seen, as well as the memory preserved. But this once populous, trading island, is now desert. Purch. Pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1786.

(R) The descriptions of places, with which this history is intermixed, seem to have been inserted by Teixeira, without distinguishing his additions from the rest.

(S) Keys is about two leagues and a half from the coast, and five from the island of Andarvia ; although the reckon fifteen from Lara to Keys. It reaches in length, from W. S. W. to E. N. E. and is about five leagues in compass. It is very low and flat, like the other two ; which are very near the shore : and when Thevenot saw it, in 1665, it was inhabited by several people ; who had houses dispersed here and there upon it. Thevenot Trav. part. 2. p. 173.

(T) Or Jarún, or Jarúm ; the Portuguese often using the m, instead of n, when the preceding vowel is long. In Purchas, Jarun is said to signify a wood ; from some thin woods and trees, which grew about the isle, like apple-trees of Anafega, and bearing the same sort of ill-tasted apples, called, by the Portuguese, Small Apples (perhaps the Marcenilla). Purch. Pilgr. vol. ii. p. 1786—These seem to be the Konar mentioned afterwards.

(U) Some ships, particularly those from Kochin, in Málabâr, take in this mineral salt, as ballast, and carry it to Bengál ; where, for want of other salt, it goes off.

(W) Her name was Bifatîma, an old woman, widow of his Wazîr, who governed in Mogestân, in Persia. She, who was said to be vastly rich, to put off the old king, who was in love with her, said, she would marry him, when she had planted a new garden, and found another fresh spring, at Torunpuka ; thinking it impracticable. However, he performed the task, yet got not the money.

some

a some prickly shrubs, bearing a fruit like haws, called Konar, green all the year; some few mallows, and purging fenna, called Senna Moki, or fenna of Moka.

THE summer heats are here prodigiously great, almost intolerable, and scarce credible to such as have not experienced them; which is surprising, considering it lies in 27 degrees and a half north latitude. For all this, the air and climate is healthy, and there is seldom any distemper in summer; for the terrible heat expels all peccant humours, by excessive sweat: but, in autumn, they pay for all disorders committed in summer.

THE island has two banders, that is, ports, or bays; one to the east, the other to the west, of the sandy point, where old Jerûn lived, and the Portuguese built a fort.

THE city of Hormûz, founded in the year 1300, was formerly large: but not so in our author's time; the best and noblest part of it having been blown up, to make a spacious parade, or place of arms, before the fort. The houses were well built, of a softish stone, found in the island, and another fort taken out of the sea: for these are light, and best to withstand the earthquakes, which the island is subject to. They have three sorts of mortar: one made of fine lime, called Ghecha, brought from the continent: another red sort, found in the island, but not so good; and a strange sort, called Charu, made of rotten dung; which is dried, and burned; then beaten, and used warm from the batoon: for it won't do if it stands till it be cool. No water can penetrate foundations laid with this cement. This city thrived so fast, that, in 200 years, it extended its dominion over the greater part of Arabia, much of Persia, and all the gulph as far as Basrab. It continued in this flourishing state, till subdued by the Portugueses: since which time it began to decline, by reason, says Teixeira, of the insolence and oppression of the governors and officers of that nation; they being at too great a distance from those who were able to curb them.

THE Hormûzians are fair and well-shaped; the men polite, and genteel; the women beautiful. They all speak the Persian tongue, but not pure. They are all Mohammedans; part Shiays, and part Sunni; which last sect the king professed, in Teixeira's time. Besides the original inhabitants, and the Portugueses, who conquered them, people of several nations were settled there: as Armenians, Georgians, Syrians, Baniyans from India, about 150 families of Jews.

THE island affords plenty of game: as Gazellas; a kind of creatures like wild goats; Adibes, which are a sort of foxes; partridges, turtle-doves, and other sorts of fowl. The wonder is, where these animals drink; since there is no fresh water, but what has been mentioned; which makes some people think they sip salt water. Although the soil produces no vegetables; yet the city is so well supplied with necessaries from abroad, that all things were sold at moderate rates: in short, Hormûz was, when the Portuguese had it, a mart and fair for all the world; where all sorts of commodities were to be found, and the merchants of all nations resorted (X). There is a manufactory here for drinking-cups, and pots to hold water: which are made of the salt clay; and, when become fresh, keep the water cool, and give it an agreeable taste.

To return to the history. Ayâs Seyfin, having reigned ten years, died in the year 711. Others say, that, after settling the affairs of his new state, he resigned the crown, in the year just mentioned, to Amir Ayâzoddin Gordûn Shâb, the son of Soldar and Bibi Zeyneb, grandson to the former king; and that, after his resignation, he returned to his Wazîrship of Kalagât, in Arabia; where he some time after died.

AMIR AYAZO'DDIN GORDUN SHAH, 16th king of the old, and 2d or the new, Hormûz; as soon as he ascended the throne, thought of ratifying the peace with Neîn, king of Keys, whom Ayâz bought the island: but his ambassadors insisted on such unreasonable terms, that Neîn, perceiving he intended a rupture, resolved to prevent him. To this end, he raised forces, and, with the assistance of Mâlek Ayâzo'ddîn, governor of Shîrâz, sailed for Hormûz, with 120 Terradas, which are small vessels, full of men. The chief reason which he alleged for this invasion, was, that Gordûn Shâb had detained the Indian ships at Hormûz, which were bound for Keys; and, by that means, wronged him of his customs. Mean time, Gordûn Shâb passed over, with his army, to Sirmion; a village (Y) in the island of Brokbt, or Qzey-shoma, with a design to cut off the enemy's water. While he was there, news came to him, that ten sail of India ships, bound for Keys, richly laden, were passing between Hormûz and Lârek; an island four leagues to the north. On this advice, he set out, with his fleet, to meet them; and, after an engagement, took, and carried them to Hormûz.

ABOUT this time, the forces of Keys and Shîrâz, being arrived near Sirmion, were surprised by a violent storm, and the whole fleet shattered. Ten ships, however, escaped, and put into the little isle of Aujem; which, lying very close to that of Brokbt, helps to form a safe and TEIX. p. 388, & seqq.

(X) The inhabitants used to say, that the world was a ring, and Ormûz the gem, or stone in it. The officers of the customs assured Teixeira, that they yield the king of Portugal 150,000 pounds; besides what it was supposed that the Moorish officers purloined. Teixeira was here in 1604.

(Y) Near a Cape of the same name, on the western end of the isle.

spacious harbour between the two. Here the king of Keys, incensed afresh with the news of the late capture of the India ships, landed his men; designing, the next night, to pass over to Hormúz. Gordún Shâb, having intelligence of this, disposed his forces in a proper manner to receive the enemy; posting about one third of them on the shore, about 1000 paces distant from the city, at a place called Karu, very proper for making a descent. Accordingly, the confederates attempted it; but were repulsed, with the loss of many men and ships. After this, putting off to sea, they sent to make propositions of peace. But Gordún Shâb rejected them; and, following the advice of Sangor Rokno'ddîn, his general, resolved to fall on his enemies by surprise; who, hearing of it, fled; yet not so timely, but that the Hormúzians made a great slaughter of them.

taken prisoner; Thus roughly handled, they returned to Keys; where having recruited their forces, they, Hej. 714. in the year 714, returned to invade Hormúz, with a greater number of men and ships than A. D. 1314. the time before. With these they beset the island so closely, for four months, that, had not Gordún Shân supplied it in time with plenty of provisions, he must have been obliged to surrender. The king of Keys, perceiving how little he prevailed, proposed a peace, with a view to ensnare him. As it was agreed, that the two kings should have a conference on the shore, he of Keys came in a small boat; and leaping on land, when the king of Hormúz advanced to embrace him, laid hold of him, being strong, and forced him into the boat; which hasting to the fleet, they immediately set sail for Keys. Nor was it any way in the power of the Hormúzians to hinder them ^a.

he escapes; WHEN Bibi Soltâna, Gordún Shâb's consort, was informed of what had happened to her husband, she ordered Mâlek Ghayâzo'ddîn Dinâr, son to her brother Shabân Shâb, to take upon him the government. Four months after, the king of Keys set out again for Hormúz, carrying with him Gordún Shâb. But, when he was about half-way, there arose so violent a tempest, that most of the ships were wrecked, and the rest dispersed into different ports. That wherein Gordún Shâb was prisoner, happened to be saved on the shore of Hormúz; whither a multitude of people resorting, they conducted him with great joy to the city: but Ghayâzo'ddîn Dinâr, having assumed the state of a king, refused to resign the government to him. Hereupon, Gordún Shâb retired to the house of Konia Mehemed Kâleb: but, not thinking himself safe there, went over the same night to the fort of Minab, which signifies Enamel, on the coast of Persia. Dinâr, finding that all the people forsook him, and resorted to Gordún Shâb, left the island, and went to Makrân, a kingdom lying between Persia and India (Z). As soon as he was gone, Gordún Shâb returned to Hormúz, where he was peaceably received; and, two years after, died in the year 717, leaving the throne to his son, Hej. 717. A. D. 1317.

17. Bahrâm Shâh; AMIR MOBAREZO'DDIN BAHRAM SHAH. At the same time, the garrisons in the forts on the continent proclaimed his brother, Shâb Kothbo'ddîn; and conducted him, as king, from the fort of Barkamîn, where he was, to that of Minâb. Babrâm Shâb, hearing of these commotions, set out with his forces; and, meeting him, joined by another brother, named Mâlek Nâzamo'ddîn Ajen Shâb, defeated them both, and returned victorious to Hormúz. Soon after, Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Issuf, or Yusef, and Mîr Tayo'ddîn Zengbi Amîr, his two commanders in chief, one at sea, the other by land, fell at variance about their prince's favour; and, as they disturbed the public peace by their factions, he seized them both. Mean while the king of Keys invaded Hormúz a third time: but met with so warm a reception, that he returned with no better success than he had before. Upon this occasion, Gordún Shâb had released those two commanders out of prison; of whom Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Issuf, thinking himself wronged, meditated revenge.

treacherously slain. As the king was desirous to put an end to the troubles raised by his brothers, who still molested him, he embarked with some troops to pass over to the continent: but, being hindered by contrary winds, went back to lie in his palace that night. When all were gone to rest, Issuf repairs, with some horse and foot, to the gate; calling out for the king to come forth: pretending, that Bibi Soltân Sangor was landed on the island, with an armed force. Babrâm Shâb, upon this alarm, hastened forward, followed by his mother, and brother Nazâmo'ddîn, who had been reconciled to him. But, as soon as they came out of the palace, they were all secured by Mîr Shabâbo'ddîn Issuf; who took upon him the title of king, in the year 718. A. D. 1318.

18. Shahâ-bo'ddîn Issuf. THIS revolution divided the Hormúzians. One part following the usurper Issuf: the other Mîr Kothbo'ddîn, brother to the prisoner king; who had defeated him, as before related, on the continent. Mâlek Dinâr, who had fled to Makrân, hearing of these troubles, returned towards Hormúz, with a good body of forces; giving out, that he came to assist Mîr Shâb Kothbo'ddîn: but finding, on his arrival, that Issuf's party prevailed, he made friends with this latter. Bibi Soltân, sister to Dinâr, and Bibi Nazmâlek, wife to Issuf, undertook to ^a TEIX. p. 393, & seq.

(Z) It is properly a maritime province of Persia.

a reconcile the contending parties : but Iffuf, as the best way to secure himself, cut off the heads of the prisoner king, Gordûn Shâb, his mother, and brother : upon which, Shâb Kothbo'ddin went over to Kalagât, in Arabia ; with Bibi Marian, wife to Ayâz Seyfin. After this, Shahâbo'ddin Iffuf, being informed that the forces of Keys were failing towards him, set forward to meet them : but, when he came in sight of them, returned home in a fright. For all this, the invaders reaped no advantage by their expedition ; returning the fourth time from Hormûz without success. It fared quite otherwise with Shâb Kothbo'ddin ; who, the next year, accompanied with Mâlek Jalâlo'ddin Queyzi, and Khoaja Jamâlo'ddin Neîn, departed from Kalagât ; and, falling unexpectedly upon the island, got possession of it¹.

b MIR SHAH KOTHBO'DDIN, the son of Gordûn Shâb, having thus recovered the kingdom^{19. Shâb} of Hormûz, immediately put to death Mir Shahâbo'ddin Iffuf ; his wife, Bibi Nazmâlek ; and Kothbo'ddin his two sons, Mir Omâdo'ddin Hosselyn, and Amîr Hassan ; who had been prisoners in the fortrefs of Gât. Not long after, Queyzi and Neîn, who had restored Shâb Kothbo'ddin to the throne, conspired to kill him, and secure the kingdom to themselves. Kothbo'ddin, being informed of their villainy, intended to have seized them ; but they, discovering his design, fled out of the island. Neîn was drowned in crossing the sea ; but the other, with a few followers, got safe to Keys. After this, Kothbo'ddin, and his kingdom, enjoyed peace for ten years : at the end of which, a new attempt was made against it from Keys.

c MALEK GHAYAZO'DDIN, who had succeeded in that island, on the death of a former king,^{subdues Keys ;} taking the opportunity, while Shâb Kothbo'ddin was in Mogostân, in Persia, during the summer heats, invaded Hormûz with a considerable fleet, and had made himself master of that island, had it not been for the gallant defence made by Mohammed Sorkâb, and Ibrâhîm Salgor, two of the king's porters, to whom he had committed the guard of it. Shâb Kothbo'ddin, on this advice, returned to Hormûz ; and, fitting out a fleet with great expedition, sailed for the island of Keys ; which he attacked, and made himself master of, with great slaughter of the inhabitants. He likewise took king Mâlek Ghayâzo'ddin, and some of his relations ; whom he afterwards put to death. He left a good garrison at Keys, and then departed ; resolving, before he returned to Hormûz, to attack the island of Bâbrayn (A) : which accordingly he subdued.

d BAHRAYN, or Babreyn, lies in the Persian gulph, midway between the island of Hormûz,^{and Bâhrayn} and the city of Basrah ; 100 leagues distant from each, and near the coast of Arabia, opposite to the port of Katîf, which is in the government of Lakok ; one of those possessed by the Turks in these parts. It is inhabited by Arabs ; only, ever since the year 1602, when it became subject to Persia, the garrison and governor are Persians. The country is pleasant, and abounds with fruit, especially dates ; but produces little of wheat, or barley : and rice, which, next to dates, is the common food, was carried thither from Hormûz, in the time of the Portugueses.^{described.}

e THIS island is famous through the world for its excellent pearls, and fresh water springs ;^{springs.} both found in the sea, which surrounds it. Before Manâma, which is the chief town in the isle, at about three fathom, or three and a half, deep, there gush out certain springs of pure fresh water ; which is brought up in skins by divers, and sold very cheap. Teixeira was told by some of the oldest inhabitants, that those springs were formerly upon the land, remote from the sea ; which, at length, gained ground on that side : and hence he imagines, that the island took the name of Bâbreyn, or the two seas ; meaning a fresh and a salt one ; rather than from two considerable streams which cross the island. Both these are brackish, like the other waters on land ; the best whereof is that of Nanîyah, in the middle of the isle, found in exceeding deep wells.

f THERE are two considerable pearl fisheries in the east ; one at Manar, in the chanel^{Pearl fishery.} between Seylan and Tutan Kori, which is cape Kori ; corruptly, Komori, or Komorin ; the extreme point of Malabar (B) : but the pearls of Bâbrayn surpass all others in goodness and weight. About 200 Terradas, or vessels, joining there, go to Katar, a port of Arabia, ten leagues to the southward ; where the fishing continues all July and August. There are other fisheries of less note, in September, at Nikhelu, Bâbrayn, and Julfar : also at Maskat, Teva, and Ras al Gât ; but the pearls of these last places are of very little value. They are found in oysters, which are brought up by divers ; and lie from twelve to fifteen fathom deep^k.

BUT to return. Shâb Kothbo'ddin, having possessed himself of Bâbrayn, went and took Katîf, Karga, and Darab. Encouraged by this great success, he pursued his good fortune,^{Other conquests.} and conquered all the coast of Persia, and Arabia, within the gulf ; from whence he received

¹ TEIXEIRA, p. 397, & seq.

^k Ibid. p. 398, & seqq.

(A) Which signifies, the two seas. Teixeira writes Barben and Buharim ; but faultily, as he does most of his proper and local names. Bâbrayn is the dual of the Arabic Bâbr, the sea.

(B) Or, as Teixeira makes it, of Korobandel, rather Koro Bander ; that is, as he says, the port of rice ; so called from its plenty on that coast. Tutan Kori (which Europeans corruptly call Tutokori, and Tutekorin) is properly a town on the coast to the east of cape Keri, or Komori.

a a considerable yearly income. Some time after his return to Hormúz, he crossed over to Persia, in order to take the diversion of hunting, accompanied by his brother, Názomo'ddin; who, in return for the affection he bore him, contrived to murder him. To this end, being then at Rúdsbahr, he pretended to follow a hare towards Meridan; by which means, getting at a distance from the king, he came, with his confederates, to the mouth of the Dozár; a rivulet opposite to Jerún, or Hormúz, five miles distant: and, embarking there in Tarrankas, passed over to that island; which, being destitute of the principal men, was easily subdued by him; who thereupon assumed the title of king, in the year 745.

Hej. 745.
A. D. 1344.
Názomo'ddin rebels;

b
As soon as Sháb Kothbo'ddin understood which way his brother was gone, he pursued him full speed: but, by the time he reached the banks of the Dozár, the usurper was landed at Hormúz. So that, not being able to proceed any farther for the present, he withdrew to Kolongo, on the continent; from whence he sent expresses into all parts of his dominions, demanding men, and other assistance, to reduce his rebel brother. At the same time, Málek Názomo'ddin sent advice of his usurpation to all the Wazírs, or governors, throughout the kingdom of Hormúz, requiring them to acknowledge, and submit to, him; with promises of great rewards to such as complied. However, the success did not answer his expectation; for no towns obeyed his summons, excepting some few belonging to Kiriakestán; and these, so soon as summer arrived, sent to tell him, that, unless he sent them forces to defend their date-trees, which are the main support of the inhabitants, against the troops of Kothbo'ddin, who infested them, they should be obliged to submit to him¹.

20. usurps the crown.

c
NÁZOMO'DDIN, taking into consideration the distress of those people, resolved to go over to the continent: but first thought proper to sound the inclinations of the Wazírs, and chief men about his brother; on whom, however, his practices had no effect; excepting one Omar Soyo'ddin, who was Kothbo'ddin's porter, and a colonel in his army. Having gained this man, he passed over into Persia; and marched towards Kolongo. Kothbo'ddin, on this advice, advanced to meet him; and engaged his troops: but, in the heat of action, the traitor, Soyo'ddin, going over to the usurper, with the greater part of his army, he immediately retired towards Jáskes, a maritime town, forty leagues distant; and crossed the gulf to Kalagát, in Arabia. He continued a twelvemonth at this port, which, by his presence, thrived exceedingly; the ships, bound from India to Hormúz, stopping there. At the year's end, he received advice, that Názomo'ddin was dead; and had ordained in his will, d that the eldest of his two sons, Shámbe and Shádi, should immediately repair to Kalagát; and, kissing Sháh Kothbo'ddin's foot, resign the kingdom to him, as being his due. However, the young prince did not think fit to obey the dying commands of his father.

21. His sons
succeed;

e
ON the other hand, Kothbo'ddin seemed to be much concerned at his brother's death; and performed his obsequies with extraordinary pomp: putting himself, and all his attendants, in mourning. At the same time, he wrote consolatory letters to his nephews; offering to look upon them as his own sons. But they, little regarding their uncle, or his kind professions, behaved after such a manner, in the government of affairs, that the whole kingdom was offended at their follies and cruelties. Kothbo'ddin, hearing of the disorderly proceedings of his nephews, prepared to invade them: but, in his passage over to Jakín, one of the Arab towns in Persia, there met him a great number of armed Terradas, sent by the young princes; which he engaged, and defeated, destroying abundance of the forces on board. After this victory, he held on his voyage to Kostak; from which place Amír Ayeb Shamso'ddin came to meet him, with a good number of men from Old Hormúz, to join his forces. From thence sailing to Jerún, or New Hormúz, he landed at Karu, and possessed himself of that post.

submit to Kothbo'ddin;

f
His nephews, perceiving they were undone, and could neither defend themselves, nor fly, delivered themselves up to their uncle; who, at the intercession of some persons of note, condescending to allow them wherewithal for their support, gave them the island of Bábrayn to dwell in, with their followers. Sháb Kothbo'ddin's return considerably advanced the affairs of Jerún, or Hormúz; which had suffered exceedingly under the government of the two brothers. Peace ensued; justice was administered; the price of provisions fell, which, till then, had been very high: and they, who had fled, or been banished by the usurpers, were restored to their houses and estates^m.

raise new commotions;

g
MEAN time, Shámbe and Shádi, who were of a restless nature, had not been long at Bábrayn before they began to raise men, and gather vessels, in order to invade Hormúz. King Kothbo'ddin, being informed of their design, embarked to oppose them, with the greatest force he could levy. As soon as he arrived at Keys, where Shádi then was, he landed his men: but, meeting with much opposition, proceeded but slowly. As those in the island were greatly strengthened, and the king's men were incensed, that they held out so long; some of them, willing to put a speedy end to the enterprise, without orders, provoked Shádi g a to an engagement. As that prince had the advantage on his side, he accepted the challenge, and obtained the victory, with a great slaughter of the Hormûzians. Shâh Kothbo'ddîn, on this defeat, retired, with such as had escaped the battle, to his vessels, and hasted back to Hormûz; where having recruited his forces, he returned to Keys. Shâdi, not thinking himself safe there, went away to Bâbrayn, where his brother was; while the king, who found no resistance after that prince's departure, gave the plunder of the island to his soldiers: and, leaving a good garrison there, returned to Hormûz, with an intent to prepare for an expedition against Bâbrayn.

¹ TEIXEIRA, p. 405, & seqq.

^m Ibid p. 406, & seqq.

As soon as he was departed, the two brothers gathered all the force they could in that island; and went over to Keys, in hopes to recover it: but, when they were half-way, most of their commanders deserted them, in order to join the king. Among the rest, were Shamso'ddîn Mabmûd, Kamâlo'ddîn Ismael, and Nâfro'ddîn Moselek, men of the first rank and quality. These, as they passed by Keys, gave notice to Mir Tagab, the governor, that he might be prepared to receive the two brothers, who were on the way to attack him. When they came up with the island of Brokbt, or Queyshoma, they called in at Lâst, and took on board Sabeko'ddîn, who was there in garrison; lest, having but a small force with him, he should not be able to withstand a sudden attack. Shâmba and Shâdi were not moved, by the desertion of their troops, to desist from their enterprise; but, being refused admittance at Keys, held on their way to Brokbt. Kothbo'ddîn had already sent a force of men and ships to Dargân, a town near Lâst, in order to secure that island; who, on the enemies arrival, engaged them at break of day, and bravely repulsed them both by sea and land, with considerable loss.

THE two brothers, being returned to Bâbrayn, fell at variance; each charging the other with the late disappointment. The difference ran so high, that, at length, Shâdi imprisoned Shâmba, and would have put him to death, had it not been for his mother, who reconciled them, and obtained his liberty. But Shâmba, after this, not caring to remain in Bâbrayn, went over to Persia, and settled near Shîrâz, in a village called Fâl; whence several great men of the kingdom of Hormûz draw their origin. The governor of Shîrâz, being informed of the prince's arrival, sent for him, and did him much honour; on account of the friendship which had subsisted between their fathers and predecessors.

d MEAN time, summer coming on, Shâh Kothbo'ddîn, king of Hormûz, resolved to pass that season at Nâlestân, a pleasant place in the country of Mogostân, in Persia, abounding with water and fruits. But, soon after his arrival there, he fell sick and died, in the year 447.

TURAN SHAH succeeded his father Kothbo'ddîn; and, proving a good prince, was loved and honoured by his subjects. As soon as he ascended the throne, he sent one Mabmûd Omâr, a man of valour and experience, to govern the isle of Keys. For all this Shâdi, who knew his abilities, did not desist from his design of invading that island from Bâbrayn. He accordingly landed there, and had several engagements with the governor: but, finding he made no great progress in his enterprise, he tampered with a kinsman of his, who promised to deliver him up on the first opportunity. To bring this plot to bear, Shâdi pretended to come to an accommodation; and, to that end, demanded a conference with Mabmûd Omar; who too readily consenting, they had an interview. Shâdi, while they walked together, amused him with discourse, that he might not suspect his designs; and, when he had insensibly drawn him at a distance from his men, seized him before he was aware, and deprived him of sight (C). After which, he took possession of the island.

ON this news, Turân Shâh set out for Keys, and arrived so suddenly, that Shâdi had not time to escape: however, it being winter, he made a shift, in a very dark night, to get off in a Tarrankin, although closely watched at land as well as at sea; and fled to Lâst, in the island of Brokbt, or Queyshoma. The king, informed of it, immediately pursued him; and, casting anchor at Dargân, near Lâst, those who were with Shâdi abandoned him, and repaired to Turân Shâh. Shâdi, finding himself forsaken, hasted to his Tarrankin, and set sail, with such expedition, that he got clear away before the persons sent to seize him could come up. However, he did not long survive this disgrace: for, soon after his arrival at Bâbrayn, he died.

^a TEIXEIRA, p. 408, & seqq.

(C) This was practised long before and since by the kings of Hormûz as well as Persia. There were at Hormûz, in Teixeira's time, on a hill about a mile from the city, the ruins of certain houses, where the kings kept their blinded kindred. The operation was performed with a copper basin, made violent hot; which, passing three or four times before the eyes, took away the sight, without altering them to appearance. Maffey informs us, in his Hist. Ind. l. v. that, when Albuquerque took possession of the island, in 1414, or 15, there were no fewer than thirty lords of the blood royal, who had been blinded by the tyrants, jealous of their authority.

for mere vexation, leaving a son very young; on whom king Turán Shâh bestowed his father's a possessions.

Shâmba killed;

MEAN time, Shâmba, who had fled to Shirâz, hearing of his brother's death, hastened to Bâbrayn; where, finding the opportunity favourable, he seized on the island, and took a bloody revenge on all those, who, in the late troubles, had sided with Shâdi against him. He put many of them to death, without sparing his infant nephew; whilst others fled the island, for fear of the like treatment. However, Mir Ajeb, a prime man of Bâbrayn, resenting so much tyranny and insolence, with the assistance of his relations, and others who joined him, assaulted Shâmba's house, and killed him. After this, he set at liberty on Ali Mohammed Palavân, whom Shâmba had imprisoned; thinking, by his assistance, to usurp the sovereignty of the island. Ali not only consented, but, taking with him Sheykh Hamed Râshid, b another Arab commander, went over to Katîf, in Arabia, and demanded some forces of the governor Sheykh Majed, under pretence of opposing Mir Ajeb. The governor, supposing that these two intended to usurp the island of Bâbrayn, not only refused to grant what they asked, but secured, and sent them in custody of an officer to Hormûz °.

Troubles at Bâbrayn.

As soon as Turán Shâh was informed of what had happened at Bâbrayn, he set sail for that island, and carried his prisoners along with him. On his arrival there, Mir Ajeb required of him the sovereignty of the island, in return for the service which he pretended he had done him, in killing Shâmba. But the king refused his request, and resolved to punish him. Whereof Ajeb being informed, he left Manânia, the principal port-town of Bâbrayn, and retired to Thiâr, another on the back of it; where being found by the king's party, he was c brought before him, and had his head struck off. As to the two prisoners, Turán Shâh, finding that they had not served against him, not only gave them their lives, but preferred them. Having settled the affairs of this island, he had a mind to see Kâtîf, on the opposite coast; and only separated by a narrow arm of the sea. He went over with his forces, and was well entertained by Sheykh Majed; where having diverted himself for some days, he returned to Bâbrayn, and from thence to Jerûn, or Hormûz (D). Turán Shâh spent the rest of his life in peace; and died in 779, after a reign of thirty years.

Hej. 779.
A. D. 1377.
23. Massûd.

His sons succeeded him in the following manner. Massâûd, the eldest, mounted the throne on his father's decease, and enjoyed it peaceably during his life.

24. Shahaboddin.

SHAHABO'DDIN, the second son, succeeded his brother Massâûd; and although in his d time there were some commotions, yet they were neither considerable, nor difficult to suppress.

25. Salgor Shâh;

SALGOR SHAH, the third son of Turán Shâh, ascended the throne next. In his reign, there started up in Persia Sufi Khalîl (E); who possessed himself of that whole kingdom, to the very shore opposite to Jerûn; to which he would fain have passed over, but could not for want of shipping; and it is said, that, for mere vexation, he designed to have levelled mountains to fill up the sea; while Sâlgor went about the island and city, singing verses to this purport: my enemy's heart burns, because I am encompassed by the sea. At length Khâlîl went away, without taking any thing from him, but what he had on the continent; where the king of Hormûz possessed, even in the time of our author (though not so absolutely as c before), seventy leagues along the coast, and twenty-eight within land; wherein are comprehended the Amadizes and Gaules (F), fierce and warlike nations. They enjoyed these lands, paying to the kings of Persia a certain acknowledgement, called Mokararias, that they might not ravage them; as they did sometimes when the tribute was held back. Sâlgor had no other remarkable war besides this, but spent his days in peace.

invaded by Khalil.

26. Shâh Weis.

SHAH WEIS ascended the throne on the death of Sâlgor; and, as no disturbance happened during his reign, Hormûz thrived considerably by the advantage of peace. Shâh Weis dying (G), 27. Seyfo'ddin.

SEYFO'DDIN inherited the crown of Hormûz, or Ormûz °. In his time, the Portuguese subdued this island, under the conduct of the renowned Alfonso de Albuquerque. This gene- f ° TEIXEIRA, p. 410, & seq.

° Ibid. p. 413, & seqq.

(D) Thus far Teixeira has taken from the history written by this prince, which ends here. What he adds cannot be very exact; for he omits Mohammed Shâh, under whom, in 1397, Timûr conquered Hormûz. See before, p. 541.

(E) This must be Sufi, or Sofi Khalîl Mutulun, general to Bay Sanker Mirza, son of Takub Beg, a prince of the Ak Koyunlu dynasty, who succeeded his father, in the year 896 of the Hejrah, and of Christ 1490; so that it could not be long before the time of Sufi Ismael, as Teixeira represents it. And the great distance of 118 years, from Turán Shâh's death, shews there is an omission of one or more reigns.

(F) Teixeira knows not whether the fiction (or romance) of Amadis de Gaul may not be derived from hence.

(G) In the first place it is written Shâh Weis, which probably stands for Shâh Weis, Weis, or Avîs; and in this place Shâh Weis; but the English translation of Teixeira, (which we make use of) is faultily printed, as well as the original.

a ral sailed from Lisbon in March 1508, in company with Nunno da Cunha; from whom he parted in August, with seven ships and 460 soldiers; directing his course for the coast of Arabia and Persia, pursuant to orders received from the king of Portugal before he set out. He first touched at Kâlayât, or Kâlagât, often mentioned before; and, settling a peace with the governor, proceeded ten leagues farther to Kûriât: where being ill received, he stormed and took the town, after great opposition, though with the loss of only three men. His soldiers plundered the place, and then burned it, with fourteen vessels in the harbour: after which he sailed eight leagues farther to Maskât, a place stronger than the former, and well provided with men; who flocked thither to defend it. But the governor, unwilling to hazard an assault, made peace with him, and sent provisions to his fleet; when on a sudden the cannon of the town began to play on his ships, and obliged him to draw off: for, having in the interim received a supply of 2000 men from Hormûz, the officers refused to stand to the treaty. But Albuquerque, landing his men next morning by day-break, attacked the town so boldly, that, as the Portuguese entered at one gate, the Arabs fled out of another.

AFTER having plundered Maskât, he passed on to Sobâr (H); whose governor submitted to pay king Manuel the same tribute which he paid to the king of Hormûz. Orfukam, a town fifteen leagues farther, being deserted by its inhabitants, was plundered; which done, he hoisted sail for Hormûz; whose reduction was the principal object of his voyage.

He arrived there about the end of September; at what time, the king being but twelve years old, Hormûz was under the government of Khojâ Attâr, a man of parts and courage: who, hearing of Albuquerque's exploits, had laid an embargo on the ships in harbour, and hired troops from the Persians and Arabs. So that, when the Portuguese fleet entered the port, there were in the city 30,000 fighting men; and in the harbour 400 vessels, sixty of considerable bulk, with 2500 men on board. Albuquerque, to shew those people the greatness of his resolution, came to an anchor among five of the largest ships; firing his cannon, to strike terror along the shore, which was soon covered with 8000 men. Finding that no messenger came from Sayfo'ddin, he sent for the captain of the biggest ship, and told him he had orders to take the king of Hormûz into his protection, and grant him leave to trade in those seas, provided he paid a reasonable tribute: but in case of refusal, he was to make war. It was doubtless no small presumption to offer a king the liberty of his own seas; and impose conditions on him, with that handful of men, and few ships, against such a numerous force.

THE message however, bold as it was, was delivered to the king, and Khojâ Attâr: who, after some delay, to gain time; on being pressed for an answer, sent word, that Hormûz used not to pay, but receive, tribute. Next morning discovered the walls, shore, and vessels; crowded with armed men; while the windows and tops of houses were filled with both sexes, as spectators of what should ensue. Presently, the cannon beginning to play furiously on both sides, the enemy, by favour of the smoke, twice attacked the Portuguese ships, with 130 boats well manned: but many were sunk, and the rest forced by the artillery to retire. By this time, several ships were sunk as well as taken, and thirty set on fire; which cutting their cables, were driven flaming on the Persian coast, where they burned others which lay aground. This struck so great a terror into all the gazing multitude, that they fled the city; and sending to offer Albuquerque whatever had been demanded, he stopped farther proceedings. Thus, with the loss of only ten men, most of the enemy's vessels, full of riches, were destroyed, and 1700 of themselves killed.

KHOJA ATTAR would have eluded the agreement; but, on the general's threats, the articles were drawn, and sworn to by both parties. Their substance was, that the king of Hormûz did submit himself to king Manuel, with a tribute of 15,000 Sharfins (I) yearly; and should assign the Portuguese ground to build a fort. The fort was immediately begun (at the point of Jerân before-mentioned), and much advanced in a few days: but the Wazîr, who could not bear it, designed to kill Albuquerque; and, for that purpose, urged him to give audience to ambassadors, which he pretended came from Persia. Finding his artifice did not succeed, he endeavoured to corrupt the Portuguese with money; and met with such success, that some of his captains opposed all his designs, gave intelligence of his small force to the enemy (K), and persuaded five sailors to desert: which animated Khojâ Attâr to break the peace.

9 DE FARIA Port. Asia, vol. i. p. 126, & seq. MAFHEY, Hist. Ind. 1. 2, & 3.

(H) Written also Scar, and Zoar; but faultily.

(I) Sharafin, or Xerefin, is about half a crown.

(K) Maffey says it was the building of the fort, which discovered the small number of Portuguese; whom Attâr imagined to have been at least 2000; and that it was the being obliged to serve as labourers in that work, which made the men of quality, and others, to murmur.

Albuquerque
retires.

ALBUQUERQUE, burning with revenge, attempted to fire some ships in the arsenal: but, failing, resolved next to besiege the city, battering it for eight days with his cannon. There was a hot dispute at some wells, which supplied the besieged (L), where he was in great danger, his retreat being cut off by the king, and Khojâ Attâr, who came to support their men: but a fortunate ball opened a way for him, by putting the enemy's horse in confusion.

The treaty eluded;

In these actions he found his soldiers but ill disposed to obey him. His captains jealous about the command of the fort, when built, three of them drew up a paper of reasons against the enterprise, and left him at a time when the city must have surrendered for want of water: two others would have done the same, if he had not, by severity, forced them to obey him. However, after sailing to the island of Queyshom, and burning the town there, he thought fit to return to the island of Sokâtra, finding he had but a few men left, and winter drawing on. But as soon as that season was passed, he set out again for Hormûz; though too weak to effect what he intended, yet at least to sound the designs of the king, and his Wazîr Khojâ Attâr. Having in the way taken and plundered Kâlayât, in revenge for some injuries lately done the Portuguese, he cast anchor before Hormûz, on the 13th of September, and sent notice to the king and his minister of his arrival. They answered, that they were ready to pay the tribute agreed on, but would not consent to the building a fort. As to that which Albuquerque had begun, Khojâ Attâr had finished it, the better to oppose him. Upon this, he resolved again to besiege the island, and stationed his ships accordingly; but the success was much the same as before. One of his captains, with eight private men, were killed, and he in great danger himself: whereupon he returned to India, and next year succeeded Don Francisco de Almeyda in the dignity of viceroy.

A. D. 1509.

ratified at last;

A. D. 1514.

ALBUQUERQUE was diverted from the thorough reduction of Hormûz, by other famous conquests, for the three first years of his government: but in 1514, resolving to complete his design, he set out from Goa, on the 20th of February, with a fleet of twenty-seven sail, and 1500 Portuguese, besides 600 Malabars and Kanârans. On the 26th of March, he anchored at Hormûz, and sent to demand of the new king (M), and his Wazîr, Reis Nûro'd-dîn, the delivery of the fort he had begun there, with the instrument of submission made of that kingdom by his predecessor Sayfo'ddîn; who was since dead. Every thing was consented to, because there was no power to resist, and the treaty ratified by the Wazîr. After this, Albuquerque went on with building the fort to his own mind; and, on a scaffold near it, received an ambassador, who came from Shâh Ismâ'el, king of Persia, to conclude a treaty of peace (N). Before the arrival of the viceroy, Reis Ahmed (O) was sent to Hormûz, with a design to seize it for Ismâ'el; and, having gotten the intire ascendant over the king, had brought people secretly into the city to kill him, when a favourable opportunity should present. To deliver him from this danger, Albuquerque procured an interview with him, though not without much reluctance on the part of the Wazîr; who entering foremost in a rude manner, and being known to be armed, as well as some of his followers, was presently slain by the viceroy's command. When the fort was finished, Albuquerque persuaded the king, against his will, that it was for the safety of the city to remove all its cannon thither. And thus was this rich kingdom brought in subjection to the Portuguese.

and a fort built;

Condition of the kings;

THE native kings were still allowed to reign from father to son, as they did before, with this difference: that what formerly they held independently of any other power, they afterwards enjoyed by grant of the king of Portugal; and had only the government of their Mohammedan subjects; nor even that without some restriction. They maintained the state of kings, and had considerable customs: but the Portuguese governors converted the greater part of it to their own use; and whereas his Hormûzian majesty could not go out of the island without leave of the governors, they for some time used to grant it, but afterwards wholly debarred him of that liberty. In this condition Hormûz, or Ormûz, continued; the natural kings succeeding one another, under the dominion of the Portuguese, the space of 114 years; till 1622, when it was taken from them by the Persians, assisted by the English, as hath been already related.

^r DE FARIA, p. 130, & seqq. MAFF. 1. 3, 4.

^s Ibid. ibid. p. 140, & seqq. & l. 4, & 5.

^t TEIX-

EIRA, Hist. Pers. p. 415.

^u See before, the reign of Shâh Ismael Sufi.

(L) These wells were at Turumpûka, or Turumbâka. Maffey writes Turumbata, in the S. W. part of the isle, as hath been already said.

(M) His name was Tor, according to Maffey. Soon after Albuquerque's departure the first time from Hormûz, Attâr died of age; and Nuro'ddîn, governor of the city, slew Seyfo'ddîn, setting up his brother Tor, and placing his own friends in the chief offices of state; among whom were the three brothers, Modhaffer, Ali, and Ahmed. Maff. Hist. Ind. 1. 5.

(N) According to Maffey, it was not till after the death of Ahmed, that the ambassador came from Ismâ'el; who, finding Hormûz to be reduced with so small a force, thought it better to lose his tribute from thence, and make a peace, than begin a war with the conqueror.

(O) According to Maffey, he was the Ahmed mentioned in the last note but one, who, by degrees, got the power into his own hands, and, after Tor had yielded up the fort, would hear speak of no other conditions; chusing rather to yield the kingdom to the king of Persia, than him of Portugal, in case it was to be yielded. For this reason, and others which were discovered, Albuquerque had him killed; and then all things were easy.

B O O K XII.

The history of the Turkmâns and Uzbeks.

C H A P. I.

History of the Turkmâns.

S E C T. I.

The origin, name, branches, and settlements, of the Turkmâns.

^a MIRKOND, a famous Persian historian, often cited in our history of the first Oriental dynasties of the Turks, in his account of Ogûz Khân, the great ancestor of those Turkmâns,^b people, informs us; that the children of this prince, and part of the tribes their origin; descended from them, spread themselves not only over Mâwara'nabr, or the countries beyond the Jibûn, or Amû, which bounds Persia on the north; but also to the south of that river, and along the borders of Khorassân, a province of Irân, or Persia at large: that those people, taking wives out of the women of the country, their children retained in their speech something of the harshness found in that of their parents; and this gave occasion to the inhabitants of Khorassân to call them Turkmâns, or Turkomâns; that is to say, Like the Turks: for, in the Persian language, Turkmân, and Turkmanen, have this signification^a.

^b JEMALO'DDIN, in his history dedicated to Mirza Iskânder, a prince descended from Timûr, and named or Tamerlan, says, that the Turkmâns formerly dwelt in the country beyond Turkestan: from whence removing in great numbers into Persia, the inhabitants of those parts, who observed that they had a great resemblance of the Turks, their neighbours, and came from the same quarter, called them Turkmâns, in the sense above-recited^b. According to Abû'lghazi Khân, the Turkmâns are sprung from the antient inhabitants of Turkestan; and dwelt in the sandy grounds with the tribe of Kânkli; till, separating themselves, at length they went to inhabit towns and villages^c.

^c WHETHER the Turkmâns quitted their native country by constraint, or choice, does not first migration; distinctly appear: but this is certain, that in the reign of Soltân Sanjar, sixth Soltân of the Seljuk Turks of Irân, a colony of Turkmâns, under the name of Gâz, and Ceshm Gâz, settled themselves in the countries of Baklân, Kandar, Khailân, or Kallân, and Khafanian, in the province of Badakhshân, spreading themselves within a little way of the city Balkh, to the number of 40,000 families. In return for this liberty, they agreed to pay the Soltân, yearly, 24,000 sheep, by way of tribute: but the officer, who levied this tribute, happening into a dispute with their chiefs about the quality of the sheep which they delivered them, they fell from words to blows; and in the fray the officer was killed. After this, the Turkmâns ceased paying the tribute for some years; during which time, the Soltân's kitchen was supplied with the usual number of sheep at the expence of his steward; who at length complained to the governor of Balkh, letting him know that he could furnish no more provision of that kind, till the Turkmâns paid the tribute as formerly.

^d THIS affair being reported to the king's Divân, or council, the Turkmâns were adjudged take Sanjar to pay 30,000 sheep, instead of 24,000, which they paid before; and to receive an officer prisoner;

^a MIRKOND in Ogûz Khân, ap. D'Herbel. Bibl. orient. p. 900, art. Turkmân.
ubi supra.

^c ABU'LGHAZI KHAN, Genealog. Hist. of the Turks, &c. p. 32.

^b D'HERBEL.

from the court, that there might be no failure of the kind for the future. But the Turkmâns, refusing to admit of any officers over them, excepting those of their own nation, made away with him whom the Soltân had sent them. Hereupon the governor of Balkh marched out to chastise their insolence: but the Turkmâns, routing his forces, killed both him and his son. On the news of this defeat, Soltân Sanjar marched in person against these strangers: who, terrified at his approach, sent deputies to implore his clemency; and offer, besides the usual tribute, to pay two rubles of silver, which make about two marks, for every family. The Soltân was inclined to pardon them, and accept of the satisfaction: but he was dissuaded by the chief officers of his army; who engaged him in a very unfortunate war: for his troops were entirely defeated, and himself, with all his women, taken prisoners^d by the Turkmâns; among whom he remained a prisoner for some years, as hath been already related^b in the reign of that prince^c.

settle in Armenia;

THE Turkmâns, after this, passed into Persia, and settled in several provinces of it, by favour of the princes both of the Seljuk and Karazmian dynasties, who employed them in their service. By this means, at length, they migrated westward into the countries of Azerbejdân, and Armenia; where their power increasing, by the accession of numbers, who retired into those parts, either through choice, or to avoid the arms, first, of the Karazmians, and then of the Mogols, under Jenghîz Khân, they at length founded two monarchies; of which we shall treat hereafter. It has been already observed, that both the Seljuk and Otmân Soltâns have been considered as of the race of Turkmâns, by the Soltâns of other Turkish dynasties; but whether this be fact or not, it seems a very difficult matter to determine.

and Karazm.

AT the same time that several tribes, or bodies, of Turkmâns migrated in the manner now mentioned, another part of them staid behind, and settled about the banks of the river Amû, and the shore of the Caspian sea; where they still possess a great number of towns and villages in the country of Astarabâd and Karazm, which they inhabited long before the irruption of the Tatars. From these two different establishments of the Turkmâns, they may be divided into eastern and western. The former of these have been hitherto little known to the European historians and geographers; although they are much more numerous at present than the western Turkmâns: for those authors, who, before D'Herbelot, had given extracts from the oriental writers, take little notice of them; and others relate no more than what occurs in the Byzantine, and such western historians, who lived at too great a distance to be acquainted^d with their affairs.

Oriental Turkmâns;

ABU'LGHAZI, Khân of Karazm, who was a great enemy to the Turkmâns, settled in that country, of which he was sovereign, mentions them in his history on several occasions; sometimes, according to the parts which they inhabited, as when he speaks of the Turkmâns of Mankishblâk, Abu'lkhân, and Dehistan^f; which last territory belongs to Persia: but oftener on account of their different tribes, or branches: of which the chief are, 1. Adâkli Khisserili; these dwell on both sides of the Amû, from the province of Pishga to that of Karakizet^g. 2. Ali-ili; inhabiting from the province of Karakizet to the mountain of Abu'lkhân. 3. Ti-u-âzi; who possess the rest of the banks of the Amû, from Abu'lkhân to the sea: these three tribes are surnamed Utzil^h. Besides them, we meet with the following; viz. Taka,^e Sarik, Yamut, Irsari, *Khorassân-saluri*ⁱ (these five formerly made but one tribe); Itzki-saluri, Hassan, Ikdur, Dsauduz, Arabaz, Koklân, Adâkli^k, Karâmit^l, and some others less considerable^m. A curious English traveller in this country, in the sixteenth century, remarks, that all the country from the Caspian sea to Urgbenj, the capital of Karazm, is called the land of *Turkmân*ⁿ.

way of living;

THE oriental Turkmâns are tall and robust, with square flat faces, like the occidental; only they are swarthier, and have a greater resemblance of the Tatars. In summer, they wear long gowns of callico, or thick cloth; and in winter, the like gowns of sheep-skin. Cattle and husbandry afford them subsistence, according to the different parts they possess. In winter, they dwell in towns and villages about the river Amû, and towards the shores of the Caspian sea: in summer, they encamp where they can find the best pasturage, and good water (A). They are, as to belief, all Mohammedans. Such as are settled in the country of Astarabâd generally follow the Persian sect: but the tribes, who dwell in Karazm, conform with the Uzbek Tatars, in sentiments of religion; although neither one nor the other give themselves much trouble about it.

^d D'HERBEL. ubi supra.

^e See before, p. 184.

^f Genealog. Hist. p. 235.

^g Ibid.

p. 256.

^h Ibid. p. 236, 239.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 238.

^k Ibid.

^l P. 256.

^m P. 238.

ⁿ JENKINSON. Voy. to Bogar, in Purch. vol. iii. p. 237.

(A) Jenkinson says, that those of the land of Turkmân above mentioned, dwell in tents, roving in great companies, with their camels, horses, and sheep; which last are large, and have tails weighing sixty or eighty pounds.

THESE Turkmâns are extremely turbulent; and submit with great reluctance to the Tatar their charac-yoke in Karazm. They are very brave; and, at least, as good horsemen as their lords the Uzbeks: by whom being treated as conquered subjects, they are obliged to pay them tribute; and suffer several other impositions from those rigid masters. It is on this account chiefly, that they bear them so great animosity: but the Turkmâns, who dwell under the dominion of the Persians, are much better treated. Both together may amount to about one hundred thousand families.

WHEN the Uzbeks entered Karazm, under Ilbars Khân, that prince, after driving out the Persians, was joyfully received by the Sârts, or old inhabitants, and proclaimed Khân in 1505^a: but they met with great opposition from the Turkmâns. However, under Sofian Soltân, third Uzbek Khân, they submitted to a considerable tribute, part in sheep, and part in merchandize^b. Yet, not brooking this subjection, they often refused to discharge that obligation, till they were compelled by force. They likewise took part in the disputes, which, from time to time, arose among the Uzbek princes; who sometimes carried their point by means of their assistance. This naturally increased the stubborn humour of the Turkmâns, Uzbeks of Karazm, and made the Uzbeks jealous: insomuch that, although they had been very instrumental in setting Abû'lghâzi Soltân on the throne of Karazm, and were the first who proclaimed him Khân in the year 1644; yet, in remembrance of the troubles they had occasioned in the reigns of his predecessors, he cut off 2000 of them at one time by treachery. And, being resolved to reduce them so low, that they should not be able to raise disturbances for the future, he made several expeditions against them; in which they suffered severely^c. We find, by the latest accounts of travellers, that the Turkmâns still maintain a footing in the above-mentioned countries, and produce men eminent for their valour, and experienced in war; of which the late Nadîr Shâh, or Tahmâsp Kûli Khân, the conqueror of Persia and India, may be alleged as an instance. This is all that we think necessary to say of the oriental Turkmâns; who, having always been subject to the dominion of other princes, never erected any sovereignty of their own.

THE occidental Turkmâns, who for a long time possessed the western provinces of Persia, Occidental with the provinces westward as far as the Euphrates, are supposed, by some authors, to have Turkmâns; separated from their brethren of the east, when they first departed out of Turkestan; and, marching westward through the countries situated to the north of the Caspian sea, thence passed southward into Armenia, and the other provinces, which they afterwards subdued: but it seems more probable, that they migrated thither in the manner as hath been before sug- their various gested (B). These Turkmâns became very potent, under two dynasties, or successions, of fortune; their princes; and were, for some time, masters of a great part of Irân, or Persia at large (at least, of those provinces which the Seljuk Soltâns of Irâk had under their dominion); after they had driven out the descendants of Timûr, with all the Tatars, by the valour and conduct of Usûn Hassan, founder of the second dynasty. But since the race of Haydr, or the Shâhs, have possessed themselves of the Persian empire, and the Othmân Turks become masters of all the provinces west of the Tigris, the occidental Turkmâns have been reduced to a very low state. Nevertheless they still enjoy the finest plains along the banks of the Euphrates: but from being lords, as they were before, they are now fallen to be subjects of the Turks; who, for all their endeavours, have not been able absolutely to subdue their restless disposition, and reduce them every-where to a thorough dependence.

THEIR manner of living is much the same now that it was when they first came to settle their dwell- in these parts; dwelling under tents made of thick felt (C), without any fixed habitations. In make and features they resemble the oriental Turkmâns; but their women are very fair, and of a becoming size. They wear in winter long gowns of sheep-skins, with peaked bon- nets of the same; and, in summer, vests of callico, shaped like the Kaftâns of the Turks. They are good horsemen, and very brave. They profess Mohammedism: but perform the duties of it no better than their brethren in the east. They have their own chiefs, or heads of tribes; who govern them according to their laws (D). However, they are obliged to pay tribute to the Othmân Soltân, and to furnish a certain number of horsemen, whenever the Porte requires it. In winter, they come in quest of pasture along the banks of the Euphrates;

^a BENTINCK, in Genealog. Hist. p. 397, 426, & seq.
^b Ibid. p. 349, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 220.

^d Ibid. p. 229, & seq.

(B) Al Jamâbi says, that these western Turkmâns left Turkestan, their native country, in the time of Argûn Khân. Pocock. Suppl. ad Hist. Compend. Dynast. p. 58. Argûn was the fourth Khân of the Moguls, successors of Hû'akz, in Persia; he began his reign in 682 or 683 of the Hejrah, and died in 690, or A. D. 1291.

(C) These tents are made in a round form, like towers. Le Febvre, Theatre de la Turquie, p. 362.

(D) They are governed by an Aga, or lord, of their own nation, independent of the Pashâ; who has nothing to do with the government of the Turkmâns. Le Febvre, ubi supra.

and, in summer, encamp in the vallies, inclosed within the mountains of Armenia, towards the a springs of that river and the Tigris.

character; THESE Turkmâns are naturally great robbers; but the Turkish Pashâs, who command in those parts, take all the care possible to bridle them: because they are interested in securing the roads, as the frequent passage of the Karawâns makes a considerable article in their revenue.

and strength; THE occidental Turkmâns are able to arm about 40,000 men. They are continually fighting with the Kurds, or Kyurds, who are their neighbours to the east; and with the Arabs, who border on them to the south: because these two nations often come and break the horns of their cattle, and carry away their wives and daughters¹. They sometimes march two or b three hundred families together, to secure themselves against the Arabs; attended with such numerous droves of camels, goats, and sheep, that the land appears covered with them for the space of two leagues: so that they pass for the richest shepherds in the Othmân empire.
They have some fire-arms among them; although they, for the general, make use only of the bow.

very industri- BOTH men and women are never idle; but always doing something. Even on the road, ous; they employ themselves either in spinning, or grinding their grain, with little hand-mills, placed on the back of their camels: which carry a bag also on each side; one full of what is to be ground, and the other to receive it when ground. Their language is the Turkish, a little corrupted, and different from the vulgar tongue. They likewise approach nearer the Turks in dress and religion, than any other nation inhabiting the Othmân empire². c first settle- HAVING premised thus much concerning the manners and living of the Turkmâns, we shall ments, proceed to give an account of the two dynasties founded by them in the west of Asia, which went under the denomination of Kara Koyunlû, or the Black Sheep, and Ak Koyunlû, or the White Sheep (E); so named from the figures of those animals being painted, or woven, in their ensigns, or colours.

in the west. KONDAMIR observes, that, as these Turkmâns spread much in Anatolia, and dwelt there, their name is still given to the country about Trebizond; which is called by the Turks Kara Koyunlû-ili; that is, the Country of the Black Sheep. In like manner, the Lesser Armenia retains the name of Ak Koyunlû-ili, or the *Country of the White Sheep*³. But this seems to d be a mistake, for the Greater Armenia, or some neighbouring country to the east of the Euphrates; and, according to Al Jannâbi, the Ak Koyunli kings began their dynasty in Diyârbekr; which is part of Mesopotamia, adjoining to the Greater Armenia. The same author says, that the Kara Koyunli princes erected their dominion about Arzenjân, and Siwâs, in *Anatolia*⁴.

¹ BENTINK, ubi supra, p. 424.
Bibl. orient. p. 253, art. Cara Coin, & p. 900, art. Turkmân.

² LE FEBURE Theatre de Turquie, p. 362.

³ D'HERBEL.

⁴ Pocock, Suppl. ad Hist. Dynast. p. 58.

(E) The modern Greeks calls those two races Mauroprobatadæ and Asproprobatadæ, which signify the same things as Kara Koyunlû and Ak Koyunlû; or as others terminate them in li, instead of lu. Some write Koinlu for Koyunlu: but the latter seems the truer pronunciation.

S E C T. II.

The Turkmân dynasty of the Kara Koyunlû, or Black Sheep.

A. D. 1410.
Dynasty of Kara Koyunlû;

THIS first dynasty of the Turkmâns does not properly take its rise from the dominion e which their princes exercised over their own nation; although they seem to have had a sort of independent authority in Armenia, and the other parts where they were settled; in the life-time of Kara Mohammed, father of Kara Yusuf; but from the time that this latter, having made himself master of Azerbejân, about the year 809 of the Hejrab, and of Christ 1406, began a new succession of princes in that country: whose title, however, was not completely established till 813, by the death of Soltân Abmed Jalayr; which put an end to the dynasty of the Ilkhânians, and brought all their dominions under the power of the Turkmâns. This happened on the following occasion.

their rise;
Hej. 783.
A. D. 1381.

AHMED JALAYR EBN AWIS, or Weis, ILKHANI (F), 4th Soltân of the Ilkhânian princes, who reigned in Irâk-Arabi, and Azerbejân; having in the year 783, or the following, defeated

(F) Soltân Awis, or Weis, called also Sheykh
Weis, was son of the Amir Sheykh Hassan Ilkhâni, surnamed, in Turkish, Buzruk, or the Great; who descended from Abu Saïd, last emperor of the Moguls in Persia.
For, after his death, several Tatar princes divided his dominions among them. Of these Sheykh Hassan Ilk- hâni, the father of Sheykh Weis, was one. Abujaid gave him the government of Anatolia; and after his death, which was in Hejrab 736, A. D. 1335, he conquered several provinces. The title of Ilkhâni denotes his being descended from Hâlakû, founder of the Mogul dynasty in Persia; who was surnamed Ilkhân.

and

a and put to death his elder brother Huffeyn, who was in possession of those countries, Adel Aga, general of Huffeyn's army, set up Báyezíd, the youngest brother, who, for fear, had fled to him, and defeated Abmed. Not content with this victory, he pursued that prince; who had retired to Marualrúdb, in Khorassán: but when he was advanced near that city, the principal officers of the army mutinied against him, in favour of Abmed; so that he was obliged to retire, with his new Soltán, to Soltaniya, in Persian Irák. On this advice, Abmed made haste to seize on Tabríz, or Tauris; which was abandoned: but he was scarce arrived, when, being informed that Sheykh Ali and Pir Ali were advancing to besiege him, he went out to meet them; and had certainly gained the victory, if, as the two armies came in fight, Omar Kipchaki, who was in the Soltán's army, had not gone over with his men to Sheykh Ali.

b AHMED, being weakened by this piece of treachery, made what haste he could to Nakshiván, there to join Kara Mobammed, or Mehemed, the Turkmán; who, putting himself at the head of 5000 horse, marched along with the Soltán against the two princes, whom they intirely defeated, and slew. Abmed's affairs being by this means re-established, he returned in triumph to Tauris; and, to reward Kara Mehemed for so signal a piece of service, not only made him general of all his forces, but also gave him his daughter in marriage^r.

Four years after, Timúr, or Tamerlán, having, after the conquest of the rest of Persia, taken Soltaniya, Tauris, Nakshiván, and the rest of Azerbeján, from Soltán Abmed, with little or no opposition, he, in 789, marched from Nakshiván against the Turkmáns; who, he was informed, were continually molesting the Mohammedans, and attacking the Karawáns. In his way he plundered the castle of Báyezíd, called before Aydín, with the country about Avenik, or Ván, where Meser, son of Kara Mehemed, resided; and, having taken Arzerúm, he sent in pursuit of Kara Mehemed himself; who, having retired to the top of an inaccessible mountain, the troops were forced to return without success^z.

How long Kara Mehemed lived after this, does not appear from the authors in view. We find indeed, that, in 795, Timúr, being on his way to besiege Bághdád, met Mehemed, prince of the Turkmáns, near Sberezúr, in Kurdestán, whom he attacked, at the head of 100 men, and routed. Whether this was Kara Mehemed, or another chief of the Turkmáns in those parts, we are not positive; but this is certain, that, after his death, his son Kara Yusef, or Iffuf, succeeded to the command, not only of the Turkmán militia, who were in the Soltán's service, but also to that of all his troops, in the same extent that his father had enjoyed it^a. Mean time, Soltán Abmed, finding himself too weak to resist such a power as was coming against him, as soon as Timúr arrived before Bághdád, fled to Hilleh, a city on the Euphrates, with Kara Yusef; and, after some skirmishes, wherein he behaved with great bravery, escaped from a party of Tatars, sent in pursuit of him. Timúr, having thus become master of Bághdád, without opposition, staid there two months, and then departed, to reduce Takrít, a strong fortress, and the rest of Irák Arabi: which having done, he left a governor in Bághdád, and marched towards Diyárbekr^b.

KARA YUSEF had retired on this side, to defend his possessions in those quarters; but, on Timúr's approach, in 796, to besiege the castle of Alenjík, he fled with his Turkmáns; whom the Tatars were ordered to pursue to the utmost. The same year, that conqueror took Avenik, or Ván, after a most obstinate defence, made by Meser, brother of Kara Yusef; who was sent prisoner to Samarkand, and Atilmish made governor. But some time after, while Timúr was in Tatary, Kara Yusef attacked Atilmish; and, having defeated and taken him, by way of requital, sent him in chains to Bárkok, Soltán of Egypt^c.

It is not certain whither Soltán Abmed was retired after his flight from Bághdád. Ebn Arabsháh says, he went to Egypt, and put himself under the protection of Soltán Bárkok: but that does not appear from Sharíf Addín's history of Timúr; who, it is to be presumed, would in such case have made it an article of complaint against that Soltán. However it be, we find, that Abmed at length recovered Bághdád: for, in 801, Mirán Sháh, Timúr's third son, who was governor of Azerbeján, marched to besiege him in that capital: though he was obliged to return, by an insurrection at Tauris in his absence. But, next year, the Mírza Rástem, son of Omar Sheykh, Timúr's second son, set out from Shíráz, by his grandfather's order, toward Irák Arabi, with a design to reduce the country once more to his obedience. On advice of Rástem's being arrived at Mendeli, in Kurestán (*), Soltán Abmed shut the gates of Bághdád, intending to sustain a siege. Just at this juncture a conspiracy was formed against him by Sherwán, Timúr's governor of Kurestán; who, having revolted, fled to Bághdád; and,

^r D'HERB. p. 129, art. Avis Ahmed; and p. 253, art. Cara Coin, and Cara Coinlu. Timur Beg, l. ii. c. 49. p. 256, and 278. ^a D'HERB. p. 254. art. Cara Josef.

^z SHARIFO'DD. Hist.

^b Hist. Timur,

^c Ibid. c. 43, p. 468, and l. v. c. 17. p. 158.

(*) Kurestán seems to be put instead of Kuzestán, or Khuzestán.

by his money, bribed Abmed's officers to his interest: but the Soltân, coming to discover this plot, by the account of money paid, which Sherwân's secretary had accidentally dropped, put that traitor to death, with 2000 of his own corrupted officers^d.

retires to Turkey;

THIS done, not thinking himself safe, he fled by night into the country of Kara Yusef, and with him returned to Bâghdâd. Yet, soon after, hearing that Timûr was on his march to Sivâs, and fearing, if that conqueror should once more enter Anatolia and Syria, the passages would be blocked up, whilst he should be obliged to fly, they departed for Anatolia; and, at Hâlep, defeated Temûrtâsh, the governor, who advanced to oppose the Soltân's passage: but, on the way to Sivâs, being informed that a party of Timûr's army was advancing against them, they turned out of the road. However, the Tatars overtook their baggage, and brought off the Soltâna Dilshâde, eldest sister of Kara Yusef, with his wife and daughter: but Kara Yusef himself and the Soltân, pursuing their route, escaped to the court of Îlderîm Bâyezîd, the Othmân Soltân^e.

Hej. 803.
A. D. 1400.

returns again;

Hej. 804.
A. D. 1401.

TIMUR, after the taking of Sivâs, instead of proceeding farther against Bâyezîd, turned towards Syria; which having subdued, he marched through Mesopotamia, subduing all the places as he went; and, in 804, encamped before Bâghdâd. This city was then governed by Farraj (or Farruj), who commanded in the absence of Abmed, with orders not to shut the gates against Timûr: but Farraj making opposition, the city was taken by assault, after a very strenuous resistance, and almost all the inhabitants (G) put to the sword. Timûr, not content with this slaughter, ordered all the buildings, except mosques, colleges, and hospitals, to be destroyed^f.

fies to Hellah.

HAVING taken this severe revenge on the once capital of the world, he marches back to Anatolia, in order to attack Bâyezîd; who, by the instigation of Soltân Abmed and Kara Yusef, had brought an army into the field; and, in revenge for the ruin of Sivâs, resolved to besiege Arzenjân, governed by prince Tabârtan; to whom Timûr had given it. As soon as Abmed was informed, that Timûr was advancing towards Anatolia, he left the Othmân camp at Kaysariya, and returned to Bâghdâd, with a design to rebuild it. But, before he could make any great progress, Mirza Abubekr, son of Omar Shcykh, arrived there one evening, when least expected. The Soltân was so surprised and pressed on this occasion, that he fled in his shirt; and, crossing the Tigris by boat, with his son Taber, got to Hilleh, and thence lower down the Euphrates, where he staid all winter; while the Tatars remained in the country, and then returned^g.

Kara Yusef

MEAN time, Kara Yusef continued in Anatolia, invading the provinces, and robbing the Karawâns under the protection of Bâyezîd; which made Timûr resolve to invade the Othmân dominions. Bâyezîd, on this advice, sent ambassadors with a letter, in very submissive terms, to Timûr; who, in answer, required, that Kara Yusef, the greatest robber and villain upon earth, as he called him, should either be put to death by the Soltân, sent in chains to Timûr, or expelled out of the Othmân dominions. Instead of complying, either on this or a second embassy, Bâyezîd sent a haughty answer; which determined Timûr to attack him, as we have before related in the reign of that Soltân: who, being defeated and taken, was reproached by Timûr, for hazarding a war, rather than deliver up the Turkmân^h.

takes Bâghdâd;

fies to Egypt;
Hej. 805.
A. D. 1402.

WHEN Timûr was about Cæsaria, in his way to fight Bâyezîd, Kara Yusef, who was then at Prusa, or Bursa, fled to Hilleh, in Arabian Irâk, and thence to the deserts; where he assembled all the Turkmân hords at Payan Hît. At the same time, Soltân Abmed retired from Bâghdâd, to his son Soltân Tâber; who, excited by some of his father's Amîrs, crossed the Tigris, and revolted. Upon this, Abmed sending for Kara Yusef to join him, they both passed the river, and defeated the troops of Tâber; who was drowned in his flight. But afterwards, Soltân Abmed growing jealous of Kara Yusef, this last went to Hilleh; where gathering his troops, he marched back to Bâghdâd, and took it. Soltân Abmed in this distress hid himself in the city till night came, and then escaped to Takrît; from whence he retired to Syria, leaving Kara Yusef in possession of the country.

NEXT year, Timûr, being at Kârs in Armenia, sent his grandson, the Mirza Abubekr, to rebuild Bâghdâd, with orders to pursue and ruin Kara Yusef, who had made himself master of Irâk Arabi (H). Abubekr, having reached Bâghdâd, marched to Hilleh; where, being joined by Mirza Rustem, he passed the Euphrates, and met Kara Yusef over-against the town of Sîb, on the Nabr al Ganam, below that city. And although they had then with them and ARABSHAH Hist. Timur, l. vi. par. 3.

^d Hist. Timur, l. v. c. 1. p. 108, et c. 7. p. 131.

c. 39. p. 230. and c. 43. p. 242. ARABSHAH, l. vi. p. 4.

^e Ibid. c. 15. p. 154.

^f Ibid. c. 32. p. 211.

^h Ibid.

(G) Arabshâh says, to the number of 90,000.

(H) Mirkond, father of Kondamîr, according to Teixeira, relates, that Timûr had bestowed Bâghdâd on Soltân Abmed; but that, while Timûr was gone into Rûm, or Anatolia, against Bâyezîd, Kara Yusef took it from Abmed; that Timûr, at his return, sent Abubekr, his grand-son, who recovered it from the Turkmân, and restored it to the Soltân. Teixeira. Hist. Pers. ch. 45. But this is contrary both to Sharifoddîn's History of Timûr, and that of Kondamîr; of which D'Herbelot has given an extract.

a but 3000 men, yet they attacked the Turkmân prince, who was intrenched with a numerous army, and defeated him, killing his brother Yar Ali. Kara Yusuf himself, with some of his domestics, fled into Syria: but his subjects, consisting of between 10 and 15,000 families, were pillaged, and his oxen, sheep, and camels, carried away. The soldiers of Mirza Rûstem brought in chains to their lord the wife of Kara Yusuf, mother of Eskânder and Espendeh, attended by the ladies of her court, and her relations. After this, Mirza Abûbekr ordered Bâghdâd to be rebuilt¹.

It may be presumed, that on this defeat Kara Yusuf fled to Egypt, as Soltân Ahmed had ^{is detained} done the year before. For we meet with no farther mention of their affairs in the history of ^{there,} Timûr till the year 807, when an ambassador arrived at Samarkand from Mîlek al Nasr Farruj, Soltân of Egypt, to that conqueror, who was preparing for his expedition to China, ^{Hej. 807.} A. D. 1404: with a letter concerning those two fugitive princes. Timûr sent back the ambassador with an answer^k, for the purport of which, not mentioned in Sbarîfo'ddîn's history of that monarch, we must have recourse to other authors.

According to Kondamîr, Timûr being informed that Soltân Ahmed and Kara Yusuf were ^{with Soltân} fled into Egypt, he wrote to Farruj to send him the first under a strong guard, and keep the ^{Ahmed.} latter prisoner. Farruj, who was willing to preserve the laws of hospitality, and, at the same time, in some measure satisfy Timûr, set guards over them: but, as they were not deprived of the liberty of conversing together, they made an agreement to attach themselves firmly to the Egyptian Soltân; and never make war on, but mutually assist, each other, as soon as ^c they should recover their liberty. This however did not happen till the death of Timûr, in the year 807, before-mentioned (I), soon after the ambassador of Farruj had left his court.

On the news of his death, Farruj caressed his prisoners exceedingly, and gave them their ^{Both released.} release. But Kara Yusuf was no sooner out of Egypt, than, putting himself at the head of his Turkmâns, he subdued great part of Arabian Irâk, and Jazîreh, or Mesopotamia, for Soltân Ahmed; who paying no regard to the complaints of the king of Egypt, this latter intirely withdrew his protection from him. The Ilkhânian prince, seeing himself abandoned by so powerful an ally, had recourse to stratagem; and, getting into Bâghdâd, with some of his followers disguised like beggars, raised such a sedition against the governor deputed by Abûbekr Mirza, to whom Timûr had given it, that the inhabitants drove him out, and proclaimed ^d Ahmed Soltân.

TOWARDS the end of the year 808, while Abûbekr Mirza was employed in the siege of Kara Yusuf's Ispâhân, the Amîr Ibrâhîm (K), marching out of Shîrwân, seized Tauris: but on Soltân ^{successes;} Ahmed's approach, he returned home. However, he did not let Ahmed long enjoy his diver- ^{Hej. 808.} sions there: for, next year, after he had taken Ispâhân, he obliged the Soltân to yield him ^{A. D. 1405.} Tauris, and make a precipitate retreat to Bâghdâd. Mean time Kara Yusuf, taking advantage of the divisions, fell with his fresh and warlike troops on the province of Azerbejdân; and, in two or three years, made himself intire master of it¹.

It is from this expedition (which he undertook about the year 809), that the beginning ^{begins to reign;} of his reign seems to be dated; at least from his conquest of Tauris, the capital of Azerbejdân, ^{A. D. 1406.} which he took, after having defeated and slain in battle the Mirza Abûbekr, son of Mirân Shâh, near the city of Nakhshivân, and afterwards Mirân Shâh himself, in the year 810.

SOLTÂN Ahmed, unable to see this conquest made of his patrimony without reluctance, ^{defeats Soltân} resolved to come to a rupture with the Turkmân; and, taking the opportunity, while he was at Ahmed; war against Kara Otkmân in Armenia Major (L), came and surprised Tauris; which he entered, without any opposition, in 813. As soon as Kara Yusuf heard of this loss, he marched with a ^{Hej. 812.} potent army against the Soltân; who went to meet him with all his forces, two leagues from that ^{A. D. 1409.} city: where a bloody battle was fought; in which Ahmed was defeated, and so hotly pressed, that he had scarce time to save himself in a garden, where he lay concealed for some time: but, being at length discovered, he was carried to his conqueror; who reproached him with his treachery, yet took not away his life. However, he disposed of his dominions, and laid him ^f under an injunction not to attempt any thing against his authority. But, soon after, the ^{puts him to} principal lords of Irâk, who were exasperated against the Soltân, advised Kara Yusuf to dispatch ^{death;}

¹ Hist. Timur, l. v. c. 51. p. 262. l. vi. c. 3. p. 302, 304, & c. 11. p. 325. p. 149. art. Avis Ahmed, and p. 254. art. Cara Josef.

^k Ibid. p. 25, 26.

¹ D'HERB.

(I) He died at Otrâr, or Farâb, on the river Sihân, in his way to China, the 10th of Shaabân, which answers to the 25th of March 1405.

(K) Doubtless the same whom Teixeira, from Mirând, calls Sheykh Ebrahim, king of Shîrwân.

(L) It is so in the article of Cara Josef; but in that of Avis Ahmed ben Avis he is said to have been in Gur- jeshân, or Georgia. This may be reconciled from Teixeira, who says, he marched against Kara Ozmân Bayânduri, then possessed of Diyâr-b. kr; who, on his approach, fled; and that afterwards, in 815, he entered Gurjeshân, slew Constantine its king; then, returning by Shîrwân, brought away its king Sheykh Ebrâkîm. This is said to be done after the death of Soltân Ahmed.

him; under pretence, that, being naturally of a restless temper, he would not continue long without drawing on them a new war, which would complete their ruin (M). The Turkmān, following their counsel, ordered both him and his children to be put to death the same year. Thus fell the family of the Ilkhānians, and that of the Black Sheep took its place^m.

dies himself.

Hej. 822.
A. D. 1419.

AFTER the death of Soltān Abmed, Kara Yusef rose to a great pitch of power: for he possessed the provinces of Irāk Arabi, Aljazireh or Mesopotamia, and Azerbejān, a great part of Gurjestān (or Georgia), and Armenia. As he went on extending his dominions, he had begun to threaten Syria (N) and Anatolia with an invasion, when Mirza Shāh Rūkh, fourth son and successor of Timūr, after he had pacified the most eastern provinces of his empire, resolved, in the year 822, to revenge on him the death of his brother Mirān Shāh, which he had designed ever since that disaster. With this intent he entered Azerbejān with a formidable army; where Kara Yusef, with a like force of veteran troops, marched to meet him. In short, they were at the eve of one of the most bloody battles that ever was fought in Asia, when, luckily for Shāh Rūkh, Kara Yusef died in his camp at Awjān (O), near Tauris.

His reign;

THE Turkmāns being thus left without a commander (for none of either the children or relations of Kara Yusef were in the camp) they soon dispersed. Part of the troops rifled the tents of their prince. Some soldiers were so insolent as to cut off his ears, for sake of the pendants; and all in general abandoned his corpse, which continued a long time unburied; till some of his friends had it carried to Arjīs (P), and there interred it. The death of this prince happened in the year 823, and fourth of his reign.

A. D. 1420.
and children.

HE had six sons. Pir Buda Khān, who died before his father: Amir Iskānder, who succeeded him: Mirza Jebān Shāh, who succeeded Iskānder: Shāh Mohammed, who had the government of Persia (Q): Amir Absal, who died also before his father; and Abu Saïd, who was killed by his brother *Iskānder*ⁿ.

2. Iskānder defeated
Hej. 824.
A. D. 1421.

AMIR ISKANDER, OR MIR ISKANDER (that is Alexander) second son of Kara Yusef, succeeded his father, in the year 824; and continued the war against Mirza Shāh Rūkh, by whom he was overthrown in Diyārbekr: after which he retired towards the Euphrates, while the victor marched back to Tauris. Yet he was obliged to withdraw into Khorassān with his army, not being able to gain that city, the inhabitants refusing to admit him, both for love and fear of Iskānder, who on Shāh Rūkh's departure returned thither. In 828, he deposed and put to death Amir Shāmsō'ddīn, king of Kalāt (or Akblāt), in Armenia; and, in 830, did the like by Soltān Abmed Kūrdi, governor of the province of Kūrdestān.

by Shāh Rūkh;

TWO years after, 832, he took Soltāniyah, in Persian Irāk: of which Mirza Shāh Rūkh being informed, marched again into Azerbejān; and, at Salmās (R), was met by Iskānder, and his brother Jebān Shāh; where they came to a battle; in which Iskānder being routed, fled into Rūmestān (or Anatolia). Yet could not Shāh Rūkh even this time make himself master of Tauris. However, having, upon his return to Khorassān, recruited his army, he marched back to the city of Rey, in Irāk, and took it. There Jebān Shāh, Iskānder's brother, was reconciled to Shāh Rūkh, who made him a present of the city of Tauris, though not in his possession. Yet, on this grant, Jebān Shāh armed against his brother; who, being vanquished in battle, shut himself up in Kalāt Alenjīk, where the other besieged him. But, while Iskānder continued to defend himself in that almost impregnable fortress, his son, Shāh Kobād, tired with his father's ill fortune, murdered him, in the year 841 of the Hejrah (S), and sixteenth of his reign; as Iskānder had his own brother, Abu Saïd, soon after he ascended the throne, upon a very slight suspicion^o.

slain by his son.
Hej. 841.
A. D. 1437.

3. Jebān
Shāh.

AFTER the death of Iskānder, his brother Jebān Shāh possessed himself of his dominions; and, when well established in the throne, marched against the king of Gurjestān, or Georgia, whom he took prisoner. After this, moving about to several parts of Pārs, he reduced them all under his obedience; expelling from some of them the garrisons placed there by Mirza Mahmūd, the son of Baysangor (T), who was dead. These things he performed in

^m D'HERB. p. 149, art. Avis Ahmed; and p. 254. art. Cara Josef.
Josef. TEIXEIRA, c. 45. p. 324.
Elkander Emir.

ⁿ D'HERB. p. 254. art. Cara TEIXEIR. Hist. Pers. c. 45. p. 325, and D'HERB. p. 320. art.

(M) Arabshah says, he was accused of governing in a very tyrannical and cruel manner.

(N) According to Mirkond, in Teixeira, he was marched as far as Antāb, in Syria, when the news of Shāh Rūkh's invasion made him return.

(O) Herbert writes Ojone.

(P) A city in Armenia, on the north side of the lake of Wān, near Kellat, or Akblat.

(Q) He held it twenty-three years, till 833 of the Hejrah, of Christ 1431, when he was killed by Abmed

Hamadāni. D'Herbelst says, he was the second prince of the Kara Koyunlū race: that he succeeded his father, and reigned in Persia till slain, as above. See Bibl. orient. art. Mohammed Schāh ben Kara Josef, p. 614.

(R) A city about 70 miles from Tauris, on the Shābi Dariasi, or the Shāb's lake, which is about 80 miles long.

(S) Al Jannabi puts the end of his reign in 839.

(T) He was son of Mirza Shāh Rūkh, son of Timūr.

^a the years 856 and 857; in which last he also subdued the province of Kermân. In 861 (U), Hej. 856. he marched towards Khorassân; and, the next year, made war on Mirza Ibrâhîm, the son of Allo'ddawlat, whom he defeated: in which battle Amir Zadoka Jagatay was killed. Hereupon Soltân Abû Saïd, who then reigned in Bâkk, advanced against him: but Jebân Shâh having received advice that one of his sons had rebelled in Tauris, he came to an agreement with Abû Saïd; and, returning to his capital, seized the disobedient prince, and closely confined him.

This commotion was no sooner suppressed, than Pir Budak, another of his sons, who ^{His large d-} was governor of Bâghdâd, revolted also. Jebân Shâh marched thither with his forces; and, ^{minions;} after he had held him besieged a whole year, by the mediation of friends, matters were accommodated, about the year 869: but, when all things were amicably settled, his brother Meh- Hej. 869. ^b med murdered him without the father's knowledge. Jebân Shâh now arrived at a great pitch of power, being possessed of Azerbeijân, Irâk, Pârs, or Proper Persia, Kermân, and other parts of Irân, in the year 872, jealous perhaps of the growing power of the Ak Koyunlû. Hej. 872. ^c Turkmâns, turned his arms against their chief, Uzûn Hassan Beg, who was then no more A. D. 1467. than governor (X) of Diyârbekr; but he was forced to return, through the severity of the winter.

HOWEVER, he took the field again next summer: and, as it was his constant custom to make ^{slain by} himself drunk over-night, and sleep till far in the day, the army marched before, and he fol- ^{Hassan.} lowed afterwards, attended by about 1000 horse. Uzûn Hassan, who had intelligence of this, took 5000 men with him; and, waiting for him in an advantageous place, attacked him so ^c opportunely, that, before any relief could arrive, he was killed, and two of his sons taken. Mehmed Mirza, the elder, was put to death on the spot, and Yusef or Issuf Mirza had his eyes put out. Jebân Shâh lived seventy years, and reigned thirty-two. As to his character, he was reckoned the most lewd and wicked prince in those parts^p, at that juncture of time.

^d KALKOKONDILAS, in his history of the fall of the Greek empire, says, this prince, whom Greek ac- he calls corruptly Tzanisa, son of Kara Yusef, and lord of Bâghdâd, sent to offer Mohammed II. ^{cunt.} the Ottomân Soltân, 4000 quintals of butter and 1000 camels, not to meddle with the country about Sebastê (or Siwâs) in Anatolia. This the Soltân agreed to, although the other had begun the war, entering that country with 8000 men, after subduing Armenia: but that, in the mean time, Trokkies (so he miscalls Shâh Râkk), a descendant of Timûr, marching from Samarkant, conquered all the country before him: and, laying siege to Bâghdâd, sent from thence a great army, under the command of Long Hassan (Uzûn Hassan), to subdue Armenia, and the flat countries of Asia; which that general performed^q. So confused and erroneous are the accounts which that author has given of foreign affairs.

^e HASSAN ALI, third son of Jebân Shâh, inherited his father's kingdom, with all his treasures; 4. Hassan which being very great, he raised an army of 200,000 horse and foot, to revenge his death: Ali and, not being very wise, gave them a year's pay before hand. At the same time he was pre- Hej. 872. paring to march against another, Soltân Abû Saïd, before-mentioned, marched against him. A. D. 1488. The two armies met; but the battle was no sooner begun, than most of those who had received their pay in advance, went over to the enemy (Y). This treachery of his troops obliged Hassan to fly: but while he escaped from one enemy, he fell into the hands of another: for ^{defeated and} Uzûn Hassan, meeting him in the way, defeated the remains of his forces, and killed him ^{slain.} with two of his sons, in the year 873^r. Thus ended the sovereignty of the family or hord of the Black Sheep, which had continued for the space of sixty-four years, and passed to the family of the White Sheep.

^p TEIXEIR. c. 45. p. 325. D'HERB. p. 367. art. Gehan Schah.

^q KALKOKONDILAS, l. iii. c. 14. and TEIXEIR. c. 45. p. 325. D'HERB. p. 435. art. Hassan Ali.

(U) A. D. 1456.

(X) As it is not said under what prince, it may be presumed, he was sovereign of that country; though not under the title of Soltân or king.

(Y) This affair is told differently by the same author, in the reign of Uzûn Hassan, founder of the Ak Koyunlû dynasty.

S E C T. III.

The Turkman dynasty of the Ak Koyunlû, or White Sheep.

^f THIS dynasty went also by the name of Bayandûriyab, which they took from the tribe or hord from whence they sprang. Accordingly Hay ibn Yokdan dedicated his Persian history to Soltân Nakib Bayandûrî, the son of Uzûn Hassan, seventh prince of this race, though others reckon him but the second. For Mirkond and the author of the Nighiaristân make Hassan the founder of this dynasty: perhaps, because that of the Kara Koyunlû seemed to hold the sovereignty before he put an end to it, and succeeded to the dominion of its princes. But Al Jannâbi, and other oriental authors, give five predecessors to Uzûn Hassan, and accordingly assign thirteen princes to this dynasty, instead of eight: to which number the before-mentioned historians would limit them^a.

1. Tûr Ali Beg.

THE first of these princes, who made any considerable figure among the Turkmâns of this tribe or branch, was Tûr Ali Beg. Yet there is nothing remarkable transmitted to us concerning him, further than that he erected his principality in Diyârbekr. Although others, as hath been observed, make Armenia Minor to have been the seat of the Ak Koyunlû Turkmâns.

2. Fâkro'ddîn Kotli Beg.

HE was succeeded by his son Fâkro'ddîn Kotli or Kotlu Beg: of whom nothing is mentioned, by the historians before us, more than of his father and predecessor. Nor have we so much as the dates, or length of their reigns: but matters begin to clear up a little in that of his successor,

3. Kara Ilûg Ozmân;
A. D. 1400.

KARA ILUG OZMAN, or OTHMAN, son of Fâkro'ddîn Kotli Beg. This prince having submitted to Timûr, and conducted him into Asia Minor^b; the conqueror, in return, bestowed on him the government of Malatiah, in Anatolia, near the Euphrates, after he had taken it from Ildrim Bâyezîd, Soltân of the Turks, in the year 803. He likewise conferred great honours upon him. The same year, when Kara Ozmân waited on him at Bîr, on the Euphrates, Timûr presented him with the Kalaat, or vest; and, marching forwards through Diyârbekr, ordered him to form the blockade of Mardin, while he went forward to besiege Bâghdâd, from which Soltân Abmed Jalayr had retired. On Timûr's return from that expedition, in 804, Kara Ozmân joined his army, on its way back to Anatolia, in order to give Bâyezîd battle. On which occasion the Turkmân prince, in conjunction with the Amîr Jêhân Shâh, did wonders, breaking through the left wing of the Othmâns. After this, Timûr, at Siwâs, conferred on him several honours, and then sent him back to his principality.

Hej. 804.
A. D. 1406.
his bravery;

rewarded by Timûr.

THIS is the account we meet with in Sharîfo'ddîn Ali's history of Timûr^c; which does not agree with what the other oriental writers before us relate concerning Kara Ozmân. They say, that he obtained of Timûr, for his services, the government of the cities of Arzenjân, Mardin, Roha or Orfa, with other territories of Diyârbekr, and even of Siwâs itself^d. But as nothing of this appears from the history of Timûr, just now mentioned, there may be room to doubt of its being fact. On the contrary, the government, not of Siwâs, but Malatiah, was bestowed on him, and Mardin continued in the hands of Soltân Aysa, its own prince. The same author tells us, that he was afterwards slain in battle by Iskânder, son of Kara Yusef, second prince of the Kara Koyunlû Turkmâns, in the ninetieth year of his age, and of the Hejrah 809. But this date, at least, must be a mistake: for, according to Mîrkond, he was living in 813 or 814, when Kara Yusef drove him out of Diyârbekr^e; and Eskânder did not succeed his father till the year 823. If therefore we substitute 829 in the room of 809, it will give his successor a reign of twenty-eight years instead of forty-eight; which seems too long.

His death.

Hej. 829.
A. D. 1425.

4. Hamza Beg.

HAMZA BEG succeeded his father Kara Ilûg Ozmân; with regard to whom we find nothing more than that he died in the year 848.

5. Jêhân Ghîr.

HAMZA had for his successor Jêhân Ghîr, son of Ali Beg, son of Kara Ozmân. He died in the year 872; having been deprived of almost all his power by his brother Uzûn Hassan.

6. Uzûn Hassan.

UZUN HASSAN signifies, in Turkish, Long Hassan; whence the Arabs call him Hassan al tawîl, which imports the same. He is also named Hassan Beg, or Beyg; that is, Lord Hassan (A). It has already been observed, in the life of Jêhân Shâh, third prince of the Kara Koyunlû family, that Uzûn Hassan slew him at an attack, in the same year; whereby he revenged the injury done his grandfather Kara Ozmân, by Kara Yusef, father of Jêhân Shâh. Hassan Ali, who succeeded this last prince, immediately sent to implore the assistance of Abû Saïd Mirza, third successor in the empire of Timûr (B), who then wintered at Marû, in Khorassân. Abû Saïd, led by generosity, but more by ambition, thinking this would open a way to enlarge his conquest westward, he set forward, at the head of a great army, with a design to attack the provinces of Irâk and Azerbejân. When he arrived on the borders of this last ^a See D'HERB. art. Ac Coinlu, Baianduri, and Turkman.

cock Suppl. p. 59.

^c L. v. c. 17, 29, 30, 38, 64.

^e See before, p. 696.

^b D'HERBELOT, art. Turkman, and Pocock Suppl. p. 59. D'HERB. art. Turkman.

(A) Corruptly written Ozun Azem Bek, by Teixeira; and Uzun Cösfan, or Casan, by Leunclavius, and other European authors.

(B) He was son of Mohammed, son of Mirân Shâh, son of Timûr. and succeeded Abdallah, son of Ulug Beg, son of Shâh Rûkh, in the dominions of the province of Mawarâ'lnahr; having been in possession of Khorassân before. He afterwards extended his empire, from Kâshgar eastward, in Little Bukhâria, to Tamris in Persia, westward. He had also Kermân, in Persia, and Indostân, as far as Multân.

a province, Hassan Beg sent several ambassadors, to demand peace: but Abu Saïd, still insidious, ^{see Abu Saïd,} that the other should come to his camp, at the same time marched in order to pass the summer at Karabâg (in the province of Arrân), where Hassan Beg usually resided. But this Turk- man having the address to cut off his provisions and torage, the greater part of the army disperfed, and the rest went over to his enemy. In this distress, fearing to be hemmed in, he took to flight: but, being pursued, he was brought to Hassan; who would have spared his life; but, by advice of his council, put him to death, in 873^c.

AFTER this defeat, Hassan Beg defeated and killed Hassan Ali, as hath been related; whereby ^{Hej. 873. A. D. 1468. and Hassan Ali.} Tauris and Azerbejdân fell into the hands of the conqueror. When Jebân Shâh was slain, his son Mirza Yusef was taken, and had his eyes put out, as was said before; in which condition
 b he retired to Shirâz, the capital of Pârs, or Proper Persia. Where he continued as sovereign, but not long: for Uzûn Hassan, after the defeat of his brother Hassan Ali, marched against him; and, entering Shirâz by force, put blind Yusef to death. Being thus become master of the province of Pârs, he entered that of Kermân, and subdued it. Afterwards he turned toward Bâghdâd, and took it, with the rest of Arabian Irâk.

THESE great successes, in so short a time as two or three years, made him think himself a ^{D. defeated by} match for Mohammed II. Soltân of the Othmân Turks; whose dominions he invaded in the ^{Moham-} year 876 (C): but, being met by the Soltân near Arzenjân, was overthrown, and his son Zey- nel (or Zeino'ddîn) governor of Kasbîn, slain, as is before related^d. Al Jamûbi observes, that ^{A. D. 1471.} after this defeat his affairs were not prosperous. He died in 882, after a reign of eleven years; ^{A. D. 1477.}
 c as did much about the same time Ogurlu Mohammed, the eldest of his seven sons. The five who survived, were Khalil Mirza, Maksûd Beg, Yakûb Beg, Masîb Beg, and Yusef Beg. Of ^{his death.}
 these, Khalil, Maksûd, and Masîb, reigned after him^e. He had to wife the daughter of Kalo- Johannes, emperor of Trebizend, who brought him a daughter, named Martha: which Mar- tha, according to the western historians, was mother of Ismaël Sofi, founder of the next dynasty in Persia.

KHALIL BEG, by some called Khalîl Soltân, ascending the throne upon his father's death, ^{7. Khalil Beg.} immediately sent his brother Yakûb Beg to govern the country of Diyârbekr. Presently after, Morâd Beg invading his dominions, he routed his forces, and made him fly to Firûz Kâb, a strong fortress; whose commander, Husseyn Beg Jelobi, admitted him, and then sent him pri-d soner to Khalil, who put him to death. In the interim, Yakûb Beg, revolting in Diyârbekr, marches with his army to Tauris, attended by his brother Maksûd Beg. On advice of this, Khalil hastes to meet them; but is routed and killed by his brother Yakûb, in 884, when he had reigned but six months^f and fifteen days. Others say, he was so hated by his subjects, on account of his cruelty, and other vices, that they assassinated him^g.

YAKUB BEG, having slain his brother, took possession of the throne. In the year 886, one ^{8. Yakûb Beg;} of his generals, called Byander Beg, rebelled against him; but, being met by him with the forces at Savab, or Sawab, a city near that of Kom, was defeated and slain. This same year, Soltân Mohammed II. died at Constantinople, and was fatal also to Shaykh Hayder: who, marching from Ardevîl into Shirwân, in order to revenge himself on Ferokhzâd (D), its king, who e had slain his father in a former invasion, was routed, and killed in battle, by the assistance of the troops of Yakûb Beg, under the conduct of Soleymân Beg Bigan. This prince died at Karabâg, near Tauris, in 895, in the 28th year of his age, after a reign of twelve years and eight months^h. Other authors say but two months; and that he was taken off by poison. ^{A. D. 1490. his death.}
 This misfortune is attributed to the death of his mother, a woman of excellent qualities; which happened eighteen days only before that of her son. Her custom was every week to assemble the principal persons of that family, about twenty in number, and inculcate such things as tended to keep up peace among them: but, with her, concord also departed; and they began to quarrel among themselves. He was reckoned to be learned; and composed verses both in Turkish and Persian. He corresponded by letters with Bayezîd II. Soltân of f the Turks; between whom and himself there was a friendshipⁱ.

BAY SANKER MIRZA, son of Yakûb Beg, succeeded his father; and, being only ten years ^{9. Bay Sanker;} old, was put under the tuition of Sufi Khalîl Musulu, one of his generals^k. There were great commotions and troubles upon his accession to the throne; because those of the hord of Bayan- durîyah were for advancing Masîb Beg, or Mirza, uncle to the infant king, and brother to his father. These, joining with him, made war on Sufi Khalîl; who, presently taking the ^c D'HERB. art. Abu Saïd Mirza, p. 34.

^d D'HERB. p. 916. art. Uzun Hassan.
^e P. 330. D'HERB. p. 457. art. Jacob Begh.

^d See Hist. Othmân Turks.

^e TEIX. ubi supra.

^f Pocock, Suppl. p. 60.

^g Pocock, ubi supr.

^h TEIX. c. 46. p. 329.

ⁱ TEIX. p. 331.

(C) Some oriental authors place this action two years after. See D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. art. Mohammed Khân, p. 614.

(D) In Teixira he is called Farrokyazar.

field, came to a battle, wherein Masib was defeated and killed: his nephew Rustam Beg, son a to his brother Maksūd, was taken alive, and sent prisoner to the fortrefs of Alenjik (in Armenia). At this time, Soleymān Beg Bigan, who had routed and slain Soltān Hayder, as is more-mentioned, advanced from Diyārbekr, in defence of Ferokzād, king of Shirwān, whom Khalil overthrew and killed at Mogān (E).

slain by Rustam.

In the mean time, Haybe Soltān Bayandurī, who had the command of some troops, assaulted Alenjik, and rescuing Rustam Beg, proclaimed him king. The new monarch, with these forces, joined with many more which resorted to him, marched towards Tauris in quest of Bay Sanker; who, on their approach, abandoned the country, and fled with his governor to Diyārbekr: but, being pursued by a body of Rustam's troops, Khalil was taken, and put to death: however, Bay Sanker escaped for that time, and Rustam Beg remained in possession of the b kingdom¹. This is the account given by Mirkbond. Al Jannābi, who places Masib Beg in the throne, instead of Bay Sanker, says he had for a competitor, besides this latter Ali Beg, son of Khalil Beg, the sixth prince of this dynasty: but the author of the Lebtarikh reckons neither Masib nor Ali Beg among the number, any more than Mirkbond^m.

10. Rustam
Mirza;
Hej. 897.
A. D. 1491.

ROSTAM MIRZA (or Beg, as in Teixeira), son of Maksūd Beg, and grandson of Uzūn Hassan Beg, as soon as he came to Tauris, released Ali Mirza, or Pādishāh, and Shāh Ismael, two sons of Shaykh Hayder, out of prison; and, taking the field with the first of them, marched in quest of Bay Sanker; who came to meet them between Ganjeh and Bardaa (F): but was there by them routed and slain. After this victory, Ali Mirza, to whom it was in great measure owing, retired with his brother to Ardevīl, his native country, with the permission c of Rostam; who, repenting that he had let him go, as fearing his presence, and the memory of his father, might occasion some commotion in that city, presently set forward at the head of his army towards Ardevīl, in order to get Ali Mirza and Ismael once more into his hands. The two brothers, resolving to defend their liberty, with what forces they could gather, gave him battle, and were defeated. Ali was killed on the spot; but Ismael the younger had the good fortune to escape into the province of Gbilān, or Khilān, in Persia, bordering on the Caspian sea.

releases Hayder's sons;

is slain.

A. D. 1496.

AFTER this, in the year 902, Abmed Beg, son of Ogūrlu Mohammed, and grandson of Uzūn Hassan Beg, marched from Diyārbekr against Rostam; who, engaging him near Tauris, lost the victory, and fled to Gūrjestān, or Georgia; where he was killed, when he had reigned d five years and six monthsⁿ; and was succeeded, according to Al Jannābi, in the year 904, by his conqueror.

11. Ahmed
Beg;

Hej. 904.
A. D. 1498.

AHMED BEG (or, as Al Jannābi names him, Soltān Abmed), having expelled Rostam, ascended the throne. He gave the government of the kingdom of Kermān, in Persia, to Haybe Soltān; and that of Pārs, or Proper Persia, to Kazem Beg Pernāki. These two, in requital of his favours, conspired together, and rebelled against him. Abmed, on the news of their revolt, marched against them; but, after some encounters, he was slain in a battle, which he lost near Ispāhān, in Persian Irāk^o. According to Al Jannābi, this prince had fled to Constantinople, for fear of his uncle Yakūb; from whence he was invited by the great lords of the kingdom: but that, having a mind, after his accession to the throne, to introduce the more severe Oth- e mān discipline among his soldiers, the principal officers of his army were so disgusted with him, that they conspired to depose him. For this purpose, they sent to Morād Mirza, son of Yakūb Beg, who was then in Shirwān, to come and take the kingdom. Morād, hastening to Azerbe- bejān on this invitation, attacked Abmed Beg; and, having vanquished his forces, put him to death, when he had reigned about one year. After this the same licentious officers, violating their faith to Morād, called in Alwand Beg, or Mirza; who, by their assistance, seized on, and threw him into prison^p.

put to death.

At the time of Abmed Beg's death, there remained of all the race of Uzūn Hassan Beg only three youths, his grandsons; Soltān Morād (or Morād Mirza), who was in Shirwān, as hath been said; Alwand Beg, the son of Tusef Beg, in Azerbejān; and Mohammed Mirza, f brother to Alwand, at Yazd, or Yezd, in Pārs. All the dominions of Persia, which had been in possession of the hord of Ak Koyunlū, were then divided among them^q.

12. Alwand
Beg;

ALWAND, or Alwend Beg, was saluted king by Kāzem Beg Pernāki, and Gāzi Beg Bayāndurī, his generals, and kinsmen: these were joined at Tauris by Haybe Soltān; who came from

¹ TEIX. p. 331. D'HERB. p. 901. art. Turkman and Massih, p. 561. p. 61.

^m Id. ibid. and Pocock, Suppl. ⁿ MIRKHOND ap. Teixeir. cap. 46. & ap. D'Herb. p. 740. art. Rustam Beg. ^o MIRKHOND, ubi supr.

^p AL JANNAB. ap. Pocock. Sup. ad Hist. Dynast. p. 61. D'HERB. Bibl. Orient. p. 901. art. Turkman. ^q MIRKHOND, ubi sup.

(E) Teixeira writes Moan: it is a plain country to the south of the rivers Arrās and Kūr, bordering on the Caspian sea.

(F) Cities in the province of Arrān, between the rivers Kūr and Arrās; to which Erizān belongs.

a Kermân. At the same time, Mohammed Mirza, who was at Yazd, assumed the title of king of Ispâhân, or Irâk; but, on Alwand's marching against him, he withdrew, without making any opposition, into the fortress of Sthâ, then governed by Husseyn Keyah Jelobi. This commander joining Mohammed, they both advanced towards Alwand, who was then upon his return; and, coming up with him, engaged in battle; which Alwand lost, and retired to Tauris. Being pursued thither by Mohammed, he ventured out again; and was again routed, with the loss of Haybe Soltân; upon which he fled to Diyârbekr.

DURING these confusions, the brothers of Haybe Soltân declared Soltân Morâd, who was then in Shîrwân, king of Irâk; and, conducting him thence with a considerable army, moved in quest of Mohammed Mirza; whom they met near Ispâhân, defeated and killed, in 905, after he had reigned one year^r. Al Jannâbi says, that although Mohammed had dispossessed his brother Alwand of the throne, yet he could not mount it himself: for that Morâd Beg, being delivered out of prison, seized it, and put him to death^s. A. D. 1499.

By this means he obtained the kingdoms of Pârs and Irâk, while Alwand remained possessed of Azerbejân. In the year 906, they both raised forces; and, taking the field, met at Kasbîn, or Kajvîn; where, without the decision of the sword, by the interposition of friends, they agreed that each party should hold what was already his own. This was a miserable time all over Persia for robberies, violence, famine, pestilence, and universal confusion. Next year, A. D. 1501. Ismaël, son of Sheykh Hayder, or Haydor, marched with his army from Nakhshivân to Tauris, the residence of Alwand; who, abandoning the country, fled to Bâghdâd, and thence to Diyârbekr; where he afterwards died. Thus Azerbejân fell under the dominion of Ismaël; who, in 908, made war on Soltân Morâd. This prince advanced from Shîrâz to meet him; A. D. 1502. and joining battle at Hamadân, was defeated with the loss of 10,000 men. Hereupon he fled back to his capital; but soon after, leaving Pârs and Kermân to the victor, retired to Bâghdâd; where he was received by the governor, Bari Beg. However, Ismaël would not let him remain there: for next year, advancing with his forces against them, they abandoned that city, and fled to Karamân, or Karamânia. Morâd, having continued there for some time, returned to Diyârbekr; where the Kezilbâsh (G) killed him, in 920: and in him ended the sovereignty of the hord of Ak Koyunlû Turkmâns, in Persia^t. A. D. 1514.

^r MIRKHOND, ubi sup.

art. Morad Beg. AL JANNABI, ubi sup.

^s AL JANNABI, ubi sup.

^t MIRKHOND, ubi sup. D'HERB. p. 624.

(G) Or Red Heads; that is, the Persians, so called in sneer by the Turks and Tatars, from their red bannets.

C H A P. II.

The history of the Uzbeks.

S E C T. I.

The origin and affairs of the Uzbeks, till their settlements in Great Bukhâriâ, and Karazmî.

d I T has been observed before, in the history of the Khâns of Kipjâk, that the Uzbeks derive their name from Uzbek, the seventh Khân of that country, descended from Jenghîz Khân; whence named, which his subjects assumed in honour of him, for having introduced the Mohammedan religion into his dominions. This prince tried his fortune twice against Abusaïd Khân, the last sovereign of the Mungls, in Irân, or Persia at large; and died in the year 1342. But, to give our readers the history of the Uzbeks and their Khâns more distinctly, it will be necessary to ascend as high as Fuji, or Tusbi Khân, eldest son of Jenghîz Khân, and first Khân of Kipjâk.

This prince, intending to make war on the Cherkas (A), Bashkîrs (B), Urûs's, (C), and Bâtû's other bordering nations, had caused a prodigious quantity of provisions to be gotten ready; but

(A) Or Cherkassians: the Italians write Circassi; whence we corruptly Circassians, instead of Chirkassians.

Rubruquis, dwelling in the north part of the kingdom of Astrakhân.

(B) A tribe of Turks or Tatars, called Paskatir by death preventing him, his father, Jenghiz Khân, resolved that Bātu, son of the deceased Juji, a called by our author Bātu Saghin Khân, should prosecute the design. Yet was it obstructed a second time by the death of that conqueror, till it was revived by Ugaday (or Oktay), successor of Jenghiz Khân, in the eastern parts of Tartary: who, after his return from his expedition into Kitay, or Katay (that is, the northern part of China), sent Bātu (D), with a numerous army, into the countries above-mentioned; where, after he had taken many cities from the Urús (or Russians) he, at length, sat down before Moskow; near which the Urús, with their allies, the Nemetz (E), had intrenched themselves.

(C) Rûs, or the Russians.

Sheybáni
Khân;

his settlement.

BATU, having tried in vain for three months to force them, his brother Sheybáni, who accompanied him in the expedition, procured of him a reinforcement of 6000 men; then causing all his troops to alight, at day-break he attacked the enemy behind, while Bātu charged them in front, with such bravery, that they fled, after losing 70,000 of their best soldiers. This great victory rendered the conquest of several other cities and provinces easy. After his return, loaded with riches and glory, Orda, surnamed Itzen (F), eldest son of Juji, to reward Sheybáni's good services, made him a present of 15,000 families. Bātu did the like, giving him, at the same time, all the places conquered from the Russians and their allies; with as many people out of the tribes of the Kuris, Naymans, Karliks, and Vigúrs (or Oygúrs), as were necessary for the guard of those towns, and support of his court: but on condition, that settling in the country between his (Bātu's) dominions and the lands of Orda Itzen, he should pass the summer about the mountains of Arál (or the Eagles) and river Jaik; and the winter more to the south, about Karakum (G), Arakum, and the rivers Sir and Sara Su. Accordingly, he sent one of his sons to take possession of the Russian and Nemetzian cities, where he and his descendants dwelt: but, because of the distance, our author could not tell where they were situated.

Dawlet Sheykh.

Hej. 1003.

Abu'lgayir
Khân.

SHEYBANI KHAN, who left twelve sons (H), was succeeded by Bábadr, his second; and Bábadr Khân by Badakul, the eldest of his four (I). After Badakul Khân, his only son, Mengu Timúr (for his wit and courage named Kutluk Mengu Timúr) ascended the throne. He had six sons (K); from the last of whom, Bekkondi, was descended Kujum Khân (L); who, after forty years reign in the country of Turán (M), becoming blind with age, was driven out by the Russians, in 1594, and retired to the Mankats (N). Mengu Timúr dying, Fulád, his third son, succeeded: after whose death, his sons, Dawlat Sheykh Oglán, and Arabsháh, divided the dominions; dwelling in summer towards the river Jaik, and in winter about the Sir.

DAWLET SHEYKH had a son, named Abu'lgayir; who made himself formidable to all his neighbours. He had eleven sons; of whom Shabadakh Soltán, the eldest, had two: the first called Mahamed, surnamed Sháhbakht; the other Mahamed Soltán; whose son, Obeyd Khân, reigned in Great Búkbária. The second son of Abu'lgayir was Khoja Mahamed; but being exceeding foolish, the Uzbeks called him Khoja Amtintak. His son, Janibek, was as foolish as his father; and Iskander Khân, the son of Janibek, was no less silly than his father and grandfather. However, he was very devout; and loved both hunting and hawking. The son of Iskander was Abdo'llah Khân; whose son, Abdo'lmu'min, was the last of that branch of Sheybáni Khân; of which two princes, who were men of understanding, something farther will be said hereafter^a.

Yadigar
Khân.

ARABSHAH, the other son of Fulád, was succeeded, in his share of his father's dominions, by his son Haji Taulay; who had his son Timúr Sheykh for his successor. Timúr Sheykh was a prince of great hopes: but dying young, and without issue (being killed in an engagement with the (O) Kalmúks, all his subjects retired to other princes, excepting the Vigúrs; who, when they went to take leave of the Khân's widow, being informed by her, that she was three

^a ABU'LGAZI KHAN. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 205. part 8. c. 1.

(D) Who had accompanied Oktay in his expedition to Kitay, with five of his brothers.

(E) The orthography in the translations of Abu'lghâzi Khân's history is so corrupt, that it is difficult to tell whether this word must be pronounced Nemetz, Nemej, or Nemesh. By these people are to be understood the Germans. The Arabs call Germany Nemshia.

(F) It may be read also Ijen, or Ichin.

(G) That is, Black Sand. Some desert towards Kip-ják.

(H) Their names are, 1. Baynal; 2. Babadr; 3. Karak; 4. Balka; 5. Zirik (or Jirik); 6. Mergán; 7. Kurtga; 8. Ayaji; 9. Sagkilgan; 10. Bayanjar; 11. Majar; 12. Konj.

(I) Viz. 1. Badakul; 2. Bik Timúr; 3. Yaukajar; 4. Teffubuga-Badakul.

(K) 1. Iljak; 2. Janta; 3. Fulád; 4. Siunji; 5. Temur Bunga; 6. Bekkondi.

(L) Or Kuchum Khân. He was the son of Murtáza Khân, son of Mamudak Khân, son of Hajim Moham-med Khân, son of Ali Oglan, son of Bekkondi.

(M) Rather the country of Tura, in Siberia, where this Khân reigned.

(N) The same with the Kara Kalpaks; who are at present possessed of the western half of Turkeshán.

(O) So the Elúths, or Alúths, are nicknamed by the Uzbeks; who are, in return, called by them Haffak Púrúh. See before, p. 144, note (E).

a months gone with child, they resolved to stay till the time of her delivery; when she brought forth a son, called Yadigar. Hereupon they sent word to the Naymāns; who, having hovered about to wait the event, upon this advice, returned to their obedience: and ever since the Vigūrs have complimented them with the left hand; which is the most honourable post.

YADIGAR KHAN had four sons. The first, named Būrga Soltān, was a prince of much courage. His breast was formed of one single bone. He lived in the time of Abū'lgayir Khān above-mentioned; but was much younger than he. Abusaïd Mirza, (descended from Amīr Timūr (or Tamerlan), who then reigned in Mawara'nabr (or Great Bukhāria), after slaying Abdo'llatif Mirza, over-ran the whole country, and forced his son, Mahamed Juki, to fly for refuge to Abū'lgayir (P); whose wife was Juki's aunt. Some time after, news being brought that Abū'lgayir had marched, with all his forces, towards Khorassān, and from thence to Māzānderān, Abū'lgayir sent 30,000 men, under Būrga Soltān, and Mirza Mahamed Juki, towards Tāshkunt; which surrendered without opposition. Proceeding thence to Shāh Rukhīya (or Fenagovernor, Amīr Masiet, advancing to meet them, was intirely defeated. After this, they reduced all the towns in the countries of Kuzīn Karmīnā (Q), and Mawara'nabr (R); excepting Samarkant and Bokhāra.

ABUSAID MIRZA, who, on the first news of this invasion, turned back with all his forces, being arrived at Bālkh, Būrga Soltān was for preventing his passage of the Amū: but Mahamed Juki, and the lords of the country, contrary to his advice, repassed the Sīr, and got into Shāh Rukhīya; which, after four months siege, surrendered to Abusaïd, in 860 (S). Some time after, Mūsa Bey, who dwelt in the dominions of Yadigar Khān, having been defeated by Khojash Mirza, another lord, fled for assistance to Būrga Soltān. This prince, who had a great respect for him, was willing to have succoured him: but perceived he could not do it effectually, till his father, Yadigar, was proclaimed Khān; though he had already been acknowledged as such by his subjects. As soon as this affair was settled, Būrga Soltān raised troops, and took the field with Mūsa Bey; advancing through the snow, which fell very thick: nor would turn back, and put off the expedition to another time, although his troops suffered more and more every day. At length, when importuned by Mūsa Bey, and his officers, he declared, that he would give over the pursuit, in case they did not, within two days, hear any news of the enemy. After this, in crossing a high mountain, they discovered troops marching in the valley beneath; and finding by his spies, that it was Khojash Mirza, whom he was in quest of, he advanced with his forces; and attacked the enemy so briskly, that he intirely defeated them. A great number of men were killed, and among the rest Khojash; whose daughter, Malay Khānzādek, being found among the captives, Būrga Soltān married her in the winter-quarters, which he took up thereabouts.

MEAN while, Abū'lgayir Khān was become so formidable to all the neighbouring princes, that, uniting their forces, they declared war against him: and, having defeated his troops by dint of numbers, put him to death, with such of his children as fell into their hands. On this occasion, Būrga Soltān, willing to fish in troubled water, appropriated to himself certain lands and subjects belonging to the deceased Khān, notwithstanding the great friendship which had always subsisted between them; and that action cost him his life: for some years after, Shāh Bākht Soltān returning into the dominions of his grandfather Abū'lgayir Khān, all the antient subjects of that prince came and submitted to him. But although he had thus re-entered into the possession of his patrimony, he did not immediately demand restitution of Būrga Soltān: on the contrary, dissembling his resentment, he lived in good understanding with him; not doubting but time would furnish him with an opportunity of revenge.

At length, in 886, Būrga Soltān happening to fix his winter-quarters near those of Shāh Bākht who surprised Soltān, who was posted on the banks of the Sīr, this latter ordered a great number of his people to attend him, under pretence of a hunting-match the next day: but, setting forward at midnight, he on a sudden turned towards Būrga Soltān's camp, telling his soldiers that he was going to attack that prince, and forbidding them to plunder, till they had secured his person. Being arrived there at break of day, he pressed forward directly to the Soltān's tent: but Būrga, on hearing the noise, jumped out of bed; and, wrapping himself in a robe of sable, passed out at one side of the tent, as the soldiers entered the other. In this condition he fled to a pond at some

(P) This was about the year 1449.

(Q) In Great Bukhāria, towards Karazm.

(R) It is an Arabic word, and signifies Transoxana, or, literally, the country beyond the river; meaning the Jibūn, or Amū; and is restrained commonly to Great Bukhāria.

(S) That is, A. D. 1455: but in the reign of Abūsaïd, we find this affair marked, Hejrab 865, A. D. 1460; which is doubtless the true date of it.

distance, and hid himself among the reeds : but had the ill luck to wound his foot by the way ^a so deeply, that he had much ado to stop the blood.

puts him to death.

MEAN time they who had been sent by Shâh Bâkht Soltân to pursue such as fled, having met with a Vigûr of distinction, named Munga, he told them that he was the person they looked for : and being asked by Shâh Bâkht, who easily perceived the deceit, what were his reasons for so acting? replied, “ He had so many obligations to Bûrga Soltân, that he thought it his duty to risque any thing to deliver him from danger ; and judged that his personating him would create a delay, which might secure his escape.” This answer exceedingly pleased Shâh Bâkht, and gave him a high idea of Munga’s virtue. However, he did not forbear searching after Bûrga Soltân, but sent out men a second time ; and, as it had snowed that night, some of them happened to discover the prints of bare feet ; and, following the tracks, found at length drops ^b of blood, which brought them to the place where he lay concealed. In this condition, they led him to Shâh Bâkht Soltân ; who, after being convinced that they were not deceived a second time, commanded him to be put to death immediately, and seized upon all his subjects ^b.

Khoja Mahamed.

KHOJA MAHAMED SOLTAN, the son of Abû’lgayir Khân, who had accompanied his nephew in this expedition, espoused the widow of Bûrga Soltân, daughter of Khojash Mirza, above-mentioned, called Malay Khânzâdeh. This Khoja Mahamed is the same who, for his silliness, was named Khoja Amtintak ; and although every body knew that the widow of Bûrga Soltân was with child at the death of her husband, yet he was willing to have it thought, that Jâni Bek, of whom she was delivered (six months after), was his own son : and for such indeed he must have passed, had his foolishness been a proof in the case.

Uzbek dynasties ;

ALTHOUGH, by this misfortune which happened to their father, the children of Bûrga Soltân were deprived of their patrimony, yet some years after they acquired new dominions ; to which the conquests, achieved by Shâh Bâkht Soltân, cleared the way for them. And here it may be proper to observe, that the descendants of Shaybânî Khân established two considerable dynasties in the countries to the south of the river Sîr : the first in Great Bukhâria, possessed by those of the branch of Abû’lgayir ; the second in Karazm, whose Khâns were of the posterity of Tadigar Khân ^c ; of whom we shall treat in their order.

why so named.

HERE likewise we cannot forbear touching on a particular, which we have taken notice of elsewhere ^d ; viz. how the name of Uzbeks came to be appropriated to those tribes who were subject to the descendants of Shaybânî Khân, and passed with them into Great Bukhâria and Karazm : for the name, we are told, came from Uzbek Khân, a descendant of Bâtu, the brother of Shaybânî ; who possessed a different part of Kipjâk ; and that it was assumed by Uzbek Khân’s subjects. Yet, at present, we find it transferred to the posterity and subjects of Shaybânî Khân ; while those of Bâtu no longer retain it.

^b ABU’LGHAZI KHAN, Hist. Turks, &c. p. 210, & seq. Karazm which follows this.

^c Ibid. p. 220.

^d See the history of

S E C T. II.

The Uzbek Khâns of Great Bukhâria.

Introduction.

THE memoirs and extracts, transmitted to us from the oriental historians, speak but very ^e little, and confusedly, of the Uzbek princes who have reigned in this large region, which has been already described ^a. They give us neither all their names, in order of succession, nor the time when their respective reigns began, or ended. What is more extraordinary ; although the dominion of the Uzbeks still subsists, both in that country and Karazm, yet the authors, from whose hands we have received those extracts, represent it as extinct above 200 years ago (A). However, we learn from other quarters, that their power is still in being ; although those authors afford little more particulars concerning them : but the Shajarek Turks of Abû’l-gbâzi, Khân of Karazm, who was an Uzbek himself, published in English, not many years since, furnisheth us with a series of the affairs of his own country, in the reigns of its Khâns, down to the middle of the last century. With the history of Karazm, he hath occasionally ^f mixed that of Great Bukhâria, on account of the wars, which happened from time to time between those two states : so that it affords the best memoirs concerning these Uzbeks, to be met a with any-where; although they fall far short of forming a complete history of them, as he did not undertake to write it with the same preciseness that he did that of his own country.

^a See before, p. 497.

(A) See D’Herbelot Bibl. p. 771. art. Schaibek Khân ; and Teixeira Hist. Pers. p. 336.

AFTER Shâh Bâkht Soltân (B) had surprisèd and put to death Bûrga Soltân, in the manner ^{1. Khân Shâh} before related, he, by degrees, subdued all the neighbouring princes in Tartary; and having, ^{Bakht.} by a long train of victories, considerably augmented his forces, he entered Great Bukhâria, with a numerous army, in 904 (C); and made himself master it, after he had driven out Soltân Bâbr, the last of the descendants of Timûr Bek in that country; and from this year is his reign dated. Shâh Bâkht, with an intent to extend his conquests, passed the Jihûn, and invaded Khorassân; where he was opposed by Soltân Hussayn Mirza, who obtained some signal victories over the Uzbeks, and designed to have expelled them. For this end, he raised a numerous army, in order to invade Great Bukhâria: but dying by the way at Wadekis, in 911, ^{A. D. 1505.} Shâh Bâkht, in his turn, invaded Bâdi Azzamân, the son and successor of Soltân Hussayn; who, not being able to oppose him, abandoned the country to the enemy, and fled to Kandahâr; where, raising forces, he returned to meet the Uzbek: but, being defeated, fled into Persia, to *Shâh Ismaël Sofi*².

MEAN time, Shâh Bâkht Soltân conquered the greater part of Khorassân, and put to death all those of the family of Soltân Hussayn Mirza, who fell into his hands: so that, as numerous as this family was but a little while before, not more than two or three of them escaped the slaughter. After this, Shâh Bâkht marched into Karazm, which had been under Soltân Hussayn's dominion; and subdued it also. Five or six years after this revolution, Shâh Ismaël, espousing Bâdi Azzamân's cause, marched against the Uzbeks in 916; and, meeting them near ^{Hej. 916.} Marû, a bloody battle was fought, wherein Shâh Bâkht was killed, with the greater part of his ^{A. D. 1510.} army, after he had reigned twelve years: in consequence of which, Karazm, and most of what the Uzbeks had acquired in Khorassân, fell under the dominion of Shâh Ismaël: but, on his death, Karazm revolted to the Uzbeks.

SHAH BAKHT KHAN was succeeded by Kushânji Khân; who is reckoned the most noble and powerful of all the Uzbek princes who reigned in Great Bukhâria. In 918, Soltân Bâbr ^{2. Khân Ku-} returned out of India; and, being joined by Abmed Isfâbânî (D), passed the Jihûn (or Amû), ^{shânji.} and ravaged the country about Kârshi. In short, they had almost reduced the whole country, when Kushânj, Khân, setting forward with an army, met and defeated them. The Persian ^{A. D. 1539.} general was killed on the spot; and Bâbr fled back to India. In 936, Kushânji Khân marched into Persia against Shâh Tahmâsb, son of Ismaël: but was defeated, and retired to his own dominions. After this, he returned to Marû, and would again have broken into Persia: but a peace being concluded between the two monarchs, Kushânji went back to Samarkant; where he died the same year, after a reign of 28 years^c.

THIS prince was succeeded by his son Abusaid Khân; who reigned four years, without doing ^{A. D. 1532.} any thing remarkable; and died in 939^d.

OBEYD KHAN succeeded Abusaid, and was the son of Mohammed Soltân, brother of Shâh Bâkht Khân, who reigned in Great Bukhâria. This prince, entering Khorassân, took some ^{3. Khân Abu-} cities; while the Uzbeks of Karazm doing the like on their side, Shâh Tahmâsb thought fit to con- ^{faid.} clude a peace with those unwelcome guests. Stirred up by Omâr Gâzi Soltân, who fled to ^{4. Khân} him from Karazm, this Khân, in conjunction with the Khâns of Samarkant (E) and Tâshkent, ^{Obeyd.} in 949, entered that country; which they over-ran, seizing Avânish Khân, and all the princes of his family: whom he divided, together with the towns, among his confederates. Dîn Mahammed Soltân, eldest son of Avânish Khân, invading Karazm, as soon as Obeyd Khân was withdrawn, retakes Khayuk and Urgbenj. On this news, Obeyd Khân returns with a numerous army: but being met the same year by Dîn Mahammed, with much inferior forces, was intirely defeated; and the princes, his relations, restored by an exchange of prisoners^e.

ABOUT the year 957, Obeyd Khân, entering Khorassân, took Marû from the Persians; but ^{A. D. 1550.} growing jealous of the governor, and sending an army to displace him, that officer surrendered it to Dîn Mahammed, then Khân of Karazm. After this, Nûr Mahamed Soltân, grandson of Dîn Mahammed Khân, being envied the possession of his grandfather's estate in Khorassân, by the princes of his family, they combined to take it from him. Hereupon he delivered up

^b ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 222. D'HERB. Bibl. Orient. p. 38, 163. art. Abusaid Mirza, and Miran Shâh; also TEIX. hist. Pers. p. 320. ^c TEIX. hist. Pers. p. 335. D'HERB. Bibl. Orient. p. 771. art. Schaibek. ^d TEIX. hist. Pers. p. 335. D'HERB. Bibl. Orient. p. 771. art. Schaibek. ^e ABU'LGH. ubi sup. p. 255, 256. ^f Ibid. p. 273, 277.

(B) He is also called Shaybeg, and Shaybek Khân, by authors.

(C) Some place this invasion in the year 900.

(D) Perhaps the same with Najemi (rather Ajemi)

Soni; whom, according to Mirkband, in Teixira, Ismaël sent with an army to assist Bâbr.

(E) In 1556, Perrak Khan reigned at Samarkant, and Seyd Burhan at Beklâra. De la Croix. Hist. Geogr. 1. 394.

his four cities of Marû, Nasay (or Nesa), Taurfurdi, and Durubn, to Obeyd Khân; imagining ^a that this prince would leave him in possession, and be content with receiving tribute from him: but he found himself deceived ^f. The time of Obeyd Khân's death is not mentioned. Teixeira and D'Herbelot, after Mirkbond, place it in 1540 (F); allowing no more than six years to his reign: but this must be a great mistake. According to Abû'lghâzi Khân, he must have reigned above fifty years; and died about 1584, or the year following ^g.

5. Khân
Iskânder.

OBEYD KHAN seems to have been succeeded by Iskânder Khân, son of Jâni Bek, son of Khoja Mahamed, son of Abû'lgayir Khân, who reigned in Kipjâk. There is nothing remarkable mentioned, relating to this prince, who was not right in his senses. On the death of his predecessor, Nûr Mahamed went and recovered his four cities out of the hands of the Bukhârian Uzbeks. Shâh Abbâs I. of Persia, being also desirous to profit by that event (G), went and ^b took Marû from him ^h. We find nothing which may give light, either as to the beginning, end, or length, of his reign.

6. Khân
Abdo'llah.

ABDO'LLAH KHAN, son of Iskânder Khân: when he began his reign is likewise uncertain: only we find, that some years after the death of Ali Soltân, which happened in 1571, Abdo'llah invaded Karazm; but retired, on the approach of Hajîm, or Azîm, Khân. Some time after, the sons of the latter having stripped a Turkish ambassador at Urgbenj, who was on his return from Great Bukhâria, Abdo'llah Khân entered Karazm a second time, with a great army; and, having conquered it chiefly by fraud, carried ten princes of the Khân's family into Bukhâria; where he put them all to death.

Hej. 1006.
Hej. 947.

MEAN time Hajîm Khân retired into Persia to Shâh Abbâs, in the year of the Serpent (H). ^c Two years after this, Abdo'llah Khân invading Khorassân, Hajîm Khân took the opportunity, while the Shâh marched against the invader, to surprise Urgbenj and Khayuk: but those places were soon recovered again by the troops of Abdo'llah Khân; who in person besieged Hazarâsb, and reduced it. After this, he returned into Great Bukhâria; where he died the last day of the year 1597, called Taûk, or the Hen. According to Teixeira and D'Herbelot, this active prince died in the year 1540, and reigned but six months ⁱ.

7. Khân Ab-
do'lmomin.

ABDO'LMOMIN KHAN, son of Abdo'llah Khân, by a daughter of Dîn Mahamed, Khân of Karazm, succeeded his father. Being at the time of his father's death in Khorassân, he set forward to return home: but, on his way, at Zamîn on the river Amû, was slain by his own people ^k.

Hej. 1030.

IMAM KULI KHAN, son of Yar Mahamed Soltân, succeeded Abdo'lmomin Khân (I). In the year 1620, Arap (or Arab) Mahamed, Khân of Karazm, having been defeated by his two rebellious sons ^l; Abû'lghâzi Soltân, who had joined his father, fled, after the battle, into Great Bukhâria, and was received kindly by the Khân. In 1622, Isfândiar Soltân, having recovered Karazm, and having put his two rebellious brothers to death, Abû'lghâzi returned to Urgbenj: but his subjects leaving the country on the appearance of a comet, a year or two after he retired to Turkestan; where he staid two years at the court of Tursum Khân, and then went into Great Bukhâria (K) to Imâm Kûli Khân; who receiving him but coldly, because he had first taken refuge with his enemy, he returned again to Karazm on the invitation of the Turkmâns ^m. Imâm Kûli Khân died about the time (L) that Abû'lghâzi Khân was proclaimed Khân of Karazm ⁿ.

8. Khân
Nadîr Mahamed.

HE was succeeded by his brother Nadîr Mahamed Khân. In 1644, the Turkmâns, who resided about Kayuk and Hazarâsb, in Karazm, refusing to submit to Abû'lghâzi upon his being proclaimed Khân, put themselves under the protection of Nadîr Mahamed Khân; who conferred the government of those two places on his grandson, Khîsseran Soltân: but soon after recalling him, he sent one of his lords to command in his room. In the mean time he was himself dethroned, in 1646, by his vassal lords, for his harsh treatment of them ^o.

9. Khân Ab-
do'laziz.

HE had for his successor his son Abdo'laziz Khân. This prince having formed a design to conquer the country of Bâlkh, its sovereign, Subhân Kûli Khân, sent to intreat aid of Abû'lghâzi Khân; who, laying hold of so fair an opportunity to revenge the injuries done to his family by Abdo'llah Khân, entered Great Bukhâria for several years successively, destroyed ^f ^f ABU'LGH. p. 273, 277. ^g See the hist. of Karazm in the next chapter. ^h ABU'L. p. 278. ⁱ Ibid. p. 290, 300, & seq. ^k Ibid. p. 309, & seq. ^l Ibid. p. 324. ^m Ibid. p. 315, 324, 344, & seq. ⁿ Ibid. p. 336. ^o Ibid. p. 356, & seq. & TEIX. hist. Pers. p. 336.

(F) In the city of Bokhâra; yet, in 1556, according to a former note, Bokhâra had its own Khân; to whom possibly Obeyd succeeded by inheritance, or conquest.

(G) As from hence it appears, that Abbâs took Marû soon after Obeyd Khân's death; and, as Abbâs began his reign in 1585; therefore Obeyd Khân must have lived till that year, if not beyond it: unless the name of Tah- mâsb should be put instead of Abbâs; which would reduce the date of that event to 1575.

(H) This, reckoning back from the death of Abdo'llah Khân, must be the year 1593.

(I) In the year 1598, it may be presumed.

(K) About the year 1627.

(L) Perhaps in 1642.

a several towns, and committed great ravages. At length, in 1658, a peace was concluded between them^p, as will be related more at large hereafter^q. Since that time we have no regular account of the Khâns of this country.

THE Persian historians, according to Teixeira, and D'Herbelot, make Abdo'llatif, son of Kushânji Khân, to succeed Abdo'llah Khân, 1540. The first says, he died the next year; and that in him ended the sovereignty of the successors of Jenghîz Khân, in Marwarâ'nabr. But this is probably some mistake committed by Teixeira, since D'Herbelot says, from the authority of the Lebtarîkh, that Abdo'llatif was living in the year 1541, when that book was written. However that be, the reader may perceive a wide difference between the account of the Usbek affairs given by Abû'lghâzi Khân, and by the Persian historians; although, at the same time, he can be at no loss to determine which of the two authorities is most fit to be relied on.

^p ABU'LG. ubi sup. p. 365, & seq.
^r TEIX. ubi sup. p. 336.

^q See the history of Usbek Khâns of Karazm, in next chap.
^s D'HERB. ubi sup. p. 772.

C H A P. III.

Kingdom of Karazm.

S E C T. I.

A description of Karazm, its name and extent, soil and produce, rivers and lakes.

c K A R A Z M, or *Karez*m, as this country is called by Abû'lghâzi Khân, and the Persian writers, is pronounced by the Arabs Khovarazm; it was known to the antient Greeks by the name of Khorsmia, as appears from Herodotus, Ptolemy, and other authors of that nation. It was in this country, that Kay Khosrû, third king of Persia, of the Kayamian race, defeated and slew Sheïdah, son of Afrâsiab, king of Turkestan; and the facility with which this victory was gained, gave name to this province; for Kowarezm, in the Persian language, signifies an easy victory.

THIS kingdom is at present bounded on the north by the country of Turkestan, and the dominions of the great Khân of the Elûths, or Kalmûks: on the east by Great Bukharia; from which it is separated partly by the mountains of Irdar^a, and partly by the deserts of Karak and Gâznab: on the south by the provinces of Asterabad and Khoraassân (A) belonging to Irân, or Persia at large; from which it is divided by the river Jihûn, or Amû, and sundry deserts of a vast extent: and on the west by the Caspian sea.

IT may be about 440 miles in length, from south to north; and 300 from west to east; being situated between the 39th and 46th degrees of latitude, and the 71st and 77th degrees of longitude. The country consists for the most part of vast sandy plains, like those of Great Tartary. Some of them are barren deserts: but others afford excellent pasture. There is good land in several of the provinces, where vines grow; of which wine is made: however, water is very scarce; the rivers being very few, as well as the mountains^b.

c K A R A Z M, according to Bentink, is extremely fertile, where watered; and Abû'lghâzi Khân himself recommends it as a fine country^c. The melons here, called by this last author Arbûs (and by Jenkinson Karbûs), are the true water melons. They are of the size of ordinary gourds, or pompions; commonly round, and green on the outside: but within of a much deeper colour than the common melons; although some are perfectly white: but these are not the best. Their seed is quite black, and shaped like that of the pompion; but rounder. It is also transparent, and dispersed all through the fruit; the whole of which is eaten, excepting the rind and seed. The substance is much finer, and of a better flavour, than that of ordinary melons. It is exceedingly cooling, and one may eat as much as he will, without the least danger. The

^a See ABU'LG. hist. Turks, p. 364.
p. 253.

^b Short way to know the world, or Compend. of Mod. Geogr.

^c Hist. Turks, ubi sup. p. 230, & 419.

(A) Kämpfer confounds Khoraassân with Khovarazm. Annan Exst. p. 137.

fruit will keep a long time; on which occasion our author observes, that they carry them from Astrakbân (where they are near as good as in Karazm) to St. Petersburg, for the court of Russia; and that they are as good in the middle of winter, as in their proper season: but he adds, that they are gathered green, and ripen afterwards^d.

Rivers.

The Amû,

KARAZM owes all its fertility, in a manner, to three rivers, and a great lake. The rivers are the Amû, Khesel, and Sîr. The Amû, as it is called by the Usbeks and Persians, is the Jibûn of the Arabs, and Oxus of the antient Greeks. It has its source to the N. N. E. of the kingdom of Kashmîr, towards the frontiers of Little Bukhâria, in those high mountains which separate it from the dominions of the Great Mogul. It crosseth the southern part of Great Bukhâria, from east to west; then, winding north-westward along the borders of that country, enters Karazm in the same direction; and, forty leagues from its mouth, divides in two arms b or branches. That on the left hand, turning westward, falls into the Caspian sea (B), towards the borders of the province of Astarabâd, belonging to Persia. But the right-hand branch, which formerly passed before the city of Urgbenj, and met the sea (C), twelve leagues to the north of the former, about fourscore years ago, quitted its antient chanel, six leagues from changes its bed. the place where it separated from the other branch; and, changing its course more to the north, threw itself into the river Khesel, on the other side of the little town of Tûk: so that its old chanel, which ran before Urgbenj, is at present dry; which, leaving that city destitute of water, has greatly impaired it. The Amû abounds with all sorts of excellent fish: and its banks are the most charming in the world. Along them grow those excellent melons, and other fruits, so much esteemed in Persia, the Indies, and Russia; whither they are carried.

The Khesel;

its course turned.

THE river Khesel, Khesil, or Kesil, as the Usbeks name it, rises in the mountains to the north-east of the province of Sogd, or Samarkant; and running westward, with some turning to the north-west, between the Amû and Sîr, falls into the lake of Arâl, fifty or sixty miles after it has been joined by the Amû. The sides of the Khesel are exceedingly fertile, where-ever they are cultivated: but then it must be confessed, that the greater part of them are neglected by the inhabitants: nor do they make use of those excellent pastures which are found along this river: although they are much better than those which enrich the sides of the Amû. At present, there is not one considerable town to be seen upon the Khesel. Besides, the few small ones, that are situated on it, are half desert: because the Usbek Tatars, of both Great Bukhâria and Karazm, chuse rather to be near the frontiers of the Persians, than of the Elûths (or Kalmûks), and Karakalpaks; seeing there is more to be gained by their incursions on one side than on the other. The waters of this river are vastly increased by the junction of the Amû, before-mentioned. But, of late years, the Tatars of Karazm have also turned the course of the Khesel from the Caspian sea (D) into the lake of Arâl (or Eagles), on the following occasion.

The Daria.

PETER I. emperor of Russia, having been informed, that gold ore was found in great abundance on the coast of the Caspian sea, at the mouth of the river Sîr, called also Daria; and judging that a new course of trade, between Siberia and the southern countries of Asia, might be carried on by means of that river, ordered certain persons, skilled in maritime affairs, to accompany the Kossîks of Jaïk in several of their expeditions along the shores of that sea, in order to discover the mouth of the Daria. These people, finding that no considerable river discharged itself e into the Caspian sea, between the Yemb, or Yemba, and the Amû, excepting the Khesel (E), concluded that this must be the river which they looked for: especially as the Kossîks assured them, that it was named Daria: not knowing that the word Daria is an appellative, signifying a river in general, among the Persians (F).

Expedition of Beckowitz.

HOWEVER that be, after they had sounded the entrance of the Khesel, and taken notice of several marks whereby to know it again; they returned, and made their report to the emperor: who thereupon, in 1719, sent one Brigadier Beckowitz, by the way of Astrakbân, with 2,500 men, to take possession of the mouth of that river. He pitched upon that officer, because he was a Cherkassian (G), and understood the Tatar language perfectly well. But the Tatars, growing jealous to see him arrive several times on that occasion, turned the course of the Khesel f northwards, by three chanel, the land being low on that side, into the lake of Arâl; and then stopped up the entrance towards the sea: so that Beckowitz, arriving some time after with his vessels to the mouth of the river, found it quite dry.

^d Hist. Turks, p. 433, & seq.

(B) Perhaps at the town of Munkisblak.

(C) It fell into the gulf, or bay, of Bâlkân, or Abâlk-bân.

(D) It fell into Peter's Bay, in the north part of the eastern coast of the Caspian sea, according to D'Arville's map.

(E) For the Sîr falls into the lake of Arâl.

(F) Likewise among the Usbeks.

(G) Webber says he was a Cherkassian prince, captain of the Tsar's guards: that he was immensely rich, and had married the most beautiful lady in all Russia; and that he had been sent before this, in the year 1715.

- a NOTWITHSTANDING this discouragement, in obedience to his orders, he landed his troops; The Khân's and began to build forts thereabouts, as well as the ground, which was exceeding sandy, would artifice permit. They were scarce in a condition of defence, when the Tatars of Kiva (so the Russians call the Usbeks (H), or Karazm), came down upon him with great numbers of troops: but Beckowitz opposed them with so much resolution, that the Khân, who was at the head of them, despairing to conquer him by force, set about to ensnare him by fraud. To this end, he sent to inform him privately, "that in his heart he was sincerely a friend to the Russians, and desired
 " nothing more than to see them settled near his own dominions: but that at the same time he " was obliged to seem their enemy in appearance, and oppose them, in order to comply with " the humour of the princes, who were his relations and neighbours. In short, that it was b " resolved in council to make a last effort the day following; and, in case they had no better " success than in their former attacks, he would do his endeavour to bring about an accommoda" tion."

BECKOWITZ gave credit the more easily to this declaration, as the Khân had already caused to ensnare him. protestations of the same kind to be made at the court of Russia, by an envoy sent for that purpose. Next morning, the Tatars did not fail to renew the attack; which they did with such vigour, that great numbers of them, contrary to custom, alighted off their horses. But having been repulsed, at length, with loss, the Khân sent one of his Mursas to the Russian general, to know on what account he had landed an army in his dominions, and what he wanted? Hereupon Beckowitz demanded, that the sluices, made in the river Khesil, should be c stopped up; and the mouth of it opened again, that so the current might resume its former course. The Tatars having remonstrated that it was not in their power to dam up the channels, the water ran into them with such rapidity; Beckowitz offered to go and do it with his own troops, provided they gave him hostages for his security. As this was just what the Tatars wanted, they readily agreed to his demands.

HEREUPON the Russian commander, leaving some men to guard the forts, set forward with The Russians the rest to execute his design: but the hostages, who served for guides, led him through slain. places quite desert, where there were only certain holes of stagnant water, not sufficient for his troops; so that, after five days march, they found themselves quite destitute of means to quench their thirst. In this distress, their guides proposed to divide into several bodies, and d march by different roads, that they might the more easily find a supply. Beckowitz was obliged to consent to this proposal, although he saw the danger of it. In short, the Russians having thus separated into parties, the Tatars surrounded them, one after another, and, slaying their leader (I), with most of his men, carried the rest into slavery. When they, who were left in the forts, heard of this misfortune, they reembarked, and returned to Astrakhan.

THE lake of Arál, that is Eagles, before-mentioned, separates the province of Arál, to Lake of Arál; which it gives name, from the eastern provinces of Karazm. It is one of the largest in the north parts of Asia; being above twenty-five German leagues in length, from south to north; about half as much in breadth, from east to west; and above eighty in circumference. Its e waters are exceeding salt, and breed great quantities of the same sorts of fish which are found in the Caspian sea; with which, however, it does not seem to have any communication: neither does it ever overflow its banks; although it receives the waters of the Sir, the Khesil, and several other smaller rivers. The Karakalpaks, who inhabit the northern coast of affords much salt: it, towards the mouth of the Sir, and the Turkmans of the province of Arál, in summer, convey the water of this lake, by means of small canals or ditches, into the neighbouring plains; whose surface, when the moisture is exhaled by the sun's heat, is covered with a fine crust of crystalline salt: with which the inhabitants of all Karazm and Turkestan are plentifully supplied.

ACCORDING to Kyrillow's map of the Russian empire, this lake resembles in figure the situation and f Caspian sea, and is more than half as long; being 340 miles from south to north, and 160 extent. broad in the south part; although not half that breadth in the north end: but, in all probability, these dimensions are too great, as well as its distance from the Caspian sea; which is there made to be 200 miles. Into this great lake the Khesil discharges itself, on the south side, by three canals; and the Sir, on the north side, by two: of which last river we have given an account elsewhere.

^c ABU'LGH. Hist. ubi supra, p. 444, & seqq.

(H) From the Khân's camp, called Khiva, or Khi-vák.

(I) Webber says, that, refusing to kneel on the red cloth, in order to be beheaded, they hamstrung and mangled him barbarously.

S E C T. II.

Provinces of Karazm.

Provinces.

KA R A Z M is divided into many provinces, as appears from Abû'lghazi Khân's history, ^a who mentions several of them; which Bentink, his commentator, has succinctly described. From him, therefore, we shall insert an account of them; which will be of great use to the reader, in perusing the subsequent history of the Khâns of this country. These provinces, so far as we know of them, are twenty in number; which that author mentions in the following order.

Ogurza.

1. OGURZA (or Ogurja), is a large province, situate towards the coast of the Caspian sea. It was very fertile heretofore, when the northern branch of the river Amû, which ran through it, took another course: since that time it became a desert, for want of water to moisten its lands. This country takes its name from the great quantity it formerly produced of cucumbers; which, both in the Tartarian and Russian language, are called Ogurza.

Pishga.

2. PISHGA, a little province, situate to the east of the city of Urgbenj; which has been but thinly inhabited ever since the northern branch of the river Amû ceased to pass through it, as formerly. ^b Karakizit.

3. KARAKIZIT (or Karakijit), a small province, situate between those of Pishga and Ogurza, which is grown very thin of people, since the river Amû deserted Urgbenj; to the west of which it lies.

Ghilkupruk.

4. GHILKUPRUK, a small province, situated to the south of the southern branch of the river Amû, in the confines of the provinces of Khorassân and Astarabâd.

Gordish.

5. GORDISH, a little province lying between those of Pishga and Kumkant. It is one of the most fruitful, and best cultivated, in all Karazm, as being watered by the Amû; which in this country quitted its old chanel to join the Khesel, as before-mentioned. ^c Kumkant.

6. THE small province of Kumkant lies to the east of Gardish, towards the northern banks of the river Amû; which in the borders of those two provinces divides into two branches.

Yanghi Shâhr.

7. YANGHI (or Yenghi) Shâhr, a little province near the right bank of the southern branch of the river Amû; which is of no great consequence at present.

Burma.

8. BURMA, one of the largest provinces of Karazm, to the east of the city of Wazîr, towards the frontiers of Great Bukhâria. It is very populous, as well as fertile; and produces the most delicious melons in all the kingdom.

Bayalkiri.

9. BAYALKIRI, a little province to the north of Urgbenj. It is very sandy and desert; ^d because it wants water.

Kefel Rabat.

10. KESIL RABAT lies towards the Khesel, or Kefil, and to the north-west of the town of Tûk. This little province is very populous, and produceth all kinds of delicious fruits in abundance.

Gardankhast.

11. GARDANKHAST, a large province, situate between the cities of Kayuk and Hazârâsh (A). It has pretty good pasturage; and is almost wholly peopled by the Sarts, who are the antient inhabitants of Karazm.

Yanghi-arik.

12. YANGHI-ARIK, a small province on the north side of the Amû, and bordering on Great Bukhâria; at the foot of the mountains which separate it from Karazm.

Bakirgan.

13. BAKIRGAN, a large province, on the north side of the river Khesel, and north east of the town of Tûk. ^e Kuigan.

14. KUIGAN, another large province, north of Bakirgan and the Khesel, extending as far as the borders of the Karakalpâks and the Kalmûks (or Elûths). It consists, for the most part, of vast plains; producing excellent pasture, like all the other sandy grounds of Great Tartary.

Ikzi Kumani.

15. IKZI KUMANI (B), a little province towards the southern banks of the Khesel, and west of the territory of Khayuk.

Khika.

16. KHIKA, another small province on the south side of the Khesel. It lies east of the territory of Tûk, and west of the province of Ikzi Kumani.

Tarkhân.

17. TARKHAN, a little province, situate to the north of the Khesel, and west of Bakirgan. It abounds with excellent pastures; but lies uncultivated. ^f Bamaburinak.

18. BAMABURINAK, a little province to the north of the Khesel, towards the southern coast of the lake of Arâl, and west of the province of Tarkhân.

(A) In the French, Hassaraassap.

(B) Or Ikzi Kumani. This seems to be a remains of the Kumani, or Komani; a warlike nation, who, for a long time, possessed the country along the north side of the Caspian sea, as far as the river Don, till conquered by Jinghiz Klân, and his successors in Kipjak.

19. KOGERTLIK,

^a 19. KOGERTLIK, a large province, situate on the borders of Great Bukhâria, and north Kogertlik, of the province of Yanghiarik.

20. THE province of Arâl, towards the coasts of the Caspian sea, is very large; extending Arâl from the mountains of Abûlkân, to the north of the old mouth of the northern branch of the Amû; which is now dry, as far as the country of the Karakalpâks. This part of Karazm is, at present, almost wholly inhabited by Turkmâns; who find there, in many places, excellent pasture for their flocks. But, for the general, the province of Arâl, which takes its name from the lake before described, is mountainous, sandy, and barren ^a.

BESIDES the provinces above described, Abû'lgâzi Khân mentions others in his history; Other provinces, particularly, those of Abû'l Khân and Dehestân ^b. The first seems to be situate where the mountain of Abû'l Khân stands, on the north side of the antient chanel of the northern branch of the Amû; and the latter properly belongs to the province of Khorassân, bordering on that of Forjân.

^a ABU'LG. Hist. p. 434.

^b Ibid. p. 235.

S E C T. III.

The cities, and other remarkable places, of Karazm.

^c K A R A Z M was in former times full of cities, towns, and castles; remarkable for their beauty, strength, and abundance of people. This was its case, it may be presumed, for a long series of ages, as well antiently under its own kings, as while it was a province of the Persian and Arabian empires; but, in all probability, it flourished most when it became an independent kingdom, under the family of the Kharazm Khâns; who annexed to it, by conquest, all Irân, or Persia at large; and Turân, or the countries to the north of the Jibûn, or Amû; forming a great empire, of which Orkanj was the capital. But at present the cities of Karazm are but few, and reduced below the condition of ordinary towns, through the destructive power of the Uzbeks; who have brought ruin and poverty where-ever they settled ^a.

^d ORKANJ, or, as it may also be written, Urgbenj, is still the capital. This, we are told, Orkanj, or is the Mungl name which it took after the time of Jenghîz Khân ^b; before it seems to have Urgenj had the name of the country Karazm, or Khowarazm, as we often find it was called. The Persians, instead of Orkanj, write Korkanj. In the tables of Abû'lfeda, Nasro'ddîn, and Ulugh Beg, we find two cities of the name of Korkanj, Great Korkanj, or Nu Korkanj, and Korkanj the lesser, or Forjaniya, of Khowarazm, to distinguish it, doubtless, from Forjaniya, of Persia. The first was the metropolis of the country; and both were situated on the west side of the Jibûn, or Amû, ten miles asunder ^c. At present it is called Urgbenj, or Urkenj, by the Uzbeks; for so Abû'lgâzi Khân names it (A). Jenkinson writes it Urgence ^d; and Johnson, his fellow traveller, from a merchant of Bokhara, Urgensh, and Urgense ^e. The English traveller, at the end of Tavernier, says, that some call it Turgench; others Jurgench, which comes near Forjaniyah: ^e he likewise writes Urgensh ^f. Whence this variety of names arises, we know not; unless from the custom of different nations, to alter the names of foreign places.

This city, called Orkanj, Jurjench, or Urjensh, is situated in a great plain, to the north of the river Amû, twenty-five German leagues from the eastern shores of the Caspian sea. The place was very considerable in ages past: but since the Tatars became its masters, it has fallen so much to decay, that, at present, it makes but a pitiful figure, being no more than a great scambling town, about a league in circumference. This is owing partly to the disorderly government of the Uzbeks, and partly to the desertion of the northern branch of the Amû, which formerly ran by the walls of the city; but having, for some time past, taken another course, and by that means deprived both the city and its territory of water, it has caused many of the inhabitants to forsake it, and rendered the neighbouring country barren, which before was very fruitful.

^f THE walls of Urjensh are of sun-burnt bricks, with a kind of ditch, which is very narrow, and full of rubbish in several places. The houses also are no better than paltry cabbins of earth. It has indeed a castle, built with bricks; but so ruinous, that scarce a fourth part of it is inhabitable. The brick mosks likewise are nearly in as bad a condition: for the Tatars

^a ABU'LG. Hist. ubi supra, p. 438.
Defer. Chowarasm, p. 23, 25. Edit. Hudson.
Collect. vol. i. p. 335.

^f P. 115.

^b LA CROIX Hist. Geng. p. 240.

^d PURCHAS Pilgr. vol. iii. p. 236.

^c ABU'LFEDA
^e HAKL.

(A) In the French and English translations it is written Urgens; the g being hard, according to the German orthography; so that it answers to Urgbins, or Urkins:

but in the name, as given by the English authors, it is doubtless soft, or stands for j consonant.

trade inconsiderable;

in general are very ready to destroy buildings, but very backward either to erect any new ones, ^a or to keep the old in repair. The only thing belonging to this city, which they take any care of at present, is a great broad street, towards the middle of it; which serves for the common market-place, and is covered from one end to the other, to preserve the goods sold there from the weather. Although Urjensh is situated very conveniently for commerce, being the rendezvous of all the business carried on between the Bukhârs and the countries on the west side of the Caspian sea, yet, at present, the trade is very inconsiderable: because foreign merchants, finding no security among the Mohammedan Tatars, very few of them will venture thither. The ordinary duties paid at Urjensh are no more than three per Cent. but the extraordinary amount, very frequently, beyond the whole merchandizes.

THE Khâns of Karazm commonly winter in this town; but in summer they encamp on ^b the banks of the Amû, or in some other agreeable place of the country, as best suits their conveniency ^c.

capital of Ka-
razm;

URJENSH has not always been the capital of Karazm. According to Abû'l-feda, Kath, or Kar, was formerly the metropolis ^b. The governor of Karazm was surprised in this city by him of Jorjân, in Persia, in the reign of Nub ibn Mansûr, of the Sammânian family ⁱ. How long it continued so is uncertain: nor does it appear on what occasion the royal seat was removed, as it seems to have been, from Urjensh; though possibly that happened on account of the inundation which once ruined it ^k. However that be, Urjensh, under the name perhaps of the city of Karazm, was, in all probability, the seat of the Karazmian empire, founded by Kothbo'ddîn, in 489; and so continued ever since, excepting now-and-then that the ^c Uzbek Khâns have thought fit to reside for a while at Wazîr, Khayuk, or some other place.

A. D. 1092.

once very great;

A. D. 1186.

ALTHOUGH at present Urjensh is reduced to so low a state, yet it was once, like all the other cities of this country, both rich and populous. In the year 582, when Soltân Shâh besieged it, the inhabitants, who had submitted to his elder brother Takash, were so numerous, that they kept their gates open in his view ^l: and thirty years after, when Jenghîz Khân took it, in 1221, the Mungls put 100,000, some say 200,000, people to the sword ^m. Urjensh began to flourish again under the family of the Sofi's; and was a great city, when Timûr Bek (or Tamerlan), having, in 1379, taken (C) it from Yusef Sofi, and conquered the kingdom, caused it to be razed in 1388, and the ground sowed with barley ⁿ. It is probable, that it was repaired three years after, when, by the conqueror's order, the country was re-peopled, ^d and restored to its antient splendor. But from that time, it may be presumed, that Urjensh never was able to recover itself; and the government of the Uzbeks, which since then it has fallen under, so injurious to commerce, joined to the inconveniencies attending the turning of the river Amû off from the town, has completed its ruin ^o.

at present miserable:

URJENSH seems to have been in no better condition when Mr. Jenkinson was there, in 1558, as appears from his account of it; which is as follows. The city, or town, stands on level ground: its walls, as well as houses, are of earth; and, by estimation, four miles in compass. The buildings within it are ruined, and out of good order. It hath one long street; which is covered above, and is the place of their market. It has been won and lost four times within seven years, by civil wars. Hence it comes to pass, that there are but few merchants ^e dwelling in it; and these so poor, that he could not sell above four pieces of kersey in the whole town. The chief commodities sold there come from Boghâr (or Bokbâra), and Persia; but in very small quantities, not worth mentioning. All the country from the Caspian sea to this city is called the land of Turkmân, and is subject to the Khân ^p.

its latitude.

THE latitude of this city, as given by the same author, is 42 degrees, 18 minutes ^q: which seems the more exact, as it differs but one minute from that assigned it by the most famous oriental astronomers (D). This English traveller, who passed through Karazm in his way to Boghâr, or Bokbâra, mentions two or three other places in the country, as Manguslau, Sellizûr, and Kayt.

Manguslau.

MANGUSLAU, a very good port, twelve leagues within a bay. Both governor and people ^f proved very bad, as exacting double the ordinary price of carriage and provisions. Jenkinson gives the latitude of this place 45 degrees: but, in all probability, it is the same place with Man-kishlak, hereafter mentioned; and, consequently, cannot have more than about 40 degrees of latitude.

^z BENTINK ap. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 438, & seq.
Hist. Pers. p. 160.

^k Descr. Chowar. p. 23.

^m LA CROIX, Hist. Gengh. p. 256.

Turks, p. 440, & seqq.

^p PURCH. ubi supr.

^h Descr. Chowar. p. 27.

ⁱ TEIXEIRA, D'HERBEL. Bibl. orient. p. 835, art. Takash.

ⁿ Hist. Tim. Bek, vol. i. p. 306.

^o ABU'LG. Hist.

^q HAKLUYT's collect. vol. i. p. 335.

(C) Korkanj Minor was then the regal seat, according to La Croix, in the notes.

(D) Viz, 42° 17' according to Albirûni, a native of Karazm; which latitude was afterwards adopted by Ulugh Begh, in his tables.

a SELLIZUR, called also Shayzûr, is twenty-four days journey of the Karawâns from Mangush-Sellizûr-lau, and two from Urjensh. It was a castle, seated on a high hill, where then resided the king, called Azim (F) Khân, with three of his brothers. The palace was not strong, being built of earth, and made a poor figure.

To the south of the castle the land is very low, but very fertile; producing many good fruits; Fruits and particularly one called a Dinie. It is very large, and full of moisture; the people eating it after grain. meat, instead of drink. There is another, called Karbûs (G), the size of a great cucumber, yellow, and sweet as sugar. Here is also a certain corn, called Jegur, whose stalk resembles a sugar-cane, and is as tall: but the grain is like rice, growing at the top like a cluster of grapes. The water with which all this country is supplied, is conveyed by canals out of the Oxus (or Amû); so that it falleth not into the Caspian sea, as formerly: and, in a short time, all that land is likely to become a wilderness, for want of water*. Which prediction of our author has come to pass.

THE towns besides Urjensh, mentioned by Abû'lghâzi Khân, and described by Bentink, are the following seven.

TUK, a little town, six leagues to the north-east of Urjensh, at a small distance from the Tak. southern bank of the Khesel.

KHAYUK lies towards the borders of Great Bukhâria, half a day's journey from the river Khe-Khayuk-sel. It is the best city in all Karazm, next to Urjensh: yet the houses are no better than miserable cabbins, being as inconvenient within as without. The neighbouring country is fertile enough; but very ill cultivated. However, one meets there with some vines; which the Sarts, who dwell in this town, take care of. They make also a kind of red wine, which is pretty good.

WAZIR, situated towards the northern bank of the river Amû; but, like the rest of the Wâzîr towns, is at present inconsiderable.

KUMKALA is a small town, in the middle of Karazm, to the north of Wazîr; but not worth Kumkâla taking notice of.

THE town of Kâbt, Kâth, or Kât (H), is situated on the north side of the Khesel, towards Kât. Great Bukhâria; and is of consequence at present only on account of its passage over that river.

d HAZARASB, situated on the north side of the Khesel (I), is also become inconsiderable, since Hazârâsb it fell into the hands of the Uzbeks.

MANKISHLAK, a small town on the shore of the Caspian sea, on the north side of the southern Mankishlâk branch of the mouth of the river Amû (K). The town itself is inconsiderable, consisting of about 700 houses, or rather pitiful cabbins, built of earth; but its port is magnificent, and the only one to be found in all that sea. As it is large, secure, and deep, it would in any other hands but those of the Tatars, soon become a place of great trade; but, at present, seldom any ships arrive there (L). The town is inhabited only by Turkmâns, who can bear the neighbourhood of the sea better than the Uzbeks†.

e ABU'LGHAZI KHAN mentions several other towns of Karazm in his history, besides the pre-Other cities. ceding*. The Uzbeks of this country have likewise some others in Khorassân; which, by degrees, they conquered from the Persians. As Durûn, Nasay (or Nesa), Ibûrd (or Bawerd), Mahân, Bâghabâd, Tawrsurdi, and Marû. These places however were, in all likelihood, recovered from them a few years ago, by the late Nâdir Shâh; who, we are told, chastised them severely, and drove them beyond the river Amû. But whether they have not taken the opportunity of the troubles which arose in Irân, or Persia, on that prince's death, to re-enter into possession of those cities, is what we cannot venture to assure our readers.

* PURCH. ubi supr.

† BENTINK Hist. Turks, p. 442, & seqq.

‡ Ibid. p. 235, & alibi.

(F) In the translations of Abû'lghâzi Khân's history, Hakim; that is, Hazim, or rather Hajim; the h being commonly used to express the English j consonant.

(G) Or Arbus, before described.

(H) Abû'lfeda calls it Kâth; Jenkinson, Kait; and only says, it is a castle where Soltân Saramet resided. Purch. Pilgr. vol. iii. p. 237. It was formerly the capital of Karazm; and there were two of the name, as well as of Orkanj, or Urjensh.

(I) This must be a mistake, unless it be a town of modern building: for Abû'lfeda places it on the Jibûn, or Amû. The name signifies, in Persian, a thousand horses.

(K) This situation is agreeable to what may be inferred from Abû'lghâzi Khân's history; who frequently mentions it, as lying towards the bottom of the Caspian sea; and, as Jenkinson, in his passage from Mangushau to Urjensh, came to the bay where formerly the Oxus, or Amû, fell into the Caspian sea before it was turned into another river, Mangushau must, we presume, be the same with Mankishlâk. For the mouth of the dry chanel lies in a latitude considerably more south than Urjensh; and it is not likely, if Mangushau was in the north part of the Caspian sea, that they should travel so far south, and round about, instead of taking the direct and shorter road thro' the country. Either, therefore, Jenkinson, or the printer, mistook as to the latitude of Mangushau, or some other particulars, or his journal was corrupted, as we have been credibly informed it was, to serve some particular purposes.

(L) In the flourishing times of the Karazmian empire, it may be presumed, a great trade was carried on here; and it is still a place of passage for ships from the coast of Shirwân, and other parts of the Caspian sea.

S E C T. IV.

The inhabitants of Karazm; their manners and customs.

The Sarts.

KA R A Z M is at present inhabited by three sorts of people; the Sarts, the Turkmâns, and the Uzbek Tatars. a

WITH regard to the first of these, we are only told, that they are the antient inhabitants of the country, and support themselves, like the Turkmâns, by their cattle and husbandry². What we are to understand by the antient inhabitants, seems not easy to determine: whether the original inhabitants, who first possessed the country; or those who were settled there before the Uzbeks became masters of it: which latter is most probable. Nor is it so likely that they are a people sprung from one and the same stock, as a mixed people, composed of the remains of Persians, Arabs, Turks, and other Tatar tribes, who have successively conquered the country; especially those of the latter kind, which their way of living in good measure confirms. But as neither Abû'lghâzi Khân, nor his commentator Bentink, has thought b unable to satisfy the curiosity of our readers.

1. Of the Turkmâns.

*Turkmâns,
their origin.*

THE Turkmâns, or Turkomâns, as our historians call them, came originally from Turkestan, or the parts of Tartary to the north of Karazm and Great Bukhâria. They separated from the Kankli, with whom they dwelt in that country, towards the eleventh century, with an intent to seek their fortune somewhere else; and settled in Karazm, long before the Tatars, as Abû'lghâzi Khân relates. They divided into two parties, one of which went round the north c side of the Caspian sea, and settled in the western parts of the Greater Armenia; from thence called Turkomania, or the country of the Turkomâns. The second party turned south, and rested about the banks of the river Amû, and the shores of the Caspian sea (A): where they still possess a great number of towns and villages, in the countries of Karazm and Astarabâd, a province of Irân, or Persia at large.

Oriental Turkmâns;

THIS branch of the Turkmâns has been hitherto unknown to the European historians and geographers; although they are much more numerous at present than that of the western Turkmâns. The authors who have given extracts from the eastern writers, take but little notice of them; and others relate no more of their history, than what occurs in the Byzantine and such western historiographers, who lived at too great a distance to be acquainted with their d affairs.

THE Turkmâns seem to be descended from the Turks, or to differ from them, only as the wandering Arabs, called Badwîns, who live under tents, do from those who dwell in cities. As the western branch of the Turkmâns formed the famous dynasties, under the denominations of the Black and White Sheep, in Armenia, and the neighbouring provinces; so from this eastern branch some oriental authors derive the three famous dynasties of the Seljuk Soltâns, who, for several ages, held in subjection the countries of Asia from the Archipelago to Hindûstân.

Shape, dress, religion;

THE Turkmâns of this latter branch are shaped much like the western: that is, are tall and robust, with square flat faces; only they are much swarthier, and have a greater resemblance of the Tatars. In summer they wear long gowns of callico, or thick cloth; and, in winter, sheep-skin gowns, of the same kind. Cattle and agriculture afford them subsistence, according to the different parts they possess. In winter they inhabit towns and villages about the river Amû, and towards the coasts of the Caspian sea. In summer they encamp where they can meet with the best pastures, and good water. They all profess the Mohammedan worship. Such of them as are settled in the country of Astarabâd generally follow the Persian sect; but they who dwell in Karazm conform with the Uzbek Tatars in sentiments of religion; although neither one nor the other give themselves much trouble about it.

Character, and number.

THESE eastern Turkmâns are exceedingly restless, and with great difficulty submit to the Tatar yoke. They are very brave, and, at least, as good horsemen, but not so great f

² BENTINK Hist. Turks, p. 235.

(A) Jenkinson found them possessed of all the coast from Manguslaw, where he landed, till he left the shore, four days before he reached Sellizûr.

^a robbers, as the Uzbeks: by whom being treated as conquered subjects, they are obliged to pay tribute, and suffer several other impositions. To this is principally to be imputed the great animosity which they bear those rigid masters: but the Turkmâns who dwell under the dominion of the Persians, are treated in a much better manner. Both together may amount to 100,000 families. These people are still divided into tribes, like all the other branches of the Turkish nation; and their chiefs enjoy the same prerogatives ^b.

ABU'LGHAZI KHAN, who was a great enemy to the Turkmâns, and from time to time destroyed great numbers of them, makes frequent mention of them, on several occasions: sometimes according to the country they inhabit, as the Turkmâns of Mankishlâk, Abû'lkbân, and Debistân^c: which last territory belongs to Persia: but oftener by the names of their respective tribes. The principal of which are, 1st, Adâkli Kisser-ili. These dwell on both sides of the Amû, from the province of Pishga to that of Karakizet^d. 2. Ali-ili, inhabiting from the province of Karakizet to the mountain of Abû'lkbân. 3. Ti-u-azi, who possess the rest of the banks of the Amû, from Abû'lkbân to the sea. These three tribes are named Utzil^e. Besides these three tribes, we meet with the names of several others, whose particular settlements are not mentioned; viz. Tâka, Sârik, Yamut, Irsâri, Khorassân Saluri^f (these five made formerly no more than one tribe), Itzki Saluri, Hassan Ikdur, Jândur, Arabâz, Koklan, Adâkli^g, Karamit^h, and some others, less considerable ⁱ.

JENKINSON remarks, in his travels to Bokhâra, that all the country from the Caspian sea to Urgens is called the land of Turkmân; and that the inhabitants between that sea and the castle of Sellizûr, as well as of all the countries about that sea, live without either town or house, in the open fields; removing from place to place in great companies, with their cattle^k.

2. Of the Uzbek Tatars.

THE name of Uzbeks, which the Tatars of Karazm and Great Bukhâria bear at present, is derived from Uzbek Khân of Kipjâk, as related by Abû'lghazi Khân^l: and this custom, to assume the name of the prince, in token of his people's affection, has always been in use with the inhabitants of Tartary: of which we have instances in the names of Moguls, or Mungls, Tatars, and the like.

Name and origin.

WHEN Ilbârs Soltân was invited by the inhabitants of Urgensh to come and take possession of Karazm^m, about the year 911, the Uzbeks possessed all the country of Kipjâk (or Kapchâk), eastward to the river Irtish, and southward as far as the river Sir, besides Great Bukhâria, A. D. 1505; which they had newly subdued under the conduct of Shâh Bakht (*) Soltân. This prince likewise added to his other conquests the greater part of Khorassân, with Karazm, which then depended on that province. However, a small number of Uzbeks seem to have settled in the country, till such time as Ilbârs, and his brother, brought the rest of them out of Kipjâk.

THE body of Uzbek Tatars, both in Karazm and Great Bukhâria, is composed out of four Uzbek tribes; viz. the Vigûrs, or Oygûrs, Naymâns, Durmâns, and Kunkurats, or Kongorats. The two first were of the four given to Sheybani Khân, son of *Juji Khân*ⁿ. On which occasion a certain author observes, that if all the inhabitants of Kipjâk took the name of Uzbeks from Uzbek Khân, it is strange none but those four should retain it. Nor is there any accounting why the Tatars of Krim are not called Uzbeks; but by supposing, either that the name extended only to those four tribes, and that the subjects of Uzbek Khân were limited to them; or else, that the rest of the Tatars, who inhabited Kipjâk, changed it by degrees, according to the above-mentioned custom, so much in use with them.

THE Uzbeks, for the most part, live by rapine, resembling in all respects those of Great Bukhâria; excepting that they are far less polite, and more restless. They dwell in winter in the towns and villages which are towards the middle of Karazm; and in summer the greater part of them encamp in the neighbourhood of the river Amû, and in other places where they can meet with favourable pasture for their cattle; always waiting for some convenient opportunity to rob and destroy. They never cease making incursions upon the adjacent territories of Persia or Great Bukhâria; and are to be restrained by no treaties or engagements whatever, in regard all their riches and support consist in the slaves and plunder which they carry off on those occasions.

ALTHOUGH there are excellent pasture-lands in many parts of the country towards the banks of the Khesel, yet the Uzbeks seldom remove thither with their cattle in summer; because there is nothing to plunder on that side: for the Karakâlpâks (or Mankâts), who are their northern neighbours, are as dextrous at the business as themselves; and what they can find to steal from one another is not worth the trouble of going for. Besides, the Mohammedan Tatars (Elâts), who border on Karazm to the north-east, they usually quit the borders of the Moham-

^b BENTINCK ap. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 426, & seq.

p. 236 & 239.

^c Ibid. p. 238.

^e Ibid.

^d Ibid. p. 235.

^f Ibid. p. 236.

^g Ibid.

Pilgr. vol. iii. p. 237.

^h ABU'LGHAZI. Hist. Turks, p. 235.

ⁱ Ibid. p. 256.

^j Ibid. p. 238.

^k PUKCH.

p. 709.

^l ABU'LGHAZI. Hist. Turks, p. 207.

^m Ibid. p. 226.

(*) See before,

of making inroads:

medan Tatars towards the beginning of summer, that they may not be exposed to their inroads; and return not thither again till the winter, when the rains and snow have rendered the roads impassable on that side. a arms and diet;

HENCE it is that none but the Sarts and Turkmâns reap the benefit of the pastures. The former seek those which lie eastward, towards Great Bukhâria, and the Turkmâns go in quest of such as are situated towards the shores of the Caspian sea, and mouth of the Amû. However, the Uzbeks frequently encamp on the sides of this river; where they are at hand to throw themselves into the Persian provinces, on the first occasion which presents, and carry off wherewithal to make good cheer in the winter. Although the Uzbeks have fixed habitations, yet, in travelling from one place to another, they carry with them all their effects of value, like the Elûths and Mungls; conformable to the way of living in use among their ancestors before they had settled dwellings °. b their cattle;

ACCORDING to Jenkinson, these Tatars never ride without their bow, arrows, and sword, although it be in hawking, or taking any other pleasure. They have no arts or sciences among them, but live an idle life; sitting round in great companies in the fields, and passing their time in idle discourse. They have not the use of bread: neither do they till or sow. They are great devourers of flesh; which they cut in small pieces, and eat greedily by handfuls: especially horse-flesh. Their chief drink is sour mare's milk, like that in use with the Nogays; with which they will get drunk. They have no rivers, nor places of water, in this country, from Manguslau, where the author landed, to the bay where he arrived, twenty stages distant; excepting some wells of brackish water, more than two days journey asunder. They eat their victuals upon the ground, sitting with their legs double under them; which is their posture also when they pray. c their money.

THE same author observes, that the inhabitants dwelling between the Caspian sea and Urjensh (including, without doubt, the Uzbeks as well as Turkmâns), have abundance of camels, horses, and sheep, both wild and tame. Their sheep are extraordinary large, with great tails, weighing sixty or eighty pounds. There are many wild horses in the country, which the Tatars frequently kill with their hawks. These birds are lured to seize upon the head or neck of the beast; which, being tired at length with toiling to get rid of this cruel enemy, the hunter, who follows his game, comes up and kills him. There grows no grass throughout this part of the country, but a brush or heath; which yet is very fattening. Jenkinson adds, that these people have not the use of gold, silver, or any other coin; but barter their cattle for necessities P. d

PERHAPS this author speaks of the Turkmâns only in this respect: for we find there is money in the kingdom; particularly a piece of silver called Tanga (B), which is current both in Karazm and Great Bukhâria. It is large, and Bentink believes the only silver money coined by the Khân of these provinces. This is round, pretty fine, and in value near the fourth part of a crown. It has on one side the name of the country, and on the other that of the country with the year of the Hejrâb. The rest of the money made in this country consists in small pieces of copper, of different sizes, which answer to our pence, half-pence and farthings. The money of Persia passes also in these provinces, especially towards the borders of that country ².

° BENTINK ap. Hist. Turks, p. 429, & seqq.
Hist. Turks, &c. p. 428.

² PURCH. Pilgr. vol. iii. p. 237.

³ BENTINK ap.

(B) Abûlghâzi Khân mentions it in his history, p. 239.

S E C T. V.

The government and revolutions of Karazm.

The Khân's authority.

KARAZM is commonly divided among divers princes of the same house; of whom, notwithstanding, only one has the title of Khân, with a kind of superiority over the others, just as he has power or skill to improve it. The usual place of his residence is Urjensh, or some other city which he chuses; although, during the summer, he, for the general, encamps on the sides of the river Amû. And, as his camp is called Khiva, his subjects are commonly denominated the Tatars of Khiva (C). This Khân is sovereign in his own dominions, and in no sort depends on him of Great Bukhâria, or any other prince ³.

JENKINSON informs us, that, in 1558, when he was in this country (which, however, he

³ BENTINK ap. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 423, & seq.

(C) That is by the Russians, as hath been observed before, in the account of Beckovitz's expedition to discover the Darîa.

a no-where names) it was in the hands of ſix brothers ; one of whom, called Azim (D), had the title of Khân : but adds, that he was very little obeyed, excepting in his own territory, and the place where he reſided (E). For that each would be king in the ſhare which belonged to him ; and one brother fought continually to deſtroy another, for want of natural affection ; which our author aſcribes to their being born of different women, and commonly the children of ſlaves. Every Khân or Soltân hath at leaſt four or five wives (F), beſides concubines. Theſe brothers are generally at war together : and when any of them is vanquiſhed he flies to the deſart, with his followers ; and there lives, by robbing the Karawâns, and all they meet with, till he is ſtrong enough to invade ſome of his brothers again ^b.

Nor is it difficult to bring this about : for Bentink obſerves, that as the Turkmâns, who were the firſt occupants, are always in oppoſition to the Uzbeks, the princes of the reigning houſe know how to make uſe of this jealousy, and draw to their ſide the faction which thinks itſelf neglected by the Khân. It is to this extreme facility of making a party, that thoſe troubles, which continually diſtract Karazm, are principally owing.

THIS ſtate can with eaſe ſet on foot forty or fifty thouſand able horſe. What Abû'lghazi Khân reports of his infantry and muſketeers ^c, ſhews that he had profited by his imprisonment in Persia : for, before his time, that way of fighting was entirely unknown to the Uzbeks. Nor do they ſeem to have retained that kind of warfare ; for, at preſent, they take the field only on horſe-back : and it is a rarity to ſee fire-arms among them ^d.

KARAZM is an antient kingdom, and hath undergone a great many revolutions. In the time of Herodotus it was ſubject to Persia, having been one of the provinces over which Darius placed Satrapas. But nothing very material occurs concerning it, till it was poſſeſſed by the Arabs, in the year 61, and for a long time after ; farther than that it was a province of their empire, under a governor, like the reſt of the countries conquered by them. Upon the declenſion of the power of the Khalîfahs, when the governors ſeized the provinces intruſted to their care, it is probable that Karazm acted like the reſt, in ſetting up for itſelf ; although in the hiſtories hitherto come to our knowledge, we meet with no king of this country before Mamûn ebn Mohammed, who reigned ſome time after the year 385. For, not long before that, we find it under a governor, named Abu Abdo'llah ^e ; but it does not appear for whom. At length it fell under the dominion of Soltân Mahmûd Gâzni, king of Khoraffân ; who, after the death of Mamûn ebn Mamûn, in 407, took that kingdom from the uſurper, and made it a province of his empire ^f.

KARAZM continued in this ſtate under the families of Gâzni and Seljûk, ſucceſſively, till, upon the death of Mâlek Shâh, ſurnamed Jâlâloddîn, third Soltân of the Seljûk Turks, in 489, Kotboddîn (G), then governor of that province, taking advantage of the broils which enſued upon the demife of that great monarch, aſſumed the title of king ^h. But that title was better eſtabliſhed by his ſon and ſucceſſor Mohammed, ſurnamed Atsîz ⁱ ; though not without great oppoſition from Soltân Sanjer, ſon of Malek Shâh, who often reduced him to a dependency. But it was Takaſh, ſixth Soltân of this dynasty, who firmly eſtabliſhed the empire of the Karazmians, by the ruin of that of Seljûk : which he put an end to in Irân, by the death of Togrul Arſlân, in 590 or 593 ; and added the dominions of that brave but unfortunate prince to his own. His ſon Kotboddîn Mohammed extended the empire yet farther, by the conqueſt of all Irân, or Persia at large, and Mawarâ'lnâbr, or Great Bukhâria ; and was the greateſt prince in all Aſia, in 615, when Jenghîz Khân invaded and deprived him both of his territories and his life.

As Jagatay Khân, ſon of that conqueror, had only a part of Karazm in his ſhare of his father's dominions, as ſet forth by the oriental hiſtorians ^j, it looks as if the whole country had not been ſubdued, or, at leaſt, that part of it revolted, and became independent. Be that as it will, it is very probable, that on the declenſion of the power of the Khâns of Jagatay (H), on the death of Gbazân, or Khâzân Khân, in 749, if not before, Karazm either

^b PURCH. Pilgr. vol. iii p. 237.

^c Ibid. 357.

^d Ibid. p. 431.

^e TEIXEIR. Hiſt. Perf. p. 260.

^f ABU'LFARAJ Hiſt. dynaſt. p. 220. D'HERBEL. p. 534.

^g LA CROIX Hiſt. Gengh. p. 129. D'HERBEL.

Bibl. orient. p. 126.

^h D'HERBEL. Art. Atſîz.

ⁱ LA CROIX hiſt. Timûr Bek, p. 307. ABULGH.

Hiſt. of the Turks, &c. p. 165.

(D) In Abû'lghazi Khân's hiſtory written Hadſim, which may be pronounced either Hazim or Hajim. He was elected Khân in 1557, and had five brothers living.

(E) He dwelt then, according to Jenkinſon, at Sellîzûr, two or three ſtages weſt of Urjenſh ; of which laſt Ali Soltân was king. We ſhall find, in the following hiſtory of the Khâns, that Ali Soltân had for his ſhare, Urjenſh, Hâzarûſh, and Kât.

(F) As Mohammedans, they can have no more than four.

(G) He ſucceeded his father Buſtekin, formerly ſlave to Balkatekin, his predeceſſor, but advanced by Mâlek Shâh to the government of Karazm.

(H) So the countries ſubject to Jagatay were called after him.

set up a king of its own, or fell a prey to some other power^k: for in the time of Timûr Bek,^a we find it possessed by Hussayn Sofi, son of Tang-bâday, of the hord of Kongorat, one of the four Uzbek tribes, which, at present, possess Karazm and Great Bukhâria. What is still more remarkable, it is called a great empire^l; and continued in that family of the Sofi's, till conquered by Timûr, in the year 781 and 790, when he razed the capital (called the city of Karazm in his history) to the ground, and sowed it with barley, as before related. But three years after, he restored both the city and kingdom to the condition it had been in before.

A. D. 1379, and 1388. by the Uzbeks. AFTERWARDS Karazm continued in the hands of the descendants of Timûr Beg in Mawarâ'lnâbr and Khorassân; on which last it was then dependent, till the famous Shâh Bakht Soltân, with his Uzbeks, subduing those two provinces, about the year 904, it fell of course into the hands of that conqueror. Soon after, Shâh Bakht having been defeated and slain by Shâh Ismael^b Sofi, in 916, Karazm returned once more under the dominion of the crown of Irân, or Persia at large: but, about two years after, the inhabitants, revolting against the governors, sent for Ilbârs Soltân; who coming with his Uzbeks out of Turkestân, was proclaimed Khân, in 918 (I), at Wazîr^m: and his descendants have continued ever since in possession of the countryⁿ.

^k LA CROIX, ibid. p. 147. & seqq.

^l Id. ibid. p. 148.

^m ABU'LGH. ubi supra, p. 226.

ⁿ Ibid. p. 420.

(I) In the original it is 911; but this must be a mistake.

S E C T. VI.

History of the Uzbek Khâns of Karazm.

1. The Khâns from Ilbârs Soltân, till his descendants were expelled Karazm.

Revolution in Karazm. BURGA SOLTÂN, son of Yadigar Khân, having been slain by Shâh Bakht Soltân,^c elder Ilbârs, the other Bilbârs, who was surnamed Bilikaj; because he became lame in his feet by a fit of sickness, which he had when a child. These two brothers were very brave, and lived on lands belonging to their father's dominions, as private men. Mean time Shâh Bakht Soltân, growing very powerful, conquered Great Bukhâria, with most of Khorassân; and having subdued Karazm, which at that time depended on Khorassân, placed a governor in Urgheñj, or Urjensh, the capital of that kingdom. But five or six years after this revolution, in 916, being defeated, and slain, near Marû, by Shâh Ismael Sofi, his governor of Urjensh fled; upon which the Shâh sent magistrates to the cities of Khayuk and Hazârâsh, Urjensh and Wazîr. The governor of this last city, on his arrival, gave the principal inhabitants a sumptuous entertainment, and made them presents: but Omar, the Kâzi (or judge), who absent-ed himself, under pretence of being indisposed, sent for some of them next day, and repre-sented, that the church was in danger from this governor, Shâh Ismael having changed the faith (A) thirteen years before. The citizens, alarmed at the thoughts of innovations in religion, went two years after to a person noted for piety, in the province of Bakirgan, proposing to make him Khân, and cut the throats of the Persian garrison. But he rejected the offer, and advised them to elect Ilbârs, son of Burga Soltân; whom he recommended for his good qualities, having often seen him in his annual journies into the country of the Uzbeks (B).

Ilbârs invited; THE burghers, taking this holy man's advice, dispatched two of their number to Ilbârs with a letter, inviting him to repair to Wazîr. Ilbârs set forward immediately with the deputies, and stopped near that city; while the conspirators, who were the principal lords, causing the inhabitants to take up arms, cut the throats of the governor and all his people. Next day they set out to meet Ilbârs, who, being joyfully received, both by the Sârts and Uzbeks, was proclaimed Khân, in the year 911, which is that called Koy, or the Sheep (C). Wazîr had then depending on it, of all its towns, no more than Tarsak and Tengbi Shâhr; which last was given to Bilbârs Soltân. The governor of Tarsak escaped to Urjensh; and having informed the governor Subhân Kûli of what had happened at Wazîr, the latter summoned the citizens, and told them, "that if they were weary of submitting to his orders, or wished for a change, they might freely declare it; for that he did not intend to be any charge to

(A) Asserting Ali to be the true successor of Mohammed, instead of Abûbekr, Omar, and Othmân, whom he reckoned usurpers: a point of vast importance among Mohammedans.

(B) They then inhabited all the country of Kipchak, or Kapchak, from the river Jûik, in the west, to the Irtish eastward, and the Sîr southward.

(C) See the Mungl Kalendar, vol. i. p. 309.

- a " them, or to reſide in their town againſt their wills." They unanimouſly answered, " that " as they had no reaſon to complain either of him or the Shâh, they deſired he would con" tinue among them ; adding, " the Uzbeks were naturally ſo inconstant, that they would
 " ſoon leave their new Khân in the lurch."

THE governor, upon theſe aſſurances, backed by an oath, reſolved to ſtay among them; ^{takes Urjenſh;} and ſent a ſpy to Wazîr, to learn the ſtrength of the enemy, while he put himſelf in a condition of defence. Three months after, Ilbârs Khân, advancing to Urjenſh, defeated the governor's army; and, entering the city with them, put him and all the Persians, with the principal inhabitants, who had aſſiſted them, to the ſword: but, finding that he had not men enough to ſecure his conqueſts, moſt of the Uzbeks being ſubject to his uncles, he propoſed b inviting the ſons of Abûlah and Amûnak (D); all approved of this motion of the Khân, excepting one Vigûr, of the common people; who alleged, " that it was a favourite maxim
 " of ſovereigns, if they had a mind to preſerve peace to themſelves, to keep their relations at " a diſtance from their dominions; that the reſtleſs ſpirits among them ſhould not be in a " ſituation to diſturb the tranquillity of the ſtate." But the Khân, and the lords of his coun-ſel, were ſo far from approving of this advice, that they took it very heinouſly, as ſpoken out of enmity to the princes; and to ſow diſcord in his family.

- As ſoon as the matter was ſettled, Ilbârs Khân gave his kiſmen to underſtand, that he had ^{calls in other}
 c already gotten poſſeſſion of Wazîr and Urjenſh; but, not having had forces enough to reduce ^{princes.}
Hazârâſh and Khayuk, he invited them to come with their ſubjects, and ſhare in the conqueſt of ſo fine a country. The princes, on this encouragement, immediately repaired to Ilbârs Khân, who gave up to them Urjenſh with its dependencies, and returned to reſide at Wazîr.
 The new-comers, by their incurſions, ſo incommoded the Persian garrifon of Khayuk and Hazârâſh, that they abandoned thoſe towns. After this, they carried the war into Khoraffân; and, after the death of Shâh Iſmaël, took all the towns between Durûn (E), and the mountains to the weſt of the city of Khoraffân (F); but they were ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, as well by the Turkmâns, who poſſeſſed the towns which lay on the borders of the provinces of Aſtara- bâd and Khoraffân, as thoſe who dwelt towards Abûlkhân and Mankiſhlâk, on the Caspian ſea d in Karazm. Bilbârs Soltân, the Khân's brother, was in moſt of theſe actions; and, though lame, led on his troops bravely among the thickeſt of the enemy, being carried in a light chariot, drawn by a ſingle horſe, and accompanied only by five or ſix choſen men.

- THESE two brothers died within a little while of each other, and left ſeveral ſons. Ilbârs ^{2. Khân} Khân was ſucceeded by Soltân Haji, ſon of Bilbârs Soltân, who was the eldeſt of all the family ^{Soltân Haji.} (G), and proclaimed at Wazîr: but, as he had only a few ſubjects, the whole power fell into the hands of Soltân Gâzi, eldeſt ſon of Ilbârs Khân (H), a prince of great genius. Ilbârs Khân gave to all his ſons the ſurname of Gâzi, which ſignifies a man who ſubdues people of another religion; in memory of their having vanquiſhed the Persians at Urjenſh and Wazîr:
 but our author knew not the reaſon why Bilbârs Soltân gave the name of Haji (I) to his ſons.
 e AFTER the death of Haji Khân, that honour was conferred on Haffan Kûli, ſon of Abûlak, ^{3. Khân Haf-} who reigned in Urjenſh, as being the eldeſt prince of the houſe of Yadigar Khân: for, although ^{ſan Kûli.}
 they were all deſcended from the three brothers, Burga Soltân, Abûlak, and Amûnak, and ſo made but one houſe, yet each had his own particular dominion. The ſix ſons of Amûnak (K) had at this time ſix ſons, of age to do for themſelves, beſides younger children. Haffan Kûli Khân, who was the only ſon of Abûlak, had likewise ſeveral ſons; of whom Bilâl, the eldeſt, reſembled his father in every thing, as well as his good diſpoſition. In the reign of this Khân, ^{The princes} the ſeed of envy and diſcord began to ſow itſelf among the aforeſaid princes: for as the Khân's ^{rebel.} revenue greatly exceeded thoſe of the reſt, they at length grew uneaſy at it; and, joining their forces againſt him, laid ſiege to Urjenſh. Hereupon Haffan Kûli Khân fallied out, on foot, f with all his men, and, poſting himſelf on the counterscarp, fought bravely, from morning till night, againſt the confederates: of whom, among others, was ſlain Aganay, the youngeſt of Amûnak's ſons, then only twenty years old; whoſe head was cut off, and ſent into the city:
 which ſo enraged his brothers, and the other chiefs of their party, that they forced the Khân to retire into Urjenſh, and fight within the walls^b.

^a ABU'LEH. Hiſt. Turks, &c. p. 224, & ſeq.

^b Ibid. p. 228, & ſeqq.

(D) The brothers of Burga Soltân. The firſt had one ſon, the other ſix ſons.

(E) Written alſo Daruan and Dargan.

(F) De l'Iſte, in his laſt map of Persia, places this city, or the remains of it, near Abiwerd, or Barwerd, in latitude 39 degrees.

(G) The eldeſt of the reigning family is always choſen Khân, except in extraordinary caſes.

(H) Ilbârs Khân had ſeven ſons; but our authors knew the names of only two, Soltân Gâzi, the eldeſt, and Mahamed Gâzi, the ſecond. Bilbârs left five; but only Soltân Hâji is named.

(I) Perhaps he conſidered his expedition along with his brother, in this Gâzi, or holy war, as a kind of religious pilgrimage.

(K) They were, 1. Safan. 2. Buzzûga. 3. Avâ- naſh. 4. Kâbl. 5. Âkattay; and, 6. Aganay.

puts him to death.

AFTER the siege had continued four months, provisions became so very dear, that many people deserted to the confederates; which, by degrees, so weakened the Khân's forces, that the allies, having at length given a general assault, entered the city, sword in hand, in spite of the incredible efforts made by that prince, and the few men he had left, of whom they made a great slaughter. After this they put to death Hassan Kâli Khân, with his son Bilâk, and banished the rest into Great Bukhâria: where, at the time our author wrote, there were living fifteen of their male descendants.

Divisions of Karazm.

THE confederates, having thus gotten the whole power into their hands, agreed on a new division of the cities of Karazm. To the descendants of Burga Soltân fell those of Wazîr, Yenghi Shâbr, Tarsak, and Durûn, with the Turkmâns of Mankishlâk: the posterity of Amûnak had all the other towns, viz. Urjensh, Khayuk, Hazârâsh, Kât, Buldumsaz, Nikijkûta, Borunda, Bâghabâd, Nasay (L), Iburdu (M), Zabarda, and Mabâna, with the Turkmâns who inhabit the countries of Abû'lkhân and Dehestân.

4. Khân, Safian Soltân.

HEREUPON Safian Soltân, eldest son of Amûnak, who succeeded Hassan Kâli Khân, sent to tell those of Abû'lkhân, that, unless they agreed to pay a yearly tribute, he would destroy their habitations. The Turkmâns, voluntarily assessing themselves, sent him the tax, as a free gift: but the Khân, not content with such a precarious contribution, next year dispatched forty men to levy it both in Abû'lkhân and Dehestân. These tax-gatherers having dispersed themselves through the country for that purpose, expecting to meet with no opposition, the Turkmâns took them, and cut all their throats, at the same time. Upon this news Safian Khân, accompanied by his four brothers, marched against them, at the head of his army; and, arriving at the first habitations of them, along the Amû, to the west of Urjensh (N) met, at first, with much resistance; but, at length, the Turkmâns fled to the mountain Dsu (or Ju), three stages north of Abû'lkhân; where, being distressed for want of water, they submitted to pay 40,000 sheep yearly; viz. the tribes of Tâka, Sârik, and Yamut, 8,000; those of Irsari and Khorassân Saluri 16,000 each.

The Turk-mâns submit.

THE other tribes agreed also to pay in the following proportions; Ijki Saluri, 10,000; Hassan 16,000; Ikdâr and Jawdâr, 12,000; Arabâz, 4,000; Koklân, 12,000; Adâkli, 12,000; besides a tenth more, each, for the Khân's kitchen. As for the tribes called Uchil, or the three branches, who dwelt on the Amû, it was stipulated, that Adâklik Hisser-illi would furnish yearly a certain number of soldiers for the Khân's service; while they of Ali-illi and Tiuâzi should pay their contribution in merchandizes.

5. Khân, Buzzûga.

SAFIAN KHAN dying, after a reign of some years, left five sons (O): but his brother Buzzûga Soltân succeeded him. About that time Obeyd Khân (P), who then reigned in Great Bukhâria, took some towns of Karazm, which the Persians before possessed; and his Uzbeks made continual war upon the rest of the towns of that country, which were still under the dominion of the Shâh, carrying away great numbers of captives. On the other side, the Uzbeks of Karazm, who possessed the cities of Iburdu, Nasay, and Durûn, did no less annoy the inhabitants of Khojân and Esferayn (Q), towards the borders of Ghilkûpruk province, Nasay being only one day's journey distant. Shâh Tabmâsh (R), unable to remedy these disorders, because he was at war with the Soltân of Rûm (S), resolved to make an alliance with the Uzbeks. For this end, he dispatched an envoy to Urjensh, to demand a princess in marriage; saying, his master thought it a great honour to wed a lady of the blood of Jenghîz Khân, after the example of Amir Timûr, who, on that occasion, got the name of Kuragân (T).

Peace with Shah Tahmas.

BUZZUGA KHAN, accepting the proposal in favour of his niece Aysba Bika, daughter of Safian Khân, because he had none of his own, sent Agbîsh Soltân, one of his brothers, and nine vassal lords to the Persian court to finish this alliance. The Shâh received that prince with great distinction, and made him a present of the town of Khojân. He sent to Buzzûga Khân ten wedges of gold, and as many of silver, each as large as a tile; with ten fine horses, whose saddles and harness were trimmed with gold. To his spouse he sent nine pieces of cloth of gold, 1,000 pieces of silks, and abundance of magnificent habits; after which she was conducted to the Shâh's court.

6. Khân, Avânâsh.

BUZZUGA KHAN died (U), after he had reigned twenty-seven years, and Avânâsh, his bro-

* ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, p. 234, & seqq.

(L) Or Nesâ, called also Little Damascus.

(M) Also Abiwerd, or Bawêrd.

(N) See before, p. 718.

(O) Viz. 1. Yussif. 2. Yunus. 3. Ali. 4. Agbîsh.

5. Paluânkûli.

(P) He was the son of Mahamed Soltân, brother of Shah Bakht Soltân, who conquered Great Bukhâria, as before related.

(Q) Esferayn lies near the borders of Forjân, in Persia.

(R) Or Tabmâsh. This prince is commonly called Shâh Tahmas I. of Persia.

(S) So the orientals stile the Ottomân emperor, because possessed of the countries formerly subject to the Romans.

(T) Others write Kurkhân, and Gurkhân, which signifies the son-in-law, and relation of the Khân.

(U) Buzzuga Khân left three sons; 1. Dost Mahamed. 2. Isf Mahamed. 3. Buram, otherwise named Isf Dost.

ther

- a ther was proclaimed Khán. His eldest son Dín Mahamed (X), who had an early genius for war, when he was nineteen years old, resolved to make an incursion with forty men towards Atarabid. Passing the south branch of the Amú, at Sidálik Táka, he met, in the defile of Dinár, a man belonging to a lord of Mahamed Gázi Soltán, who resided at Durán, driving nine camels and thirty sheep. Among these he observed a yellow goat, and desired he might have it, for his people's subsistence on the road, promising to make his master amends at his return: but the fellow refusing to gratify his request, he ordered his men to beat him, and take all his drove. After this, Dín Mahamed pursued his journey, and had the wished-for success: but, on his return, was met on a party sent out by Mahamed Gázi, who took all his booty of cattle, and himself prisoner, letting his followers go their way. Being brought before the
- b Soltán, he for a time confined him; and then, having punished him, sent him, under the guard of Risba Khudayberdi and six men, to his father Avánash Khán; with orders to tell this prince, that he had sent him his Tugma (Y), after punishing him for invading the Per-sian territories, without his permission, and stripping some of his people^d.

MAHAMED, impatient to be at liberty, from time to time, made great outcries, that if Dín Mahamed any of his men had stopped on the road, they might come to his assistance. On the other med hand, every time he made a noise, the lord, who conducted him, bawled out Risba, which was his usual word: but Dín Mahamed, believing he made those exclamations with design to insult him, took such offence at it, that it cost Risba his life. One day, when his guards were asleep, in the country of Gordísh, some of his men, who knew his voice, and had followed c him at a distance, coming up, set him at liberty, and cut the throats of his guards; whom they buried out of the way, deep in the sands. On his return, his father, who did not love him, having asked him, how he got out of the scrape? he answered, that Mahamed Gázi was indeed angry with him at first: but was soon reconciled, and sent him back with a present of some horses and habits: which his father believed to be matter of fact.

AFTER this, Dín Mahamed getting two seals engraved, one with his father's cypher, the kills Mahamed other with that of his mother-in-law, who was sister to Mahamed Gázi; he wrote letters to med Gázi, him in both their names, informing him, that she was very sick, and earnestly desired to see him. Her brother immediately set forward; and arriving in an evening, when the Khán was out a hawking, went directly to his sister's apartment. As he perceived her to be very d well, and she told him she had sent no letter, he began to suspect some treachery, and left her that instant, with design to take horse again: but, hearing much noise in the street, which faced the castle, he made to the Khán's stables, thinking to escape by a back-door that opened into a by-lane; which being full of people, he hid himself in a heap of dung that lay in a corner.

DIN MAHAMED, who had seen Mahamed Gázi go up to his sister's apartment, followed Ali Soltán with some of his forty men: but, not finding him there, he went, by the direction of some slain women slaves, towards the stables; where, after much search, one of them perceived a bit of his scarlet robe sticking out of the dung; on which he went and told Dín Mahamed, who came and slew him on the spot. Upon this alarm, one of Mahamed Gázi's men ran to Wázir, to e inform his brother Soltán Gázi; who, in the first transports of rage, slew Ali Soltán (son of Safian Khán), his wife's brother, who unfortunately was just then come to visit her. When Avánash Khán returned from hunting, and was made acquainted with the murder committed by Dín Mahamed, who had made his escape, he assembled his council, to deliberate what was to be done upon so extraordinary an occasion: but they were scarce come to a resolution in the affair, when a courier arrived with the news of the murder of Ali Soltán; which threw them into farther confusion^e.

MEAN time the Khán's nephews, who were all of Amúnak's posterity, being informed of Burga what had happened at Urjensh and Wázir, foresaw that it would occasion a civil war: and Soltán's posterity therefore repaired to Urjensh: from whence, on the other hand, Mahamed Gázi's people re-^{nity} tired to Wázir. Avánash Khán, for his part, had no inclination to a war; but his nephews, in some measure, forced him to raise an army, and march towards that city. On this advice, Soltán Gázi sent to the descendants of Bilbárs Soltán, at Yenghi Sháhr: but, without staying for them, advanced with what troops he had, to meet the Khán, as far as the province of Komkint, which lies to the west of Wázir. He was chagrined, on ranging his troops, to find that there were not men enough to make a front equal to that of the enemy; but more, to hear a soldier, by way of mockery, for he was not beloved, say, "that he might supply

" the defect with his horses and cows; of which, till then, he had made more account than of

" his warriors." In short, the two armies coming to an engagement, he was there killed, with forced out of Karazm;

^d ARU'LEH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 238, & seqq.^e Ibid. p. 247, & seqq.(X) He had two other sons, Mahmúd and Ali.(Y) Tugma is a word of reproach, and signifies Basard.

fifteen princes descended from Ilbârs Khân. His sons, Omar Gâzi Soltân and Sbîr Gâzi Soltân, and two daughters, falling into the hands of Akkatay Soltân, brother of the Khân, he sent them into Great Bukhâria. a

THE other princes, who made haste to join Soltân Ghâzi, hearing of this disaster, fled also into Great Bukhâria, not daring to return to Yenghi Shâbr. After which, the descendants of Amûnak put to death all the posterity of Burga Soltân who fell into their hands; excepting the women, whom they kept as captives. Thus was the race of Ilbârs, once so numerous, almost extinguished; at least, none of them were to be found in Karazm. After so great a revolution, the country was divided among the descendants of Amûnak; and Dîn Mahamed Soltân had for his share the city of Durûn.

MEAN time Omar Gâzi Soltân, son of Soltân Gâzi, arriving in Great Bukhâria, put himself b in the service of Obeyd Khân (Y); and, although no more than sixteen years old, signalized himself on several occasions. He bestirred himself so effectually in his own behalf, that the Khân, in conjunction with Juanmart, Khân of Samarkant, Barak, Khân of Tâshkunt, and the prince of Hissâr, entered Karazm with their united forces. On the news of their approach, the princes possessed of Kbayuk, Hazârâsb, and other neighbouring towns, repaired, with their troops, to join Avânash Khân: but he, not daring to wait the enemy's coming, retired into the deserts. The confederates, arriving at Urjensh, detached some troops after the fugitive princes: who being taken, Obeyd Khân made a division of them; and, as Avânash Khân fell to Omâr Gâzi's share, he instantly put him to death. The Khân gave Urjensh to his son Abdo'lazîz Soltân, and one of the four Uzbek tribes who dwelt in Karazm, to each of the four c invading powers; who, after appointing their intendants over them, returned to their own dominions.

WHEN Avânash Khân was made prisoner, his two sons, Mabmûd and Ali, took refuge with Dîn Mahamed Soltân, their eldest brother, at Durûn; whither also fled Yusef and Yunus, two sons of Safian Khân, with other princes, and young men of quality. But Kâbl Soltân and Akkatay Soltân, brothers of the Khân, were carried into Great Bukhâria, with all the children of the latter, excepting Hajim Soltân: who, being at that time eighteen years of age, put on a mean garb, and retired to an old domestic of his father's, whose horses he kept, as if one of his slaves; till, the affair taking wind, his protector, for both their safeties, conveyed him to Durûn. d

NOT long after this, Dîn Mahamed, accompanied by all the refugee princes, set out for Urjensh, with 2000 men, whom he reinforced in the province of Gordish by 1000 Turkmâns: but it appearing, when they came to the country of Pishga, that their forces were too few to attack the city, and besides wanting boats to pass the Amû, they bent their course towards Kbayuk: because on that side there was no need of boats, and they had hopes of getting thither undiscovered, as but few people dwelt on that road. Being arrived, they took the city, without much difficulty; and put to death the commander, with some of his garrison. Upon this news, the governor of Hazârâsb repaired to Urjensh; and Abdo'lazîz Soltân, fearing to fall into Dîn Mahamed's hands, retired into Great Bukhâria. Obeyd Khân, on his son's return, immediately raised a numerous army, and marched towards Urjensh; but, arriving at the Karamit Turkmâns, stopped there, with part of his forces, and sent forty thousand men, under two generals, to that city. d

ON the first advice of the enemy's march, Dîn Mahamed Soltân left Kbayuk, with design to meet them: but as his forces did not exceed 10,000 men, the princes and lords, who accompanied him, advised him to return to Durûn; alleging, that as soon as Obeyd Khân, who came only to secure Urgbenj, perceived they were retreated, he would retire also; and that then they might turn back, without noise, and take the city. But Dîn Mahamed persisting in his resolution to give the enemy battle, 220 of his principal officers alighted; and, falling at his feet, intreated him to return. Having renewed their supplication in this manner three times, he at last fell in a passion, and flung himself off his horse also: then taking up a handful of dust, scattered it on his head, and cried out, "I devote myself to God, and my body to the earth." After this, turning to the lords who surrounded him, he said, "I consider myself as a dead man; and if you esteem your lives more precious than mine, you are at liberty to return: but if you will share with me the glory that attends us, let us march." Hereupon, remounting his horse, he continued his march; and all his army followed, shedding tears. f

MEAN time Dîn Mahamed being informed, that the enemy had in the night passed by Hazârâsb, and would be upon his back the next day, he halted in the evening at a pond, since

^f ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, p. 251, & seqq.

(Y) He was nephew to Shâh Bakht Soltân, and son of a grandson of Atâlgabâr Khân; which last is the common ancestor of the Uzbek princes settled in Great Bukhâria.

^a called Shikast Kâli, in the province of Jardankhast. He ranged his troops on the west side of the pond, which was then dried up; and having had notice before day, by his scouts, of the enemy's approach, first sent his brother Ali Soltân, who was but eight years old, with six trusty men, a little aside from the field of battle (to the end that, if he lost the victory, there might remain at least one sprig of their family); then divided his forces into two bodies; one commanded by himself, the other by Yusef Soltân, eldest son of Safian Khân: these he posted on both sides of the road, and waited with profound silence. The Bukhârian army soon appeared, having at their head most of their commanders, with four torches to light them; whom Dîn Mahamed let pass, and then fell suddenly on the troops which followed; charging them so briskly, that they were soon broken, and obliged to fly, notwithstanding their great superiority.^b

^b TOGAY BAHADR, one of the chiefs of the Kunkurats, and the Soltân's vassal, killed sixty An Uzbek men in the battle with his own hand. Dîn Mahamed had advanced so far among the enemy, champion. that the bow fell from his side unknown to him; which Hajim Soltân (Z), who accompanied him, having recovered, "Brother," said Dîn Mahamed; "that which you have done to-day for me, shall be the knot of an everlasting friendship between us." He was then twenty-eight years of age, and Hajim Soltân eighteen. This victory was complete; for, besides the soldiers slain and taken, most of the principal officers of the enemy fell into the victor's hands; which enabled him to recover the captive princes of his family, by an exchange of prisoners. For ^{Hej. 949:} this purpose, the persons of distinction were suffered to go, on their parole, into Great Buk- ^{A. D. 1542.} hâria, accompanied by Hajim Soltân; who executed his commission so well, that, in 949, he brought back his father Akattay Soltân, Kalil Soltân, and the other princes, whom the confederate Khân had some time before carried into that country.

^c AFTER the battle, Dîn Mahamed ordered the prisoners to be brought before him; and there being among them Hafis, one of the principal lords of Obeyd Khân's court, he demanded on what account he had told his master, that the inhabitants of Urgenjb were not true believers, but of a different faith from the Mussulmâns. The lord, alarmed at this question, fell at his feet, and made answer, "It is at this juncture, that I shall find whether you are true Mussulmâns, or whether you be of a different religion." Meaning, that if they were of the same religion with him, they would pardon him. To this answer Dîn Mahamed Soltân made no reply; in regard that report, concerning the people of Urgenjb, was not ill-grounded, as they had discovered an inclination for the religion of the Persians.

2. From the revolution under Avânish Khân, till Karazm was seized by Obeyd Khân, of Great Bukhâria.

THE descendants of Amûnak, having thus recovered their possessions in Karazm, by the 7. Khân ^{Kâhl.} valour of Dîn Mahamed Soltân, they conferred the dignity of Khân on Kâbl Soltân; who fixed his seat at Urgenjb. Akattay Soltân had Wazîr; Hajim Soltân, his son, Bâghabâd; the descendants of Soltân Khân (A), had Khayuk; the sons of Buzzûga Khân, Hazârâsb; and Dîn Mahamed Soltân, and his brother, the cities of Durûn, Yawsurdî, and Nasay (or Nesâ).

^c AKATTAY, who succeeded his brother in the dignity of Khân, gave Kât to Sheykh Mahamed, and Shâh Nazer, two sons of Kâbl Khân; Urgenjb, with its dependants, to Ali Soltân, ^{8. Khân} Akattay, the youngest son of Avânish Khân; continuing himself to reside at Wazîr: but he did not long enjoy the sovereignty; which happened on the following occasion. Yunus Soltân, son of Safian Khân, a prince of much ambition and courage, who had married the daughter of a Biyawl of the Mankats, departed one day from Kayuk, with forty chosen men; under pretence of going to pay a visit to his father-in-law, who dwelt near Urgenjb. Having passed Kât, and arrived at Tûk, which he knew then to be empty (all the inhabitants, both of the town and country, being gone towards Urgenjb and Wazîr), he got upon a tower, from whence he could see Urgenjb; and expressing a desire to be there, as being his native place, his men told him, they were ready to follow him where-ever he pleased.^a

^f BEING arrived about midnight at the south gate of the city, they put their horses apart, and entered the ditch on foot; where they lay hid, till the guards, with their torches, had passed Urgenjb by. Then, by the help of a long pole reared against the wall, they all mounted; and, going directly to the house of Mahmûd Soltân (left governor by his brother Ali, who went to live at Nasay), seized and sent him to Wazîr, to the custody of Akattay Khân; whose daughter he had married. Mahmûd, who was a very wicked man, never ceased to importune the Khân to go

^a ABU'LGHAZI KHAN, Hist. Turks, &c. p. 255, & seqq. ^b Ibid. p. 259, & seqq.

(Z) Jenkinson, in his voyage to Bogar, writes Azim.
(A) These were Yunus and Paluânkâli, the two sons of Safian Khân then living. The other three were dead; Ali Soltân killed by order of Soltân Gâzi, as before related; Aghish Soltân died at Khojân, in Khorassân; and Yusef, the eldest, by loss of blood, after venesection; the vein opening in the night.

and reduce Urjensh, till he had consented; especially considering that Yunus had only forty a men, and it was not likely the Uzbeks of that city would assist him against their sovereign: but being advanced near that place, he found Yunus with a good body of troops expecting him; and, coming to a battle, was put to flight.

the Khân
taken;

and cruelly murdered.

9. Khân
Yunus.

Hejrah 956.
A. D. 1539.

Another revolution.

10. Khân Dîn Mahamed;

his great resolution;

KASSEM, son of Yunus, by the daughter of the Khân, undertook to pursue him, crying out, "Grandfather, whither would you go in this hot weather? You had better rest yourself to-day under some tree, and early to-morrow-morning continue your journey." But Akattay Khân's answer was, "Your father has a heart as black as a pot: but if your intentions towards me be good, leave me to continue my road, and do me no harm". Kassem, finding that fair means would not do, made use of foul, and forced him to go with him to Urjensh. Upon this news, all the Uzbeks about Urjensh, having assembled tumultuously, acknowledged Yunus b for their Khân, without consulting the other princes. A few days after, Yunus Khân sent to tell the four sons (B) of Akattay Khân, who lived at Wazîr, "that, although they had no "desire to take their father, yet they were obliged to convey him home with them, as they "found him quite spent with the cholic; which still violently afflicted him." Presently after, he sent four men to the house, which served for the Khân's prison, with orders to bind his hands and feet, and then impale him alive; taking care that no marks of a violent death should be found on his body. As soon as the fact was perpetrated, he sent the corpse to Wazîr, with many compliments of condolence to the Khân's sons; who he supposed would conclude that their father died of the cholic.

As soon as the princes, who were at Wazîr, heard the news of their father's murder, they c sent to their elder brothers (C), who resided at Bâghabâd, which depended on Khorassân, to join with them in revenging such an atrocious crime. The brothers accordingly joined their forces, and went forward towards Urjensh: but when Yunus was informed, that they had passed the Amû, not daring to wait for them, he fled into Great Bukhâria, with his brother, and the sons of Kâhl Khân. On the road most of his people abandoned him; and his son Kassem lost his way, accompanied only by one man; who, under pretence to get victuals for them, went to Urjensh, and betrayed him to Hajim Soltân. This prince immediately sent persons to fetch him from the pond, from that time called Khân Zungali (where he lay hid among the d reeds), and caused him instantly to be put to death. Which revolution happened in the

THE descendants of Safian Khân and Kâhl Khân having being thus entirely stripped of all they enjoyed in Karazm, the children of Avânish Khân continued in possession of Durîn (+) and Yawrsurdi; which depended on Khorassân. The sons of Akattay Khân held Urjensh and Wazîr; and Bûzzûga Khân's three sons, Isb, Dost, and Burum, became masters of Kbayuk, Hazârasb, and Kât. After which, they conferred the dignity of Khân on Dîn Mahamed Soltân i.

THIS prince, who could not sit idle, began to invade Khorassân; which obliged Shâh Tabmasb to send an army thither; who took from him Yawrsurdi. As soon as the Persian troops were retired, the Khân posted to Kazwîn, where the Shâh resided, and prayed him to restore that city: but Tabmasb being deaf to his intreaties, he got the royal seal counterfeited, and c then wrote a letter in the Shâh's name to the governor of Yawrsurdi, ordering him to deliver it up to Dîn Mahamed Khân, and come himself to court. A few days after, while Shâh Tabmasb was hunting, he slipped from the company, with his followers; and, hastening to Yawrsurdi, delivered the letter to the governor: who, readily obeying the supposed command, surrendered up the town to him, and departed for Kazwîn. As soon as his back was turned, Dîn Mahamed ordered the gates to be shut, and all the Persians in the place to be put to the sword.

AT this news, Shâh Tabmasb set out with a considerable army to take revenge for the deceit: but when he came to the little river Kara Sû, near Masbâd (D), he was informed that the Khân was arrived in the camp, with a retinue of fifty horse. This account appeared so ridiculous to him, that he would not believe it, till they brought him word, that the prince was at his tent-door. Dîn Mahamed Khân, entering at the same time, fell on his knees before the Shâh; who was so surprised at his extraordinary boldness, that, not content with putting his right hand on the Khân's left shoulder, he thrust his left into that prince's bosom, to try if his heart did not beat: but, perceiving no motion there more than what is usual, he could not avoid admiring the intrepidity of his suppliant. On this account, he pardoned him all that was past; and, having feasted him magnificently, sent him home next day, laden with rich presents; conducting him in person to some distance from the camp. f i ABU'GH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 253, & seqq.

(B) These were Falât, Timâr, Alla Kûli, and Soleyman.

(C) Hajim and Mahmûd.

(D) Written Daraîn.

(D) A name given to Tû, in Khorassân, on account of the sepulchre of Imâm Riza, who is reckoned a martyr. The river Kara Sû runs to the west of it.

a SOME time after this, Obeyd Khân, of Great Bukhâria, gave the command of it to Yulum Bey, a chief of the Naymâns: but the Khân growing jealous of him, through the suggestions of envious people, sent for him to court. As Yulum Bey was not over-hasty to obey these orders, Obeyd Khân, concluding that he designed to revolt, sent an army of 30,000 men against him. Yulum Bey, now put to his last shifts, had recourse for succour to Dîn Mahamed Khân; who set forward immediately with his troops: but, as they were only a few, he ordered every man to cut down three small trees; and, fixing one on each side of his horse, tie the third to his tail; which left marks on the soft and marshy ground, as if a great army had passed that way. The Bukhârian generals, being informed that the Khân was coming to Yulum Bey's assistance, sent out their spies; who, observing the marks along the road, brought word, that he was advancing with very numerous forces. Upon this the generals, not thinking it safe to wait his coming, retreated as fast as they could, without seeing the enemy: and Dîn Mahamed Khân, having taken possession of Marû, fixed his residence for life in that city; where he died in the year 960, called, by the Mungls, Sighir, or the Cow, at the age of forty *.

Hej. 960.
A. D. 1552.
Abâl Soltân.

THIS prince, besides the other heroic virtues which he possessed in a high degree, was extremely generous, gracious, and eloquent: he had withal a peculiar brightness of wit. And here it may not be amiss, before we proceed to the next Khân, to relate what became of his sons, and the other descendants of Avânash Khân. Dîn Mahamed Khân left behind him two sons; the eldest called Saganda Mahamed: but, because he was not in his right senses, his brother, Abâl Soltân, succeeded in all his father's dominions; and reigned with wisdom for several years. At length he made an irruption, with great forces, into Khorassân; and, arriving at Mashbâd, detached his only son, with most of his army, to penetrate deeper into the country: but having advanced as far as the river Kara Sû, to the west of that city, he was met by a great army of Persians; and lost the battle, with his life: ten thousand men being slain besides. The news of this misfortune so grievously afflicted his father, that he fell dangerously ill, beyond the help of physic. On this occasion, a woman of Marû produced a boy, four years old, which she said she had by the Soltân; who, having sent for her one night to play on the harp, took a fancy to lie with her. Hereupon one of his physicians, esteemed the most skilful in the country, ordered both the Soltân and the child to be undressed. Then laying the boy on the belly of the dying prince, had a coverlet thrown over them, and began to cry out with all his force, Soltân, behold a son of yours! As he continued to do this three times a day, the Soltân, by degrees, recovered his former health; after which he owned the child for his son, and called him Nûr Mahamed.

ABU'L SOLTÂN dying, Nûr Mahamed succeeded him in all his dominions: but some years after, the princes of the house of Hajîm Khân united against him, under pretence that they would not have the son of a strumpet for their brother. Nûr Mahamed, finding himself unable to resist them, sued for protection to Obeyd Khân, and delivered up his four cities of Marû, Nasay, Tawrsurdi, and Durûn; imagining, that the Khân would leave him in possession, and be content with receiving tribute: but, finding himself deceived in his expectation, he quitted Great Bukhâria in discontent, and repaired to Urjensh; where he was well received by his late enemies, and lived five years with them. At length, Obeyd Khân dying, Nûr Mahamed set out to recover his four cities; in which expedition having succeeded, he put to the sword all the Uzbeks whom he found in those places; settling the Sarts and Turkmâns in their room. But Shâh Abbâs Mazi, of Persia (E), willing also to profit by the death of Obeyd Khân, came in person to besiege Marû, with a powerful army; and took it in forty days, with Nûr Mahamed, who had shut himself up there. After this, he took the three other cities, without any trouble, and sent the captive prince to Shîrâz; where, with him, ended the posterity of Dîn Mahamed Khân, eldest son of Avânash Khân.

f THE second son of this last Khân was Mahmûd, surnamed Sâri Mahmûd; that is, Yellow Sâri Mahmûd, from his complexion. For all the other descendants of Amûnak were of a fine brown. This prince was addicted to all sorts of vices. He loved liquor so well, that, being one day at a house drinking Brûga, and some-body coming to tell him the enemy's troops were near, while all the rest ran to their horses, he, with a great deal of unconcern, took a knife and marked all the pots which had Brûga in them, bidding the host take care of them till his return. This shewed, that his excessive debaucheries had impaired his senses; and indeed he died soon after without leaving children¹.

ALI SOLTÂN, the youngest of Avânash Khân's sons, possessed at several times the cities of Ali Soltân; Nasay, Tawrsurdi, Urjensh, Hazârâ, and Kât. He used every spring to cross the Amû, * ABU'GH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 271, & seq.

¹ Ibid. p. 274, & seq.

(E.) This should be Shah Tamash the first.

and encamp towards the borders of Khorassân: from whence he sent parties to plunder the Persians and in autumn returned to Urjensh. He mustered all the Usbeks in his service every year; and gave each for his pay sixteen sheep, out of those which he received by way of contribution from the Turkmâns: and, when they fell short, he supplied the defect by the booty-sheep taken from the Persians. Shâh Tabmâsh, on complaints made of these ravages, at length sent Bâdr Khân (F), with 12,000 men, in quest of Ali Soltân. This prince, according to custom, had entered the country of Astarabâd, with 3000 men, to oblige the Turkmân tribe of Oklikoklân to pay him contribution; which Bâdr Khân being informed of at Bastâm, he turned that way. At first, Ali Soltân was a little startled at this news; but, considering that it was dangerous to retreat in the face of an enemy, went and possessed himself of the Kurgân. This river was very difficult to pass, being rapid as well as deep, and the banks extremely high; excepting in a few places, where it is fordable. Our author, who had often passed it, found the height of them, in many parts, above two cubits. He caused the horses and cattle to be tied behind; and employed the waggons to cover the front of his troops.

defeats the Persians;

In this posture he was attacked several times by the Persians; but, as they had only cavalry, they could gain no advantage. Hereupon Aba Beg, a Turkmân chief, impatient to see the fight continue so long, sallied out with 300 men of the tribe of Okli, in order to charge the enemy behind, while Ali Soltân attacked them in front. When he was gone, some of the principal Usbek commanders said it was wrong to let him go; because it was probable he would join the enemy. Ali Soltân bad them have patience; saying, "if they are gone to join the Persians, I trust that God will deliver us from this danger, and perhaps the enemy may have need of such a reinforcement." But Aba Beg, while they were speaking so much to his disadvantage, had already begun the fight: so that, having been vigorously attacked three times by the Persians, he must have been oppressed by their numbers, if Ali Soltân had not in time issued out of his intrenchment, and charged them in front, with such success, that they fell into disorder, and took to flight, after the greater part of them had been slain. The Soltân pursued till far in the night; so that Bâdr Khân had much ado to escape, with a few of his men. So great a number of horses were taken, that Ali Soltân having made his esquire a present of every ninth, they amounted to 700; not reckoning what fell in division to the officers and soldiers.

death and
character.

Hej. 979.
A. D. 1571.

FIFTEEN years after this, Ali Soltân, having in one of his expeditions advanced as far as the Zengbel, or Desart, to the south of Kbojân, fell ill of a contagious ulcer, which broke out between his shoulders. As he would let no body see it, through bashfulness, the chiefs were obliged to use force, and cut the clothes over the part affected, in order to come at it. Yet, for all the care they took to get him cured, he died of that distemper, in the year 979 (G), at the age of forty. Ali Soltân was a prince of so much merit, that his cousin Hajim Khân often said of him, that he had not his equal among the descendants of Tadigar Khân, in bravery and liberality, sincerity, modesty, and, above all, the art of reigning. As in all his life he had never suffered any either to see or touch his naked body, so he would not, when dying, suffer a domestic to feel whether his legs began to grow cold. He did speedy justice to those who demanded it. In one of his expeditions, he hanged a man for taking two Arbuscs (or melons) out of a field. He left two sons; Iskander, who died the same year, and Sanjer, who, being disturbed in his senses, reigned ten years at Nasay, under the conduct of a Nayman lord^m. Thus much concerning the family of Avânash Khân.

11. Khan
Dost Soltân.

AFTER the death of Dîn Mahamed Khân, the Usbek princes chose Dost Soltân, second son of Buzzûga Khân, to succeed him at Kayuk, rather than Isb Soltân, the eldest brother; because, although courageous and generous, he was neither so wise nor moderate. He was likewise suspected as to his orthodoxy in religion. Isb, who took this very ill, applied to his brother for assistance to reduce Urjensh: but, arriving with his forces in the territory of Zilpuk (or Jilpuk), which belongs to the country of Kumkant, he found Hajim Soltân in the field ready to fight him, with a much superior army. Hereupon, securing his men behind with a small river, and with his chariots in front, Hajim, after an attack of eight days continuance, was obliged to come to an accommodation. Some years after, Isb Soltân, having formed a new design against Urjensh, Hajim met him between that city and Tûk; where Isb covered himself as before, with his chariots; and, having fought eight days against superior forces, marched out of his intrenchments silently in the night, and surprised Urjensh, to the great astonishment of Hajim Soltân. As soon as he saw himself master of the place, he ordered all the Vigûrs and

^m ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 279, & seqq.

(F) The Persians, after the extinction of the descendants of Timûr Bek in Persia, by way of hatred, or contempt, gave the title of Khan to their military officers, and governors of cities.

(G) Called Sighir, or the Cony, by the Mungls.

- a Naymáns to retire to Wazír, without any of their effects ; but let those of other tribes, who were settled there, remain in peace.

AFTER this, each party having endeavoured to secure Ali Soltán, who resided at Nasay, in his interest, that prince declared in favour of Hajím Soltán, whom he joined, accompanied by Abú'l Soltán, son of Dín Mahamed Khán, and besieged Urjensh. Ish Soltán defended himself well at first : but the besiegers at length giving a general assault, while he was riding about from post to post, where his presence was necessary, a Durmán, whose sister he had ravished, wounded his horse in the flank with an arrow. The beast hereupon capered, and threw the Soltán so violently, that he broke one of his legs ; and the enemy, who had scaled the walls in the interim, coming up, slew him, and a Sart, who was endeavouring to remount him.

- b After this, the confederates took Kayuk, and put to death Dost Khán, brother of Ish Soltán, whose two sons were sent into Great Bukhária ; where dying without issue, the race of Buz-zúga Khán became wholly extinct. This revolution happened in the year 965, called Gbilki, or the horse.

Hej. 965.
A. D. 1557.

THE same year Hajím Soltán, being then 35 years of age (H), was declared Khán, and went to reside at Wazír. As, of all the posterity of Amúnak, there were left only the children of Avânish Khán and Akattay Khán, they gave the cities of Urjensh, Hazárasb, and Kát, to Ali Soltán, youngest son of the former. Of the four remaining sons of Akattay Khán, Mahmúd Soltán lived with his brother Hajím Khán : Pulád and Timúr had Khayuk between them, with two Usbek tribes, for their share ^a.

12. Khán Hajím Soltán.

- c THESE two brothers were both weak of understanding : but Timúr Soltán knew best how to behave himself of the two ; and joined to a solid conduct, in affairs of government, much bravery on warlike occasions. This prince never went to eat at the house of any person : inso-much that one time, going from Hazárasb, where he usually resided, to see his brother Pulád at Khayuk, he refused the invitation of a Vigúr lord, who had the administration of that Soltán's affairs, on account of his indisposition. The reason of his being so reserved was this. One day, when about 15 years of age, while he took a ride for the air, he was invited in by a countryman who killed a sheep to treat him ; and, at his going away, presented him with a gigot of it. At his return, he went to offer it to his father ; but Akattay Khán, offended on the occasion, reproved him, saying, " that he was 50 years old, and had never put any one d " to such an expence ; that, if the peasants were obliged to kill sheep to treat him when he was " young, they must kill horses and cows for him when he grew up ; and that, as his vassals " would follow his example, his poor subjects would soon be reduced to beggary." This said, he ordered him to be stripped, and gave him 30 lashes with a rod, laying on so hard, that young Timúr's shirt was all bloody. His brother Hajím, meeting him as he came forth, approved of what his father had done : but advised him to appear next day in that bloody condition before Akattay Khán ; who, repenting of his severity, after exhorting him not to do the like again, made him a present of the Türkman tribe of Ti-u-ázi, consisting of 6000 families. Here-upon Timúr Soltán made an oath never to go to eat with any body whomsoever, nor suffer any of his people to do so. This prince was very pious, and loved virtuous people : he had e withal so excellent a memory, that although he could neither write nor read, yet he kept an exact account of his revenue.

Story of Timúr Soltán.

- ON the death of Ali Soltán, Hajím Khán went to reside at Urjensh ; his brother, Mahmúd Soltán, continued at Wazír ; Pulád had Khayuk ; and Timúr, Hazárasb and Kát. Some years after, while Hajím Khán was invading Khorassán, Abdo'llah, Khán of Great Bukhária, came with an army to besiege Urjensh ; but, after losing many soldiers, was obliged to retire into the province of Tenghi Arik ; where he waited to secure the places, which he possessed on that side, till more forces arrived : but, hearing that Hajím Khán was returned with a great army to fight him, he thought fit to make peace with Pulád and Timúr, who were at Khayuk, and retired to his own dominions. Some time after this, the Soltán Khalifah of Rúm (I) sent f an ambassador to Abdo'llah Khán, to engage him to attack the empire of Sheykh Oglí (K) on one side, while he attacked him vigorously on the other. Pialasba, who had spent three years in the voyage, going by way of the Indies, was desirous to return through Karazm, and cross the sea of Mazánderán (L) to Shírván, then subject to his master ; that so he might get to Turkish exposed.

^a ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 267, & seq.

(H) He was born, Hejrah 930, A. D. 1523.

(I) That is, the grand signor, or emperor of the Turks ; who, since the suppression of the Khalifah of Egypt, the last of whom was carried to Constantinople by Soltán Selím, in 1516, is qualified by the Mohammedan princes of the Senni sect, with the title of Khalifah, and assumes it himself.

(K) That is, of the sons of the Sheykh ; meaning Ismael Sofi (founder of the race of Sháhs), so called by way of contempt.

(L) So the Caspian sea is called from that province, which lies upon it. It is named also from other countries situate along its shore.

Istâmbûl (M) in four months. But when he came to Urjensh, Mahamed and Ibrâhîm, the two youngest sons of Hajîm Khân, stripped him of all his equipage, and then sent him to Mankish-lâk; where some merchants happening to be on their return to Shîrwân, they carried him over in their barks to that province.

and merchants plundered.

To this first cause of complaint there was joined another. They of Great Bukhâria, who performed the pilgrimage to Mekka, in times of peace, always passed through Karazm, and the dominions of the Shâh: but, in time of war, were obliged to go far about by the Indies. It happened that some merchants, relying on the peace, took their route through Karazm: but, arriving at Khayuk, were stripped to their very shirts by Bâba Soltân, son of Pulâd Soltân, and sent home again on foot. These people, at their return, going to complain to Abdo'llah Khân, he told them that he could do nothing in the affair; for that Bâba Soltân was as much sovereign at Khayuk, as himself could be in Great Bukhâria. Hereupon Hâjî Kutas, head of the Karawân, made answer, "that he would be his accuser before the throne of God, in case he suffered to go unpunished an outrage done to the deity himself, in the persons of those who went to offer up their prayers to him in his holy house."

Abdo'llah
Khân

This bold remonstrance, joined to a desire of revenge for the loss of the four towns taken from Nûr Mahamed, which by their means he recovered, determined Abdo'llah Khân to renew his design of conquering Karazm, and make war on Hajîm Khân. The news of his preparations divided the Uzbeks of Karazm into two parties. One was for making a vigorous defence, the other for submitting so soon as the enemy approached Urjensh; on a persuasion that they should be well treated and employed by him, even though he should carry them into Great Bukhâria. Hajîm Khân, finding by this that he could not depend on his subjects, left his sons, Mahamed and Ibrâhîm, at Urjensh, and returned to Durûn, with his eldest son Siunj Mahamed Soltân.

invades Ka-
razm;

MEAN time, Abdo'llah Khân advancing with his army, Mahamed, son of Timûr Soltân, marched with his Uzbeks from Hazârâsh to Khayuk; designing to make this place the rendezvous of their troops, as his father had done in the former war, and by that means baffled the designs of Abdo'llah Khân. But finding, at his arrival, that Pulâd Soltân resolved to quit the town, and retire to Wazîr, they all set out together at day-break, with a large train of men and chariots (or waggons); which took up so much time, that at noon, just as the troops passed out of the city on one side, those of Khojâm Kûli, one of the enemy's generals, entered at the opposite gate; and next day, pursuing the confederate princes with 3000 horse, on a great trot, overtook them at the borough of Almatish Khân; for they had not continued their march till the same morning. At Khojâm Khân's approach, they covered themselves with their chariots: but the general, having forced that barricade, after a vigorous resistance, put them to the rout. However, as he lost many men in the action, he did not follow the princes, who went forward in great confusion to Wazîr.

insnares the princes

WHEN they arrived, they resolved to make proposals of peace; and drove from the city Bâba Soltân, who had been the occasion of this unfortunate war. Hereupon Pulâd Soltân, finding that he could not hinder their design, retired with his two other sons to Hajîm Khân, at Durûn; while Mahamed and Ibrâhîm, the Khân's sons, repaired to Wazîr to join the confederates; where Ali Soltân, son of Mahmûd Soltân, had the chief command. Mean time, Abdo'llah Khân, appearing before that city, besieged it in form: but finding, after two months leaguer, that it would be difficult to come off with honour in the enterprise, he had recourse to craft. He sent to tell the confederate princes, that since they had thrust out Bâba Soltân, whom he had chief cause to complain of, they might depend on being received by him as his allies and relations. The princes, deluded by these fair promises, entered into a capitulation to swear in his name, not to meddle with either their persons or effects; and that he had no evil intention against them.

by a treaty:

AFTER the five lords had taken the oath, the common people (who were against the princes trusting to so weak security) desired that they might be arrested, and held in custody, till such time as Abdo'llah Khân should raise the siege, and begin his march. But Ali Soltân, who had the chief sway in the city, which belonged to the children of Mahmûd Soltân, and, though little and crooked, was a great wit, strenuously opposed this motion; alleging, "that, being the Khân's near relations, they had nothing to fear from him: that, in case he should carry them into Great Bukhâria, he would settle them more advantageously than they were situated in Karazm: nay he was persuaded, that Abdo'llah, far from any evil intentions against them, would, on the first application, leave them in possession of Urjensh and Wazîr." These reasons being approved of by all the men of distinction, the people were • ABU'LG. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 285, & seq.

• Ibid. p. 292, & seq.

(M) That is, Constantinople; of which it is a corruption, or contraction.

a obliged to acquiesce; and the Bukhârian lords, accompanied with the princes, left the city to return to their master's camp. As soon as they arrived there, Abdo'llah Khân, having put them under a guard, and divided their soldiers into troops of ten or twelve men, one of whom was to be responsible for the rest, he sent them all prisoners into Great Bukhâria; whither he followed with his army, after he had put governors into all the cities of Karazm; which thus fell into his hands.

3. From the invasion of Obeyd Khân to the parricide of Arap Mahamed Khân.

A MONTH after this event, Hajim Khân, and the ten princes of his house who were with him at Durûn, resolved to retire into Irâk to Shâh Abbâs Mazi; on which Pulâd Soltân, third son of Akatay Khân, thinking it would be very unbecoming of him, who was near 70 years old, to seek a sanctuary among people of a different religion, chose rather to repair to Abdo'llah Khân, on a presumption that he would pity his condition, and give him a subsistence. But he found himself fatally deceived: for that prince, on his return to Bukhâria, caused him, and all the other descendants of Amûnak, being twelve in number, who had fallen into his hands, to be put to death the same day, in the town of Sâgraj. After this, he laid a yearly tax of a Tanga a head on all the other prisoners above the age of ten; which constrained many to sell their children, in order to raise wherewithal to pay the poll-money. Mean while Hajim Khân set out for Durûn, with the princes, accompanied by 3000 horse: but they deserted so fast on the road, that he arrived with a train of no more than 150 at the court of Shâh Abbâs; who came in person to receive him, and gave him the best treatment imaginable: but Siunj Mahamed Soltân, and his son, went forward to the Soltân Khalifah of Rûm. This happened in the year called Yilân, or the Serpent.

Two years after, in that named Koy, or the Sheep, the same in which a comet appeared (N), Abdo'llah Khân sent before him his son Abdo'l-momîn Soltân, with part of his army, to besiege Esfarayn, in Khorassân. As soon as the Shâh received advice of this, he left Kazwîn, with his forces, accompanied by Hajim Khân, and the other Usbek princes; who, having learned when they came to Bastâm, that there were no more than 60 of the enemy at Khayuk, and 40 at Urgheñj, judged this a proper time to recover those places: but as, for the more secrecy, the attempt was to be made without the Shâh's knowledge, Hajim Khân and some others declined it, for fear their sudden departure should give offence to that monarch; so that none engaged in the enterprise, excepting Arap Mahamed, and Mahamed Kûli, two of Hajim's sons, and the three sons of Pulâd Soltân. These princes took horse late one evening, and, riding all night, arrived at the Turkmân tribe of Amîr; and from thence by noon at Astarabâd (O). Next morning, Hajim Khân having acquainted Abbâs with their design, the Shâh, who knew the activity of Abdo'llah Khân, and the improbability of recovering their possessions, during that prince's life, advised him to ride after them immediately, and bring them back. Hajim overtook them at Astarabâd: but, instead of bringing them back, they prevailed on him to continue with them, till he saw what success they were likely to have; the Turkmâns having promised them a powerful assistance^a.

DEPARTING therefore altogether from Astarabâd, they went towards the mountain of Kurân; Hajim Khân where the tribes of Tûka and Yâmut lent them 500 men. Then crossing the territory of Man-kishlik, whose inhabitants had all removed to the country of Orda Kutuk (P), they came to the tribe of Irsîri, which granted them five or six hundred men; and thence proceeded towards Pishga. The princes separating in this province, Hajim Khân, with his two sons, took the road of Urgenish; and Bâba Soltân, with his two brothers, went to Khayuk. On the news of Hajim Khân's approach, Sâri Oglân, governor of Urgenish, retired into the castle: but the Khân having entered by a subterraneous passage, which he ordered to be carried under the wall in the night, he put the governor and his 40 men to death. The Turkmâns after this returned home laden with plunder, leaving Hajim Khân, and his sons, almost alone at Urgenish. Bâba Soltân had no less success on the other side: for so soon as he appeared before Khayuk, the Sârts, who dwelt in the city, opened the gates to him; which entering, he slew the governor, Menglish Bey, and his 60 men. When the commanders of Hazârâsh and Kât were informed of these misfortunes, they quitted those cities, and fled towards Great Bukhâria.

TEN days after, Bâba Soltân, having dismissed all his Turkmâns, excepting fifteen, went with his brother Pelûnkûli to Hazârâsh; but, it being the vintage season, Hâmza staid at Khayuk taken;

^a ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 298, & seq.

(N) That is, as we compute, A. D. 1593.

(O) Some read Estarabâd; in the translation everywhere Istarabâd: others Astarabâd.

(P) Because of the quarrels they had with the Man-kats (or Karakalpaks), on one side; and with the tribe of Irsîri on the other.

Kbayuk to drink his fill of wine. Just as Bába got into Hazarásb, he perceived two officers advancing towards the town on a smart gallop, at the head of 150 horse; and, suspecting them to be enemies, endeavoured to shut the gate: but he had scarce closed one side, before the first came up, and endeavoured with his lance to keep the other side open. However, some of the inhabitants, running thither in the nick of time, shut it also; and with their arrows compelled the enemy to retreat. In their way back, they took a Sáir; who having informed them of Hámza's stay at Kbayuk, they turned on that side, and arrived there next day at noon, while the Soltán was taking the air. But not daring to use force with so few men, they lay concealed till the evening; when, assistance coming to them, they opened a passage into the town, under one of the gates; at which having entered, they put all to the sword: a misfortune that much disconcerted the affairs of Bába Soltán.

by Abdo'llah's troops.

To understand who these troops were, the reader must be informed, that Abdo'llah Khán having sent Khojám Kúli to support his son Abdo'lmomín Soltán, while he followed leisurely to take the diversion of catching water-fowl beyond Zárjui, in the country of Gordásb, that general met on the road the commander of Hazarásb; from whom he learned what had passed in that city, and then sent him with the news to Abdo'llah Khán. On this advice, the Khán dispatched orders to Khojám Kúli, to march in haste towards Kbayuk; promising to follow him with his whole army. Hereupon the general turned towards that city: but found, at his arrival, that the work had been already done by his van-guard; which determined him to march for Urjensh.

Mahamed
Kúli's bravery:

In the interim, Mahamed Kúli Soltán, third son of Hajím Khán, a prince of much courage, having heard of his cousin Hámza's death, kept it very secret; resolving to go from Urjensh secretly, and join Bába Soltán at Hazarásb. He took with him some trusty Turkmáns, and Jagatays (Q), with 200 Usbeks, newly escaped from Great Bukhária, with a view to trade. He began his journey by the river of Urjensh: but, coming near the little town of Zilpuk, found himself on a sudden surrounded by the troops of Khojám Kúli; who, believing that the Soltán could not possibly get out of his hands, ordered his officers to take him alive. However, he missed of his aim; for Mahamed Kúli, forming one large squadron with his men, rushed violently upon one of the enemy's wings; and, breaking through them, retired into the country of the Mankáts (R); where he endeavoured to draw Kuzuk Khán into his interest, by proposing to marry his sister: but this prince, fearing Abdo'llah Khán's resentment, in case he gave Mahamed Kúli any protection, had him arrested, and sent to the Urús (or Russians); where he died some time after.

Hajím Khán
flies again.

Hajím KHAN, being informed of what had happened by a soldier, who was in the fight, left Urjensh, accompanied by his son Arap Mahamed Soltán, and some soldiers, designing to retire to Mankishláak; but the enemy having overtaken him the third night after his departure, he was obliged to fight them; and, being worsted, he endeavoured to make a retreat. As the enemy continued to follow him, he was forced next morning to stand a new attack; in which he lost more than half of the few men he had with him. So that he was constrained once more to quit Karazm, and take refuge at Astarabád; from whence he afterwards repaired to the Sháh at Kazwín. Mean time Abdo'llah Khán went in person to besiege Hazarásb; and, having taken it, caused Bába Soltán, and his fifteen men, to be put to death. After this he returned into Great Bukhária; where he died (S) the last day of the year 1006, called (by the Mungls) Tawk, or the Hen.

Hej. 1006.
A. D. 1597.

After Abdo'llah's
death;

UPON the news of Abdo'llah Khán's death, Sháh Abbás Mázi gathered a great army, and next year encamped near Bastám. At this place Hajím Khán desired leave of the Sháh to take a journey towards Great Bukhária, to try if Abdo'lmomín, who had succeeded his father, would restore him one of his cities, that he might there end his days in quiet. Abbás having readily consented to his request, he departed, accompanied by Arap Mahamed Soltán, and his grandson Isfándiar Soltán, with a retinue of fifteen persons; leaving behind Barandú, son of Ibráhím Soltán. But, having lost his way, during the second day's journey, he found himself at length near the Turkmáns of Táka, by the mountains of Kurán; where he imagined he was not far from Marú. As this mistake embarrassed him extremely, he resolved to rest there that night, in order to consider what he had best to do. Going at sun-rise to sit in the shade to say his prayers, because it was Midsummer, he saw two Naymáns on horseback, coming from towards Yawrsurdi. These had formerly been his subjects, and of those who were carried into Great Bukhária. As soon as they approached, they wished him long life, and informed him, that

^r ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 304. & seq.

(Q) The old Mongols, or Mungls, who came with Jagatay Khán into these parts; which took their name from him.

(R) Or Karakálpáks; who possess the west parts of Turkestan.

(S) So that Olearius must be mistaken, when he says that the Khán, with his brother, and three of his sons, were taken by Sháh Abbás, and put to death.

a Abdo'lmonin Khân, in his return from Khorassân to his own dominions, was slain at Zâmû (T), by his own people; and that they had let-out in quest of him to bring him the news.

Hajim Khan, greatly rejoiced at these tidings, made such haste to Urjensh, that he arrived there in eight days, and found the city without either a governor or a garrison. For, on the confusion which followed the assassination of their Khân, the enemy withdrew out of Karazm. Hajim Khân kept Urjensh and Wazâr; he assigned Khayuk and Kât to his son Arap Mahamed Soltân, and gave Isfândiar his grandson, Hazâresh. Soon after the Uzbeks, made prisoners by Abdo'llah Khân, took the opportunity to return home; as did in the third year Siunj Mahamed Soltân, from the country of Rum (or Turky): at whose arrival his father resigned to him the dignity of Khân; and retired to live at Khayuk, with Arap Mahamed Soltân.

b SIUNJ MAHAMED KHAN did not long enjoy the sweets of reigning: for he died a year after his return to Urjensh; and was succeeded by his son Abdo'llah Soltân: but ABDO'LLAH KHAN lived no more than another twelve-month after his father.

AT length Hajim Khân died in the year 1011, called Bars, or the Tiger, at the age of fourscore-and-one.

ARAP (U) MAHAMED KHAN succeeded on the death of his father Hajim Khân to all his dominions; and on his advancement, added Kât to his son Isfândiar's portion. Six months after, while he passed the summer, with the lords his vassals, on the banks of the river Amû, the Urûs (or Russians of Taïk (X), knowing there were no soldiers at Urjensh during that season, came with 1000 men; and, after they had cut the throats of 1000 of the inhabitants, loaded as many waggons with the most valuable goods; and, burning what they could not carry away, marched off with 1000 females. The Khân, being informed of this in time, went to cut off their retreat at a certain defile: which he so well intrenched and palisadoed, though in a hurry, that the enemy could not force him, till after an attack of two days; and after-all, they were obliged to leave their booty behind them. Mean time Arap Mahamed Khân, who had no design to let them escape him so cheaply, having gotten the start of them by cross roads, went to wait for them at another pass; which the Urûs not being able to force, and water beginning to fail, so that they were constrained to drink the blood of their slain, they made a last effort to break through the barricades: but this attempt succeeded so ill with them, that scarce a hundred of their number escaped. These remains made over to the river Khesel; where they built a cabin, a good way beyond Tûk, and subsisted by fishing, waiting for an opportunity to get back: but five days after, the Khân, being informed of the place of their retreat, sent soldiers thither, who slew them every man.

Six months after, a thousand Kalmûks (Y), passing between the lake Khoja Kûli, and the mountain Sheykh Aziz, came to surprise some Uzbeks, who dwelt along the Khesel, towards Kât; and, having killed a great number of them, were upon their return home, laden with booty and prisoners: but Arap Mahamed Khân, having been informed of their invasion, pursued them so close at the heels, that they had much ado to escape him, after they had been forced to leave what they had taken behind them.

SOME time after, the Naymâns, who never relished well the government of this Khân, brought secretly into Khayuk one Khisserân Soltân, a descendant of Ilbârs Khân, with a design to kill Arap Mahamed, and set up the other for Khân in his room. But Arap Mahamed Khân, having timely notice of the plot from two men, one a Kerghis, the other a Vigûr, caused the Soltân to be seized and put to death. As for Sâfi Mirza, the chief conspirator, his own brother Bâba Mirza killed him, as a person unworthy to live after such a crime; otherwise the Khân would not have punished him. Two years after, Sâsh Mirza, with twenty Vigûrs, went from Urjensh to Samarkant, and brought from thence Seleb Soltân, a descendant of Hassân Kûli Khân, with design to get him acknowledged Khân in Urjensh. Of this Arap Mahamed Khân being informed, he hastened to that city, and put the new pretender to death, without enquiring farther after his accomplices; who, he said, might be innocently drawn into the plot: and although he knew Sâsh Mirza was the author of the whole, yet he would not put him to death, but left it to the Vigûrs to do by him as they judged proper.

TEN years after, the Kalmûks, having invaded Karazm on the side of Bakirgan, plundered many habitations, and returned with a great number of prisoners; notwithstanding all the haste that was made to pursue them.

* ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 308, & seq.

(T) Or Zâm, on the river Amû.

(U) This is the Turkish pronunciation of Arab.

(X) These were the Kossâks, who dwell on the river Taïk, or Taïk.

(Y) A nickname given the Elûth Mungls, by the Uzbeks; from whom the Russians have it.

Two of his sons

ARAP MAHAMED KHAN had now reigned peaceably for fourteen years. When one day, a being gone to Urjensh, several young men persuaded two of his sons (Z), Habâsh and Ilbârs (the one sixteen, the other fourteen), to go with them from Kbayuk to Urjensh, in order to get them received in quality of successors to their father. With this intention they actually advanced as far as a fountain in the province of Pishga, only one day's journey from Urjensh, where they stayed ten days; during which time their father sent for them to come to him, and to tell them that he would give them Wâzîr for a portion. Their answer was, that they would come as soon as their men were gotten together. Arap Mahamed Khân might have quashed this sedition in its birth, if he had only published his orders that none should join the princes: for he was so much feared by his subjects, that, if he had forbidden them to have any commerce with their wives for a whole year together, they would not only have obeyed his orders, but even avoided coming too near their houses, for fear of giving room for suspicion: but neglecting this precaution, though at the same time he knew many went to visit them, the people imagined that what they did was by his own consent.

rise against him:

THE two princes, judging themselves strong enough, made an irruption into Khorassân; from whence they returned to their camp laden with plunder, and sent two Persians as a present to their father: after this they dismissed all their troops, excepting fourscore men. Hereupon the Khân sent again a Vigûr lord to exhort them to come before him: but the Uzbeks, dwelling between the provinces of Darugan and Bakirgan, who had joined them, answered, "that the princes had no occasion to go to their father, and that they had nothing to do with him." As this language foreboded a rebellion, the Khân, being seized with fear, at the advice of that lord, retired to Kbayuk. Upon this news, the two princes went a second time to ravage the Persian territories; and, at their return, seizing all their father's granaries, distributed the corn among their troops; which increased them considerably. Wheat was at that time so cheap in Karazm, that two hundred weight might have been bought for a Tanga: for nothing but that kind of grain was sown, from the small town of Modekân, to this side of Bakirgan, and as far as the province of Kuigan.

matters accommodated:

THE Khân, who possessed a great extent of land on that side, caused the Khesil to be cut behind the town of Tûk, and by means of that opening, and several canals which proceeded from it, watered his meadows: after which, the gap being closed up, the river resumed its course to the sea of Mazânderân. Arap Mahamed Khân, finding the mutineers multiply daily, came to an agreement with his sons, giving up to them Wâzîr, and all the Turkmâns depending on it: after which, the two princes, followed by 4000 men, went to Kbayuk to salute their father.

rebel a second time.

FOUR years after this, Ilbârs Soltân assembled troops at Sayzakuduk to the north of Wâzîr, under pretence of going to besiege Yawrsurdi: but, hearing that the Khân his father was on the road to Urjensh, he went and took Kbayuk. Arap Mahamed Khân, being informed of this surprise, turned back by advice of his lords; who were of opinion, that on his approach Ilbârs would quit the city. But when he came to Kbasgan, a little town near Kbayuk, Ilbârs sent thither 500 men; who, entering in the night, seized him and all his retinue. From thence they were convoyed to Kbayuk: where Ilbârs detained them all as his prisoners, and distributed among his troops all the money found in his father's chest, which he had been gathering for many years; as well as the effects of the captive lords. The other brothers, being informed of this detestable action, resolved to make war on Ilbârs; even Habâsh himself offered to join them in the undertaking: but they were diverted from that resolution by some of their lords, who judged that such a proceeding might bring their aged father's life in danger; while Ilbârs, if let alone, would release him of his own accord: as shortly after it fell out.

Abû'lghâzi
Soltân

WHEN the Khân was returned to Urjensh, with his son Isfândiar Soltân, it was resolved to seize Ilbârs Soltân: but he, discovering their design, fled to the desert with only five or six men: however, they ruined his habitations, and removed the greater part of his subjects. At their return from this expedition, Abû'lghâzi Soltân proposed to go kill his brothers Habâsh and Ilbârs, who still carried on a close correspondence, as the only way to secure his father's life. But the Khân would determine nothing till he had consulted Zîn Hâji. Abû'lghâzi Soltân returned at the time appointed; and, understanding that this lord did not approve of his proposal, put his father in mind how he had been deceived before by the brother of Zîn Hâji, magnifying the forces of those princes, to whom he was sent on their first revolt: which act had obliged the Khân to retire to Kbayuk, when he might easily have seized them, but

* ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 312, & seq.

(Z) He had in all seven; 1. Isfândiar Soltân; 2. Habâsh Soltân; 3. Ilbârs Soltân; 4. Abû'lghâzi Bahadr Soltân; 5. Sharîf Mahamed Soltân; 6. Karazm Khân Sol-tân; 7. Augân Soltân. The second and third were by one mother, the fifth and sixth by another.

- a for that false representation. He added, "that as every body else, whom the Khán had consulted, approved of his design, excepting Zín Háji, it confirmed him in the opinion, which he had all along entertained, that he and his brother Kurbank were both traitors; and held a criminal correspondence with Ilbárs, by means of their two other brothers, who were the most intimate confidants of that prince." In short, he told his father, that, if he did not follow his counsel, he would repent it when it was too late.
- c For all this, Arap Mahamed Khán refused to enter into his measures; nor would Isfándiar Soltán, his eldest brother, be concerned in any such design. Mean time, Habâsh Soltán, who had his spies every-where, being informed, by one of Isfándiar Soltán's principal domestics, of Abû'lghâzi's proposal to destroy him, never could forgive it him.
- b FIVE months after, Arap Mahamed Khán, beginning to repent that he had not followed Abû'lghâzi Soltán's advice, sent orders to Isfándiar Soltán, and him, to repair forthwith to Khayuk, with their troops. In the interim, he sent to tell Habâsh and Ilbárs Soltán, that, in case they delivered up to him ten persons, who never ceased giving them evil counsel, he would pardon all which was past; otherwise he would own them no longer for his children. Upon their refusal, the Khán advanced with his troops to Kandum, a borough not far from Khayuk; where he waited for his two sons. Abû'lghâzi Soltán, leaving his men to follow leisurely, rode before (A); and, being come to Kandum, would have had his father march along the right side of the river: while he, with 800 men should oblige the Turkmâns, who encamped in the desert, and were more than half of them his subjects, to join him; resolving to destroy such as belonged to his rebel brothers, in case they refused: for, without their assistance, those provinces could not raise 400 men: but the Khán could not approve of his advice this time neither. As soon as Isfándiar Soltán arrived with his troops, they set forward; and, when they came into the province of Ikzi Kumâni, Abû'lghâzi Soltán set upon his father once more to make a diversion among the Turkmâns: though to as little purpose as before. In short, having advanced by slow marches as far as the little canal, called Tashli Ghermish, the two rebel princes, who had time enough given them to assemble all their forces, came and charged their father so vigorously, that his men began presently to fly, and left the unfortunate Khán a second time prisoner in the hands of his unnatural sons.
- c In this battle, which was very bloody, Abû'lghâzi Soltán, being hemmed in by forty men, was brought off by six of his own; who came opportunely to his relief. On this occasion he received a shot with an arrow in the mouth; so that he was obliged afterwards to have some little bone taken away on the fractured side. After this he made towards a river: but had scarce gotten his coat of mail off, before the enemy came running after him, and crying kill! Hereupon, plunging into the stream, which was very rapid, he, with difficulty, escaped drowning, by giving the horse his head, and holding fast by the mane. As soon as he had crossed the river, with three of his men, he took the road to Kât, where he met with ten more; and with them retired into Great Bukhâria to Imâm Kûli Khán, successor of Abdo'l-momîn Khán at Samarkant (B); who received him very kindly.
- d ISFANDIAR SOLTAN, having retreated to Hazârâsb, with his brothers Sbarîf Mahamed and Karazm Khán Soltán, Ilbárs and Habâsh came and besieged them: but, coming to an accommodation at the end of forty days, Isfándiar retired to the Shâh of Persia, under pretence of performing the pilgrimage of Mekka, and left the city in possession of Sbarîf Mahamed Soltán; who, four months after, retired into Great Bukhâria to his brother Abû'lghâzi Soltán. As Karazm, by his departure, fell intirely into the hands of Ilbárs and Habâsh, they divided it between themselves. The first had Khayuk and Hazârâsb; the latter Uryensh and Wâzîr; with their dependencies. They assigned their father the little town of Kumkâla, to live there with his three wives and two youngest sons: but twelve months after, Ilbárs, sending for his father and two brothers, caused him to be put to death, with Karazm Khán Soltán; and sent Augân Soltán to Habâsh, that he might meet with the same treatment. However, this latter, without whose knowledge all the rest had been done, unwilling to imbrue his hand in his brother's blood, had him sent to the Czar of Russia; where he remained till he died. As to the two sons of Isfándiar Soltán, who were both infants, Ilbárs had them educated at Khayuk. Arap Mahamed Khán lost his life in 1031, called It, or the Dog, after having reigned twenty years.

^a ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 316, & seq.

^c Ibid. p. 321, & seq.

(A) He left Kât in the morning, and came to Kandum late in the evening.

(B) This seems to clash with what is related, p. 333 & 334, of Abû'lghâzi Khán's history; where it is said, that, from Kât, he crossed Mâwara'nâhr to Samarkant, in order to go to Imâm Kûli Khán, in Great Bukhâria. From hence also it may be inferred, that Mâwara'nâhr is a different country from Great Bukhâria; and that Imâm Kûli Khán reigned at Bokhâra, not at Samarkant.

Hej. 1031.
A. D. 1621.

4. From the death of Arap Mahamed Khân to the reign of Abû'lghâzi Khân.

14. Khân
Isfândiar's attempt;

THE news of the Khân's death having reached the Persian court, the Shâh gave Isfândiar Soltân 300 chosen men, to see if he could recover his father's dominions. As he was joined on the road by 170 Turkmâns of the tribes of Tâka and Yamut, he advanced directly to the camp of Habâsh Soltân, near Tûk; but found him not there. That prince was then feasting at the house of one of his lords; when hearing on a sudden the trumpet sound (which is forbidden on any account, except on the approach of an enemy), he instantly took horse, and fled for shelter to Ilbârs Soltân. After this, all those who had any regard for the memory of the late Khân, as well as such who were the subjects of his other sons, came and joined Isfândiar: whose affairs were taking the best turn imaginable, when the face of them was intirely changed by the artifice of one Nâsar Khoja.

defeated by
pious fraud;

As soon as this person, who was descended from a holy man, called Sâghidâta, saw the storm rising, he sent to bid Ilbârs, who had married his daughter, take courage; and promised to join him in two days, with all the men he could get together. To this end he armed fifty men, and pressing all the people he met on the road, went and seized the ford of the river Khesil, in order to hinder any from passing who had a mind to take part with Isfândiar. This done, he took the Korân in his hands, and began to curse that prince aloud; giving out that he had embraced the Persian sect, and that, where-ever he came, he put to the sword all the men, and made slaves of the women and children. As he supported all this with the solemnest oaths, many of the common people, who could not believe that a man of his birth would violate the most sacred laws purposely to impose on them, instead of repairing to Isfândiar, as they at first designed, went over to the two usurpers.

he recovers
Karazm.

ILBARS and Habâsh, by this means, quickly found themselves in a condition to march in search of their eldest brother: and the two armies at length meeting, Isfândiar was constrained, after a bloody action, to retire towards Mankishlâk. However, in that place, being joined by 3000 Turkmâns, and a great number of Uzbeks, who began to grow weary of the government of the two princes, he turned back again; and his brothers having advanced to meet him with a considerable army, they continued fighting for twenty-two days successively: but at length Isfândiar gained the victory; and having taken his brother Ilbârs prisoner, caused him to be put to death on the spot. Habâsh Soltân took refuge with the Mankats (C), who inhabit along the river Sîr: but, not thinking himself safe enough with them, he retired to Shârnîk Mirza, a lord of the Mankats, who dwelt about the banks of the Yem; in hopes of meeting with a good reception from the chief of that tribe, in return for having sent back all the Mankat prisoners within his dominions, when he reigned at Urjensh: but that lord, detesting his heinous actions, caused him to be arrested, and sent him to his brother Isfândiar; who had him executed without delay, in the year 1032, called Tongûz, or the Hog.

Hej. 1032.
A. D. 1622.
Partition of the towns.

THE news of this event coming to the ears of Abû'lghâzi, and Sharîf Mahamed, at Samar-kant, they took leave of Imâm Kûli Khân, and returned to Urjensh. At their arrival, they caused Isfândiar to be proclaimed Khân; and divided the dominions of their father among them. The Khân had for his share the cities of Kbayuk, Hazârâsh, and Kât; Abû'lghâzi Soltân, Urjensh, with its dependencies (being then just nineteen years old); and Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, Wâzîr.

Plot against the Turk-mâns.

THE year after, all the principal subjects of Isfândiar Khân went in autumn to pay their court to him: but Abû'lghâzi Soltân, before he set out, invited his brother Sharîf Mahamed, with three of his vassal lords, to his house; and, in presence of two of his own vassals, asked him, if there was not some animosity between him and the Khân. On his answering in the negative, he enjoined all the six to secrecy under an oath; and then told them, "that he could not comprehend what his brother meant by keeping the Turkmâns about him a whole year: "that possibly his design was to destroy all the Uzbeks about Kbayuk, for having always favoured Ilbârs Soltân; in which case he would be sure to demand help of them on their appearance at Kbayuk: that, for this reason, the best course they could take was not to go to that city; since their absence might divert his intention: but that, if they must needs go thither, it was his advice to kill all the Turkmâns they should meet on the road; and then present themselves before the Khân, with ropes about their necks, to implore pardon; excusing themselves on account of the usual treachery of that people, and the great occasion of complaint given by them in times past." But Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, not approving of killing the Turkmâns, proposed assassinating the Khân his brother, and then proclaiming Abû'lghâzi Soltân in his room.

Y ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 323, & seq.

(C) Nicknamed Kârakâlpâks.

- a THIS propoſal was liked by four of the lords; but the fifth, named Kurbân Hâji, a Vigûr, ^{Vigûrs and Naymâns ſlain:} and one of Abû'lghâzi Soltân's vaffals, not only rejected it, but declared, that, if he heard any more mention of ſuch a plot againſt the Khân's life, he would impeach them. So blunt a declaration having broken all their meaſures, they went to Kbayuk: but four days after, when they were about to return, Iſfândiar Khân cauſed Abû'lghâzi Soltân to be arreſted, and all the Vigûrs and Naymâns then in the city, to the number of 500, to be put to the ſword. On this occaſion, 100 Uzbeks of other tribes were ſlain, although he had forbidden that any harm ſhould be done to ſuch. In like manner the troops, which were ſent to deſtroy all about Kbayuk belonging to thoſe two tribes (whom he was determined to root out), contrary to his orders, ſlew all the Uzbeks, who dwelt from Hazârâſb, as far as the high ſtone-tower, where the river Amû divides in two branches (D); not ſparing the very infants at the breaſt².

- b THE Khân, after this, ſent Sharîf Mahamed Soltân to Urjenſh, with orders to cauſe the throats of all the Vigûrs and Naymâns, depending on that city, to be cut. However, on his arrival there, thoſe people gave him to underſtand, that they were reſolved not to ſuffer themſelves to be maſſacred without ſelling their lives very dear: but that they were ready to quit ^{ſtand on their defence;} the country, or receive Abû'lghâzi Soltân, and Mahamed Sayn Beg (one of the Khân's moſt truſty ſervants) to inſpect their conduct. Theſe propoſals appearing reaſonable to Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, he ſent them to Iſfândiar Khân; who pitched on the laſt expedient. As ſoon as Abû'lghâzi Soltân arrived thither, he went and took up his abode by the ſide of the Kheſil; which he fortified for his ſecurity. A few days after, Sharîf Mahamed Soltân came c thither alſo, with eighty Turkmâns in his train; who immediately quitted him, and went to join Mahamed Sayn Beg. Mean time thirty of the moſt conſiderable Uzbeks, beyond the river, came to welcome Abû'lghâzi Soltân, and offered him 1000 choice men to be employed in his ſervice againſt Iſfândiar Khân. On this occaſion, they propoſed to begin by killing Mahamed Sayn Beg and his eighty men, becauſe they conſidered the Turkmâns as the only authors of the late maſſacre of their brethren; and then, marching to Kbayuk, would put to the ſword all ſuch of that nation as they found in its neighbourhood.

- BUT this project appeared impracticable to Abû'lghâzi Soltân; who knew that the eighty ^{new attempt} Turkmâns would be ſo much upon their guard, that, on the leaſt motion of the Uzbeks, they would take flight: ſo that, before the Uzbeks could reach Kbayuk, the reſt of them would be d removed with their effects; and, what would be ſtill worſe, the Kalmûks, in their abſence, would come and carry off their wives and children. He was therefore of opinion, that they ought to treat Mahamed Sayn Beg kindly; and ſend him back laden with civilities, in order to lull Iſfândiar Khân aſleep: that after this, Sharîf Mahamed ſhould go paſs the winter in the little town of Kayuk, near Urjenſh; whiſt the Uzbeks, beyond the river, began to make an intrenchment, as if for their ſecurity againſt the Kalmûks: that they ſhould place guards along the two roads leading to the country of thoſe Tatars, as though to obſerve what paſſed; and that, in ſpring, a man ſhould come running from thoſe guards, with news of a Kalmûk invaſion: that on this advice they ſhould aſſemble troops, under pretence of going to meet the enemy: but that in the way, joining Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, they ſhould turn on a ſudden e towards Kbayuk; ſurpriſe that city, when there could not be at ſuch time more than ſixty men about the Khân, and put all the Turkmâns to the ſword².

- THE Uzbeks, however, had no inclination to depart from their deſign upon Mahamed Sayn ^{againſt the} Beg and his eighty Turkmâns: but theſe latter, ſmelling it out, retired at night-fall, when every body elſe was gone to reſt. The Uzbeks arriving ſoon after, Abû'lghâzi Soltân told them, that, as the ſhorteſt follies are the beſt, his advice was to ſend to aſſure the Khân, that they knew not the reaſon of Mahamed's ſudden departure, having given him no cauſe to complain; and that, in caſe they had intended him any harm, they might eaſily have prevented it. But this advice was not reliſhed by his brother and the Uzbeks, who inſiſted that they had no other meaſures to take, than to march with all their forces to Kbayuk. According to this reſolution f of the majority, they ſet forwards; and, arriving in two days at the bridge of Tâſh Kupruk, they halted there forty days; in which time they killed ſome Turkmâns, the reſt retiring into that city.

MEAN time the Kalmûks having ſurpriſed one part of the Uzbeks camp, and carried a great ^{the Uzbeks defeated.} number into ſlavery, many of them deſerted the army, beginning to have a bad opinion of their ſucceſs. On the news of this revolt of the Uzbeks, the Turkmâns who dwelt about the mountain Abû'lkhân, and at Mankiſhlâk, joining Iſfândiar Khân at Kbayuk, this prince took

² ABU'LGH. Hiſt. Turks, &c. p. 328, & ſeq.

² Ibid. p. 336, & ſeq.

(D) One of theſe arms, called Tokay, paſſes by that tower; the other, which is greater, having quitted its old bed, runs by a large channel into the Kheſil, near Tûk; which had rendered Urjenſh, when the author wrote, no better than a deſart.

Abû'lghâzi's valour.

the field in his turn; and, engaging the Uzbeks in the place above-mentioned, intirely defeated a them. Abû'lghâzi Soltân, seeing the battle lost, retired with some of his men into the intrenchment, which they had raised to cover their baggage; where he found four or five hundred busy at packing up to be gone: but, obliging them to dismount, he made them tie their horses together, to take from them all hopes of saving themselves by flight, and then in a posture of defence waited for the enemy. In the evening, Isfândiar Khân drew near: but Abû'lghâzi Soltân, sallying out at the head of 500 men, gave him so warm a reception, that he durst not make a second attempt; contenting himself to intrench with his troops at a small distance. After they had looked at one another in this manner for six days, without daring to engage; on the seventh, they came to an accommodation, which the Khan had set on foot only with a view to draw Abû'lghâzi Soltân into the open field; where he proposed to have put him and b all his followers to the sword. But he missed of his aim by an accident: for the Turkmâns had gone to pillage the borough of Khânaka, inhabited by Sârts, just at the time his brother passed out of his intrenchment: however, at their return, the Khân did not fail to pursue him with 5000 men. Abû'lghâzi Soltân, who had in all but 540 men, suspecting his design when he perceived him advance, formed in haste an inclosure with his chariots; and defended himself so well, that the Khân was obliged to come to a second treaty, after having had 80 killed and 2000 wounded in the action: whereas of Abû'lghâzi's soldiers no more than 20 were slain, and 100 wounded. After this Abû'lghâzi Soltân, and his brother Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, fixing their abode at Urjensh, all the Uzbeks, who dwelt before on both sides of the Amû, went and settled about that city ^b.

Karazm deserted.

SOME time after, a comet having appeared in the sky, the common people, who were persuaded, considering the extraordinary animosities which reigned among their princes, that it portended some very great calamities, departed by troops, which they call Top, Top, and went into their countries. Nor was it in the power of Abû'lghâzi Soltân, by any means, to restrain their flight: for while he sent after a party which went off on one side, two or three others withdrew another way: some with design to seek shelter in Great Bukhâria, others in Turkestân, among the Kasats (D) and Mankâts. So that having, in one month's time, lost three considerable troops of his subjects, he was constrained to retire elsewhere, to avoid lying at the mercy of Isfândiar Khân. Accordingly he bent his course towards the Kasâchia Orda, and visited Isâm Khân of Turkestân: while Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, who was in the same case, went d into Great Bukhâria.

Retires to Turkestân;

THREE months after, Isâm Khân, going to Tâshkant, to pay his respects to Tursum Khân, the reigning prince of those provinces presented Abû'lghâzi Soltân to him, and at the same time mentioned the obligations which they both owed to his house, on account of the protection given to many of their relations, who had fled for refuge to Karazm. Hereupon Tursum Khân received him at his court, and treated him with much distinction: but, two years after, Isâm Khân, having assassinated Tursum Khân, and massacred all those of the Kataguns who were his antient subjects; Abû'lghâzi, who saw there was no less discord between their families than there was in his own, went into Great Bukhâria. On his arrival there, he found a very cool reception from Imâm Kûli Khân; because he had applied himself first to Tursum Khân, who was his enemy.

thence to Sa-
markant:

FOR this reason he told the Uzbeks, who had retired thither before him, that he should be obliged to hearken to the Turkmâns, who promised to espouse his interest, to the utmost of their power, provided he would forget what was past. Upon this declaration the Uzbeks assured him, that although they had left the country at the appearance of the comet, yet he might always depend on their zeal for his service: that, on the other hand, they flattered themselves, that he would continue his protection to them; of which, they said, they had the more need, as they daily perceived they could not depend on the promises of his brother Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, who was naturally inconstant, and might, one time or other, side with the Turkmâns against them. In the last place, they counselled him to go over to the Turkmâns on the first invitation, and promised to repair to him in proper time. e returns to Ka-razm.

SHORTLY after, there came a new deputy from the Turkmâns, to let him know, that Isfândiar Khân, being informed they had invited him to their quarters, had retired to Hazarâsh, fearing a surprise. Upon this advice Abû'lghâzi Soltân, followed only by five or six persons, went away directly to Khayuk, where he was immediately joined by numbers of people, who flocked to him from all parts. Two months after, he learned, that his brother Sharîf Mahamed Soltân, being reconciled with Isfândiar Khân, was arrived at Hazarâsh; and that they both intended to turn all their forces against him. On this information he took the f

^b ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 340, & seq.

(D) These are the Kasâchia, or Kasâchia Orda, mentioned below, who possess the east part of Turkestân, as the Mankâts, or Karakalpâks do the west part.

a field with what troops he had; and the two armies coming to an engagement, that of Abû'l-ghâzi Soltân had the better; which obliged his two brothers to sign a treaty of peace. Yet, six months after, when least expected, they came again, and besieged Khayuk, with above 15,000 men, having been joined by all the Turkmâns thereabout. But, although Abû'l-ghâzi Soltân had no more than 600 with him, he defended himself so vigorously, that he obliged them, at length, to return with loss: the consequence of which was a new treaty.

SOME time after, 3000 families of those Uzbeks, who, three years before, had fled from Uzbeks mas- about Khayuk to the Kassâts and Mankâts, to avoid the fury of Isfândiar Khân, returned sacred. and went to settle on the sea-coast, about the mouth of the river Amûl. On this news 800 others set forward, on their return from Great Bukhâria, with design to settle in the province of Arâl: but the Khân, who looked on the Vigûrs and Naymûns as the authors of all the misfortunes which had befallen his family, being informed thereof, came upon them by surprise, with some troops, on the banks of the Khesîl, towards Kât, and put them all to the sword, man, woman, and child.

ISFANDIAR KHAN, taking this occasion to invite his two brothers to court, under pretence Abû'lghâzi Soltân ar- of regulating with them what concerned the affairs of the Uzbeks, persuaded Sharîf Mahamed rested: Soltân to repair to the province of Arâl, among those people, as it were of his own accord, and unknown to the Khân. Next morning early, some of the principal Turkmâns coming to visit him on that occasion, he solemnly protested, that Sharîf Mahamed had undertaken the journey without his privity; and, to incense them against Abû'lghâzi Soltân, insinuated that it was done by his advice. He went still farther, and told them, that it was this last who had recalled the Uzbeks to settle in the province of Arâl, with a design to employ them against the Turkmâns; and that he had sent his brother thither, to prepare them for the enterprise. He concluded, by saying, that, as from thence it appeared he was contriving some dangerous plot against them, their only course was to prevent him by seizing his person.

THIS counsel having been approved of by the assembly, he commanded the gates of the sent into Persia castle to be shut, and sent to arrest Abû'lghâzi Soltân, who was still fast asleep. After this the Khân, carrying him to Yawrsurdi, ordered the governor to send him under a strong guard into Persia: but that officer thought fit, for better security, to conduct him in person to Hamadân, where Shâh Sefi (E), the successor of Abbâs, then was. This prince had him conveyed to Ispahân, where he assigned him a house, and 10,000 Tanga (F) per year, for his maintenance (G): but, at the same time, caused him to be strictly watched, that he might not escape.

ISFANDIAR KHAN died in the first day of the year 1044, called Ghilkî, or the Horse, after 15. Khân; having reigned twelve years, and left two sons, Yushan and Asbrâf. He was succeeded by Sharîf Mahamed med. his brother Sharîf Mahamed Soltân; who fixed his residence at Urjensh. This Khân was much A. D. 1634. at variance with the Kalmûks (or Elûths); who, in his time, came and seized a great part of A. D. 1642. Karazm. He died in the year 1052, leaving, as it should seem, the throne vacant for two years.

5. The reign of Abû'lghâzi Khân.

ABUL'GHAZI SOLTAN succeeded his brother Sharîf Mahamed in quality of Khân. This prince 16. Khân was born at Urjensh, in the year 1015, called Tauskhân, or the Hare, on Monday, in the month Abû'lghâzi of Asfet, at sun-rise, forty-eight days after the defeat of the Kossaks, before-mentioned ^d. These Bahadr Kossaks having, near the river Taïk, met with ten merchants of Urjensh, trading to Russia, A. D. 1605. slew eight, and reserved the other two for guides in their expedition. On this occasion his father Arap Mahamed Khân said, "that child will be happy, because his enemies were defeated before he was born (H):" and, in regard his mother was descended from Soltân Gâzi, son of Ilbârs Khân, he gave him the name of Abû'lghâzi Babâdr; and, when he was sixteen years old, married him: at which time he made him a present of one half of Urjensh; assigning the other half to Habâsh Soltân. The year following (I), upon some difference, which happened between the two brothers, his father gave him the city of Kât, for his portion; and, not long after, the unfortunate battle was fought, wherein the Khân was taken prisoner, and put to death by his unnatural sons.

^c ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 343, & seq. ^d Before, 735. ^e ABU'LGH. ubi supra, p. 328, & seq. also 347, & seq.

(E) He ascended the throne in 1629, at the age of 16.

(F) A silver coin, the fourth part of a crown. See before, p. 721.

(G) This happened about the year 1630: for it was thirteen years before he was proclaimed Khân.

(H) The Tatars are full of such superstitious whimsies.

(I) This was in Hijrah 1031, A. D. 1621.

escapes from Ispahân ;

WHAT passed from that time till Abû'lghâzi Soltân was sent into Persia, has been already a related. After this prince had remained in that country, in the condition of a prisoner, the space of ten years, he formed the design to make his escape. This having been approved of by three of his domestics, whom he acquainted with it, he called the person who had the guard of him, and ordered him to take to the butcher's a horse, which had been sent for his kitchen. This done, he gave him a thousand Tanga, bidding him go buy a pretty slave ; and gave him leave to pass the night with her. His ward being gone, full of joy at this present, Abû'lghâzi Soltân and his men went to a neighbouring stable, and took out eight horses. After this, ordering them to shave their beards close, when every body was at rest, he made one of them, who could speak both Turkish and Persian, to put on his best clothes, because he was to represent the master. The second domestic was dressed also like a gentle- b man ; the third wore the garb of a valet, and himself passed for a groom.

suspected at Bastâm ;

IN this equipage they led the horses very softly out of the house, and mounting at midnight, when they beat the drum, they arrived at the gate of the city the very instant it was opened : then, continuing their journey, they got safe to Bastâm (K), and passed through the town in the evening, without any accident ; but three of their horses failing a little beyond that city, they were obliged to stop at the village of Boyish, inhabited by Sagbits. He who passed for the master, being seated on a carpet at the gate, with one of the valets standing behind him, while the other held the horses, Abû'lghâzi Soltân entered into the place, to exchange the tired cattle. He presently got off two of them. But having asked one among the croud, who flocked about him, which was the way to the village of Maghi ? an old man c of seventy grew suspicious of him, telling his neighbours, that as scarce one in ten of themselves knew the way to Maghi, he believed this must be the Soltân of the Uzbeks, who was making his escape. He added, that as, in case it was so, there would be couriers after him within a day or two, therefore it would be best to seize and carry him to Bastâm ; or, at least, not to exchange horses with him, in regard they who did would suffer for it. On this occasion the counterfeit groom, who spoke the language of the country perfectly well, by way of answer, told the old man a very formal story : that, as his mother had laid her commands on him to go see a person who lived at Maghi, he had prevailed on the lord his master, who sat on the carpet, to take that road. This invention gained the people on his side ; but the old man, being still of his first opinion, went to the servant of the overseer of the village, d and bade him haste to acquaint his master, that there were deserters in the place, and that he would do well to have them seized. On this, the valet rode up to Abû'lghâzi Soltân ; and, calling him robber, asked him, where he was going ? But the pretended groom so awed the valet with the name of his counterfeit lord, and the danger he said he was in of losing his nose, in case his lord should hear what he had uttered, that the valet begged his pardon, and pretended he spoke only by way of jest. After this the groom found no difficulty to exchange his third horse, and get sufficient information of the road f.

avoids the danger :

gets out of Persia.

HAVING made great expedition to pass the borders of Khorassân, he at length arrived in the neighbourhood of Karakum (L), at a place where the road dividing, one led to Mankishlâk, the other to the mountain of Kurân. Resolving now to keep the fields no longer (as till then e he had done, to avoid meeting much people), he struck into the latter, and came to a village which belonged to the Turkmâns. At the same time, seeing a boy near the road, he asked him, what kind of people they were ? The youth replied, we are Kisilafaks. He then demanded, how they came to be there, since they belonged to Mankishlâk ? and was answered, that the Kalmûks had driven them out of their habitations three years before ; and named some families of the tribe of Irsûri, known to Abû'lghâzi Soltân, who dwelt not far off.

received by the Turkmâns :

THE Soltân, joyful to find himself out of the Persian dominions, went to the village, where he was received with extreme joy by the inhabitants ; at whose invitation he staid there the whole winter, but in spring repaired to the Turkmâns of the tribe of Tûka, who dwelt near the river Amû, at the foot of the mountain Kurân. With these he staid two years, and then went f to Mankishlâk ; where he found no more than 700 families, who were reduced under the dominion of the Kalmûks (or Elûth Mungls). The Khân of the Kalmûks, being informed of Abû'lghâzi Soltân's arrival in his dominions, sent one of his principal officers to invite him to court (M). Abû'lghâzi Soltân, accepting of the invitation, was treated with great distinction all the while he staid there, which was a whole year. After which, having taken a is proclaimed

Khân :

f ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 349, & seq.

(K) A city in the province of Komes, or Kumes, on the borders of Affarabâd.

(L) Karakum signifies black sand. A black sandy diart, on the borders of Karazm.

(M) The author does not mention where the Khân kept his court, or whether any part of Karazm was then under his dominion. It was at this time that the author learned the Megol (or Mungl) language, in which he wrote his history. See Abû'lghâzi Khân's Hist. Turks, &c. p. 31.

a resolution of going to Urjenſh, the Khán ſuffered him to depart, and ſhewed him many marks of friendſhip. He arrived at that city in the year 1053, called Ghílan, or the ſerpent; and, Hej. 1053. ſix months after, the Turkmáns proclaimed him Khán, in the province of Arál, towards the A. D. 1043. entrance of the river Amú into the ſea of Mazánderán. This was in 1054, two years after, the death of Sharíf Máhamed Khán. Tuſhan and Aſbráf, the two ſons of Iſfándiar Khán, his predecessor, being in poſſeſſion of Kbayuk and Hazáráſh, the Turkmáns, within their juřiſdiction, reſuſed to ſubmit to Abú'lgbázi Khán; and put themſelves under the protection of Nadíř Máhamed Khán, of Great Bukhária, after ſending Aſbráf Soltán to the Perſian court, to be brought up there.

Upon this, Abú'lgbázi Khán, having ſent twice to pillage the habitations of the ſubjects of attacks Kbayuk, the Khán of Great Bukhária placed commanders and ſtrong garrisons in that city and Kbayuk. Hazáráſh; and ſent the widow of Iſfándiar Khán to dwell in the country of Kanſki. Having afterwards conferred the government of thoſe two places on his grandſon Káſſim Soltán, ſon of Khifferán Soltán, Abú'lgbázi Khán reſolved to pay him a viſit. With this deſign he embarked his infantry in the province of Arál, to aſcend the river Kbeſil, as far as the bridge of Taſh Kapruk, and followed by land with his cavalry. Being arrived at the place of rendezvous, he marched, with ſome of his foot, to the village of Kondúm; and, paſſing a brook which lay between him and the city, concealed one hundred and eighty of his men in a valley: then, with ſixty bowmen and twenty muſketteers, advanced up to the place, ordering them not to fire till they ſaw him fire.

c THE enemy, perceiving them coming on, made a ſally with a thouſand men, of whom ſeven hundred had coats of mail; whereas not above five of the Khán's were ſo accoutred. But that prince, without being diſmayed at their numbers, drew dexterouſly to the place where he deſigned, and then, marching up, gave them ſo rude a ſalute with arrows and bullets, at twenty paces diſtance, as allayed much of their firſt ardour; whiſt they who lay concealed advancing at the ſame time to charge them in flank, the enemy fell into confuſion, and fled towards Kbayuk. The Khán, who was not able to purſue them, for want of horſe, returned, and ſent his troops into quarters (N).

SOMETIME after this, Nadíř Máhamed, Khán of Great Bukhária, recalled his grandſon Káſſim Soltán from Kbayuk, and ſent Yakúb, one of his lords, to Hazáráſh, to govern what he afterwards poſſeſſed in Karazm: but having in the interim been dethroned by his vaſſals, for his harſh treatment of them, they ſet up his ſon Abdo'lazíz Soltán. On the news of this revolution, Abú'lgbázi Khán, marching to Kbayuk, in the year 1056, called Tauk, or the Hen, found no difficulty to poſſeſs himſelf of that city. After which he cauſed proclamation to be made, that all the Turkmáns who had quitted their habitations, on account of their late troubles, might freely return home, on his promiſe never to call to mind their paſt offences. Hej. 1056. A. D. 1046.

On theſe aſſurances, they who dwelt beyond Hazáráſh ſent deputies to the Khán; who ordered, that they ſhould all repair to his camp before that city, which he was going to take poſſeſſion of, and there tender him their faith and homage. The Turkmáns being aſſembled, purſuant to his commands, he, by a meſſenger, deſired them to provide his kitchen with milk and cattle, for that he intended to make a great entertainment the day following. This having been performed to the Khán's ſatisfaction, he treated them in a very ſplendid manner; but, towards evening, cauſed all his gueſts to be killed, to the number of 2000 perſons; and then ſent to plunder their habitations.

NEXT year, being that called It, or the Dog, in the month of Jomado'lawal, he marched into the province of Tarkhán, in queſt of the Turkmáns, who had quitted Kbayuk, after Káſſim Soltán's departure; and put to the ſword all thoſe whom he met with: but the greater part of them fled into the province of Bamuburinak, whither he went to diſlodge them, in the year Zizkán, or the Mouſe (O). They who knew not where elſe to retire, ſent their wives and children into the province of Arál, and intrenched themſelves under the ruins of ſome old walls. The Khán, finding them in this ſituation, made them ſome ſpecious propoſals of accommodation: but, as they durſt not truſt him, they marched out on foot, and threw themſelves deſperately on his troops: however, they were ſo well received, that not one of them eſcaped the ſword. The day after, Abú'lgbázi Khán detached ſome of his men towards the province of Arál, in purſuit of the wives and children of the Turkmáns, who had loſt their lives on this occaſion, and returned himſelf to Kbayuk. In ſhort, being reſolved to reduce the Turkmáns A. D. 1648.

* ABU'LGH. Hiſt. Turks, &c. p. 354, & ſeq.

(N) Here Abú'lgbázi Khán breaks off his hiſtory; having been hindered from finiſhing it by a grievous ſickneſs, of which he died. What follows of it was added by his ſon and ſucceſſor Anúſha Máhamed Babáđ Khán.

(O) The firſt of the duodenary cycle of the Mungls.

so low, that they should not be able to raise disturbances for the future, he made several expeditions against them, in which he severely chastised them^b (P).

Kalmûks invasion.

A. D. 1649.

IN the year Sagbîr, or the Cow, a Kalmûk lord, of the tribe of Kurlaüt, advancing with some troops as far as Kât, caused many people to be killed, and others carried into slavery.

A. D. 1649.

Soon after, another, called Boyan, of the Torgaüt tribe, coming into Karazm to traffick, the Khân suffered him and his followers to finish their business; and then, pursuing them, defeated their rear, in the province of Yuguruk-bâsh: after which, overtaking the body of their troops, they were constrained to fly, and leave their effects behind them. Three years after, in that called Lu, or the Crocodile, Abû'lghâzi Khân, having been informed that the Kalmûks hovered upon the frontiers both of Great Bukhâria and Karazm, with strong parties, and made terrible havock where-ever they came, sent Abdo'lazîz notice to be on his guard. Mean time, the lords of the Torgaüts invaded the lands of Hazârâsh, where they destroyed the village Tezdus, and took many people and cattle out of another called Danugân.

A. D. 1652.

Repulsed by the Khân.

UPON this advice, Abû'lghâzi Khân took horse immediately, to pursue them, contrary to the request of his officers: and, although they had gotten ten days march before him, yet, by riding day and night, he at length came up with their rear, near the mountain Irder, and defeated them. Then, pursuing the rest, he overtook them in the province of Segheri Rabat; where they had so well intrenched themselves that it was impossible to force them: but, on the other hand, as they durst not venture out to continue their journey, they sent all the plunder which they had taken, with their bows and arrows to the Khân, and intreated pardon for the offence; pretending, in excuse, that they did not know the above-mentioned village belonged to him; and promising never to invade his dominions for the future, or suffer any of their nation to do it. Hereupon Abû'lghâzi Khân, considering that none of that tribe of Kalmûks had ever incommoded his subjects before, he sent them their release, and let them return home in peace.

He invades Great Bukhâria:

A. D. 1655.

AFTER this, Subhân Kûli, Khân of Bâlk, who had married his brother Sharîf Mahamed Khân's daughter, sent to intreat his aid against Abdo'lazîz Khân, who had taken the field, with an intention to deprive him of his dominions (Q). Abû'lghâzi Khân, though he had designed to pass the rest of his days in repose, yet willing to assist his near relation, and revenge the injuries done his house by Abdo'llah Khân, advanced, in the year called Koy, or the Sheep, into the province of Kogbertlik, bordering on Great Bukhâria; and sent a body of 10,000 men to plunder the city of Karakûl, whilst he went in person against that of Siunjbâla, which he destroyed, with thirty or forty neighbouring villages. After this, he returned for a while to Khayuk; and then, in a second expedition, made the same year, plundered Karakûl in person. Then passing on to the province of Gordîsh, he defeated an army of 15,000 men, sent by Abdo'lazîz Khân from Kârshî, of whom scarce 1000 escaped. A great part of these 1000 threw themselves into Karakûl; but the Khân, following them, took prisoners all who escaped the sword, and burned the few houses which remained in that townⁱ.

makes great ravages:

IN the year Bîzin, or the Ape, he took the town of Zârjûi; which he intirely destroyed, and plundered the circumjacent country. Next year, he went and ravaged the province of Yayzi; which extends from the city of Karakûl to that of Nersem; and, having taken much booty, was gone back to his own frontiers, at the same time that Abdo'lazîz Khân, accompanied by Kasîm Soltân, was on the march, with a numerous army, to make a diversion in the province of Kogbertlik: but as soon as he heard of Abû'lghâzi Khân's return to Karazm, he retreated with so much precipitation, that many of his men killed their horses with haste to get off, although no one had any thoughts of pursuing them. Abû'lghâzi Khân, who in the mean time had taken a turn to Khayuk, made another invasion the same year, with 25,000 men, into Great Bukhâria; and, having taken the city of Karmîna, gave it to be pillaged, returning with considerable booty, and many prisoners.

Attacked in retreating,

IN his retreat, after he had passed a river over a bridge, he caused his tents to be set up there; and, believing himself very secure in that place, ordered that the baggage should begin to march at midnight, and that the army should follow at day-break, keeping about his person no more than his usual guard of one hundred men. Next morning, some hours after the army had decamped, one of his principal officers entered his tent; and, finding him still fast asleep, cried to him, "Rise, Sir; is this a time to sleep here?" But the Khân made answer, "Who is it you would have me be afraid of; since we have not heard of any enemy's troops in all this province?" At the same time one came to inform Abû'lghâzi Khân, that troops appeared ⁱ Ibid. p. 361, seq.

^b ABU'LGH. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 357, & seq.

(P) Particularly the Bayratzs, Ghemergem illi, and Sarik.

(Q) It is of the embassy of these two Khâns to Aureng

Zib, the Great Mogol, that Bernier seems to speak, tom. ii. p. 1, & seq.

a on the other side of the river. And in reality it was Abdo'lazíz Khán himself, at the head of 60,000 men; who, having been informed, by a beggar, that the Khán of Karazm, from whom he had received an alms on the road, was going to besiege Karmína, set forward immediately, with all his forces.

ABU'LGHASI KHAN, on the enemy's approach, retired leisurely towards his troops; which by great forces. being about to pass a little marshy brook, he sent orders for them to halt on this side. Mean time 1000 horsemen, in coats of mail, began to press him at the heels: on which the Khán, having gained a pass, made his hundred men alight (as he did himself), the better to make use of their muskets; and sent orders for his army to return. After this, he detached Yadigar Atalik (lately made the first lord of his court), with thirty men, to attack the 1000 horse, at the entrance b of the defile, while he stood ready to support him with the rest. Yadigar executed his orders with so much conduct, that, having first stunned the enemy by a successful fire made on them near at hand, afterwards managed his small force so well, by retiring or advancing, as occasion required, that he disputed the pass, till Anúsha Mahamed Bahádr Soltán (the Khán's son, then no more than fourteen years of age) came to his father's assistance at the head of 600 horsemen, with 300 foot soldiers behind them^k.

ABU'LGHASI KHAN, having received this reinforcement, found himself in a condition to His brave de- march out of the defile to attack those 1000 men: but as in the interim the enemy's army had fence. time to approach, they were quickly supported by a great body of troops: which, having surrounded the Khán of Karazm on all sides, would infallibly have handled him severely, if he had not ordered his son Anúsha Mahamed, with 400 men, to fall vigorously on the right of a large squadron, which blocked up the road to their army, while he attacked the rest with the c remaining 600. This scheme was executed with so good success, that, having forced the enemy's troops on both sides, they made their way through them, and rejoined their own; which advanced in haste to rescue their Khán from the danger he was in.

As soon as he had put himself at the head of his army, he caused it to march, under the Defeats the command of Anúsha Mahamed Bahádr Soltán, to attack the enemy's forces, which began to enemy. appear; and when the rest of his troops arrived, he made them advance to the right and left of his son, in order to support him. In this disposition they began the battle, which soon became general; and both armies fought a long time with equal fortune: but, at length, the juvenile courage of the prince prevailing (although it was the first time he had ever been at such an entertainment), the forces of Abdo'lazíz Khán were defeated, notwithstanding their d great superiority, and pursued as far as the above-mentioned river. The rout was so signal, that a great number of the enemy, who could not gain the bridge, were drowned in the stream; and their Khán himself, though much wounded, was obliged to swim over, to avoid being taken.

ABU'LGHASI KHAN, returning to Khayuk, with a great number of prisoners, gave a splen- Invades them did feast to all his lords and great officers; and, after he had in public extolled the valour of anew. his son, resigned to him the city of Hazárásh, with subjects for its defence. Next year, called It, or the Dog, the Khán again entered Great Bukhária, and took the city of Wardansí, which A. D. 1658. he ordered to be sacked, and returned laden with plunder and captives. Four years after, in A. D. 1662. the year called Bárs, or the Tiger, he made another expedition thither; and, advancing to the very walls of Bokhára, capital of the whole country, caused all the villages within its jurisdic- e tion to be destroyed. After this, he encamped before the gate Namasga, with a design to take the city by force. But, considering there was no glory in such an exploit, at a time when the Khán was absent at Samarkant, and that there were none but women and Tajiks, or burghers, in the place; he laid aside the design till another opportunity, and returned into his own dominions, with much booty and many prisoners.

ABU'LGHASI KHAN, being by this time arrived at the age of sixty years, began to consider Resigns the that there was blood enough spilt to revenge the murders committed by Abdo'llah Khán on the crown: princes of his family; and that it would be acting against the dictates of conscience, to persist any longer in giving disturbance to a prince who was of the same religion with himself, while f he could more usefully employ his army against the Kalmúks and Persians. Guided by these sentiments, he dispatched ambassadors to Abdo'lazíz Khán, with proposals of peace; which having been accepted of, he recalled his troops from the borders of Great Bukhária, and sent them towards the country of Khorassán. After this, he resigned the throne to Anúsha Mahamed Bahádr Soltán, with a design to spend the rest of his days in serving God: but he died not Hej. 1074. long after, in the month of Ramadán, 1074, called Táushán, or the Hare; when he had A. D. 1663. reigned twenty years^l.

^k ABU'LG. Hist. Turks, &c. p. 367, & seq.

^l Ibid. p. 370, & seq.

Death and
character.

CHARDIN, who calls this prince Abûl Kâzi, gives him a very advantageous character. He a says, that he knew so well how to disguise the natural barbarity of the Tatars, that you would have taken him for a Persian. He behaved with a grace and affability on all occasions. So that Shâh Safi, for distinction-sake called Mâzi (*), that is, the past reign, observing him to be endowed with so many rare qualities, admitted him into his Méjels, or royal assemblies, where he ranked him on an equality with the grandees of his kingdom. The same author informs us, that, on his being brought to Ispâbân (R), Safi looked on him not as a robber, but a prisoner of war, and paid him all the honours due to a person of royal birth; assigned him a revenue of 1500 Tomâns, amounting to 6000 pounds; and gave him a stately palace, richly furnished, with a suitable number of officers and retinue to attend him, during the ten years he continued in his capital. After his return (S) to Karazm, he proved a constant friend to Persia; keeping b Subbân Kûli Khân (T), and Abdo'lazîz Khân, of Bokhâra, in such awe, that as soon as either of them entered Persia, he was in the bowels of their territories.

Honoured in Persia.

17. Khân,
Anûtha Ma-
hamed

BUT, after his death, the crown descending to his son Enûsh (or Anûsha) Khân, Abbâs II. withdrew his pension, which, in kindness, he had given his father. But the son, who looked on it as a kind of tribute, paid by the Persian monarch to the king of Karazm, or Orkenj (U), to restrain him from plundering his dominions, judged the surest way to recover it, or at least to make himself amends for the loss, would be, to ravage the frontier provinces. To this end, he entered into a league with the two other Khâns, against Persia; espousing the sister of the prince of Bâlk, and giving his own in marriage to him of Bokhâra.

leagues against Persia;

A. D. 1665.

HOWEVER, Abûlghâzi Khân having been of the Shiyah sect, which the Persians follow, and c not of the Sunni persuasion, such as the Uzbeks (X) profess, Enûsh Khân made profession of the latter: but his allies, as a proof of his sincerity, required that he should begin the war first, promising to assist him the next year with all their forces. Hereupon the prince of Orkenj entered Persia in the year 1665; but met with a very powerful resistance: for Shâh Abbâs, having been informed of the conspiracy of these petty kings, marched with a great army, resolving to conquer their territories, and annex Bâlk to his own dominions. The Uzbeks, terrified at his approach, thought it best to desist; and, the year following, sent to beg a peace.

makes great ravages.

UPON the death of Abbâs II. which happened not long after, the Tatars taking heart again, the prince of Orkenj, in 1667, entered Merve Sava (Y) with his Uzbeks; who, finding no d resistance, made strange havock. Nor could the governors have prevented it, if they had force enough, considering with what swiftness those people invade a country, and retire. Persia then being governed by a young unexperienced prince, preparations to repel the enemy went on very slowly. At length two great lords set out, with 4000 men, to join the forces which were already in Khorassân. Six weeks after, money was sent to pay the troops in that province, under a convoy of 200 men. But the Uzbeks, getting intelligence of it, sent out a body of 3000 horse; who took their measures so well, that they carried off the treasure, in spite of the troops which were detached to overtake them^m.

Hâji Mahamed Khân.

FROM this time to the present we find very little in authors, relating to the affairs of Karazm, till 1714; when, according to Bentink, Hâji Mahamed Babâdr Khân, grandson of e Abûlghâzi Khân, sent a messenger to Petersburgh, to treat of an alliance with the court of *Russia*ⁿ. Webber mentions this prince; but calls him only the Khân of Usbek: and says, the design of the embassy was to prevail on Peter I. to oblige Ayûka Khân, his vassal, not to join with the princes his neighbours, or stir them up against him. On this condition he offered to assist the Tsar with 50,000 horse at any time, and allow his karawâns a passage through his dominions to China: which journey might be performed in four months, the road being good; whereas that through Siberia was very long and troublesome (Z). He proposed likewise to enter into a treaty of commerce with Russia, which would be very advantageous to it.

^m CHARDIN'S Coronation of Soleyman, p. 116, & seq.

ⁿ ABU'LG. Hist. Turks, p. 373.

(*) Abûlghâzi Khân ascribes this title to Shâh Abbâs I. See before, p. 729.

(R) According to Chardin, he was made prisoner after a battle, wherein the Uzbeks lost 12 or 18,000 men.

(S) The circumstances of his escape are told by Chardin in a different manner from what he relates himself.

(T) That is, the prince, the slave of the Praise-worthy; meaning God.

(U) That is, Karazm, or Urjensh. Orkenj being the Persian name.

(X) Chardin, and several others, write Uzbeks; which, according to the Persians, signifies one hundred lords: to shew, that they are governed by many princes. He adds, that the Uzbeks reject this etymology, as false and injurious; saying, the word is compounded of Yus, he, and bek, lord; as who should say, He the lord, or He is the lord: as if these were the only people on earth who are truly lords. Coronation of Soleyman III. p. 115. But, in all likelihood, this must be a mistake; since, according to the Uzbek history, they take their name from Uzbek Khân, conformable to a custom among the Tatars in general.

(Y) This must be the territory of Marû, written also Maravo, and Marave, so often mentioned before; and, for a time, belonging to Karazm.

(Z) But, should that road be deserted, it would hinder the peopling of Siberia.

- a THE ambassador was Acher Bey, about fifty years old, of a lively and venerable aspect, wearing a long beard, and an ostrich feather on his turban, which is worn by none but the principal lords. He said, his Khân was turned of twenty; and that, the year before, he had married the king of Persia's eldest daughter: that his country was called Usbek (A); and place of residence Khiva, which consisted only of tents and huts; but never fixed to any certain spot (B): that the Khân is a sovereign prince; but his authority limited by a kind of senate: that he was able to raise 200,000 cavalry; in which number were included, in the Tsar's judgment, all his male subjects, old and young: lastly, that the country of Usbek bordered on China, Hindûstân, and Persia. Among other things relating to this embassy, it is mentioned, that the Tsar liked the ambassador's music well enough^o. On which occasion it may be observed, that the inhabitants of Karazm were formerly very famous for their proficiency in that art^p.
- BENTINK informs us, that, between 1714 and 1724, when he wrote, there happened a revolution in that country; of which he knew not the particulars^q. Probably it may be the same with that mentioned by the missionaries of Syria, who acquaint us, that some years before they wrote (C), they saw the prince of the Usbeks pass through Aleppo, in his way to Mohammed's tomb, with an intention to live there a private life. His son had rebelled; and, having seized him, caused his eyes to be put out, that he might have no longer hopes of ascending the throne. He marched on horseback with his eyes bound up, conducted by fifty guards. But, since that time, we understand, continues our author, that the son died miserably, and his father was restored^r. It may be presumed, that Hâji Mahamed was the unnatural child; although the title of Hâji, or pilgrim, better suits the blind prince: but Mahamed seems too young to have had such an enterprising son. However that be, in 1719, the Usbeks of Karazm ought to have had a Khân of an enterprising genius, and who could see well, to command in person the expedition against Beckowitz, sent by the Tsar in that year, to discover the river Daria^s.

^o Present State of Russia, vol. i. p. 20. & seq.

ubi sup. p. 373.

and trav. vol. iv. p. 477 and 514.

^p LA CROIX Hist. Gengh. p. 240.

^q ABU'LGHA.

^s See new collect. of voya.

(A) The author mistook the name of the people for that of the country; which has also been so miscalled by geographers.

(B) This must be understood of his summer camp (for he dwells under tents in that season); which is not fixed: but his winter residence is Urjensh, or some other city.

(C) The author wrote between 1720 and 1724, when his memoirs were printed in Memoirs des missions en Syrie & en Egypt. Tom vi. p. 198.